In the case before us the owner of the property, through its agent, Dolan, did not suggest the plan for committing the offense of larceny, which was finally adopted; but the evidence shows conclusively that, by the consent or direction of the packing company, through words or otherwise, he suggested the commission of such an offense and invited from the accused plans to that end. The fair construction of the evidence is that in the finality the plan was a joint creation of the two, and that it required each to be an active participant in its consummation. It seems that there is good reason for holding that the situation in that respect falls within the condemnatory language in the opinion of the court in Love v. People, 160 Ill. 501, 32 L.R.A. 139, 43 N. E. 710, cited to our attention by counsel for the plaintiff in error. That will be apparent from the closing words of the opinion, which are as follows: "A contemplated crime may never be developed into a consummated act. To stimulate unlawful intentions for the purpose and with the motive of bringing them to maturity so the consequent crime may be punished, is a dangerous practice. It is safer law and sounder morals to hold, where one arranges to have a crime committed against his property or himself, and knows that an attempt is to be made to encourage others to commit the act by one acting in concert with such owner, that no crime is thus committed. The owner and his agent may wait passively for the would-be criminal to perpetrate the offense, and each and every part of it, for himself, but they must not aid, encourage, or solicit him that they may seek to punish."

We cannot well escape the conclusion that this case falls under the condemnation of the rule that, where the owner of property, by himself or his agent, actually or constructively, aids in the commission of the offense, as intended by the wrongdoer, by performing or rendering unnecessary some act in the transaction essential to the offense, the would-be criminal is not guilty of all the elements of the offense. Here Mr. Layer, acting for the owner of the property, packed or superintended the packing of the four barrels of meat as suggested by the owner's agent in the matter, Dolan, and caused the same to be placed on the platform, knowing that the accused would soon arrive to take them, under an arrangement between him and its agent, and directed its platform boss, when he inquired as to the purpose of so placing the barrels, "Let them go. They are for some man and he will call for them." He, from the standpoint of such employee directed the latter to deliver the barrels to the man when he called, the same in all respects as was done in Williams v. State, supra. He substantially made such delivery, by treating the accused when he arrived upon the scene as having a right to take the property. In that the design to trap a criminal went a little too far, at least, in that it included the doing of an act, in effect preventing the taking of the property from being characterized by any element of trespass.

The logical basis for the doctrine above discussed is that there can be no larceny without a trespass. So, if one procures his property to be taken by another intending to commit larceny, or delivers his property to such other, the latter purposing to commit such crime, the element of trespass is wanting and the crime not fully consummated, however plain may be the guilty purpose of the one possessing himself of such property. That does not militate against a person's being free to set a trap to catch one whom he suspects of an intention to commit the crime of larceny; but the setting of such trap must not go further than to afford the would-be thief the amplest opportunity to carry out his purpose, formed without such inducement on the part of the owner of the property as to put him in the position of having consented to the taking. If I induce one to come and take my property, and then place it before him to be taken, and he takes it with criminal intent; or if, knowing that one intends to take my property, I deliver it to him, and he takes it with such intent,—the essential element of trespass involving nonconsent requisite to a completed offense of larceny does not characterize the transaction, regardless of the fact that the moral turpitude involved is no less than it would be if such essential were present. Some writers, in treating this subject, give so much attention to condemning the deception practised to facilitate and encourage the commission of a crime by one supposed to have such a purpose in view that the condemnation is liable to be viewed as if the deception were sufficient to excuse the would-be criminal, or to preclude his being prosecuted; that there is a question of good morals involved as to both parties to the transaction, and that the wrongful participation of the owner of the property renders him and the public incapable of being heard to charge the person he has entrapped with the offense of larceny. That is wrong. It is the removal from the completed transaction, which, from the mental attitude of the would-be criminal may have all the ingredients of larceny, from the standpoint of the owner of the property of the element of trespass or nonconsent. When such element does not characterize a transaction involving the full offense of larceny so far as the mental purpose of such would-be criminal is concerned, is often not free from difficulty; and courts of review should incline quite strongly to support the decision of the trial judge in respect to the matter, and not disturb it except in a clear case. It seems that there is such a case before us.

If the accused had merely disclosed to Dolan, his ostensible accomplice, a purpose to improve the opportunity when one should present itself to steal barrels of meat from the packing company's loading platform, and that had been communicated by Dolan to the company, and it had then merely furnished the accused the opportunity he was looking for to carry out such purpose, and he had improved it, the situation would be quite different. The mere fact that the plan for obtaining the property was that of the accused, under the circumstances of this case, is not controlling. Dolan, as an emissary of the packing company, as we have seen, was sent to the accused to arrange, if the latter were so disposed, some sort of a plan for taking some of the company's property with the intention of stealing it. Though the accused proposed the plan, Dolan agreed to it, which involved a promise to assist in carrying it out, ostensibly as an accomplice, but actually as an instrument of the packing company. That came very near, if it did not involve, solicitation by the company, in a secret way, for the accused to take its property as proposed. With the other element added of placing such property on the loading platform for the accused to take pursuant to the agreement, with directions, in effect, to the person in charge of the platform, to let the accused take it when he came for that purpose, we are unable to see any element of trespass in the taking which followed. The packing company went very significantly further than the owner of the property did in King v. Egginton, supra, which is regarded as quite an extreme case. It solicited the opportunity to be an ostensible accomplice in committing the offense of larceny, instead of being solicited in that regard; and the property was in practical effect delivered to the would-be thief instead of its being merely placed where he could readily trespass upon the rights of the packing company by taking it. When one keeps in mind the plain distinction between merely furnishing opportunity for the execution of a formed design to commit larceny and negotiations for the purpose of developing a scheme to commit the offense, regardless of who finally proposes the plan jointly adopted, and not facilitating the execution of the plan by placing the property pursuant to the arrangement where it can readily be taken, but in practical effect, at least, delivering the same into the possession of the would-be thief, one can readily see that the element of trespass, involving non-consent, is present in the first situation mentioned, and not in the last; and that the latter pretty clearly fits the circumstances of this case.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

G. W. DWINNELL, Respt.,
v.

W. F. DYER et al., Appts.

Mines—location of claim.

1. A location of a mining claim which complies with the act of Congress, but fails to comply with the local statute as to form and record of notice, will, upon the repeal of the local statute, become valid if the required assessment work has been and is continued.

Same—order of location acts.

2. The order in which the acts for the location of a mining claim have been done is immaterial where every act necessary to a complete location has been done before an adverse claim has accrued.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Siskiyou County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to establish a mining claim. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Gillis & Tapscott, for appellants:

After the repeal of the statute defendants might adopt their former valid acts.

Mr. R. S. Taylor for respondent.

Chipman, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff alleges ownership of a quartz mine called Cuban Beauty No. 2, situated in Siskiyou county; that defendants unlawfully entered upon plaintiff's said land with force and arms, and drove off plaintiff's men there employed, and are excavating gold-bearing rock contained therein. It is prayed that defendants be enjoined from interfering with said mining property, and that plaintiff be adjudged to be the owner thereof. Defendants Oscar Dyer and Charles Trucedale disclaimed all interest in the land in controversy. Defendant W. F. Dyer answered, claiming ownership in certain three mining claims, known as Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 1 and No. 2 and No. 3. It is alleged that a portion of plaintiff's said claim overlaps a portion of Squaw Creek Gold Mines Nos. 2 and 3; ownership is claimed at the commencement of the action and some time prior thereto, and that defendant and

XV. Conclusion, 887.

I. "Mining claim" and "location" defined.

A mining claim is a parcel of land containing precious metal in its soil or rock. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 26 L. ed. 875; McFeters v. Pierson, 15 Colo. 201, 22 Am. St. Rep. 388, 24 Pac. 1076.

"Mining claim" is the name given to that portion of the public mineral lands which the miner, for mining purposes, takes and holds in accordance with mining laws, local or statutory. Mt. Diablo Mill & Min. Co. v. Callison, 5 Sawy. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 9,886.

And it includes the vein specifically located, and also all the surface ground located on each side of it, and all other veins findant, that the attempted early locations of Davis and of defendants Dyer and Phillips were not made in compliance with the law then in force, to wit, the act of March 27, 1897, of this state; defendant's contention being that his location was valid.

There is evidence that Davis made his location October 30, 1898, on which day he posted notice at the center of the north line of the claim bordering on the so-called Cuban Beauty. The lines were run out, and corners marked. The notice was not recorded until September 8, 1899. The Cuban Beauty and the Dewey, both of which corner with the Cuban Beauty No. 2 at the northeast corner of the latter, were located at the same time by the Davis party, and formed one group of mines. Davis subsequently also located the Black Bear No. 2, which lies south of and adjoining the Cuban Beauty, and west of the Cuban Beauty, No. 2, and joins it, but extends south less than half the length of the latter. He conveyed to plaintiff on November 27, 1899, by deed placed in escrow, which was delivered on compliance with the contract of sale in September, 1900. There is evidence, though not without conflict, that when these locations were made there was no other location, or signs of any other location, of the ground involved. On November 26, 1900, plaintiff relocated the Cuban Beauty No. 2 through one Cousins, who did the work. This location was intended to be and was substantially identical with the original Davis location. Cousins testified that Davis

Independent of the acts of Congress providing a mode of acquisition of title to the mineral lands of the United States, the term has always been applied to a portion of such lands to which the right of exclusive possession and enjoyment by a private person or persons has been asserted, by actual occupation or by compliance with the local mining laws, rules, usages, or customs. Williams v. Santa Clara Min. Asso. 66 Cal. 193, 5 Pac. 85.

As the term is used in the statutes of the United States, it is that portion of a vein or lode, and of the adjoining surface of the earth, or of the surface and subjacent material, to which a claimant has acquired a right of possession by virtue of compliance with the laws of the United States, and the local rules and customs of miners.

And where a claim is located upon a discovery within its limits of a vein or lode of quartz-bearing copper and gold, which is in all respects regular, it is a "mining claim" within the meaning of the proviso in the act of Congress of June 3, 1878, as amended by the act of Congress of August 4, 1892, and not subject to purchase under that act, though the application to purchase was made so soon after the location that the locator had no reasonable opportunity to develop his claim sufficiently to ascertain with any certainty the extent or value of the mineral deposits contained therein. Michie v. Gothberg, 30 Land Dec. 407.

But the mere existence of quartz or a vein does not, of itself, constitute a mine, or warrant the discoverer in locating a mining claim, so as to render a trespasser thereon liable under Mont. Comp. Stat. § 1482, p. 1055, providing that any person who shall remove any stake or monument of any claim, or obliterate, deface, or destroy any notice placed thereon, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. Territory v. Mackey, 8 Mont. 168, 19 Pac. 395.

So, a location of a mining claim is the act of appropriating a parcel of land containing precious metal in its soil or rock according 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

to established rules. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp and McFeters v. Pierson, supra.

The word "location" includes all the acts requisite to perfect the right of possession of a mining claim, including the discovery. Uinta Tunnel, Min. & Transp. Co. v. Ajax Gold Min. Co. 73 C. C. A. 35, 141 Fed. 663; McKay v. McDougall, 25 Mont. 258, 87 Am. St. Rep. 395, 64 Pac. 669.

And it usually consists in placing on the ground in a conspicuous position a notice setting forth the name of the locator and the fact that the claim is located, with a description of the extent and boundaries of the parcel located according to statutory authority or local customs. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp, supra.

It does not mean merely the initiation of a location by entry and performance of the first necessary step. McKay v. McDougall, supra.

Nor is a location of a mining claim made by taking possession alone, but by marking on the ground, recording, and doing whatever else is required for that purpose by act of Congress and the local laws and regulations. Garfield M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153; Noyes v. Black, 4 Mont. 527, 2 Pac. 769; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. ed. 735.

It is the discovery by a qualified person of a lode or vein of mineral-bearing rock in place on the vacant land of the United States, and the appropriation thereof, evidenced by posting notice and recording the same, and by marking on the ground the boundaries so that they may be readily traced, that initiates a valid mining claim. SHARKEY v. CANDIANI.

And the essentials to complete location which will vest title in the claimant usually are, first, discovery; second, notice; third, location; fourth, marking the boundaries; and fifth, record. Marshall v. Harney Peak Tin Min. Mill. & Mfg. Co. 1 S. D. 350, 47 N. W. 290; Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah. 410, 64 Pac. 1019.

The word "location," in its application to mining claims, however, is frequently used had previously shown him the lines and corners, and in January, 1900, defendant Oscar Dyer, in company with Davis, showed him some of the lines and corners. Speaking of the relocation in November, 1900, he testified: "At the time I located this claim, I went all over it. As for mining work, there was a small hole dug on it. In some small places it was picked a little. There wasn't a square yard of dirt or rock moved in any one place. I don't think it would amount to a cubic yard." When Oscar Dyer was with Cousins in January, 1900, he told Cousins that his brother (defendant) claimed the ground west of the southeast corner of the Davis claim, and that more than the assessment work had been done. Cousins testified: "I then said that I had seen they had.

But it wasn't on what we claimed. They hadn't hit a lick of work on what we claimed. North of our south line he had done a lot of work upon the hill and on the ground we didn't claim."

It appears from plaintiff's testimony that he relocated the Cuban Beauty No. 2 because of some doubt of the legality of the Davis location under the state mining law of 1897, and his attempt to do the assessment work was in order to hold the claim if the Davis location was legal. As to the relocation in 1900, the assessment work becomes immaterial, as it might be done at any time during the year 1901, and the action was tried in August of that year. It also appeared from plaintiff's testimony that he acquired all the Davis group of claims, and the contract of in a restricted sense to portray the placing of the claim, the posting of the notice, and the marking of the boundaries, excluding discovery. Uinta Tunnel, Min. & Transp. Co. v. Ajax Gold Min. Co. supra.

And the use of the word "location" with relation to mining ground, in an agreed statement of facts in a controversy stipulating that the lode claims of the plaintiff were located in compliance with the law at dates anterior to the location of defendant's tunnel site, and as to an issue made in the pleadings upon the question whether mineral in rock in place was discovered upon the plaintiff's claim before the location of the tunnel site, the testimony tending to negative such discovery, is in its restricted sense, excluding discovery, and does not estop the defendant from litigating the issue relative to the discovery of mineral in rock in place in the plaintiff's claim prior to location of the defendant's tunnel site. Ibid.

So, in mining parlance the word "location" is sometimes used as synonymous with the term "mining claim." McPeters v. Pierson, 15 Colo. 201, 22 Am. St. Rep. 388, 24 Pac. 1076.

But this use of the term has grown incidentally out of the fact that the mining claim is located; and it cannot be deemed a strictly correct one.

For examples of the use of the word "location" in its restricted sense, as indicating a mere placing of the claim, see infra, VII. f.

II. Scope of note.

For the purpose of this note, the word "location," though sometimes used in its more restricted sense, is to be given its broader scope, including all the acts requisite to perfect the right of possession of a mining claim. And what is here intended to be considered is the act of locating, not the thing located. It is not intended, however, to include anything beyond the steps necessary to initiate and perfect a right of possession. Questions of forfeiture by abandonment, or failure to work the claim, or otherwise, of rights once fully acquired, are not regarded as legitimately within the scope of this note. Though the rule has been adopted, as seems to have been done in at least one jurisdiction, that assessment work is a part of the process of location, and that this must be properly done to constitute a complete location, the question of the effect of failure to do it is one of forfeiture rather than of location, and cases on that subject have been left for future consideration.

The design of this note is to consider the questions, What may be located as a mining claim? Who may locate? and What steps must be taken to consummate a location? Questions as to rights acquired by location or as to rights lost after acquisition, are not within the scope of this note. Nor is the subject territorially unlimited. Both before and after the enactment by Congress of the mining laws, the right to appropriate mineral lands was confined, as we shall see (infra, III. V.), to the public lands of the national government; and since, in the thirteen original states, the national government never owned any public lands, there is nothing in them to which location can apply. So, though in a number of the other states much of the land was originally public domain, it has been disposed of in other ways, as by sale, and by provision for leasing, etc., so as to leave nothing to which rules with reference to location of mining claims are applicable. With some exceptions of a minor character, mining laws and rules with reference to locations of mining claims upon the public domain would appear to be confined in their operation to the precious-metal-bearing states and territories, consisting of Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

The act of Congress of May 17, 1884, establishing a civil government for Alaska, extends to it the provisions of the mineral laws of the United States; and the acts of Congress relating to the location and possession of mining claims constitute the law sale calls for the payment of $125,000 for all the mines. There were some others besides the three mentioned by plaintiff in his testimony following: "There were three claims,—the Cuban Beauty, the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and the Admiral Dewey,—and that work [the assessment work for 1899] on the Admiral Dewey was supposed to develop the three claims, and was done for that purpose; and then I did the assessment work for those three claims on the Admiral Dewey. I spent about $3,000 on the Admiral Dewey for the time in doing it. I ran about 500 feet of tunnels, and then I built some buildings, and then I fixed the trail and general development of the mining claims." Allen Davis testified that he was working on the Dewey mine about May 1, 1899, and met defendant William Dyer there at that time; and, in a conversation, Dyer, in reply to a question as to the line between sections 6 and 7, and as to whether his location extended into section 6, pointed out about where the section line was, and stated: "I haven't got anything in 6. All of mine is in section 7." The south line of the Cuban Beauty No. 2 is admittedly a considerable distance north of this section line,—“300 or 400 feet,” as testified by witness Cousins. Dyer's claims did in fact extend onto section 6, and he probably meant no more in his statement to Cousins and those present than that he claimed nothing within the lines of the Davis location of the Cuban Beauty No. 2. Dyer knew where the section line was, and so testified. The court found that the

III. Location previous to mining statutes.

a. Foundation of the right.

Previous to the Federal mining acts of 1866 and 1872, there existed no provision for the disposition of the public mineral lands; but a system was permitted to grow up by the voluntary action and assent of the population by which such lands were appropriated and used for mining purposes by the free and unrestrained occupation of the mineral regions for the purpose of taking minerals, which was tacitly assented to and encouraged by the government; and the right of miners to be protected in their selected localities came to be regarded as having the force and effect of res judicata. Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Cal. 140, 63 Am. Dec. 113.

This right was based upon appropriation and possession. Attwood v. Fricot, 17 Cal. 37, 76 Am. Dec. 567; Brown v. 49 & 56 Quartz Min. Co. 15 Cal. 153, 76 Am. Dec. 468.

The rights of miners who had taken possession of mines and worked and developed them were rights which the government had, by its conduct, recognized and encouraged, and was bound to protect. Broder v. Natoma Water & Min. Co. 101 U. S. 274, 25 L. ed. 790.

of mining lands belonging to the United States, the court proceeded upon the presumption of a grant from the government to the first appropriator of mines, water privileges, and the like. Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 567.

And the question involved in ejectment for mining claims upon public lands was, Which one of two competing claimants, as against the other, had the better right to mine the land in question? and the doctrine that the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title did not apply. Richardson v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 339.

Actual possession was prima facie evidence of title in the possessor, and was protected by law against lawless invasion without right or color of right; and a person who knew that a mining claim was in the actual possession of another could not make an entry thereon in good faith, unless it was made by some right, or color of right, existing before the entry. Phenix Mill. & Min. Co. v. Lawrence, 55 Cal. 143.

And an entry and location of a mining claim in the possession of another was invalid and conferred no rights, where the locator entered not upon faith of any title in himself, but to take advantage of what he supposed to be a defect in the title of the person in possession. Ibid.

b. Miners' rules and regulations.

The fact that undefined possession was calculated to lead to conflicting interests appealed to the love of order and system and of fair dealing possessed by the vast number of miners attracted to mining regions by the discovery of gold in the west, in common with the rest of the American people, and led to the framing by them, in the different regions which they occupied, of rules, differing in different districts only according to the extent and character of the mines, for their government, by which they were permitted to appropriate ground for mining purposes, and the extent of the ground they could severally hold was designated, their possessory right to such ground secured and

It is not necessary to discuss the validity of the original location by Davis, for the court found that it was not made in conformity with the state law (Stat. 1897, chap. 159, p. 214), and the finding cannot be questioned by plaintiff. Cowing v. Rogers, 34 Cal. 648. Nor do we think it necessary to examine the evidence, particularly as to the validity of the Dyer locations made about the same time, for they also failed to comply with the statute, and the court so found. Dyer subsequently posted a new notice, January 14, 1899, recorded March 13, 1899. The statute above referred to was in force until February 28, 1899, when it was repealed. Stat. 1899, chap. 113,

p. 148. Dyer claims under this location, as well as his location in 1898. But we think the evidence fails to establish the validity of either location, while there is evidence showing the validity of plaintiff's location of November 26, 1900. As we understand the purpose of the evidence as to these early locations, it was not so much to show valid locations in fact as it was to show the intention of the locators as to the particular ground in question. Appellant's contention is that he took all the ground south and west of a line drawn from the southeast corner of the Brown Bear claim to what is now claimed by plaintiff to be the southeast corner of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and, as the Brown Bear claim lay west of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and extended only about 600 enforced, and contests between them either avoided or determined. Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. S. 453, 25 L. ed. 240.

These regulations, rules, and customs were appealed to in controversies in the courts, and received their sanction. Ibid.

And the manner of locating a mining claim upon the public domain was regulated by the rules and by-laws made by the inhabitants of the district in which the claim was situated, or, in the absence of such rules and by-laws, by the local usages and customs of the district. Sullivan v. Hense, 2 Colo. 424; Consolidated Republican Mountain Min. Co. v. Lebanon Min. Co. 9 Colo. 343, 12 Pac. 212; Mallett v. Uncle Sam Gold & S. Min. Co. 1 Nev. 188, 90 Am. Dec. 484.

And a right to a mining claim vested upon the taking in accordance with local rules. McGarrity v. Byington, 12 Cal. 426, 2 Morrison. Min. Rep. 311.

Where such rules, customs, or usages existed in a mining district, a valid location of a mining claim could be made only according to their requirements. Sullivan v. Hense; Consolidated Republican Mountain Min. Co. v. Lebanon Min. Co.; and Mallett v. Uncle Sam Gold & S. Min. Co.—supra; Glacier Mountain Silver Min. Co. v. Willis, 127 U. S. 471, 32 L. ed. 172, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1214.

And where local mining customs existed with reference to locating mining claims, controversies affecting a mining right were required to be solved and determined by them, whether they were written or unwritten. Morton v. Solambo Copper Min. Co. 26 Cal. 527, 4 Morrison, Min. Rep. 463.

The title presumed to rest in the first appropriator of mining lands was a title subject to the conditions imposed by the mining laws and customs under and by virtue of which it was acquired. Mallett v. Uncle Sam Gold & S. Min. Co. supra.

And a miner locating a claim where no mining laws existed held it by actual occupancy and such work for the development of the mine as, under all the circumstances, was deemed reasonable. Ibid.

The rule that the mode of acquiring a mining claim, and its extent, were governed by local mining rules, was not deemed inconsistent with the statutory provision giving effect to local regulations, provided such regulations should not be inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the state, where no right of property would attach or was affected thereby. Dutch Flat Water Co. v. Mooney, 12 Cal. 534.

And, under a statutory provision that customs, usages, and regulations shall govern the decision of an action with reference to possession of certain mining claims, no distinction is made between the effect of a custom or usage, proof of which must rest in parol, and a regulation which may be adopted at a miners' meeting, embodied in a written local law. Harvey v. Ryan, 42 Cal. 626.

c. What land could be taken.

Previous to the Federal statutes on the subject, by the policy of the government all citizens were permitted to dig for gold and silver upon the public lands. Hicks v. Bell, 3 Cal. 219; Stoakes v. Barrett, 5 Cal. 37.

As a general rule the public mineral lands of the state were open to the occupancy of every person who, in good faith, chose to enter upon them for the purpose of mining. Gillan v. Hutchinson, 16 Cal. 153.

And, under a statutory provision in California that all lands shall be regarded as public lands until the legal title is shown to have passed from the government to private parties, a person going upon mineral land to mine is not presumed to be a trespasser. Burdge v. Smith, 14 Cal. 380; Smith v. Doe, 15 Cal. 100.

And the mere possession of a tract of mineral land was not sufficient to support ejectment as against a person entering upon and occupying it for mining purposes. Smith v. Doe, supra.

But to authorize the invasion of private property in order to mine for gold or silver required specific legislation. Stoakes v. Barrett, 5 Cal. 36.

And the California act of April 20, 1852, feet along the latter, the said line would cut off more than a third of the southwest portion of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, including the ledges and rock in place found on the latter by Davis, its original locator. This contention of appellant is based largely on evidence that Davis himself conceded this to be the dividing line in February, 1890, when he and appellant and some other persons were on the ground for the purpose of ascertaining its location. It appeared, however, that, when Davis took the party to what in fact was the southeast corner of his claim, he by mistake told them it was the southwest corner, and that his southeast corner lay over east, near the Chadwick claim. The evidence here is in sharp conflict, and there is evidence that the Cuban

Beauty No. 2 was laid out originally as claimed by plaintiff, and that, when Davis pointed east for his southeast corner, he by mistake called it the southwest corner, which would thus cut off the triangular piece in the southwest part of the claim. This was all cleared up to the satisfaction of the trial court, and, as there was evidence to support its conclusion, it cannot now be disturbed. Besides, the trial court held that, as these declarations of Davis were made after he had sold the property to plaintiff, they were inadmissible as affecting plaintiff's title; and this ruling, though objected to at the time, is not now questioned. The bearing of this evidence was confined to its effect upon statements of plaintiff's witnesses as to where the lines of plaintiff's claim prescribing the mode of maintaining and defending possessory actions on public lands, gave permission to all persons to work the mines upon public lands, notwithstanding that they might be in the possession and enjoyment of another for the purpose of agriculture or grazing. Ibid.; Rupley v. Welch, 23 Cal. 452.

And, under that act, the rights of agriculturists in the occupation of public lands were made to yield to those of the miner, where gold was discovered in their lands. Tartar v. Spring Creek Water & Min. Co. 5 Cal. 395.

Miners were given the right, in good faith, to extract any valuable metals that might be found in lands occupied by settlers for agricultural purposes, provided it was exercised in the most practicable manner and with the least injury to the occupant. McClintock v. Bryden, 5 Cal. 97, 63 Am. Dec. 87; Clark v. Duval, 15 Cal. 85; Smith v. Doe, supra.

Nor was this right affected by the fact that the occupant for agricultural purposes located upon such lands prior to legislation authorizing the location for mining purposes. McClintock v. Bryden, supra.

Or by the fact that lands taken up for agricultural purposes had been inclosed. Clark v. Duval, supra.

And the cultivation of land and the raising of crops of grain or grass thereon were uses of land purely for agricultural or grazing purposes, within the meaning of a statute providing that possession of public lands containing mines of precious metals, for agricultural and grazing purposes, shall not preclude the working of such mines by any person desiring to do so. Rupley v. Welch, supra.

But, while the legislature, in California, saw fit to foster and protect the mining interests as paramount to all others, in permitting miners to go upon public lands occupied by others, it legalized what would otherwise have been a trespass; and its act could not be extended by implication to cases, or classes of cases, not specially provided for. Fitzgerald v. Urton, 5 Cal. 308; Burdge v. Underwood, 6 Cal. 45.

And a miner had no right to dig or do other work within the inclosure surrounding a dwelling house, corral, or other improvements of value. Burdge v. Underwood, supra.

And occupation of a lot on mining lands for the purpose of hotel keeping was not inconsistent with the policy of the law with regard to mining claims; and the person so occupying had a right to be reasonably protected in his occupation, and could not be disturbed by a person endeavoring to mine in his inclosure. Fitzgerald v. Urton, supra.

And, by the California act of April 25, 1855, it was provided that whenever any person shall, for mining purposes, desire to occupy or use any mineral lands then occupied by growing crops, he shall give a bond to the owner of the crops conditioned to pay any damage sustained by reason of their destruction. Rupley v. Welch, supra.

This act merely regulated a right to mine on public lands used for agricultural purposes, previously vested in the miner, and was not subject to constitutional objection. Ibid.

Though it was designed for the protection of growing crops and improvements in the mining districts of the state, and, so far as it purported to give a right of entry upon mineral lands in case no such right existed anterior to its passage, it was clearly invalid. Gillan v. Hutchinson, 16 Cal. 153.

And under it valuable and permanent improvements, such as houses, orchards, vineyards, etc., and growing crops of every description, were protected against appropriation for mining purposes. Ibid.

And a tract of land taken up under the California possessory act, and inclosed, and upon which were planted fruit and ornamental trees and shrubbery, could not be entered upon and dug up for mining purposes, so as to destroy the trees and shrubbery; and such entry and destruction might be enjoined. Daubenspeck v. Grear, 18 Cal. 444.

But where a miner desiring to mine on were in fact located. Appellant used at the trial a plat by way of illustration. Much of the evidence brought out in connection with this map is so reported as to be unintelligible here, though doubtless was understood by the trial judge. The diagram was not proved to be correct. It furnishes us but little aid, because not drawn to show the exact situation of the several claims referred to in the evidence, and is but an approximation of their relation to each other. It is confusing by reason of this fact, and also because the top of the map is south instead of north, which latter is the usual and better method of preparing illustrative maps. From the best consideration we can give of the evidence with this map in hand, we think the findings are supported.

lands occupied for agricultural purposes offered to give the proper bond to indemnify the occupant against damage from the destruction of his crops, provided for by law, and the occupant refused to receive such bond, the entry of the miner upon such land for mining purposes was not unlawful and could not be treated as a trespass; but he was liable for damage to the growing crops caused by his acts, and was compelled to give the bond required by statute upon demand. Rupley v. Welch, 23 Cal. 452.

And the owner of an orchard upon public lands could not restrain miners from digging up his ground for mining purposes, where the trees planted thereon were not planted in good faith, but rather as a means of stopping the mining. Ensminger v. McIntire, 23 Cal. 593.

Nor could he do so unless he showed priority of appropriation of the land in controversy. Ibid.

So, the act of a person of taking up and inclosing 12 acres of mineral land in a mining district under the pretext of holding it in exclusive occupancy as a town lot did not affect the right of a miner subsequently to enter upon the land in good faith for the purpose of digging gold therein, where in his operations he did no injury to the comfortable use of the premises as a residence, or for carrying on any mechanical or commercial business. Martin v. Browner, 11 Cal. 12.

Nor did an entry upon a portion of public land by virtue of the California act of 1858, as seminary land, to which the state was entitled under act of Congress, prevent its subsequent entry by another for the purpose of the extraction of gold, and the use of the water running through it as auxiliary to mining, where the land was mineral land. Burdge v. Smith, 14 Cal. 380.

And a person might take up a claim for mining purposes that had been and still was used as a place for tailings by another, though his mining right would be subject to this prior right of deposit; but the claim of the miner would not be subject to those who should come after him. O'Keiffe v. Cunning, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The principal point urged by appellant is that he was in possession of the contested ground when plaintiff made his last location, and therefore it was not unoccupied mineral land and subject to location by plaintiff. Defendant claims from the evidence that the man sent to relocate the claim for plaintiff was driven off by defendant before he did any work; that defendant had a dwelling house on the claim, was living in it and working on the claim, and had done about $2,000 worth of work on it; and had the claim marked off so that the boundaries could be readily traced. And it is claimed that plaintiff had to commit a trespass upon the ground in order to locate. The decisions are not entirely harmonious as to whether an occupation such as is described above, ham, 9 Cal. 589, 9 Morrison, Min. Rep. 451.

And one person might locate ground containing mineral for fluming purposes, and another might, either at the same time or at a different time, locate the same ground for mining purposes; and the two locations, being for different purposes, would not be in conflict. Ibid.

The rights of miners and persons owning ditches constructed for mining purposes, however, were not paramount to all other rights of a different character, regardless of time or mode of their acquisition. Wixon v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 24 Cal. 367, 85 Am. Dec. 69.

And a person entering lands for mining purposes could not divest the vested right of property of another in a reservoir which he had constructed across the bed of a ravine for the purpose of collecting the water flowing down the same for the purpose of irrigating a garden or fruit trees. Rupley v. Welch, supra.

So, Cal. act March, 1856, § 11, for the protection of actual settlers, and to quiet titles in the state, was designed for the benefit of those who desired to build up homes in the country, and for that purpose were seeking, in good faith, lands for settlement and occupation; and miners engaged simply in extracting gold from a quartz vein were not "settled upon" the vein, within the meaning of these words as used in the statute, so as to permit them to avail themselves of the two years' limitation of that act. Fremont v. Seals, 18 Cal. 434.

Nor could one entering upon public lands for mining purposes when the lands have been taken up for other purposes justify his entry in any way, except by showing that the land was public land, that it contained mines or minerals, and that the person entering did so for the bona fide purpose of mining. Lentz v. Victor, 17 Cal. 271.

And that lands were public lands, and that they contained mines or minerals, and that the person entering upon them against a prior possession did so for the bona fide purpose of mining, were in the nature of a under an invalid location, would be sufficient to prevent a valid location being made by another qualified person, provided he could do so without the use of force. The question is not necessarily involved in this case. There is evidence, which the trial court accepted, showing that the facts are not as above claimed. Defendant had done much work on a claim at considerable distance from plaintiff's claim, and he had a dwelling house on one of his claims, but it was a mile from plaintiff's claim. There was evidence that these improvements were not on any claim that encroached upon plaintiff's claim. Defendant's map shows a cabin which was erected by defendant more recently, but it is not on plaintiff's claim. The only work done by defendant on any part of plaintiff's claim is described as of but small extent. The evidence is not that Cousins, who made plaintiff's location, was driven off by defendant at the time the location was made. This circumstance happened some time before, when he went there to do assessment work under the Davis location. So far as the evidence shows, Cousins made the relocation peaceably, and without interruption or objection by any person. He was familiar with the lines by previous examination of them, and he testified that when he relocated the claim he went all over it, and found only such evidences of work on it as have been already stated. He found no person on any part of the claim, and no one in actual possession of any part of it. The utmost that can be said justification of the entry as against an apparent and prima facie right of the actual prior possessor; and were required to be affirmatively pleaded, with all the requisite averments to show the right under the statute, or by law, to enter, in an action of ejectment brought by the actual possessor against the person so entering. Ibid.

So, previous to the Federal mining laws, the acquisition of possessory title to land valuable only for the metals which it contained, such as land on which tailings had been deposited, which was not claimed for any other purpose, was governed by the same rules ordinarily controlling possessory titles to mining claims. Rogers v. Cooney, 7 Nev. 213.

And whether a town lot located by a miner for mining purposes was so necessary for his use to enable him to work his mine as to make his right superior to that of a pre-emptor, in accordance with the act of Congress of July 1, 1864, providing that, where mineral veins are possessed, which possession is recognized by local authority, and to the extent so possessed and recognized, the title to lodes to be acquired shall be subject to such recognized possession, and the necessary use thereof, was a question of fact for the jury. Courchaine v. Bullion Min. Co. 4 Nev. 369.

d. The question of possession.

While mining claims were held by possession, that possession was regulated and defined by usage and local and conventional rules; and the actual possession which is applied to agricultural lands was not required, in case of a mining claim, in order to give a right of action for the invasion of it. Attwood v. Fricot, 17 Cal. 37, 76 Am. Dec. 567.

And going on a lead to work it, or even work done in proximity to it, for the purpose of extracting, or preparing to extract, minerals from it,—as, for example, starting a tunnel a considerable distance away to run into a claim,—constituted possession of the claim, which would sustain an action against a person subsequently taking possession. English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 107, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

76 Am. Dec. 574, 12 Morrison, Min. Rep. 202.

But the possession of a mining claim which enabled one to maintain an action must have been either actual possession or constructive possession, under the rules or regulations of miners. Pralus v. Jefferson Gold & S. Min. Co. 34 Cal. 558.

And a claim of possession of lands for mining purposes must have been in some way defined as to limits before possession of, or working upon, it gave possession to any more than that part so possessed or worked. Attwood v. Fricot, supra.

And constructive possession of a mining claim, which would sustain an action to quiet title thereto, could be established only by proof of local mining customs, rules, and regulations in force in the district embracing the claim, and that particular acts were required thereby in the location and working of claims, and that the locator had substantially complied with such requirements. Pralus v. Jefferson Gold & S. Min. Co. supra.

But actual possession of a portion of a mining claim, according to the custom of miners in a given locality, extended by construction to the limits of the claim held in accordance with such custom. Hicks v. Bell, 3 Cal. 219; Attwood v. Fricot, supra.

And a person who made a location of a small tract of mining land of demarked limits, and took possession thereof, was prima facie rightfully possessed, in the absence of any proof that his claim was opposed to the local rules. English v. Johnson, supra.

And such possession taken for mining purposes embraced the whole claim thus characterized, though the actual occupancy or work was on or of only a part, and though the party did not enter in accordance with mining rules or under a paper title. Ibid.

And, when accompanied with actual occupancy of a part of the tract, was sufficient to enable the possessor to maintain ejectment for the entire claim. Table Mountain Tun- of the evidence in support of defendant's contention is that he had an invalid location on which he had done much work outside the boundaries of the claim in dispute, that he claimed that his location overlapped and included some of plaintiff's ground, and that in 1899 he had done some prospecting work on the disputed ground, but was not working this ground when plaintiff's relocation was made.

In view of this state of facts, the case of Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. ed. 735, would seem to settle the question against defendants' contention. In that case Belk attempted to make a location in December, 1876, and did everything necessary to a valid location, if the ground was then subject to location. There was, however, a prior locator, whose rights precluded a valid location by Belk. This prior locator's rights expired on January 1, 1877, and were in fact then lost. Belk claimed that, upon the failure of the prior locator to keep his location alive, his (Belk's) location, made in December, at once attached. The court held that it did not so operate. Between December 19th and February 21st following, Belk did a small amount of work on the claim, which did not occupy more than two days of his time, and he had no other possession of the property than such as arose from his location of the claim and his occasional labor upon it. On February 21, 1877, defendants Meagher and others entered on the property peaceably and made another relocation, doing all that was required to perfect their nel Co. v. Stranahan, 20 Cal. 198, 9 Morrison, Min. Rep. 457, 21 Cal. 548.

Nor did the fact that location was not originally made in strict accordance with the mining rules in force at the time invalidate it as to coclaimants and their grantees, where it was actually possessed and worked for several years, and was generally recognized as valid by the miners in the vicinity. Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 7,827.

So, prior possession of a mining claim, not taken in pursuance of mining rules, was good as against one who subsequently took possession in the same way. English v. Johnson, supra.

While a person could not, in defiance of mining rules, take up any quantity of mineral land he chose, and hold it by merely putting up stakes, or marking lines, or inclosing it, he could hold the quantity allowed to be taken up by him by the rules without strictly complying with the regulations prescribing the mode of taking, so as to be protected in the possession of that quantity as against one not claiming through the rules. Ibid.

And the prior appropriator of public lands got the better right where the title of the respective parties was based on possession alone, though the prior appropriation was for agricultural purposes, while the subsequent appropriation was for mining purposes. Gibson v. Puchta, 33 Cal. 310.

e. Extent of claim.

Previous to the enactment of the Federal mining laws, the extent of a mining claim depended upon the question of reasonableness; and, if the quantity of ground included in a mining claim was unreasonable, the location was not effectual for any purpose, and possession under it extended only to the ground actually occupied. Table Mountain Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan, supra.

And general customs in force at the time of the location of a mining claim were admissible in evidence upon the question of the reasonableness of its extent, where there were no local customs or regulations in force in the district at that time. Table Mountain Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan, 31 Cal. 387.

And the testimony of witnesses as to the extent of a mining location was not objectionable as not being the best evidence, in an action for the recovery of possession of mining ground, where the location was not made by notices alone, boundaries having been designated by fixed objects on or near the exterior boundaries. Kelly v. Taylor, 23 Cal. 11.

But the quantity of ground a miner might claim by appropriation for mining purposes might be limited by the mining rules of the district. Prosser v. Parks, 18 Cal. 47; United States v. Castillero, 2 Black, 17, 17 L. ed. 360.

And the length of a mining claim located in a district might be proved by showing the rule or custom of the mining district as to the length of claims as shown by the record of such claims. Sullivan v. Hense, 2 Colo. 424.

And, if a locator took more land than these rules allowed, he got no title to the excess against one who complied with the laws and took such excess in accordance with them. English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 107, 76 Am. Dec. 574, 12 Morrison, Min. Rep. 202.

But a person who took up and marked out a larger mining claim than the rules allowed was entitled to keep and maintain possession of it as against one entering without complying with the rules. Ibid.

Nor could a local rule be given in evidence to affect the validity of a claim acquired previous to its establishment. Table Mountain Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan, 20 Cal. 198, 9 Morrison, Min. Rep. 457, 21 Cal. 548.

And evidence of differing customs in different mining districts was not admissible to show the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the extent of a mining claim; a general custom was required to be proved if one existed. Table Mountain Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan, 31 Cal. 387.

Under these rules and regulations, however, the location of the lode was regarded rights, if the premises were then open to them. After showing that the rights of Belk were not affected by the Montana statute, and that his right of location depended entirely on the act of Congress, the court said: "All he got or could get by his entry was possession, and that, to be of any avail, must be actual. Under the provisions of the Revised Statutes relied on, Belk could not get a patent for the claim he attempted to locate unless he secured what is here made the equivalent of a valid location, by actually holding and working for the requisite time. If he actually held possession and worked the claim long enough, and kept all others out, his right to a patent would be complete. He had no grant of any right of possession. His ultimate right to a patent depended entirely on his keeping himself in and all others out, and, if he was not actually in, he was, in law, out. A peaceable adverse entry, coupled with the right to hold possession which was thereby acquired, operated as an ouster, which broke the continuity of his holding, and deprived him of the title he might have got if he had kept it for the requisite length of time. He had made no such location as prevented the lands from being, in law, vacant. Others had the right to enter for the purpose of taking them up, if it could be done peaceably and without force." The court then said: "There is nothing in Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513, 24 L. ed. 732, to the contrary of this." Applying the principles of Belk v. Meagher, we must hold that defendant acquired no right to the disputed land which constituted it other than unoccupied as the principal thing, and that of the surface as a mere incident thereto; and a claim was defined by the terms of the notice of location claiming the vein, and not by posts and monuments erected on the ground. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312.

And a vein located by means of a notice posted on the croppings, and by recording the notice and doing work at the discovery point, without any definition of the boundaries, gave the locator the right to follow the vein in whatever direction it might run to the extent claimed in the location notice, taking the adjacent surface necessary for the convenient working of the mine as a mere incident thereto. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442; Elgin Min. & Smelting Co. v. Iron Silver Min. Co. 14 Fed. 377, Affirmed in 118 U. S. 196, 30 L. ed. 98, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177.

And, when a mistake in the direction of the vein was discovered, the locator had a right to change the lines of his surface claim, even though by so doing it encroached upon the claim of a subsequent locator. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. supra.

So, where, by the mining laws and regulations of a neighborhood, the locator of a quartz lead therein had a right to a portion of it on complying with certain rules, one of which was that he should post up notices near the premises stating his claim, and the vein as subsequently ascertained ran in a different direction from that given in the notice, the misdescription did not affect his right to hold, as against a subsequent locator, a part of the undeveloped portion of the vein which ran out of the direction indicated in the notice, the main thing being the vein. Johnson v. Parks, 10 Cal. 449, 4 Morrison. Min. Rep. 316.

Nor did the fact that a party had located a claim bounded by another claim, in the absence of mining rules regulating the subject of claims, their course, distances, etc., raise any implication or inference that the last located claim corresponded in size, or the direction of its lines, with the former. Live Yankee Co. v. Oregon Co. 7 Cal. 40.

Boundaries of a mining claim were required to be fixed, however, under the mining ordinances of Mexico, or the title was void for uncertainty. United States v. Castillero, supra.

f. Notice of appropriation.

Before the enactment of the mineral laws, the right to the possession of a particular piece of mining ground on the government domain might be established by evidence of its appropriation by the claimant by means which, in view of the nature of the subject and of surrounding circumstances, would give notice to those who had a right to know, that that particular mining land was subjected to the dominion and control of some private claimant. Hess v. Winder, 30 Cal. 349, 12 Morrison, Min. Rep. 217.

And the location of a claim by the one discovering it, by putting up a written notice with his name and those of the others concerned upon it, thus making claim to the discovery, was the usual mode recognized among miners to indicate the taking up of a mining claim. Gore v. McBrayer, 18 Cal. 582, 1 Morrison, Min. Rep. 645.

A location was commonly made by posting a notice in reasonable proximity to the point at which a lode was discovered or exposed, stating that the locator claimed so many feet of the vein extending so far and in such a direction or directions from the discovery point, together with the amount of adjacent surface ground allowed by the rules of the district; and this notice had the effect of holding the ground described a certain length of time, commonly ten days, after which it was necessary to have the notice recorded by the district recorder in order to keep the claim good. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. and Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra.

To hold a mining claim by virtue of prior possession alone, however, without refer-public land, or precluded plaintiff from making a valid location thereon. See the question discussed and cases cited pro and con in Lindley on Mines, 2d ed. §§ 216-210. Belk v. Meagher also disposes of appellant's further contention that the repeal of the act of 1897 did not impair his rights vested by virtue of his invalid location. He could only claim such land as he actually possessed and was working in good faith.

The judgment and order should be affirmed.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

ence to local mining customs, the locator must have marked out his mining boundaries by such distinct marks or monuments as would indicate to any person what his exterior boundaries were. Hess v. Winder, supra.

And entry upon a tract of mining ground for mining purposes on the public domain did not give the miner the right to recover damages for an entry by a stranger upon a part of the tract not in his actual occupancy, where his boundaries were not plainly indicated by marks or monuments, and there was no local mining custom allowing his possession to extend to the ground upon which the entry was made. Ibid.

And the boundaries of land claimed for mining purposes must have been indicated by such definite physical marks or monuments as would fairly advertise to all concerned where and what it was, and its extent. Ibid.

The marks must have been of sufficient prominence to be found by one honestly concerned and diligently endeavoring to discover whether the land was claimed by some other person for mining purposes. Ibid.

The mode of notifying others of the extent of the claim of a possessor of public lands for mining purposes, and what the extent of the mining claim was, however, was generally regulated by the miners of the particular locality, whose rules in this respect were adopted as rules of law; though, in the absence of evidence of such rules, or of the customs of miners in the particular district, the case was governed by the general rules in such cases. Ibid.

And it could not be assumed without proof that a certificate of location on the records of a mining district was all that was necessary to make a valid title to a mining claim, or that the certificate itself was made according to legal rules of the district; the evidence should show the essential features of a good location in the district. Sullivan v. Hense, 2 Colo. 424.

A rehearing in banc was subsequently granted, after which, on September 28, 1904, Beatty, Ch. J., handed down the following additional opinion:

Action to quiet title to a mining claim. In his complaint, filed November 30, 1900, the plaintiff alleged, among other things, that he was, and for a long time had been, the owner, entitled to the possession, and in the exclusive possession, of a quartz-lode mining claim, known as the "Cuban Beauty No. 2;" that on the 15th of November, 1900, the defendants had entered upon the claim with force and arms, and had driven off the men employed by him to do the necessary assessment work for that year; that they claim was asserted under mining rules containing no requirement that notices should be posted upon the claim at the time of location, a custom in the mining district, requiring a party locating to post a notice of his claim upon the ground, was admissible in evidence; such custom merely prescribing an additional and not unreasonable requirement for location. Harvey v. Ryan, 42 Cal. 626.

In the absence of any mining rule declaring that a failure to record a claim or entry avoids it, however, an entry with actual possession taken by the claimant was good as against a subsequent entry and location in due form by another. English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 107, 76 Am. Dec. 574, 12 Morrison, Min. Rep. 202.

And a statutory rule that the records of mining districts shall be taken as evidence in the courts does not extend beyond the records made according to the local rules and customs of the district. Sullivan v. Hense, supra.

IV. Statutory authority for location.

a. The Federal statutes.

On July 26, 1866, it was enacted by Congress (14 Stat. at L. 251, chap. 262), that the mineral lands of the public domain, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and occupation by all citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become such, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and subject, also, to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same may not be in conflict with the laws of the United States, restricting each locator, in § 4 thereof, to but one location on the same lode. This act stood until 1872, when it was superseded and repealed by the act of Congress of May 10, 1872 (17 Stat. at L. 91, chap. 152, § 1, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), providing that all valuable mineral deposits in lands had taken possession of the ground, claimed to own it, and were excavating and removing the gold-bearing quartz, etc. Wherefore he prayed for a temporary injunction, and for a final decree adjudging him to be the owner, etc. By their answer the defendants alleged that W. F. Dyer was the owner of a mining claim located in 1898 as the "Squaw Creek No. 2," a small portion of which was included within the alleged boundaries of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and they denied that they had excluded plaintiff from any portion of his claim, except that which overlapped the superior claim of W. F. Dyer. As to that portion they admitted, in effect, that they were holding it, and mining and removing the ores contained therein. From this brief statement it will sufficiently appear that the only material issues presented by the pleadings were those relating to the validity and priority of the overlapping claims. Upon these issues the findings and decision of the superior court were in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying them a new trial.

From the evidence contained in the record, it appears that both parties relied, to some extent, at least, upon locations made or attempted in 1898, all of which were held invalid for failure of the locators to comply with some of the requirements of an act of the legislature of California, passed March 27, 1897, prescribing the manner of making mining locations, etc. Stat. 1897, chap. 159, p. 214. These locations being held void, belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the land in which they are found to occupation and purchase, by citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become such, under the regulations prescribed by law, and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States. This provision of the act of 1872 was preserved in the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), being § 2319 thereof; and it remains unrepealed, and has since furnished authority for the location of mining claims upon the public domain.

And, under it, all valuable mineral deposits in land belonging to the government are free and open to exploration, occupation, and purchase by its citizens under the regulations prescribed therein, and by local customs and laws of miners in the several mining districts, so far as they are not inconsistent with the laws of the United States. Allen v. Dunlap, 24 Or. 229, 33 Pac. 675.

b. Supplementary legislation by states and territories.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, providing that the miners of each mining district may make regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States, or with the laws of the state or territory where the district is situated, governing the location and manner of recording mining claims, recognizes the rights of the states to pass acts supplementing the mining acts of Congress in respect to the location of mining claims. Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah, 410, 64 Pac. 1019.

And supplementary regulations, concerning the location of mining claims, prescribed by a statute in addition to the congressional regulations, are not invalid on the theory that they were enacted in the exercise of an unlawful delegation by Congress of legislative power. Butte City Water Co. v. Baker, 196 U. S. 119, 49 L. ed. 409, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 211, Affirming 28 Mont. 222, 104 Am. St. Rep. 686, 72 Pac. 617.

The right thus recognized and confirmed has been, as we shall see in subsequent portions of this note, acted upon by the enactment of supplementary legislation to a greater or less extent by nearly all, if not all, the mining states and territories.

c. Supplementary rules and regulations of miners.

Miners may, in their respective districts, make rules and regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States, or the state or territory in which the districts are situated, governing the location and manner of recording. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560, Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860.

The statutes of the United States giving citizens and those who have declared their intention to become such permission to explore and occupy mineral lands of the public domain, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law and the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are not in conflict with the laws of the United States, constitute an absolute grant of legislative power to miners themselves; and the customs, rules, or regulations of miners with reference to location of mining claims within the limits named have the full force of legislative enactments, and are as binding upon the courts as any law of the legislature, and subject to the same rules of construction. Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816; Gropper v. King, 4 Mont. 367, 1 Pac. 755.

And a mining location is invalid if the district laws are not complied with. Re Taylor, 9 Copp, Land Owner. 52, Mineral Law Dig. 120; Re Chavanne, 7 Copp, Land Owner, 115, Mineral Law Dig. 120.

And, while usages and customs of miners cannot be made to override a statute whose meaning is clear and free from doubt, where the decision of the superior court in favor of the plaintiff was based wholly upon a relocation of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, made November 26, 1900, by the plaintiff, just four days before he commenced this action. In view of the grounds of the motion for a new trial,—i. e., failure of the evidence to sustain the findings, and that the decision is against law,—it will facilitate the discussion to quote some of the more specific findings in full. They are as follows:

"(1) That upon the 26th day of November 1900, plaintiff, a citizen of the United States over the age of twenty-one years, located as a mining claim a certain parcel of land situated in Gazelle mining district, county of Siskiyou, state of California, and described as commencing at a point where location notice was posted; thence westerly, along the line of the Cuban Beauty quartz mine, a distance of 300 feet, to stake in mound of rock; then southerly, a distance of 1,500 feet, to stake in mound of rock; thence easterly, 600 feet, to a stake in mound of rock; thence in a northerly direction, 1,500 feet, to the southeast corner of the Cuban Beauty quartz mine, to stake in mound of rock; thence along the line of said Cuban Beauty quartz mine to place of beginning,—and commonly known as the 'Cuban Beauty No. 2.' That at the time plaintiff made mining location, said land was unoccupied public mineral land of the United States, and subject to location as such.

"(2) That, in making said location, plaintiff complied with the laws of the United the meaning is doubtful the statute should receive that construction which is supported by custom and usage, and by contemporary history and interpretation. McCurtain v. Grady, 1 Ind. Terr. 107, 38 S. W. 65.

Rules or regulations of miners with reference to location of mining claims, however, which will deprive a party of the right to property, which he is enabled to acquire by a compliance with the provisions of the statutes of the United States, by the imposition of any additional burdens or obligations, must be clear and positive in their character and requirements, and must not rest in inference or presumption; and they must impose an obligation to do some certain and specific act which, if not complied with, will, by the terms thereof, deprive the locator of some right. Flaherty v. Gwinn, 1 Dak. 509, Appx.

And a failure of a person locating a mining claim to comply with the local rules or customs of the district with reference thereto will not work a forfeiture, unless such failure is declared by such rules or customs to be a ground of forfeiture. Rush v. French, supra.

So, while such failure may be shown by a protest or adverse claim, it does not afford ground for proceeding against the patentee by the government, where no conflict with the general law appears. Re Hawke, 14 Copp. Land Owner, 151, Mineral Law Dig. 120.

Nor are rules, by-laws, usages, and customs of mining districts a subject of judicial notice; they must be proved. Sullivan v. Hense, 2 Colo. 424; Poujade v. Ryan, 21 Nev. 449, 33 Pac. 659.

Their existence is to be established by evidence in the case, the same as any other question of fact. Poujade v. Ryan, supra.

And one who desires to attack the validity of a mining location upon the ground that the local rules and regulations have not been complied with by the locators must show what such rules and regulations are. Kirk v. Meldrum, 28 Colo. 453, 65 Pac. 633.

For this purpose, miners' books of rules, and regulations of miners in the district in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

question, are competent evidence. Orr v. Haskell, 2 Mont. 225.

And, in the absence of a rule requiring a record, such rules and regulations may be proved by custom or usage, as well as by the act of the miners in their meeting, or by a written record. Flaherty v. Gwinn, supra.

And mining customs are competent evidence on an issue as to the validity of a mining claim, however recent the date or short the duration of their establishment. Smith v. North American Min. Co. 1 Nev. 423.

A possessor of a mining claim in a mining district is presumed, however, to hold the same by virtue of having complied with the law, and the local rules and customs. Groppe v. King, supra; Robertson v. Smith, 1 Mont. 410.

And the location of a mining claim is presumed to have been governed by the laws of the United States, in the absence of proof of local customs and rules of miners. Anderson v. Caughey (Cal.) 84 Pac. 223.

Nor is it essential that the mining district should be organized and local rules adopted, to hold mining claims and to acquire government title thereto; all that the government requires to be done is prescribed by law, and, in the absence of local rules, a compliance with the public law will secure the claim. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312.

And, in the absence of a statute making additional requirements, or a local rule or custom, a compliance with the statutes of the United States as to discovery and marking of the boundaries is sufficient to sustain the location of a placer-mining claim. McKay v. McDougall, 25 Mont. 258, 87 Am. St. Rep. 395, 64 Pac. 669.

As to rules and regulations of miners as to recording mining claims, see infra, XII. c.

V. What lands may be located.

a. Unoccupied, unappropriated public domain.

1. General rule.

The location of a mining claim must be

States by placing markings at the exterior boundaries of said location, so that the same could be readily traced, and also complied with all local customs and usages in recording notice of said location.

"(3) That, prior to said location by plaintiff, one Grant Davis had attempted to locate the same land covered by the said location of plaintiff herein, and thereafter sold and conveyed said land to this plaintiff by deed.

"(4) That, prior to said location by plaintiff, defendant W. F. Dyer and Frank Phillips had attempted to make locations of certain quartz mining ground in Gazelle mining district, and known as 'Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 1,' 'Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 2,' and 'Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 3.'

That said Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 2 covers a portion of the same ground covered by the location of the plaintiff herein.

"(5) That the said attempted locations made by said Grant Davis, and by said defendant W. F. Dyer and said Frank Phillips, were not made in compliance with the law then in force when the same was made.

"(6) That upon or about the 15th day of November, 1900, plaintiff sent workmen upon said claim for the purpose of doing assessment work thereon, and upon said day defendants wrongfully and with force and arms entered upon said land of plaintiff and drove off said workmen, and threatened to drive them off if they ever returned, and at the time of the commencement of this ac-on unoccupied, unappropriated public domain. Cleary v. Skiffich, 28 Colo. 362, 89 Am. St. Rep. 207, 65 Pac. 59; Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 393; Hoban v. Boyer (Colo.) 85 Pac. 837; Girard v. Carson, 22 Colo. 345, 44 Pac. 508; Michael v. Mills, 22 Colo. 439, 45 Pac. 429; Walsh v. Henry (Colo.) 88 Pac. 449; Moyle v. Bullene, 7 Colo. App. 308, 44 Pac. 69; Erwin v. Perego, 35 C. C. A. 482, 93 Fed. 608, Affirming 85 Fed. 905.

Although a locator performed every act necessary to constitute a valid location of a mining claim, yet, if the territory upon which these acts were performed did not comprise a portion of the unappropriated public domain, open to location as mineral land, he secured no rights thereby. Kendall v. San Juan Silver Min. Co. 9 Colo. 349, 12 Pac. 198, Affirmed in 144 U. S. 658, 36 L. ed. 583, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 779.

And it rests with the person asserting, or seeking to sustain, a mining location, to show as one of the material facts that it is on unoccupied and unappropriated mineral domain, and subject to location. Kirk v. Meldrum, 28 Colo. 453, 65 Pac. 633.

Nor is the belief of the locator that the land is or is not subject to appropriation material. Walsh v. Henry, supra.

Nor has a miner any right to enter upon private land and subject it to such uses as may be necessary to enable him to extract the precious metal which it may contain. Boggs v. Merced Min. Co. 14 Cal. 279; Henshaw v. Clark, 14 Cal. 460; Davis v. Wiebold, 139 U. S. 507, 35 L. ed. 238, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628.

And a private owner whose lands are so entered upon is entitled to equitable interference by way of injunction to restrain such entry. Henshaw v. Clark, supra.

So, the location of a mining claim on land already sold under Tex. Laws 1887, chap. 99, providing for the sale of state lands set apart for educational and charitable institutions, and repealing all conflicting laws, and containing no provisions with reference to the minerals on such lands, is unauthorized and void. Heil v. Martin (Tex. Civ. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.))

App.) 70 S. W. 430, Affirmed in 96 Tex. 209, 71 S. W. 814.

The fact that a part of a mining claim was located upon land which was not at the time public land, however, is of no effect in a contest with reference to a part of the claim which at the time of the location was unoccupied public lands. Richards v. Wolfing, 98 Cal. 195, 32 Pac. 971.

And mining locations or entries under the public-land laws, made upon land not at the time regularly subject thereto, may, nevertheless, if maintained in good faith and the land subsequently becomes subject to such locations or entries, be permitted to remain intact as having attached on such date, if at that time there was no adverse claim. Adams v. Polglase, 33 Land Dec. 30.

2. Patented lands.

The ownership of minerals contained in public lands patented to an individual passes under the patent, and lands thus patented cannot be taken up for mining purposes under mining laws, or rules and regulations. Fremont v. Seals, 18 Cal. 434; Moore v. Smaw, 17 Cal. 199, 79 Am. Dec. 123; Moyle v. Bullene, 7 Colo. App. 308, 44 Pac. 69; Pacific Coast Min. & Mill. Co. v. Spargo, 8 Sawy. 645, 16 Fed. 348; SHARKEY v. CANDIANI.

Unless the premises are so abandoned by the patentees as to render them a part of the unappropriated public domain. SHARKEY v. CANDIANI.

Where Congress has provided for the disposition of various classes of public lands, and has authorized the officers of the Land Department to ascertain the character of such lands, and issue patents therefor, in the absence of fraud, imposition, or mistake, the determination of that department as to the character of the land is conclusive; and where a determination is made, and a patent is issued, it is conclusive that the lands in question are nonmineral in character, and no rights thereon can be originated by discovery and location of a mineral vein within tion still hold possession thereof, and threaten to continue to hold possession."

These findings, when read in connection with the evidence in the case, fully disclose the erroneous view of the law which guided the decision of the superior court. The attempted location of the Squaw Creek claims by Dyer and Phillips was in September, 1898, and the evidence shows without substantial conflict that they then did everything necessary to constitute a valid location of the ground under the laws of the United States; that is to say, they discovered a lode of gold-bearing quartz, they posted on the ground a notice claiming 1,500 feet along the supposed course of the vein and 300 feet on either side, they plainly marked the exterior lines of their claim, including the point of discovery, and shortly afterwards commenced the work of development, which they prosecuted with more than sufficient diligence. In addition to this, Dyer, who had acquired the interest of his co-locator, Phillips, built a house on the claim and was residing there within his marked boundaries at the time when plaintiff's employees came on the ground, November 15, 1900, for the purpose of doing assessment work for the Grant Davis location of Cuban Beauty No. 2, and also when plaintiff made the location on November 26, 1900, which the court finds to have been a valid location of unoccupied mining ground, and upon which alone his right of recovery is made to depend. The attempted location of the Cuban Beauty No. 2 by Grant Davis was made in October, 1898,

And one who discovers a vein the top or apex of which lies within the limits of another lode claim, as the same is described in a patent issued to the owner, can claim no rights by virtue of such discovery. Up-ton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

A patent to land issued by the United States carries all the mines in the land patented to which no right has attached at the time the patent issues. Pacific Coast Min. & Mill. Co. v. Spargo, supra.

And it is conclusive as to the priority of its location over any other, and confers upon the patentee title to the entire surface of the claim as against the owner of an unpatented conflicting claim. Empire State-Idaho Mining & Developing Co. v. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. 52 C. C. A. 222, 114 Fed. 420; Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. 48 C. C. A. 665, 109 Fed. 538, Reversing ruling on this point in 108 Fed. 189, but Affirming judgment on other grounds.

It is at least conclusive as to which is the superior claim within the overlapping surface boundaries, though not necessarily a determination that that claim was of prior location. United States Min. Co. v. Lawson, 67 C. C. A. 587, 134 Fed. 769.

But a judgment in a prior suit involving a question as to which of two conflicting claimants had a right to a piece of mining ground, in which it was necessary to prove the right of possession to the ground in order to establish a right thereto as against the United States; and, in order to do this, it was necessary to show a valid location,—is conclusive only as to the right of possession of that piece of ground, and is not conclusive in a subsequent action between the parties upon the question of priority. Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, 4 C. C. A. 329, 7 U. S. App. 463, 54 Fed. 284.

So, proof of the date of the location of a mining claim, and of the fact that such location is excepted from patents for an adjoining location, raises a presumption that the former location was first made. Van-Zandt v. Argentine Min. Co. 2 McCrary, 159, 8 Fed. 725.

And a provision in a patent for public lands that it is subject to the right of the proprietor of a vein or lode to extract and remove his ore therefrom, should the same be found to penetrate or intersect the premises granted, does not apply in favor of parties claiming to be proprietors, who locate mines after the issue of the patent; it applies only in favor of persons who are the proprietors of mines at the time when the patentee's rights attach. When the patent issues it covers everything embraced in the land to which no prior right has attached. Pacific Coast Min. & Mill. Co. v. Spargo, supra.

Nor will a mining location, made a few days prior to the end of publication of notice of application for a patent, sustain an adverse claim. Smead v. Deadwood Min. Co. 7 Copp, Land Owner, 50, Mineral Law Dig. 125.

And the failure of the locator of a mining claim to interpose an adverse claim in proceedings instituted by another to obtain a patent for a claim including a part of his claim waives all his rights and loses to him the benefit of his location; and all lands in it, not covered by the patent, are thrown open to exploration, and become subject to claim for new discoveries. Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 45, 29 L. ed. 348, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1110.

So, that the claimed discovery of a lode is, in fact, on land appropriated by a prior location, cannot be asserted by the prior locator where he failed to adverse an application for a lode patent on the junior location, and the same was patented. American Consol. Min. & Mill. Co. v. De Witt, 26 Land Dec. 580.

And a judicial award to a junior locator, made in adverse proceedings, of a small part of the ground in conflict, is none the less binding upon the parties and the Land Department because made in pursuance of a stipulation between the parties. Re Stranger Lode, 28 Land Dec. 322.

a month later than the discovery and attempted location of the lode by Dyer; and the act done by Davis—giving the utmost credit to his testimony—fell far short of the efforts of Dyer to comply with the law. His evidence leaves it very doubtful if he ever discovered any gold-bearing rock in place, or did anything except to mark the boundaries of his claim.

The court finds that his claim as marked was the same as the location made by plaintiff November 26, 1900, and there is evidence that this claim at its extreme southern end includes some croppings of a lode, which appears to be the same as that upon which Dyer has done a large amount of work. But this finding that plaintiff's location embraces the identical ground covered by the Grant Davis claim is sustained by no testimony aside from that of Davis, and his testimony on the stand is in direct conflict with statements he admits having made when on the ground with Dyer and others for the purpose of adjusting their lines so as to avoid a conflict of locations. At that time he stated that his southwest corner was where he now claims his southeast corner was placed, and the change he thus makes involves a swinging of the southern end of his claim 600 feet to the west, making it by that means alone cover a triangular portion of Dyer's claim, including the only rock in place which could have been the basis of a valid location. He, however, says that his statement on the ground was a mistake, and the trial judge accepted his ex-

But a judgment, in an action to determine the right of possession as between two overlapping mining claims, in favor of the plaintiff after the withdrawal by the defendant of his answer, reciting the priority of the plaintiff's location, after which the defendant abandoned a portion of his claim, including that embraced in the judgment, is not admissible in a subsequent action between the same parties in respect to ground not embraced in the judgment, as evidence of prior location. Last Chance Min. Co. v. Tyler Min. Co. 9 C. C. A. 613, 15 U. S. App. 456, 61 Fed. 557.

A location of a mining claim is not absolutely void, however, because made upon land at that time segregated from the public domain by being subjected to an entry for a mineral patent, where the entry was invalid and was afterwards canceled; in such case the land becomes subject to location, and the prior location becomes effective from that time, if rights thereunder were then being, and were thereafter, asserted according to the mining law. Adams v. Polglase, 32 Land Dec. 477, Affirmed on motion to review, in 33 Land Dec. 30.

So, land embraced within a mineral application and subject to appropriation thereunder, but excluded therefrom when entry for patent is made, is thereafter vacant public land, and subject to location as such, and may be properly included within a subsequent application of another; and the fact that the discovery lies on the excluded tract does not affect the validity of the claim. Re Adams Lode, 16 Land Dec. 233.

But where an entry has been erroneously canceled, the claim covered thereby cannot be appropriated by strangers to the record who had located it while the entry was still subsisting. Re Harrison, 2 Land Dec. 767.

3. Lands appropriated for mining purposes.

(a) General rule.

Title to a mining claim cannot be initiated by an entry upon a prior valid existing location. Kirk v. Meldrum, 28 Colo. 45, 65 Pac. 633; Sierra Blanca Min. & Reduction L.R.A. (N.S.)

tion Co. v. Winchell (Colo.) 83 Pac. 628; Lebanon Min. Co. v. Consolidated Republican Min. Co. 6 Colo. 371; Seymour v. Fisher, 16 Colo. 188, 27 Pac. 240; Anderson v. Caughey (Cal.) 84 Pac. 223; Souter v. Maguire, 78 Cal. 543, 21 Pac. 183; Garthe v. Hart, 73 Cal. 541, 15 Pac. 93; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560, Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860.

And a better right in a third party may be shown by an adverse claimant for the purpose of defeating a mining location. Girard v. Carson, 22 Colo. 345, 44 Pac. 508.

The effect of a valid location of a mining claim is to segregate the ground from the public domain; and, until the locator either abandons his claim, or forfeits it, the ground is not unoccupied public land, and cannot be located or possessed by another. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787; Porter v. Tonopah North Star Tunnel & Development Co. 133 Fed. 750; Price v. McIntosh, 1 Alaska, 286; Kinney v. Fleming, 6 Ariz. 263, 56 Pac. 723; Score v. Griffin (Ariz.) 80 Pac. 331; Killers v. Boatman, 3 Utah, 159, 2 Pac. 66; Slothower v. Hunter (Wyo.) 88 Pac. 36; Cone v. Roxanna Gold Min. & Tunneling Co. 2 Denver Legal Adv. 350; Branagan v. Dulaney, 2 Land Dec. 744.

Until some act or laches of the owner occurs by which the title reverts to the government. Slothower v. Hunter and Score v. Griffin, supra.

And an adverse claimant may show that the locator's location was made upon ground embraced within a prior valid and subsisting location. Hoban v. Boyer (Colo.) 85 Pac. 837.

And that a prior location existed which precluded a possibility of a valid location by the plaintiff may be given in evidence under a general denial of the plaintiff's title and right of possession, in an action by him to quiet title to a mining claim. Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488.

Nor is a location made upon a valid subsisting claim given validity by the subsequent forfeiture of the senior claim; a location of a mining claim to be good must be planation, as he had a right to do, and as we should, perhaps, be bound to do if the fact were material, which, as will appear, we do not deem it to be, so far as the present appeal is concerned. In view, however, of the necessity for a new trial, and the possible materiality of this fact in some different aspect of the case, it may properly be suggested that an accurate instrumental survey of this original claim in connection with the lines of the older claims—the Cuban Beauty and Dewey, with reference to which the Cuban Beauty No. 2 was located, and the subsequently located claims of Chadwick and the Black Bear No. 2, located with reference to the Cuban Beauty, the Dewey, and Cuban Beauty No. 2—would probably show whether the testimony of Grant Davis, in addition to being inconsistent with his former statements, does not also involve a geometric absurdity; that is to say, whether it does not require us to believe that by going south on the west side of a claim bounded by parallel lines we will reach the southeast, instead of the southwest, corner. But, assuming for the present purpose that the plaintiff's location of November 26, 1900, covered the identical ground included by the boundaries marked by Grant Davis in October, 1898, there is no evidence that either Davis or the plaintiff ever did, or attempted to do, any development work within those boundaries prior to the 15th of November, 1900, when plaintiff's men found Dyer in possession and were driven off the ground by him and his employees; Dyer having in good when made, and conflicting claimants must each stand on his own location and can take only what it will give him under the law. Lockhart v. Farrell (Utah) 86 Pac. 1077; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. ed. 735; Montagne v. Labay, 2 Alaska, 575; Dufresne v. Northern Light Min. Co. 2 Alaska, 592.

Montagne v. Labay and Dufresne v. Northern Light Min. Co. supra, followed Belk v. Meagher, supra, and refused to follow Lavagnino v. Uhlig, 198 U. S. 443, 49 L. ed. 1119, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 716; and in the former case it was said that the case of Lavagnino v. Uhlig, infra, V. a, 3, (b), applies as authority only in adverse proceedings where a patent to mining property has been applied for, and is binding only within its own limited circle of exceptional facts and circumstances; and that it does not apply in a controversy wholly between senior and junior locators.

A stranger going upon land held under a valid mining location for the purpose of discovering veins or of otherwise interfering with the locator's possession and use is a trespasser. Seymour v. Fisher, 16 Colo. 188, 27 Pac. 240.

And a valid mining claim cannot be initiated by the commission of a trespass. Traphagen v. Kirk, 30 Mont. 562, 77 Pac. 58.

Nor is a subsequent location of a mining claim extending over a senior discovery in the actual possession of another valid as to the portion thereof occupied under the senior claim. Lebanon Min. Co. v. Consolidated Republican Min. Co. supra; Re Stranger Lode, 28 Land Dec. 322.

A junior locator of a mining claim conflicting with a senior one has no right to any portion of the area in conflict. Argentine Min. Co. v. Benedict, 18 Utah, 183, 55 Pac. 559; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

And in such case no question as to its being a cross vein can be considered. Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra.

The cardinal principle which governs conflicting claims of appropriators of mining locations and other rights on the public do- 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

main is that, other things being equal, the prior locator prevails. Conway v. Hart, 129 Cal. 483, 62 Pac. 44; Bulette v. Dodge, 2 Alaska, 427.

And seniority in such case is determined by the order in which they were located, whether they have been patented or remain unpatented. United States Min. Co. v. Lawson, 67 C. C. A. 587, 134 Fed. 769.

And a lode claim which includes land embraced within a senior location will not support a mineral entry; it should be made to terminate where the lode in its onward course intersects the exterior boundary. Re Howard, 15 Land Dec. 504.

So, where one person makes a valid location of a placer mine for the benefit of himself and another, and a third person makes a subsequent location of the same claim at the suggestion of the associate, the doctrine of estoppel cannot be applied to make the second location good as to the associate's part and bad as to the former locator's part. In such case the first location excludes a second location during the continuance of its validity. Russell v. Dufresne, 1 Alaska, 486.

But the owner and locator of a vein cannot follow it beyond his own end lines; and a vein beyond such lines is subject to further discovery and appropriation. Larkin v. Upton, 144 U. S. 19, 36 L. ed. 330, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, Affirming 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

Though a junior location of an excess of a senior location over the maximum allowed by law ought not to be sustained, unless it is taken from that part of the claim not actually occupied by the diggings or property of the senior locator. Price v. McIntosh, 1 Alaska, 286.

Nor does the fact that land is held as a placer-mining claim necessarily prevent lode locations from being made upon it. Hughes v. Ochsner, 27 Land Dec. 396.

And, where the evidence on an issue as to which of two persons made the first valid location of a mining claim upon grounds in dispute is conflicting, a question of fact for the jury is presented. Stemwinder Min. Co.

the meantime, as above stated, built a cabin on the ground, taken up his residence there, and continued work upon the vein.

But the whole question as to what, if any, effect the Grant Davis location may have had upon the rights of the parties is eliminated from the case as presented on this appeal by the finding of the court—amply sustained by the evidence, even if the respondent could question it—that his attempted location was invalid for want of conformity to the requirements of the law then in force. The law to which this finding (No. 5) refers was the above-cited act of March 27, 1897, prescribing certain particulars that location notices must contain, and requiring the record of such notices within certain limited periods. This state law was no doubt valid as one of the local regulations authorized and sanctioned by the act of Congress, and, so long as it remained unrepealed, was obligatory upon those who desired to secure mining claims in this state by the constructive possession resulting from a technical compliance with the law. The superior court, therefore, was right in concluding that neither the Davis location nor the Dyer location was valid at the time it was made. But the act of 1897 was repealed long before the plaintiff made his location in November, 1900. In the first place, an act properly entitled was passed March 20, 1899 (Stat. 1899, chap. 113, p. 148), for the purpose of repealing it; but, owing to a faulty wording of the body of the act, there seems to have been a question whether it

v. Emma & L. C. Consol. Min. Co. 2 Idaho, 456, 21 Pac. 1040, Affirmed in 149 U. S. 787, 37 L. ed. 960, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1052.

But where an attempted location of a mining claim by the first discoverer was insufficient and invalid, and, before a subsequent sufficient location by him, the claim was located by another, the right of the second locator depends entirely upon the sufficiency of his location; and an instruction in an action involving the relative rights of the two locators, leaving the matter of the validity of the second location, and of its effect, to the jury, is erroneous. Brown v. Oregon King Min. Co. 110 Fed. 728.

And one who attacks a mining location upon the sole ground of the existence of a previous location of the same claim has the burden of showing that the previous location was made and perfected in compliance not only with the laws of the United States, but also with such provisions of the statutes of the state relating to the location of mining claims as are not inconsistent with the United States statutes. Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah, 410, 64 Pac. 1019; Porter v. Tonopah North Star Tunnel & Development Co. 133 Fed. 756.

And this must be established by a preponderance of the evidence. Porter v. Tonopah North Star Tunnel & Development Co. supra.

But, as between two conflicting locations of mining claims, the court may presume that the prior locator had prima facie the better right; and the burden rests with the junior locator of rebutting the presumption by showing the invalidity of the prior location. Lockhart v. Farrell (Utah) 86 Pac. 1077.

(b) Effect of defects in prior location.

Though lands legally located for mining purposes are not public lands and subject to location as such, where a location for mining purposes is an invalid one, the lands are open to bona fide entry by others for the purpose of initiating a new location. Miller 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444.

And an attempted location of a mining claim does not prevent the claim from being open to subsequent location, where the person attempting to locate had not then and never made any discovery of mineral thereon. Ibid.

Until the discovery upon unappropriated public land of the United States of a mineral-bearing lode, and the distinct markings of the boundaries of the claim including it, so that they can be readily traced, the lode and land sought are open to location and appropriation by any competent locator; but, when these requirements have been complied with, the land is no longer public. Erwin v. Perego, 35 C. C. A. 482, 93 Fed. 608, Affirming 85 Fed. 905.

So, when a mining claim is abandoned, the ground is subject to location subsequent to the abandonment. Paragon Min. & Development Co. v. Stevens County Exploration Co. (Wash.) 87 Pac. 1068.

And where one goes upon mineral lands of the United States and works thereon without complying with the requirement of any law, either Federal or district, or any local custom, relying exclusively on his possession or work; and a second person peaceably locates a mining claim covering the same ground, and in all respects complies with the requirements of the law and with mining rules and regulations,—the second person is entitled to possession thereof as against the first. Horswell v. Ruiz, 67 Cal. 111, 7 Pac. 197; Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442.

And this is so no matter who is entitled to the credit for the discovery. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra.

And, as against a subsequent locator, a mining location not perfected according to the territorial laws, within the time provided, is forfeited and void, and the ground embraced therein is open to location. Lockhart v. Wills, 9 N. M. 354, 54 Pac. 336, Affirmed in part in 181 U. S. 516, 45 L. ed. 979, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665.

Failure of a locator of a mining claim, effected the desired repeal. In consequence of this uncertainty the same act, properly worded, was introduced at the extra session of the legislature in 1900, and finally passed February 8th of that year, taking immediate effect. Stat. 1900, chap. 6, p. 9. The result of this repeal was to make the validity of mining locations in this state solely dependent from that time forward upon a compliance with the laws of the United States and such valid local regulations as the miners themselves may have adopted in their respective districts. There is no evidence of an organized district including these claims, and no suggestion of a failure to comply with any miners' rules or customs. So that the point to be considered is the effect upon the Davis and Dyer locations of the entire elimination from our state or local laws of all regulations additional or supplemental to the laws of the United States governing the location of mining claims.

The repeal of the state law took effect at least as early as February 8, 1900, if not on the 20th of March, 1899, and the condition in which it found the Davis and Dyer claims was this: Davis had never attempted anything except a technical location, and in that he had failed. Dyer had also failed in his earlier attempt at a technical location, but he was on the ground working the vein within his marked boundaries, and had done everything necessary to constitute a valid location under the only law then and thereafter in force. This being so, his claim was thenceforward good so long as he continued within the proper time, to comply with the location statutes, forfeits all right to any benefits therefrom, except as he may be aided thereby in proof of actual possession; and the remainder of his lode, aside from that in his actual possession, is open to exploration and location as though he had never attempted to perfect a statutory location thereon. Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 581.

But the area of conflict between two mining locations does not, upon forfeiture of the senior location, become unoccupied mineral lands of the United States, so as to enable a relocater of the forfeited location to adverse successfully the application for a patent by the junior locator; since the latter's right, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2326, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1430, to a patent which would exist in the case of failure of the owner of a subsisting senior location either to adverse the application, or to prosecute such adverse, if one was made, must also arise from the forfeiture of the claim of the senior locator before the junior locator's application for a patent is made, and the consequent inability of the senior locator to adverse successfully after the forfeiture is complete. Lavagnino v. Uhlig, 198 U. S. 443, 49 L. ed. 1119, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 716.

Nor can one who attempted a technical location of a mining claim, but failed, hold the ground as against one who also failed at an attempt at a technical location, but who was on the ground working the vein within his marked boundaries, and had done everything necessary to constitute a valid location under the law then and thereafter in force. DWINNELL v. DYER.

And where land embraced in a placer-mining claim is found to be nonmineral, and therefore not patentable, so that the placer claimant cannot take the legal title thereto, the basis of his claim to the lodes therein disappears, and no prejudice to the claim of a lode applicant can result from a judgment of the court awarding the placer claimant the right of possession of the ground in controversy as a part of the placer in which the lodes are contained. Clipper Min. Co. v. Eli Min. & Land Co. 33 Land Dec. 660. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But where a lode has been discovered on the surface, and it is in the actual occupation of the person to whom it was granted by the purchaser at a given point, a valid location cannot be made thereon by others. Lebanon Min. Co. v. Consolidated Republican Min. Co. 6 Colo. 371; Faxon v. Barnard, 2 McCrary, 44, 4 Fed. 702.

And, if the discovery and location of a mine were within the boundaries of another mine as evidenced by its discovery notice, and such discovery was made within a prescribed period after the date of the posting of the notice of discovery of the latter mine, pursuant to a statutory provision giving such a period for discovery, the location of the junior locator is invalid as to the conflicting area. Sierra Blanca Min. & Reduction Co. v. Winchell (Colo.) 83 Pac. 628; Bramlett v. Flick, 23 Mont. 95, 57 Pac. 869.

And such invalidity is not cured by failure of the senior locator to perform the necessary discovery work. Sierra Blanca Min. & Reduction Co. v. Winchell, supra.

Nor are lands in actual possession of a person open to location as a mining claim, where failure of the person in possession to comply with local customs or rules with reference to locations of mining claims by posting a notice, requiring working, etc., is not of itself declared to work a forfeiture. Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816.

And a person in actual possession of a mining claim of no greater extent than the law allows him to hold may maintain an action against a trespasser, though he has not performed all the acts required to perfect a valid location. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 503, 11 Fed. 125.

"Ground in the actual possession of a person under claim or color of right cannot be located by another person, because such ground is not vacant and unappropriated. Bulette v. Dodge, 2 Alaska, 427.

So, possession of a mining claim under title deraigned from the locator, who located some time before by posting notice containing such specific calls and reference to monuments that a surveyor would have to do the necessary assessment work. This work, and far more than necessary to satisfy the requirements of the act of Congress, was clearly proved without any substantial conflict in the evidence, and therefore the concluding portion of the first finding, to the effect that on November 26, 1900, plaintiff's mining location was made upon unoccupied mineral land of the United States, is unsustained by the evidence. This finding is apparently based upon the view that the Dyer location, having been originally defective by reason solely of noncompliance with the state law, although fully complying with the laws of the United States, acquired no validity by the repeal of the state law. But this is not a correct view. The repeal of the state law, of course, had no affirmative effect in giving validity to the location; but it did away forever with the necessity of conforming to its provisions, and left unimpaired and unaffected every right which is conferred by a compliance with the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Dyer, having complied with those provisions, was certainly in no worse a situation with respect to this ground than the plaintiff. He had discovered the ledge once. He could not discover it again. He had marked the boundaries of his claim. There was nothing to be gained by marking again boundaries that were already marked. The laws of the United States require no posting or recording of notices, but merely provide that a notice, when required by local regulations, must contain certain things in no difficulty in locating the boundaries with knowledge of the location of the monuments, is good as against a relocation by a person having knowledge of the former location, and of such possession, as successor in interest of the former locators, though witnesses with the location notices in their hands were at the time unable to find all the particular monuments referred to in the notices. Yreka Min. & Mill. Co. v. Knight, 133 Cal. 544, 65 Pac. 1091.

But a mining claim the boundaries of which are marked on the ground and notice of which is posted thereon has priority over another with reference to which such steps have not been taken, though the notice of the latter was recorded prior to the marking of the boundaries and the posting of the notice of the former. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401.

So, one who located unsurveyed government lands on which he had discovered a coal vein about ten years before, and who returned to it year after year and spent large sums of money in developing it and making it of great value, and putting it in shape to be profitable when transportation facilities could be obtained, which promised to be available, and caused lines to be run to it from the nearest government surveys, and ascertained its exact location, is sufficiently in possession to preclude another from entering on it, notwithstanding a mere temporary absence, the recovery being confined to the cabin, tunnels, and other improvements, together with the convenient spacing around them, and not including the whole section of the land claimed. Davis v. Dennis (Wash.) 85 Pac. 1079.

Nor are the facts that, when a person went upon mining ground to locate it, there were a tent, bedding, and tools thereon, and a person in charge, and monuments had been erected thereon, which could, and should, have been seen, insufficient to notify him that the ground had been appropriated by others and was not open to location. Talnadge v. St. John, 129 Cal. 430, 62 Pac. 79.

properly designating the surface boundaries of the claim, acquire rights as against his grantee by virtue of any subsequent location, which will defeat or limit his grantee's estate, or any right pursuant thereto; and the fact that such subsequent location was made upon a vein not transferred to the grantee, but which intersects a vein having its apex within the surface boundaries of the granted vein, and was made prior to a relocation by the grantee of the granted vein, is immaterial. Stinchfield v. Gillis, 96 Cal. 33, 30 Pac. 839.

It has been held, however, that the fact that a prior location of a mining claim had been made, which had not yet expired at the time of a subsequent discovery thereon by another, does not prevent such discovery from forming a proper basis for a location by the discoverer after the former locator's title is forfeited, where there is nothing to show that the presence of the second discoverer upon the claim was unauthorized. Russell v. Dufresne, 1 Alaska, 486.

And where an attempted location was in itself invalid, the claim may be subsequently located without reference to whether or not it had been abandoned. Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444.

And in such case knowledge upon the part of a person seeking to locate a mining claim, that another had previously attempted to locate it, is immaterial, and does not affect the validity of the second location. Brown v. Oregon King Min. Co. 110 Fed. 728.

And where, after putting up an initial monument and examining the claim sought to be located, the locator wishes to abandon it, and tears down the monument, and goes away with the intention of not coming back, and pays no further attention to it, the land covered by the claim is open to location the moment such act takes place and such intention is formed; and others wishing to locate the ground will not be required to wait until it has become forfeited by reason of a noncompliance with requirements as to sinking a discovery shaft, recording the no-order to be of any effect. There was no longer any law providing for notice or record, or giving any effect to a recorded notice, and all that Dyer could do was to perform the amount of development work required by the law of Congress, and that he was doing when this action was commenced and injunction issued, more than a month prior to the expiration of the year allowed to him for that purpose.

Upon these facts, we cannot understand how it could be held that at the time of plaintiff's attempted location the ground was unoccupied. Dyer had in fact a pedis possessio to the extent of his visible boundaries, and the fact that those boundaries had been marked in connection with an attempted location, invalid only because of failure to comply in other particulars with the state statute of 1897, then no longer in force, made them none the less efficacious for his protection. Conway v. Hart, 129 Cal. 483, 484, 62 Pac. 44. The working of a quartz lode inside of defined boundaries is not only a pedis possessio of all the ground within such boundaries, but is in itself the substance of everything required by law to constitute a valid location; and ever since the decision of this court in English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 107, 76 Am. Dec. 574, it has been held to give a good title to a mining claim (not excessive in extent), regardless of local rules providing for the posting and recording of notices. It is actual possession, while a formal location is only constructive possession. In addition to the cases of Engtice, and building monuments. Kinney v. Fleming, 6 Ariz. 263, 56 Pac. 723.

Nor does evidence that a mining claim was located upon old mining claims tend to show a prior location, or even an attempted prior location, under the mining laws. Patchen v. Keeley, 19 Nev. 404, 14 Pac. 347.

Though a ruling of the court respecting an inference deducible from the prior possession of the plaintiff in an action to quiet title to a mining claim is not erroneous or prejudicial to the defendant, where the validity of the original location is not put in issue by the answer, which only sets up a forfeiture of the claim by the plaintiff and the defendant's relocation thereof. Hammer v. Garfield Min. & Mill. Co. 130 U. S. 291, 32 L. ed. 964, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548, Affirming 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153.

And evidence of the location of a mining claim and the working of the mine by the locators for several years; and that they had placed stakes around the claim, and sunk a shaft, and taken out rock; and that they left it, and, several years afterwards, went back and found the stakes and shaft and claim in substantially the same position,—is sufficient to sustain a finding that the land was vacant property upon their return; and open to location. Conway v. Hart, 129 Cal. 483, 62 Pac. 44.

4. Occupation without color of title.

While possession of a mining claim is good as against mere intruders, the mere fact of possession is not good as against one who locates in compliance with mining laws. Garthe v. Hart, 73 Cal. 541, 15 Pac. 93.

The mere naked possession of a mining claim upon the public lands is not sufficient to hold it as against a subsequent location made in pursuance of the law, and kept alive in compliance therewith. Hopkins v. Noyes, 4 Mont. 550, 2 Pac. 280; Noyes v. Black, 4 Mont. 527, 2 Pac. 769; Garthe v. Hart, supra.

And persons claiming lands for no other purpose than the right of way and support of a ditch are not entitled to question the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

right of another to locate, possess, and explore the land as mineral, subject to their admitted right of way. Lorenz v. Waldron, 96 Cal. 243, 31 Pac. 54.

And it has been held that the occupation, by aliens, of mining land, does not exclude it from the operation of the mining acts precluding citizens from taking it up as mining land belonging to the United States; and that aliens so occupying mining land when the same is taken up and located in a proper manner by citizens, though occupying peaceably, become trespassers in law upon the legal rights of the citizens. Chapman v. Toy Long, 4 Sawy. 28, Fed. Cas. No. 2610.

And that both the person making a location of mining ground and his grantees, who succeed to his rights, must have the capacity to possess and purchase; otherwise the grant of the government becomes devested, and the ground is again open to location; and, where a citizen conveys an unpatented mining claim to an alien, the conveyance has the effect so to restore the claim to the public domain as to authorize its location and possession by a citizen. Tibbitts v. Ah Tong, 4 Mont. 536, 2 Pac. 759.

But, while any competent locator may enter upon mineral lands of the United States upon which there is no valid existing location even though they are in the actual possession of another, provided he can do so peaceably and in good faith, in order to initiate a location for himself, no right can be initiated by a forcible, fraudulent, surreptitious, or clandestine entry upon lands in the actual possession of another engaged in mining; the entry must be open, above-board, and made in good faith. Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. 98 Fed. 673.

A miner may hold the place in which he is working on the public domain against all others having no better right. Zollars v. Evans, 2 McCrary, 39, 5 Fed. 172.

And a location of a mining claim, made upon ground not vacant and open to location, but which is in actual and adverse occupancy of another, is void. Gird v. California Oil Co. 60 Fed. 531; Cowell v. Lambers, 10 Sawy. 246, 21 Fed. 200.

lish v. Johnson and Conway v. Hart, above cited from the decisions of this court, we refer for a fuller statement and elucidation of the views here expressed as to the location of mining claims since the act of Congress of May 10, 1872, to the following cases: Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312; Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. (C. C.) 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. (C. C.) 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666. The Nevada cases were among the first that arose under the act of Congress of May, 1872, and the views therein expressed were substantially embodied in the charge to the jury given by Judge Sawyer in the two cases cited from the Federal Reporter. The decisions of Judge Sawyer have been cited and followed in numerous subsequent cases in the Federal and state courts, and we are not aware that they have ever been seriously questioned.

It is proper here to notice the case of Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. ed. 735, which in the department opinion affirming the judgment and order of the superior court was cited as a controlling authority. It will not be difficult, we think, to point out a distinction between that case and this which makes it totally inapplicable to the point to be decided here. In that case Belk, in December, 1876, posted a notice of location upon mining ground then covered by a valid claim of third parties, who by their acts

A location cannot be extended over a senior discovery in the actual possession of another, though the senior discoverer failed to locate under the law. Faxon v. Barnard, 2 McCrary, 44, 4 Fed. 702; Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816.

And an instruction in an action involving the right to a mining claim, that lands may be located where they are not in actual possession of one entitled thereto, is erroneous as submitting to the jury a question of law. Jordan v. Duke, 4 Ariz. 278, 36 Pac. 896.

Entering upon the premises in the actual possession of another for the purpose of performing acts necessary to constitute location and possession of a mining claim is a trespass, and cannot form a basis for the acquisition of title. Weese v. Barker, 7 Colo. 178, 2 Pac. 919; Lebanon Min. Co. v. Consolidated Republican Min. Co. 6 Colo. 371.

So, as between two persons, neither of whom had done any work before his attempted location of conflicting mining claims, and both of whom claimed to have made valid mining locations, the issue must be determined by a reference to priority in the statutory designation on the surveys of the limits of the claim. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401.

A person asserting the location of a mining claim as against another in actual possession has the burden of showing that the latter was not there at the time of his location. Faxon v. Barnard, supra.

5. Lands claimed under Mexican and Spanish grants.

The rule adopted in the earlier history of the country was that a Mexican or Spanish land grant, confirmed or allowed as prescribed by law, of a quantity of land to be afterwards surveyed and laid off within a certain territory, vested in the grantee a present and immediate interest which carried with it the ownership of the minerals contained therein. Fremont v. United States, 17 How. 542, 15 L. ed. 241.

And that a patent from the United States government for land issued upon a confirmation of claims held under grants of the Mexican government invested the patentee with the ownership of the precious metals contained in it. Moore v. Smaw, 17 Cal. 199, 79 Am. Dec. 123; Fremont v. Seals, 18 Cal. 433; Ah Hee v. Crippen, 19 Cal. 492.

And where lands were claimed under a Mexican grant, and, after a confirmation under the act of Congress of 1851, and pending proceedings thereunder for location, a third person took up a mining claim thereon in pursuance of the act of Congress of 1866; and a patent was subsequently issued upon the Mexican grant,—it included the mine so located, and defeated the location thereof. Manning v. San Jacinto Tin Co. 7 Sawy. 418, 9 Fed. 726.

So, a person locating a mine upon lands claimed under a Mexican grant, after confirmation and pending proceedings for location, but before patent, could not, after patent, on a bill in equity, question the correctness of the location of the grant on the ground that it was fraudulently located by officers of the government with the knowledge of the patentee, upon lands not covered by the grant, and for the fraudulent purpose of securing the mine. Ibid.

In United States v. San Pedro & C. del A. Co. 4 N. M. 405, 17 Pac. 337, however, it was held that a grant of lands by the government to an individual under the Mexican and Spanish colonization laws, as well as under the pre-emption laws and land acts of the United States, does not include mineral deposits in the land; and that a grant thus made by the Mexican government gave title to the land only; and that a confirmation of such grant by Congress, after the acquisition by the United States of the territory comprising such lands, confirms title only as passed by the grant.

And, by act of Congress of March 3, 1891, it was provided that no allowance or confirmation of any claim shall confer any right or title to any gold, silver, or quicksilver mines or minerals of the same, unless the grant claimed effected the donation or sale of such mines or minerals to the grantee, or unless such grantee has become otherwise done in compliance with the law of the United States had become invested, according to its express terms, with the "exclusive right of possession" of the ground so located until the 1st of January, 1877. If by that date they did not resume work on the claim their right of possession would lapse, but in the meantime it was unquestionable; and, when Belk attempted his location he not only posted his notice upon ground not open to location, but he was guilty of an unlawful act,—a trespass upon the lawful possession of others. A careful reading of Chief Justice Waite's opinion will show that for this reason alone his acts done in December were held utterly void. In this case the acts of Dyer, done while the act of 1897 was in force, were every one of them lawful, and every one of them constituted a step taken in compliance with the law of Congress. His discovery was upon unoccupied land of the United States. His entry, his marking of boundaries, his work on the lode,—everything he did,—was free from any imputation of illegality, and, when he had fully complied with the act of Congress, there was nothing left for him to do except to post and record the notices as prescribed by the state law, in order to make his location perfect; and this he could have done at any time before the ground became subject to an intervening right.

Under the law of Congress, under the law of this state, and under every code of district laws adopted by miners that has come to my notice, the prescribed order of the entitled thereto in law or in equity; but all such mines and minerals shall remain the property of the United States, with the right of working the same, which fact shall be stated in all patents issued under this act.

Under this act, lands held under the Mexican or Spanish grants, with reference to which there was no reservation, either by treaty or by law, are not reserved lands, and are lands belonging to the United States, within the meaning of § 2319, U. S. Rev. Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), and are open to exploration and purchase under the mining laws of the United States. Lockhart v. Wills, 9 N. M. 344, 54 Pac. 336. Affirmed in part in 181 U. S. 516, 45 L. ed. 979, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665; Lockhart v. Leeds, 10 N. M. 568, 63 Pac. 48.

And lands claimed to be within the limits of a Mexican grant are not withdrawn and reserved from entry under the mining laws of the United States by the fact that the claim is before the court of private land claims for adjudication, there being nothing in the treaty with Mexico to work that result, and the act of 1854 (10 Stat. at L. 308, chap. 103), reserving such lands until the final action of Congress on such claims, having been repealed by the act of Congress of March 3, 1891, establishing the court of private land claims. Lockhart v. Johnson, 181 U. S. 516, 45 L. ed. 979, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665.

6. Indian reservations.

The effect of a treaty with a nation of Indians, by which a district therein described is set apart for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of such Indian nation, is to withdraw the agreed district from private entry or appropriation for the purpose of discovering and locating mining claims. Kendall v. San Juan Silver Min. Co. 9 Colo. 349, 12 Pac. 198, Affirmed in 144 U. S. 658, 36 L. ed. 583, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 779.

And no rights can be acquired to lands by location of mining claims when the same are covered at the time by an Indian reservation. Caledonia Gold Min. Co. v. Noonan, 3 Dak. 189, 14 N. W. 426; Uhlig v. Garrison, 2 Dak. 71, 2 N. W. 253; French v. Lancaster, 2 Dak. 346, 47 N. W. 395; Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Smith, 2 Dak. 377, 11 N. W. 98; Kendall v. San Juan Silver Min. Co. supra.

And the person attempting such location acquires no rights which will avail him against a location made by another after the land is opened for settlement. Kendall v. San Juan Silver Min. Co. supra.

The mineral laws do not subject to exploration and entry lands which have been allotted to Indians for a reservation. Re Acme Cement & Plaster Co. 31 Land Dec. 125.

And U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2319 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), declaring all mineral deposits in the public lands of the United States open to exploration and purchase, and the lands containing the same to occupation and purchase, does not prevent the President from reserving by proclamation a portion of the unoccupied public lands of the United States for an Indian reservation; such a proclamation not constituting a repeal or suspension of the act. Gibson v. Anderson, 65 C. C. A. 277, 131 Fed. 39.

A person in possession of a mining claim within an Indian reservation, prior to its relinquishment, with the requisite discovery and the boundaries sufficiently marked, and with a notice of location posted, and a disclosed vein of ore, may, however, upon the relinquishment of the reservation, adopt what has been done, causing the proper record to be made, and hold his claim dating his rights from that day. Noonan v. Caledonia Gold Min. Co. 121 U. S. 393, 30 L. ed. 1061, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 911, Affirming 3 Dak. 189, 14 N. W. 126; Kendall v. San Juan Silver Min. Co. supra.

And where, in such a case, the locator was on that day in actual possession of the ground located upon, with the requisite discovery of a vein of valuable minerals thereon, and then or thereafter performed every act necessary to constitute and maintain a valid location, another person can claim no acts necessary to a valid location is, first, the discovery of mineral-bearing rock in place; second, the posting of notice at or near the point where the ledge is exposed; next, the recording of notice; next, the marking of boundaries; and, finally, the work of development. But, although this is the proper and natural order of procedure, it is not obligatory, in the absence of intervening rights. It is, indeed, universally held that, when every act necessary to complete a location has been done before an adverse claim has accrued, the order in which such acts have been performed is immaterial. If, for instance, a locator, before the discovery of any lode, begins by first marking out a surface claim, his location is perfected if he develops a lode within his boundaries before a good location is made by an adverse claimant. So here Dyer, having done everything required by the act of Congress, could have perfected his claim under the state law, if it had remained in force, by a subsequent posting and recording of the prescribed notices. To state the matter in another form: Several distinct acts are essential to constitute a valid location. The order in which they are performed is immaterial. Dyer performed all the acts required by the Federal statute in a perfectly legal manner, and they were all valid. The acts to be performed under the state law had been omitted, but were still performable at his option without any infringement of intervening claims when the state released him, in common with all others, from compliance with portion thereof by virtue of an attempted adverse prior location made before that date. Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Smith, 2 Dak. 374, 11 N. W. 97.

Nor is the admission, in an action to adverse a claim to mining ground, of evidence of acts of location of the claim in question, done prior to the date upon which an Indian reservation was removed from the lands in question, in connection with the existence of the result of such acts on and after that date; such acts consisting of the discovery within the limits of the claim of a vein of gold-bearing ore, and the staking of the ground,—erroneously prejudicial as against a party claiming an adverse right based on possession by virtue of what existed and was done by him in support and maintenance of his claim on and after that date. Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Smith, 2 Dak. 377, 11 N. W. 98.

And immaterial evidence and findings in an action brought to determine conflicting claims to mining ground, with reference to facts and matters occurring prior to the date when an Indian reservation was removed from the land in question, are not ground for reversal, where the cause was tried by the court, and the findings distinctly and clearly discriminated between acts done before and those done after that date, and the evidence fully supported the findings. Caledonia Gold Min. Co. v. Noonan, 3 Dak. 189, 14 N. W. 426.

In the above case French v. Lancaster, 2 Dak. 276, 9 N. W. 716, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that that case was tried by a jury.

So, one who entered on an Indian reservation and attempted to locate a mining claim, to which, after the treaty opening the reservation, he was given a patent, had, prior to such treaty, sufficient right in such claim to part with a portion thereof by dedication for highway purposes; and the public, under such dedication, and under an act of Congress granting a right of way for the construction of highways over public land, acquired a valid title, of which no subsequent act on his part or on the part of his grantees could deprive it. Deadwood v. Whittaker, 12 S. D. 520, 81 N. W. 908.

But where mining claims are sought to be located within the boundaries of a tract once set apart for an Indian reservation, which has not been opened to white people for any other purpose than locating, developing, and operating mines, it is important that, before a locator shall be adjudged to have acquired the right to a patent, there shall be a showing that the ground claimed is in fact mining ground, containing gold or other precious metals in sufficient quantities to pay for working, and that the purpose of the locator in acquiring title is to develop and operate mines. Durant v. Corbin, 94 Fed. 382.

Nor does an act of Congress restoring to the public domain a portion of an Indian reservation, and providing that, subject to the right of individual allotments therefrom to Indians as prescribed therein, the same shall be open to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, and shall be disposed of under the general laws, operate of itself, in advance of the proclamation of the President, to give the right to locate mining claims therein under the mineral laws. McFadden v. Mountain View Min. & Mill. Co. 38 C. C. A. 354, 97 Fed. 670, Reversed on other grounds in 180 U. S. 533, 45 L. ed. 656, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488.

And, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1901, opening lands acquired from certain tribes of Indians by treaty to settlement; and under the proclamation of the President, issued July 4, 1901, fixing the opening day for entry upon such lands on August 6, 1901, containing an express warning that no person shall be permitted to settle upon property, or enter any of said ceded lands, except in the manner prescribed by the proclamation after the expiration of sixty days from the time the same are opened to settlement and entry,—persons qualified to make mining locations and obtain title to public lands could not occupy any of such lands for the purpose of discovering minerals, prospecting for oil, or making mineral locations, until sixty days after August 6, its local law. His claim was then perfect. Belk, on the contrary, commenced his attempted location by an unlawful trespass upon the rights of others, which for that reason was totally invalid as the foundation of any right, and, excluding this unlawful act from consideration, it was held that his subsequent acts, prior to Meagher's location, were insufficient to secure the ground. Dyer's acts, on the contrary,—none of which could be excluded from consideration on the ground of illegality,—did, long prior to the 28th of November, 1900, constitute a perfect location as the law stood from and after the 6th of February of that year.

We have not overlooked the contention of respondent that it is found as a fact by the superior court (concluding portion of the first finding) that, when plaintiff made his location on November 26, 1900, the ground was vacant and unoccupied, and his further contention that there is sufficient conflict and uncertainty in the evidence regarding the Dyer locations to sustain this finding in its broadest sense. We think, however, that such a finding would not only have been in conflict with all the substantial evidence in the case, but it would have been inconsistent with other and more specific findings, and with the allegations of the complaint. The allegation of the complaint is that the ouster by defendants occurred on the 15th of November, 1900, and the evidence conforms strictly to this allegation. It shows that on that day two men employed by plaintiff to do assessment work on his supposed claim 1901; and a location under the placer mining law for the purpose of mining for petroleum and oil, made during such sixty days, was contrary to law, and void. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. 13 Okla. 425, 73 Pac. 936.

So, a person making mining locations on an Indian reservation on May 27, 1902, on which day Congress passed an act subjecting mineral lands in the reservation to entry, acquires no rights by such location, where on the same day Congress, by two joint resolutions, postponed the operation of the act until a subsequent day. Gibson v. Anderson, supra.

But where an act of Congress opens a part of an Indian reservation, and restores the lands to the public domain subject to the rights of the Indians to make selection of land to be allotted to them in severalty, the purpose and intent are to award to each Indian agricultural land for his home; and lands valuable for minerals contained in them are not subject to be selected for allotment to Indians. Collins v. Bubb, 73 Fed. 735.

Mining laws and the right to locate and enter mineral lands, however, have been extended over lands ceded to certain Indians in a number of instances. This was done with reference to lands ceded to certain Indian tribes in Oklahoma by act of Congress of June 6, 1900, and with reference to mineral lands in the Colville Indian reservation, in the state of Washington, by act of Congress of July 1, 1898. Re Acme Cement & Plaster Co. 31 Land Dec. 125; United States v. Four Bottles Sour-Mash Whisky, 90 Fed. 720.

And the act of Congress of June 6, 1900, subjected from the time of its passage, to the mineral laws and to mineral exploration and entry, all of the lands which were to be allotted or opened to settlement thereunder, so far as the same should be found to contain valuable mineral deposits. Re Acme Cement & Plaster Co. supra.

And the provisions thereof were not intended to operate as an exception to the settled principles applied by the Land Department in the administration of the public land laws generally; and controversies between mineral and agricultural or town-site claimants, as to any of the land over which the mining laws were extended by that act, are to be determined by the same principles which apply to like controversies with respect to public lands elsewhere. Re Mining Claim, 31 Land Dec. 154.

But lands subjected by that act, to the mining laws and to mineral exploration and entry, like other land subject to the mining laws or to mineral exploration, are not always so subject, but only so long as they remain free from any vested right of ownership in an Indian or white person; and, upon their allotment in severalty, or by title thereto being earned by homestead entry men by compliance with the homestead law, lands allotted or embraced in the entry cease to be subject to statutes like the mining laws, which prescribe the manner of disposing of public lands. Re Acme Cement & Plaster Co. supra.

And of the lands ceded to the United States by the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache Indians, sections 16 and 36, 13 and 33, reserved for school purposes under agreement ratified by that act, are not thereby made subject to the operation of the mining laws. Re School Sections, 32 Land Dec. 95.

Though the rule is different with reference to the like sections reserved for school purposes of the lands ceded to the United States by the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians under agreement ratified by the act of Congress of March 2, 1895. Ibid.

So, under the act of Congress of July 1, 1898, intended to authorize prospectors and miners to explore the Colville Indian reservation for the purpose of developing its mineral resources, and authorizing citizens who make discoveries of valuable minerals therein to locate, claim, and work them, the lands can be entered only under and in accordance with the general law of the United States in relation to the entry of mineral lands. United States v. Four Bottles Sour-Mash Whisky, supra.

And lands ceded by Indian tribes to the were driven from the ground by Dyer and his men. At that date, then, when, according to the specific findings of the court, plaintiff had acquired no rights to any of the ground in controversy, the defendants were on the ground and remained in possession, claiming it under the location which the court finds they had long before attempted to make. It was eleven days later that the plaintiff's supposed right was initiated by his formal location of November 26th, and when four days later, on November 30th, he filed his complaint in this action. He alleged the ouster on the 15th, the taking possession and claim of ownership by defendants, and that they were excavating and threatening to continue excavating the gold-bearing rock. In short, the allegations of the complaint itself on any fair construction of their terms are inconsistent with the assumption that Dyer was not in possession of his claim at the date of plaintiff's location.

Finally, we think that a new trial should have been granted upon the ground that the decision is against law for want of a finding upon the most material issue presented by the pleadings. It is found that plaintiff made a location of the ground in November, 1900, and it is found that Dyer's previous location was invalid for lack of conformity to a law in force at the time it was made. This finding, however, is entirely consistent, as we have endeavored to show, with the supposition that after the repeal of the act of 1897 his location may have been or become perfect, and the material question—the issue upon which the whole case depends—is not whether Dyer had a good claim in 1898 or 1899, but whether he had a good claim prior to November 26, 1900. Upon this point there is no direct finding, and, if it be contended that it is indirectly or inferentially found against the defendant, we can only repeat that such finding is not only in conflict with the evidence, but inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: Shaw, J.; Van Dyke, J.; Lorigan, J.; Henshaw, J.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent, and adhere to the opinion heretofore rendered in department. I think that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

United States under agreement ratified by act of Congress, which have been heretofore set aside and reserved by the Secretary of the Interior for county-seat town sites under the act of Congress of March, 1901, or which have been reserved and appropriated by authority of law for any other specific purpose, are not subject to the operation of the mining laws. Re School Sections, supra.

7. Military and naval reservations.

Mineral lands may be included in reservations for military purposes; and, when so included, they are not subject to appropriation by mineral claimants during the time the reservations exist. Re Ft. Maginnis, 1 Land Dec. 552.

But, where mining claims were legally located and held prior to a reservation of the land comprising them for military purposes, the miners' rights cannot be divested by such taking. Ibid.

So, a discovery of mineral upon lands within a naval reservation is not on unoccupied land open to exploration or location, and will not sustain a location of a mineral claim. Behrends v. Goldsteen, 1 Alaska, 518.

And this is so when the discovery is within the reservation, though the land lies partly within and partly without such reservation. In such case the whole claim is void. Ibid.

So, a mineral entry based on a location made after the withdrawal of the land for a reservoir site under the act of Congress of 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

October 2, 1888, reserving from sale as property of the United States all such lands as should thereafter be designated or selected for reservoirs, confers no right; but an entry based upon such a location may be suspended, and, if it subsequently appears that the land is not required for reservoir purposes, it may then pass to patent. Re Colomokas Gold Min. Co. 28 Land Dec. 172.

8. Tide lands.

Mineral lands below high tide are not a part of the mineral lands of the United States, subject to exploration and location for mining purposes, like those above high tide; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2319 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), providing that all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found, to occupation and purchase by citizens of the United States, being construed as subject to the general policy of the government that tide lands are never to be sold, but are to be held in trust for the new States that shall be carved out of the public domain. Alaska Gold Min. Co. v. Barbridge, 1 Alaska, 311; Re Logan, 29 Land Dec. 395.

And a miner who discovers a lode above mean high tide, and locates thereon, cannot follow the lode and include in his location a part thereof, or mineral lands that may extend into and under the sea, below mean high Referee—act beyond jurisdiction—waiver.

1. Participating in the taking of testimony by a referee out of the jurisdiction of the court without a special order authorizing it waives the error.

Patent—mine—effect.

2. The issuance of a patent to a mining claim is conclusive to establish all facts necessary to its validity as against one claiming adverse rights.

Mine—marking boundaries—statute.

3. A statute making null and void a mining location which does not comply with its requirements as to marking of boundaries, applies only in favor of conflicting claimants, and does not prevent a correct marking before adverse claims attach.

Same—subsequent discovery.

4. The subsequent discovery of mineral-bearing ore validates the location of a mining claim invalid for want of such discovery, in the absence of intervening rights.

Same—managing partner—authority.

5. The managing partner of a mining tide. His claim ends at the shore line. Alaska Gold Min. Co. v. Barbridge, supra.

So, lands below high-water mark of a meandered stream like the Missouri river are not public lands within the meaning of the mining laws, and are not subject to appropriation and entry as a mining claim. Re Argillite Ornamental Stone Co. 29 Land Dec. 585.

It is provided, however, in the act of Congress extending the laws of the United States relating to mining claims to the district of Alaska (Carter's Anno. Alaska Codes, p. 139), that, subject only to such general limits as may be necessary to exempt navigation from artificial obstruction, all land and shoal water between low and mean high tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Behring sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to exploration and mining for gold and other precious metals by citizens of the United States, or persons who have legally declared their intention to become such, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the miners in organized districts may have heretofore made, or hereafter may make, governing the temporary possession thereof for exploration and mining purposes, until otherwise provided by law; but no exclusive permit shall be granted by the Secretary of War authorizing any person or persons, corporation or company, to excavate or mine under any of said water below low tide.

claim possesses sufficient authority from his co-owners to bind them by his negligence in permitting the location of a conflicting claim and its improvement until paying ore is discovered, so that the partners cannot subsequently assert their rights to the land within the conflicting location.

Same—abandonment.

6. Mining locators who have not perfected their title, who attempt to point out to another unlocated land, and, after he has selected it, place the stakes of the location for him, will, after they have permitted him to improve it at great expense until he has discovered paying ore, be held to have abandoned their claim so far as it conflicts with the later location.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lane County in favor of defendants in a proceeding to establish title to a mining claim. Affirmed.

Statement by Moore, J.:

This cause having been reargued, the opinion heretofore announced, which has not been published, will be changed to accord with the view now entertained. This is a suit by Frank C. Sharkey, Louis Zimmer-

b. Mineral lands.

1. Restriction to.

Only the mineral lands of the general government are subject to exploration and location in a proper case for mining purposes. Armstrong v. Loer, 6 Colo. 393; Re Deadwood Town Site, 8 Copp, Land Owner, 18, Mineral Law Dig. p. 452.

This is implied in the language of the grant,—“all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase.” U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2319, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424.

And it is and has been the settled policy of the government to withhold mineral lands from public land grants, unless they are expressly granted; and such a grant, which does not in express terms include mineral lands, does not transfer to the grantee lands valuable for mineral deposits, though there is no express exception of mineral lands in the grant. Re Florida C. & P. R. Co. 26 Land Dec. 600.

The rejection by the Land Department of an application for a patent to a mining claim because of failure to establish the presence in the land involved of mineral deposits of such extent and value as to justify the issuance of a patent, however, does not amount to a determination that the location upon which the application is based is invalid. Clipper Min. Co. v. Eli Min. & Land Co. 33 Land Dec. 660.

man, Fred E. Sharkey, and N. B. Standish, against C. F. Candiani, Caesar Marco, and J. J. Tyler, to determine the right of possession of certain mineral land. The complaint states that the defendants secured a survey of what they designated as the "Doctor" lode in the unorganized mineral district of Blue river, Lane county, and applied for a United States patent therefor; whereupon plaintiffs interposed an adverse claim to a part of the premises included in such survey, and instituted this suit, alleging, inter alia, that they were in possession of the Louise and Lucky Boy No. 4 quartz mining claims, which were prior locations, the validity of which had been maintained, detailing the manner thereof and showing wherein the Doctor lode conflicted with such claims. The answer, having denied the material allegations of the complaint, averred that plaintiffs had abandoned all interest in the premises inconsistent with the boundaries of the Doctor lode, and that by reason of their conduct they ought to be estopped to assert any claim thereto; setting out the facts which, it is asserted, constituted the alleged impediment which the law raises to preclude the maintenance of this suit. The allegations of new matter in the answer having been denied in the reply, the cause was referred, and from the testimony taken the court found that the defendants, by reason of plaintiffs' conduct, were entitled to the possession of the premises in dispute, and, having rendered a decree in accordance therewith, the plaintiffs appeal.

2. What are, within statutory grants, exceptions, and reservations.

(a) General rules.

There is no certain, well-defined, obvious boundary between mineral lands and those which cannot be so classed. Perhaps the true criterion would be to consider whether, upon the whole, the lands appear to be better adapted to mining, or to other purposes. Ah Yew v. Choate, 24 Cal. 562.

To constitute mining land, it must appear as a fact that mineral can be secured therefrom with profit. Re Royal K. Placer, 13 Land Dec. 86.

And this rule applies as well in an ex parte case as upon the application of a mineral locator, conflicting with that of some other locator or claimant. Ibid.

And an allegation in a complaint, in an action involving title to a mining location, that the location does not contain named minerals in lode deposits of value sufficient to justify the expense of exploitation, charges that the ground is nonmineral, and is an allegation of fact, and not one of a legal conclusion. O'Keefe v. Cannon, 52 Fed. 898.

So, proof of the mineral character of the land must be specific, and based upon the actual production of mineral. Kings County v. Alexander, 5 Land Dec. 126.

And a mere theory that limestone underlies the surface of land, unsupported by evidence tending to establish its presence, is insufficient to establish its mineral character. Ferrell v. Hoge, 27 Land Dec. 129.

And the mere facts that colors of gold may be found by panning in the dry beds of creeks, and miners, upon such encouragement, might be led further to explore in the hope of finding gold in paying quantities, are not sufficient to show that the land is so valuable for mineral as to take it out of the category of agricultural lands and to establish its character as mineral land, in a contest between a mineral claimant and one claiming land under other laws of the 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

United States. Steele v. Tanana Mines R. Co. 148 Fed. 678.

So, evidence of the digging of a prospect hole to the depth of 10 feet, in which about 2 cents' worth of gold was found, and that there were ample time and opportunity to test the extent and value of alleged mineral deposits in the ground, without any systematic or continuous prospecting or working of the claim having been done, does not show a discovery upon which a mining claim may be based, within the meaning of the timber and stone act of June 3, 1878, withdrawing mining claims from the operation of that act. Purtle v. Steffee, 31 Land Dec. 400.

In the above case, Michie v. Gothberg, 30 Land Dec. 407, infra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the mineral location interposed by protest against the application to purchase under the timber and stone act was based upon an actual discovery of mineral sufficient to sustain it until reasonable opportunity had been afforded the locator to ascertain, by further developing, the extent and value of the mineral deposit he had discovered.

So, the existence of mineral in such quantities as to justify the expenditure of money in the effort to secure it must be established as a present fact, to bring the land within the class subject to location and entry for mining purposes. Re Downs, 7 Land Dec. 71; Kings County v. Alexander, supra.

And evidence that neighborhood or adjoining lands are mineral in character; and that the land in controversy may hereafter develop mineral to such an extent as to show its mineral character,—is not sufficient to establish it. Kings County v. Alexander, supra.

Land containing gold in sufficient quantities to justify men of ordinary prudence in the expenditure of money and labor in mining developments, however, must be regarded as mineral in character. Aspen Consol. Min. Co. v. Williams, 23 Land Dec. 34.

And evidence of facts tending to show that a mining claim was deemed valuable for mining purposes is sufficient to go to the

Messrs. Snow & McCamant, for appellants:

A location once regularly made confers a right equivalent to patent; any entry on such lands, so regularly located, constitutes a trespass, and every attempted subsequent location thereon is void.

The Doctor location, there being no prior right of entry upon the ground covered by Louise and Lucky Boy No. 4, is void.

jury on an issue as to whether or not the lands were vacant mineral lands of the United States subject to location. It is not necessary to show that there was a reasonable probability that the claim would become a source of profit. United States v. King, 9 Mont. 75, 22 Pac. 498.

And land on which mineral of commercial value is found is subject to appropriation and entry under the mineral land laws, regardless of the fact that, from lack of transportation facilities, the mineral cannot at the present time be put upon the market. Smith v. Wallace, Departmental Decision of March 24, 1896, Mineral Law Dig. 345.

So, in the absence of any adverse claim, it will be presumed that lodes exist in land legally located as lode claims. Apple Blossom Placer v. Cora Lee Lode, 21 Land Dec. 438.

And if the mineral character of a mining claim is founded upon the exploration of only one portion thereof, the burden thereby cast upon one attacking the mineral location is sustained by evidence of exploration on that same portion, sufficient to demonstrate its nonmineral character, by overcoming the alleged prior exploration and discovery. Washington v. McBride, 25 Land Dec. 169.

Nor is the fact that no active mining operations have been carried on on lands since their purchase of any effect on the question of their mineral character, where, during such time, the land has been involved in litigation. Active mining operations are not essential in order to establish the mineral character of the land. Aspen Consol. Min. Co. v. Williams, 23 Land Dec. 34.

And where a mineral location is based upon a discovery within its limits of a vein or lode of quartz-bearing copper and gold; and it appears that the same is in all respects regular, and that the time intervening between the date of the location and the filing of an application to purchase the land under the act of June 3, 1878, as amended by the act of August 4, 1892, was so short as not to afford the mineral locator a reasonable opportunity to develop his claim sufficiently to ascertain with certainty the extent or value of the mineral deposit contained therein,—such location will be regarded as a mining claim within the meaning of the proviso to such act, and the land therein embraced will not be regarded as subject to purchase thereunder. Michie v. Gothberg, supra.

But where the local land officer and the commissioner of the General Land Office concur in finding that land is mineral in character, and subject to sale as such, the evidence being conflicting, great consideration should be given to such determination; and it should not be rejected unless a mature and careful examination of the entire record clearly demonstrates that it is wrong. Washington v. McBride, supra.

And the report of the surveyor as to the mineral character of a claim is sufficient to warrant its location as a placer mine, in the absence of anything to bring in question the bona fides of the claim, or tending to show that the ground is valuable, or is sought, for any other than mining purposes. Re Lincoln Placer, 7 Land Dec. 81.

But the report of the United States deputy surveyor, stating that a claim is underlain with a deep bed of gravel-bearing placer gold, does not establish its mineral character so as to justify its location and entry for mining, where it also states that the successful working of said claim as a placer mine will depend upon the building of a bed-rock flume. Re Downs, 7 Land Dec. 71.

And since a surveyor is not required, or afforded opportunity, to pass over the interior or body of sections he surveys, and he is not directed to search for mines, but merely to report such as come to his knowledge while passing along the outlines of the sections surveyed, his return that lands are mineral or nonmineral does not preclude the assertion of any right, or the proof of the facts of the case as they really exist. Win-scott v. Northern P. R. Co. 17 Land Dec. 274.

Nor does an ordinary assay certificate establish the value of a vein of mineral; and Equitable estoppel never arises where there has been a bona fide mistake of the parties as to where the true boundary of the true owner lies, even where, as a result of this mistake, improvements have been erected.

To constitute an estoppel by the acquiescence of a party it is essential that he who is claimed to be estopped should have had knowledge of the facts, and he who claims the estoppel should have been ignorant of the truth, and have been led into doing that which he would not have done but for such silence.

Appellants had abandoned to respondents the ground embraced in the Doctor location, it is not sufficient to establish the mineral character of the land containing it. Dobler v. Northern P. R. Co. 17 Land Dec. 103.

Only the government of the United States, or persons claiming lands under the government as nonmineral lands, can properly raise the question whether the lands are subject to be located as mineral lands. Lorenz v. Waldron, 96 Cal. 243, 31 Pac. 54.

On this subject, see also infra, V. c.

(b) Grants to states for educational and other purposes.

Grants of public lands to a state or territory for school or other purposes pass no title to mineral lands then known to be such as a matter of governmental policy, whether they are expressly reserved or not. Ivanhoe Min. Co. v. Keystone Consol. Min. Co. 102 U. S. 787, 26 L. ed. 126; Keystone Lode & Mill Site v. Nevada, 15 Land Dec. 259; Re Utah, 32 Land Dec. 117.

Thus, the grant of the 16th and 36th sections of public land to the state of California by the act of Congress of March 3, 1853, was not intended to include mineral lands known to be such when the same was surveyed. Ivanhoe Min. Co. v. Keystone Consol. Min. Co. supra.

As to this point, the above case appears to have overruled Wedekind v. Craig, 56 Cal. 642, and Higgins v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 254.

So, the provision of § 7 of that act, that no person shall obtain the benefit of this act by a settlement or location on mineral lands, expressly excepts from the grant mineral lands known to be such when the surveys of them were made. Ivanhoe Min. Co. v. Keystone Consol. Min. Co. and Wedekind v. Craig, supra.

And school indemnity selection lands, if mineral in character, are open to exploration and purchase under the mining laws prior to 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the approval of the selection. McQuiddy v. California, 29 Land Dec. 181.

But a patent transferring public lands to an individual is a record of a judgment of the state by its officers, duly appointed for that purpose, that conditions and characteristics of the land are not such as to constitute it mineral land, within the meaning of a statute reserving mineral lands from a grant of school lands. Ah Yew v. Choate, 24 Cal. 562.

And the mere fact that land patented to an individual was ascertained to contain a sufficient amount of gold to induce the patentee to mine it therefor is not sufficient to establish that it was mineral land, within the meaning of a statute excepting mineral lands from a grant of school lands, as against evidence to the contrary, furnished by the patent. Ibid.

So, the act of Congress of March 21, 1864, providing for the admission of Nevada into the Union as a state, and granting thereto certain sections of land for school purposes, does not pass title to lands known to be mineral in character, though the grant does not, in terms, except such lands; the same remaining part of the public domain, and subject to location for mining purposes. Keystone Lode & Mill Site v. Nevada, supra.

And the provision of that act, granting specific sections of public land which had not yet been surveyed, constituted a present grant of land equal in amount to the specified sections, the grant to take effect when the status of the land was fixed by survey and they became capable of identification; and where, subsequent to such grant, an act was passed reserving from sale all mineral lands of the state; and after this the legislature of the state of Nevada unqualifiedly accepted the grant,—the acceptance of the grant was in its modified form, not including mineral lands, so that a patent of such and cannot be heard to assert a title they disclaimed.

Peard, 111 Cal. 599, 44 Pac. 246; Johnston v. Standard Min. Co. 148 U. S. 360, 37 L. ed. 480, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended by plaintiffs' counsel that an error was committed in refusing to strike from the transcript much of the testimony given by defendants' witnesses, because it was taken out of the jurisdiction of the trial court, without an order to that effect. The statute authorizes a court, when a suit is at issue upon a question of fact, to refer the cause, and also to appoint a special referee for the purpose of taking testimony of witnesses residing more than 20 miles from the place of holding court. Bellinger & C. Comp. § 827. This suit was begun and tried in Lane county, and the referee appointed therein, without an order of special reference, went to Multnomah county, where, over objection and exception of plaintiffs' counsel, the testimony of defendants' witnesses was taken. These witnesses, however, were cross-examined before such referee by plaintiffs' counsel, who thereafter, in Lane county, offered testimony in rebuttal thereof. In Brush v. Mullany, 12 Abb. Pr. 344, it was insisted that a referee appointed in one county in New York could not, without special appointment, take the testimony of witnesses in any other county of that state; the court holding that an objection interposed on that ground went to the jurisdiction of the referee, and intimating that it was doubtful whether or not an indictment for perjury would lie against any of the witnesses who were sworn before him lands by the state did not include the mineral lands; and mineral lands were not thereby withdrawn from location for mining purposes. Heydenfeldt v. Daney Gold & S. Min. Co. 93 U. S. 634, 23 L. ed. 995, Affirming 10 Nev. 290.

And the reservation therein from sale, of lands valuable for mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, or copper, applies to lands granted prior to and at the time of the passage of the act, as well as to future acts or grants. Heydenfeldt v. Daney Gold & S. Min. Co. 10 Nev. 290.

And it is not limited to the public lands then belonging to the United States, but includes all unsurveyed lands whether the same or any portion thereof had been previously granted or not. All lands are public within the meaning of the word "public," as used in that act, until the survey thereof is made. Ibid.

But, in excluding mineral land from the lands granted by that act, Congress intended to exclude only such as were valuable for mining purposes; and the mere fact that the land contained copper, gold, and silver bearing quartz is not sufficient to impress it with the character of mineral land within the meaning of the reservation. Merrill v. Dixon, 15 Nev. 406.

Nor was the 2,000,000-acre grant by the United States to the state of Nevada of land for school purposes, to be selected by the state from unappropriated, nonmineral, public lands, made by the act of Congress of June 16, 1880, intended to include any mineral lands. Garrard v. Silver Peak Mines, 82 Fed. 578, Affirmed in 36 C. C. A. 603, 94 Fed. 983.

And under it the state has no authority to issue a patent for mineral land. Ibid.

So, under that act, and under Nevada act of March 3, 1887, expressly disclaiming, on behalf of itself and its grantees, any rights to any mineral lands which had been, or might be, selected under such grant, the state acquired no right to land selected under the grant which was, in fact, known mineral land containing salt and precious metals, and which had been previously appropriated under an act authorizing such appropriation, and had since remained in the actual possession of the appropriator and his grantees. Garrard v. Silver Peak Mines, 36 C. C. A. 603, 94 Fed. 983.

And a patent issued by the state under that act, and under the Nevada statutes, providing for the sale of such lands, but permitting any citizen to enter on any mineral land in the state, notwithstanding the state's selection of it, conveys to a patentee no title to a lode or vein of mineral in the patented lands; and one taking a patent to such lands acquires no interest in a mine located after his application was filed, and before the patent issued, notwithstanding the fact that the selection by the state under the grant from the government determined that the lands were agricultural and nonmineral. Stanley v. Mineral Union, Limited, 20 Nev. 55, 63 Pac. 59.

Nor did the grant of school lands to the state of Utah, made by act of Congress of July 16, 1894, carry with it lands known to be chiefly valuable for mineral at the time when the state's right would attach, if at all. Re Utah, 32 Land Dec. 117.

But a mineral return by the surveyor general does not have the effect of establishing the character of lands as chiefly valuable for mineral, and cannot of itself operate to take lands out of a grant to a state for school purposes as mineral lands; this can be done only by proof clearly showing that the lands were, at the time when the right of the state would have attached, known to contain valuable deposits of mineral, and to be chiefly valuable on account of such deposits. Ibid.

outside the county in which he was appointed. In that case, however, a default by all the defendants having been entered, the cause was referred and the testimony taken in their absence, thus precluding the implication of a waiver. In Blevins v. Morledge, 5 Okla. 141, 47 Pac. 1068, an objection was interposed that a trial before referees was conducted outside the jurisdiction of the court, and it was held untenable where the point was not raised in the court below. It is fairly to be implied from the decision in that case that an objection to the taking of testimony by a referee, outside the jurisdiction of the court appointing him, could be waived by the parties. In New York a reference ordered by a court of special and limited jurisdiction requires the referee to take the testimony within such jurisdiction. Bonner v. McPhail, 31 Barb. 106. Where, however, attorneys stipulate that a referee appointed by a surrogate in a county of that state may take the testimony of witnesses in another county therein, and an order to that effect is entered, it cannot be subsequently attacked, on the ground of a want of jurisdiction, by a party who appeared before the referee in such other county and there participated in the proceeding had therein before such referee. Re Davenport, 37 Misc. 179, 74 N. Y. Supp. 940. In the case at bar, though plaintiffs' counsel objected and excepted to the taking of the testimony by the referee in Multnomah county, they nevertheless participated therein by cross-examining the witnesses produced by the de-

And a mineral location of land within the state, made prior to the admission thereof as a state, is not of itself sufficient to establish the mineral character of the land located, so as to defeat a grant to the state. Re Mahogany No. 2 Lode Claim, 33 Land Dec. 37.

But where the state was specially notified of the pendency of an application for a patent under such a location, and made no objection by way of protest or otherwise to the allowance of a mineral entry, it is bound by the record made upon such application; and a hearing for the purpose of determining the character of the land is unnecessary. Ibid.

An entry upon lands reserved by the act of Congress of March 2, 1853, for the purpose of being applied to common schools in Washington territory, and granted to the state to take effect as soon as it should be organized under the enabling act of February 22, 1889, made subsequent to the survey of such lands and the approval of the enabling act, however, is void, whether the lands are entered under the timber and stone act, or under the mining laws. Wheeler v. Smith, 5 Wash. 704, 32 Pac. 784.

So, the state of Michigan was admitted to the Union with the unalterable understanding that every section number 16 in every township of public lands, and, when the section has been sold or disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to the state for the use of schools; and the entry by a mining company on lands in such sections, or their equivalent, and a patent issued therefor, do not confer title. Cooper v. Roberts, 18 How. 173, 15 L. ed. 338.

Nor are lands reserved for the benefit of public schools, or donated, to any state, subject to location or entry as placer-mining claims under the act of Congress of August 4, 1892. Re Harper, 16 Land Dec. 110.

(c) Town-site grants.

recognize the possession of mining claims within their limits, and forbid the acquisition of any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper within them under proceedings by which title to other lands there situated is secured; thus leaving the mineral deposits within town sites open to exploration, and the land in which they are found to occupation and purchase in the same manner as such deposits are elsewhere explored and possessed, and the lands containing them acquired. Steel v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. 106 U. S. 447, 27 L. ed. 226, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389; Deffebach v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 29 L. ed. 423, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95.

And whenever mines are found in lands belonging to the United States, whether within or without town sites, they may be claimed and worked, provided existing rights of others, arising from prior occupation, are not interfered with. *Steel v. Land embraced within a town site on the public domain, when unoccupied, is not exempt from location and sale for mining purposes; its exemption is only from settlement and sale under the pre-emption laws of the United States. Steel v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. supra; Poire v. Wells, 6 Colo. 406; Poire v. Leadville Improv. Co. 6 Colo. 413.

And a patent issued under the general town-site laws, for land embraced in an unincorporated town site, is inoperative to convey title to any lands known to be valuable for minerals at the date of the town-site entry, or to any valid mining claim or possession held under the mining laws at the date of such entry. Lalande v. Saltese Townsite, 32 Land Dec. 211; Moyle v. Bul-lene, 7 Colo. App. 308, 44 Pac. 69.

Nor will present or prospective value of mineral lands for town-site purposes prevent acquisition of title thereto under the mineral laws. Kemp v. Starr, 6 Copp, Land Owner, 3, Mineral Law Dig. 452; Re Deadwood Town Site, supra.

And where a large tract of land is granted

fendants. To strike from the transcript the testimony so taken would be to permit plaintiffs to speculate on securing a decree in their favor; but, failing in this respect, now to insist that an error was thereby committed, would be allowing them to take advantage of an irregularity which, in our opinion, they voluntarily waived; the want of jurisdiction being only to the person.

Considering the case on its merits, the transcript shows that, prior to November, 1899, the plaintiffs and J. W. Moore and G. A. Dyson, as tenants in common, were in possession of the Louise and Lucky Boy No. 4, and other quartz-mining claims in the Blue river district upon which improvements have been made of the value of about $40,000; the property being treated as one mine, which is known as the "Lucky Boy Group," and was under the supervision of the plaintiff Frank C. Sharkey as managing partner. A statement of the means adopted by plaintiffs to secure a title to their claims is not deemed essential, for a patent from the United States having been executed to them therefor, except as to the premises in conflict, is conclusive of all the facts necessary to establish the validity thereof as against a party claiming adverse rights. Anderson v. Bartels, 7 Colo. 256, 3 Pac. 225; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Campbell, 17 Colo. 267, 29 Pac. 513; Uinta Tunnel Min. & Transp. Co. v. Creede & C. C. Min. & Mill. Co. 57 C. C. for town sites, and a patent is issued for a smaller portion of such tract, valuable mineral deposits in such land outside of the patent, but in the town-site tract, are equally open to exploration and purchase with those in lands outside of the town site. Davis v. Wiebbold, 139 U. S. 507, 35 L. ed. 238, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628.

The rule that lands in which a vested right of ownership has been acquired are not subject to the mining laws or to mineral exploration and entry applies, however, to lands to which vested rights of ownership have been acquired under the town-site law. Re Mining Claim, 31 Land Dec. 154.

And the term, "mine of gold, silver, cinnamon, or copper," as used in the acts of Congress providing that no title to any such mine shall be acquired under provisions relating to town sites, applies to paying mines known to exist at the time of the granting of town sites, or which there was good reason to believe then existed; and, if the land was not known to be mineral at the time of the issuance of the patent, it passes by the patent, and is not open to subsequent location. Smith v. Hill, 89 Cal. 122, 26 Pac. 644; Davis v. Wiebbold and Re Mining Claim, supra.

A patent for a town site after issue thereof is conclusive as to the nonmineral character of the land, and can be assailed only in a direct proceeding by the United States. Carter v. Thompson, 65 Fed. 329.

And it cannot be attacked collaterally by persons locating mining claims subsequent to the entry of the town site, and the issuance of the patents therefor, on the ground that the land covered by such patents was mineral at the time of its entry, and hence did not pass under the patents, and was not withdrawn from location. Board of Education v. Mansfield, 17 S. D. 72, 106 Am. St. Rep. 771, 95 N. W. 286; Re Duffy Quartz Mine, 18 Land Dec. 259.

Nor is a mining location of land within certain named town sites, made after special reservation of those town sites pursuant to a statute providing therefor, of any, validity 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or effect whatever. Re Mining Claim, supra.

And where entry of a town site was made and the patent issued, and it was not known that there were any valuable minerals within the town site, the patentee, or a person holding under him, cannot be deprived of the premises purchased and occupied by him because of a subsequent discovery of minerals in them and the issue of a patent to the discoverer. Davis v. Wiebbold, supra; Re Laney, 9 Land Dec. 83; Re Williams, 9 Copp, Land Owner, 147, Mineral Law Dig. 452; Re Mining Claim, supra.

In Davis v. Wiebbold, supra, it was said that the language in Steel v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. 106 U. S. 447, 27 L. ed. 226, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389, supra, was used with reference to mines in unoccupied public land in unpatented town sites, and it is applicable only to them and to mines in public land in patented town sites outside of the limits of the patent.

Nor can the locator of a lode-mining claim which is partly embraced in a town site obtain any rights by virtue thereof within the limits of the town site. Re Laney, supra.

So, the policy of the United States government, of conveying town-site lands to the states, was to reserve only such mineral lands as were valuable as such. Richards v. Dower, 81 Cal. 44, 22 Pac. 304.

A mine is not reserved from the Federal grant of town-site lands to a state, unless it is not only known, but known to be valuable, at the date of the patent, or discovered to be so before the occupation or improvement of the lot containing it for residences or business under the town-site title. Ibid.

And a mining claim is not legally known to exist, within the meaning of these rules, where the boundaries of the claim located are not specifically marked on the ground, and due notice of the location given. Re Duffy Quartz Mine, supra.

And if the lands were not known at that time to be valuable for mining purposes, the fact that they had been valuable, or that they were afterwards discovered to be still

181 Fed. 579; St. Louis Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 26 L. ed. 875; Calhoun Gold Min. Co. v. Ajax Gold Min. Co. 182 U. S. 499, 45 L. ed. 1200, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 885. The defendant Candiani having been advised by Zimmerman to go to the Blue river mining district and secure a quartz claim, accepted from him a letter of introduction which, in November, 1899, he presented at the mines to Frank C. Sharkey, who showed him and his associate, one G. B. Perelli, every attention possible. After remaining plaintiffs' guests several days, Candiani and Perelli went to a tunnel on one of the claims, known as the "Gold Dollar," where they saw Dyson, who, in answer to their inquiry as to whether or not there was any mining property that could be secured in that vicinity, informed them that vacant public land could be found just above the place where he was working, showing them the northeast and northwest corners of the Gold Dollar claim. Perelli, going a few feet north of the boundary of such claim, prospected the ground, and returning to the tunnel wrote a location notice, calling the premises 'the "Doctor" claim. Dyson signed his name as a witness to the notice, which was posted on the stub of a tree on the claim selected. The day being very stormy, Dyson agreed to mark on the ground the boundaries of the Doctor claim, and Candiani and Perelli in a day or two thereafter left the mines without informing the superintendent of the location they had made. Candiani, on returning to Portland, however, told Zimmerman that he valuable, for such purposes, does not prevent the patentee under a town-site patent from taking title. Dower v. Richards, 151 U. S. 658, 38 L. ed. 305, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 452, Affirming 81 Cal. 44, 22 Pac. 304; Bonner v. Meikle, 82 Fed. 697.

So, the exception of mineral lands from the town-site grant of lands applies only to such lands as were at the time of the grant known to be so valuable for minerals as to justify expenditure for their extraction. Davis v. Wiebold and Bonner v. Meikle, supra; Harkrader v. Goldstein, 31 Land Dec. 87.

If lands are known to contain precious metals, but in quantities so small as not to justify the attempt to extract them; or, though they might be mined at a small profit, if they are of more value for agriculture than for mining,—they are not mineral lands within the meaning of the statutes. Richards v. Dower, 81 Cal. 44, 22 Pac. 304.

And land will not be deemed to have continued to be valuable as mineral land merely because a ledge had once been profitably worked, so as to be exempted from a grant of town-site lands. Ibid.

(2) Determination as to character.

The question whether town-site lands are mineral, so as to be open to location, is one for the consideration of the Land Department, in an application for a patent. Steel v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. 106 U. S. 447; 27 L. ed. 226, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389; Ryan v. Granite Hill Min. & Development Co. 29 Land Dec. 522.

And a decision of that question by the court does not bind or conclude the department, or relieve it from the duty of making its own decision in the premises. Ryan v. Granite Hill Min. & Development Co. supra.

So, whether rights have been acquired in town-site lands which would preclude their location for mining purposes, and the issue of a patent therefor to a miner, when not subjected, under the act of Congress, to local tribunals, is a matter properly cognizable by the Land Department when applicable L.R.A. (N.S.)

tion is made for a patent. Steel v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. 106 U. S. 447, 27 L. ed. 226, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389.

But whether a ledge was known to be valuable for mining purposes at the time when a town-site patent covering it took effect is a question of fact for the trial court in an action involving a possessory right, which cannot be reviewed on appeal to a Federal court, where the only question of Federal law in the case had been rightly settled below. Dower v. Richards, 151 U. S. 658, 38 L. ed. 305, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 452, Affirming 81 Cal. 44, 22 Pac. 304.

So, one who asserts a right to town-site lands has the burden of showing that they are mineral, and are, therefore, excepted from the town-site grant. Richards v. Dower, 81 Cal. 44, 22 Pac. 304.

And where a person acted in good faith in locating upon or purchasing town lots, and made improvements thereon under the belief that the land was not mineral, his rights ought not to be disturbed without clear and satisfactory proof that, within their limits, there had been found a lode or vein of mineral. Bonner v. Meikle, supra.

But where land is within a well-known mineral locality, the presumption, before its survey, is that it is mineral in character. Re Deadwood Town Site, 8 Copp, Land Owner, 18, Mineral Law. Dig. 342.

And clear and positive proof alone can overcome the mineral return of land near valuable mines. North Leadville Town Site v. Searl, 7 Copp, Land Owner, 36, Mineral Law Dig. 341.

(d) Homestead pre-emption and other agricultural grants.

(1) Generally.

Known mineral land is expressly exempted from homestead pre-emption by act of Congress. Boggs v. Merced Min. Co. 14 Cal. 279; Gold Hill Quartz Min. Co. v. Ish, 5 Or. 104; Deffebach v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 29 L. ed. 423, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95.

And it remains subject to location for had established a claim joining the Gold Dollar. In the winter of 1899 or 1900, Dyson and Standish made some markings of the Doctor claim, for which service Candiani sent the former by Zimmerman $10 in payment thereof, but when this money was delivered Zimmerman did not know that Dyson had indicated any line on the Doctor claim.

The statute of this state in force when Candiani attempted to establish the Doctor lode required the locator of a mine, before the expiration of ninety days from the date of posting the notice of selection of mineral land, to sink a discovery shaft upon his claim to the depth of 10 feet, or deeper, if necessary, to show a vein of mineral deposit in place. Laws 1898, p. 17, § 3. No work having been done on the Doctor claim within the time prescribed, Candiani returned thereto and posted thereon another notice, of which the following is a copy, to wit: "Notice is hereby given that Charles F. Candiana, a citizen of the United States of America, conforming to the mining laws thereof, and of the state of Oregon, and the local rules, regulations, and customs of miners, has located, and by this notice do relocate, claim known as the Doctor lode or mining claim, said claim being discovered on the 16th day of November, 1899, and do claim 960 feet on this lead, lode, or vein, bearing mineral in place, by 600 feet in width, the same being 300 feet on each side of the center thereof, together with all dips, spurs, and angles, and all other veins or lodes the mining purposes. Gold Hill Quartz Min. Co. v. Ish, supra.

Nor do known deposits of precious metals in public lands pass by a patent thereof as agricultural lands. Gold Hill Quartz Min. Co. v. Ish and Deffebach v. Hawke, supra; Bellows v. Champion Mine, 4 Copp. Land Owner, 17; Re Newell, 3 Copp. Land Owner, 50; Re Hurlbut, 5 Copp. Land Owner, 5, Mineral Law Dig. 259.

And the fact that lands were not segregated and leased as mineral lands does not affect their exemption from pre-emption as agricultural lands where their mineral character was known. Gold Hill Quartz Min. Co. v. Ish, supra.

And a pre-emption entry, covering land which is mineral in character, made with knowledge of prior mineral locations thereon, and of the fact that the land was at the time regarded by many in the vicinity as valuable for mineral purposes, is subject to cancellation as having been allowed for known mineral land. Aspen Consol. Min. Co. v. Williams, 23 Land Dec. 34.

And land upon which a valid homestead entry has been made, and which is classed as agricultural, but which is subject to the mineral laws, may be located for mining purposes; and the homesteader may be divested of his rights upon a proper showing, upon application made at any time before final proof and payment are made, and the final receipt issued. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil, & Min. Co. 13 Okla. 425, 73 Pac. 936.

Rights once vested in an allottee of public lands, or an entry man under the homestead laws, however, cannot be affected by the subsequent exploration or location of the lands for minerals. Re Mining Claim, 31 Land Dec. 154.

And lands not known to contain valuable mineral deposits at the time when the rights of the allottee or homestead entry man become fixed and vested are not thereafter subject to exploration, location, or entry under the mining laws. Ibid.; Re Acme Cement & Plaster Co. 31 Land Dec. 125; Heine v. Roth, 2 Alaska, 417. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And all mineral deposits discovered upon land after a patent therefor has issued to a party claiming under the laws regulating the disposal of agricultural lands pass with the patent, and are withdrawn from location. Cowell v. Lammers, 10 Sawy. 246, 21 Fed. 200.

But a mining claim located so that a part of it was included within the limits of an agricultural claim, afterwards patented as agricultural lands, is not thereby rendered invalid as against a subsequent comer, who relies wholly upon the supposed defect in the original locator's location. Richards v. Wolfing, 98 Cal. 195, 32 Pac. 971.

Nor do mere surface indications of the existence of veins of mineral constitute a mine expressly excepted out of the pre-emption laws. Colorado Coal & I. Co. v. United States, 123 U. S. 307, 31 L. ed. 182, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 131.

And the fact that there may be some quantity of gold in lands, not in sufficient quantities to warrant miners to work them, does not warrant a location for mining purposes, or prevent a homestead claimant from taking them as agricultural lands. Etling v. Potter, 17 Land Dec. 424.

To be reserved from sale under the agricultural-land laws as mineral in character, lands must be capable of being profitably worked for mineral by the usual modes of mining. Re Deadwood Town Site, 8 Copp. Land Owner, 153, Mineral Law Dig. 346.

The question for determination on an issue as to whether land is mineral or agricultural in its character is whether it is more valuable for mining than for agricultural purposes. Winters v. Bliss, 14 Land Dec. 59; Peirano v. Pendola, 10 Land Dec. 536; Cutting v. Reininghaus, 7 Land Dec. 265; Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. supra.

If land is worth more for agricultural than for mining purposes it is not mineral land within the meaning of the statutes providing that no lands on which are situated any known mines are subject to pre-emption, although it may contain some top or apex of which lie within said boundaries, situate in Blue river mining district, county of Lane, state of Oregon, said location being described and marked on the ground as follows, to wit: From this notice of location running 300 feet in a westerly direction to a stake marked 'Southwest stake of the Doctor lode;' thence 950 feet in a northerly direction to a stake marked 'Northwest stake of Doctor lode;' thence running 600 feet in an easterly direction to a stake marked 'Northeast stake of Doctor lode;' thence running 300 feet in a westerly direction to this notice of location. This claim is joining the northeast line of the Gold Dollar claim, and is the extension of the same; and I intend to hold and work said claim in accordance with the local customs and rules of miners and the mining laws of the United States and of the state of Oregon. Dated on the ground the 14th of February, 1900. Located February 14th, 1900. Discovered November 16th, 1899. C. F. Candiani." He also cut a tunnel into his mine, and prior to June, 1901, made other improvements on the property of the value of about $8,000, when Frank C. Sharkey, having discovered that the Doctor lode conflicted with plaintiffs' mining claims, took possession of such tunnel and ejected Candiani from the premises, thereby precipitating a difficulty which resulted in this suit.

The statute of this state permits a citizen of the United States, or one who has declared his intention of becoming such, who discovers upon the unappropriated public measure of gold or silver. United States v. Reed, 28 Fed. 482.

And, to exclude lands from appropriation under the homestead law on the ground that they contain a valuable bed of limestone, it must affirmatively appear that they are more valuable on account of the stone than for agricultural purposes. Long v. Isakson, 23 Land Dec. 353.

And the same rule applies to coal lands. Colorado Coal & Iron Co. v. United States, supra.

Nor is the mere fact that lands were being mined or claimed for mining purposes sufficient to withdraw them from entry under the homestead law, if the lands were not in fact mineral, and were worth more for agricultural than for mining purposes. United States v. Reed, supra.

And the construction of a house and shop upon a placer-mining claim does not tend to show that the person constructing them possesses the land as a miner, or that it is mineral ground; and evidence thereof is not competent as bearing upon the right of possession of a tract of placer-mining ground. Moxon v. Wilkinson, 2 Mont. 421.

A locator of a mining claim, contesting the rights of a homestead entry man upon the same property, is not entitled to either joint or adverse possession as against the homesteader. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. supra.

(2) Determination as to character.

The existence of known mines expressly excepted out of the pre-emption laws must be determined according to the facts in existence at the time of the sale of the pre-empted lands, and new discoveries after the sale, by which the lands become profitable to work as a mine, cannot affect the title passed by the sale. Colorado Coal & I. Co. v. United States, supra.

And proof of the mineral character of land, in a contest between a mineral and an agricultural claimant, must be specific and based upon the actual production of mineral, and must show that the mineral value 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the land is greater than its agricultural value. Dughi v. Harkins, 2 Land Dec. 721.

And a person asserting the mineral character of land returned as agricultural has the burden of proving it. Winters v. Bliss, 14 Land Dec. 59; Hunt v. Bartholomew, 10 Copp. Land Owner, 293; Mineral Law Dig. 407; Dughi v. Harkins, supra; Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. 13 Okla. 425, 73 Pac. 936.

He must show that, as a present fact, the land is mineral in character, and more valuable for mining than for agricultural purposes. Dobler v. Northern P. R. Co. 17 Land Dec. 103; Tinkham v. McCaffrey, 13 Land Dec. 517; Magruder v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 28 Land Dec. 174; Creswell Min. Co. v. Johnson, 8 Land Dec. 440.

And one who attacks an agricultural entry on the ground of the known mineral character of the land at the date of the entry has the burden of proof to establish such character irrespective of the fact that the land had been returned as mineral after the allowance of the agricultural entry. Aspen Consol. Min. Co. v. Williams, 23 Land Dec. 34.

Where land has been returned as mineral in the surveyor general's report, and this report remains in force, however, the burden of proof of its agricultural character rests with the person asserting it. Ibid.

But a final decision of the Land Department, in which a tract of land is held to be mineral in character, is conclusive only as to the period covered by the inquiry, and will not preclude a subsequent investigation as to the character of the tract on allegation that the mining claims thereon have been abandoned, and that the land has become agricultural in character. Dargin v. Koch, 20 Land Dec. 384.

Nor are the returns of the surveyor as to the character of lands, as to being mineral or agricultural, conclusive; and evidence as to the character of the land may be produced in impeachment of his returns. Gold Hill Quartz Min. Co. v. Ish, 5 Or. 104.

And evidence that a tract of land returned as mineral had improvements on it to the domain, a lode of mineral-bearing rock in place, to locate a claim on the vein by posting thereon a notice which shall contain: "First, the name of the lode or claim; second, the name or names of the locator or locators; third, the date of the location; fourth, the number of linear feet claimed along the vein or lode each way from the point of discovery, with the width on each side of the said lode or vein; fifth, the general course or strike of the vein or lode as nearly as may be." A locator is also required to define "the boundaries upon the surface of each claim so that the same may be readily traced. Such boundaries shall be marked within thirty days after posting of such notice by six substantial posts, . . . or by substantial mounds of stone, . . .

value of about $5,000; and that several acres of it were in a high state of cultivation, producing quantities of fruit, grapes, vegetables, and berries; and that a part of it produced a large quantity of hay; and that the pre-emptor derived from his agricultural operations an actual profit of $1,000 after allowing prevailing wages for himself and three or four hands,—is sufficient to establish greater value for agricultural than for mineral purposes, as against evidence that the mining claims thereon were unworked and were salable at $200 or less. Peirano v. Pendola, 10 Land Dec. 536.

Nor does a certificate of location of a mining claim establish the mineral character of a tract, in the absence of other evidence showing an actual discovery of mineral. Etling v. Potter, 17 Land Dec. 424; McQuiddy v. California, 29 Land Dec. 181; Magruder v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 28 Land Dec. 174.

And it is not sufficient to overcome an agricultural return of the surveyor general. McQuiddy v. California and Magruder v. Oregon & C. R. Co. supra.

In Magruder v. Oregon & C. R. Co. supra, Sweeney v. Northern P. R. Co. 20 Land Dec. 394; Northern P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 17 Land Dec. 545; and Walker v. Southern P. R. Co. 24 Land Dec. 172,—were overruled as to this point.

To raise a presumption by a location of a mining claim that the land included therein, though returned as agricultural, is in fact mineral, the location must be a legal one in which a discovery in compliance with the law was made. Rhodes v. Treas. 21 Land Dec. 502.

But to sustain the location of a mining claim, besides the certificate of location, evidence of the mineral character of the land, or of a discovery of mineral sufficient to warrant a person of ordinary prudence in the further expenditure of his labor and means with a reasonable prospect of success in developing a paying mine, must be given as against an agricultural return. McQuiddy v. California, supra.

And when a legal location for mining one such post or mound of rock at each corner and at the center ends of such claims." Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 3975. "Any and all locations, or attempted locations, of quartz-mining claims, within this state subsequent to the 31st day of December, 1898, that shall not comply and be in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be null and void." Id. § 3984. An examination of the last notice posted by Candiani will show that it fails in many respects to comply with the statutory requirements, and evidently omits to designate the eastern boundary of the Doctor claim. The trial court, inter alia, found, and we think the conclusion is fully warranted by the testimony: "That no markings of the Doctor claim for the purpose of marking purposes has been made on land returned as agricultural, the slight presumption in favor of the return of the surveyor general is overcome, and the burden of proof shifts to the party attacking the mineral entry. Northern P. R. Co. v. Marshall, supra.

And the act of a settler, of swearing falsely in the matter of the land being claimed or worked for precious metals, though it might subject him to perjury, will not vitiate his entry, or render his patent void or liable to cancellation, in the absence of any statute giving it that effect. United States v. Reed, 28 Fed. 482.

The general instructions of the Land Office, of April 22, 1880, revoking mineral withdrawals, and shifting the burden of proof from agricultural to mineral claimants, applies to the public lands of Alabama as well as to those of other states. Re Caste, 3 Land Dec. 169.

(e) Railway aid grants.

(1) Rights of way.

The act of Congress granting to the Northern Pacific Railway Company a right of way through the public lands, and other similar acts containing no conditions or reservations, pass minerals therein contained; and mining claims cannot be located and worked upon the track and land covered by the right of way. Wilkinson v. Northern P. R. Co. 5 Mont. 538, 6 Pac. 349.

And the joint resolution of Congress of January 30, 1865, declaring that no act shall be so construed as to embrace mineral lands, which in all cases shall be, and are hereby, reserved exclusively to the United States, cannot be construed as a reservation of mineral lands from the operation of grants of right of way to railway companies. Ibid.

Nor are the mineral lands excluded from the operation of the third section of the charter of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, granting in aid of the construction of the railroad every alternate section of the public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to a designated amount of out on the ground the boundaries thereof was ever made until the time of the survey for patent, other than such as was made by Dyson and Standish in December, 1899.' Though our statute has prescribed certain conditions which must be performed in order properly to locate a mining claim, and provided that a failure to comply therewith should annul every attempted location, the enactment was evidently designed as a guide only to determine the rights of conflicting claimants, thus permitting the proper marking of a location at any time before adverse rights attach. McGinnis v. Egbert, 8 Colo. 41, 5 Pac. 652; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666, 4 Morrison, Min. Rep. 411; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1

Fed. 522, 9 Morrison, Min. Rep. 529; Crown Point Min. Co. v. Crismon, 39 Or. 364, 65 Pac. 87.

Unappropriated lands of the United States containing valuable deposits of mineral are subject to exploration, occupation, and purchase, under regulations prescribed by law, so far as the same is applicable and not inconsistent with the acts of Congress. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2319, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424. In commenting upon legislation which the act of Congress of July 4, 1866, authorizes, Mr. Lindley, in his work on Mines, 2d ed. § 249, says: "If the state may prescribe any additional or supplemental rules, increasing the burdens or diminishing the benefits granted by the Federal laws in lands of the public domain, it is simply because sections, those covered by the right of way. Ibid.

Under the right-of-way act of Congress of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. at L. 482, chap. 152, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1568), providing for the granting of a right of way through the public lands to any railroad company, and § 4 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1569), providing that any railroad desiring to secure the benefits of that act shall, within a specified time, file in the land office for the district where the land is located a profile of its road; and that, on the approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior, the same shall be noted on the plats in that office; and thereafter all such lands over which such right of way shall pass shall be disposed of subject thereto, however, until the filing of a right-of-way map definitely locating the road and the approval thereof thus provided for, the lands covered by a proposed right of way remain open and subject to location for mining purposes under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2322 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1425), giving locators for mining purposes an exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their location. Southern California R. Co. v. O'Donnell (Cal.) 85 Pac. 932.

(2) Subsidy or aid lands.

All, or nearly all, the various acts of Congress, granting public lands in aid of railway construction, except mineral lands; and such a grant will not pass an existing mining claim though it is imperfect. Broder v. Natoma Water & Min. Co. 101 U. S. 274, 25 L. ed. 790.

And a patent under the act of Congress granting to the Union Central Pacific Railroad and Western Pacific Railroad Company alternate sections of land within certain limits on each side of their respective roads does not include mineral lands which were excepted out of such grant. McLaughlin v. United States (Western P. R. Co. v. United States) 107 U. S. 526, 27 L. ed. 621, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And a grantee in such case, who knows that the land is mineral, cannot hold such mineral land as an innocent purchaser. Ibid.

And a person entering upon lands for mining purposes may, in ejectment brought by a person claiming title under a grant made by government to a railroad company, show that the land was mineral land, and within an exception to the grant. McLaughlin v. Powell, 50 Cal. 64.

So, under these acts, the terms "mineral lands," and "lands valuable for minerals," and "valuable mineral deposits," as used in the mining laws, are not confined to minerals of the metallic class only, but include all kinds of metalliferous deposits, the value, and not the kind, of any common mineral deposit being the controlling key. Pacific Coast Marble Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 25 Land Dec. 233, Overruling Tucker v. Florida R. & Nav. Co. 19 Land Dec. 414.

All minerals except coal and iron are excepted from grants to railroads. Re Arnold, 2 Copp, Land Owner, 131, Mineral Law Dig. 26.

And the rule adopted by the earlier cases was that mineral lands excepted from lands granted by Congress in aid of the construction of a railroad mean lands known to be mineral, or which there was then satisfactory reason to believe to be such when the grant took effect. Francoeur v. Newhouse, 14 Sawy. 600, 43 Fed. 236, 40 Fed. 618; Re Spong, 5 Land Dec. 193.

Under that rule, the discovery of a coal mine in the lands after the title had vested by full performance of the conditions did not defeat the title. Francoeur v. Newhouse, 40 Fed. 618.

And that there was good reason to believe that the land in question was mineral land at the time of the consummation of the grant, and that it was known to be mineral land at the time, is sufficiently shown by evidence that in certain ravines on such land mining had been carried on for a number of years previous thereto; and that, the government, as owner of the property, sanctions, expressly or by implication, the exercise of such powers." This author, in discussing the necessity for a substantial compliance with the requirements of the acts of Congress in respect to securing public land containing valuable mineral deposits, and of legislation by the states supplemental thereto, which are treated as conditions precedent to the completion of a valid location, further observes: "The order in which the several acts required by law are to be performed is nonessential, in the absence of intervening rights." Id. § 330. In Sisson v. Sommers, 24 Nev. 379, 77 Am. St. Rep. 815, 55 Pac. 829, it was held that a failure substantially to comply with the provisions of a statute of Nevada, which required a locator of a mining claim to sink a discovery shaft within a prescribed time after posting a notice of location, forfeited the rights of the locator, whether or not the statute contained a clause to that effect. In deciding the case, the court, referring to the Federal and to the state laws, and to the rules and regulations of miners relating to the steps necessary to be taken to secure a mining claim, says: "Failure to comply with such laws and rules works a forfeiture, whether the laws and rules provide for forfeiture for noncompliance or not; and the mining claim becomes subject to location by any qualified locator." As a forfeiture results from a failure substantially to comply with the requirements of a state statute prescribing the method to be pursued to obtain prior to the filing of a map of the definite location of the railroad, two quartz lodes had been located thereon; and that the person claiming the land as grantee of the railroad was informed by the company that it was reserved as mineral land when he received his transfer. Valentine v. Valentine, 47 Fed. 597.

But in Northern P. R. Co. v. Cannon, 4 C. C. A. 303, 7 U. S. App. 507, 54 Fed. 252, it was held that, under the act of Congress of July 2, 1864, granting sections of land designated by odd numbers to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, excluding mineral lands, and providing that the lands granted were to be free from pre-emption or other claims or rights from the time of the filing of its map in the General Land Office, mineral lands were not withdrawn from sale prior to the definite fixing of the line of the railroad, and the filing of a plat in the General Land Office; and the railroad cannot maintain a suit in equity to quiet its title to lands within the limits of its grant where patents had been issued to individuals for the lands as mineral lands before the line of the road was so fixed.

And Northern P. R. Co. v. Sanders, 1 C. C. A. 192, 7 U. S. App. 47, 49 Fed. 129, holds that the grant does not prevent the location of mines in the reserved lands after the filing of such map and before the definite location of the road; and it does not avail the railroad company that the lands so located for mining purposes are in fact not mineral lands.

And Barden v. Northern P. R. Co. 154 U. S. 288, 38 L. ed. 992, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1030, Reversing 46 Fed. 592, overturns the rule of the earlier cases above set forth, and holds that the proviso of the grant of land for railway construction by act of Congress of July 2, 1864, declaring that all mineral lands are excluded from its operation, was intended to exclude from the grant all mineral lands, whether known or unknown, and not merely such as were known at the time to be mineral.

But where the land in question has been patented to a railroad company it is not unappropriated public land subject to location, and an attempted location confers no rights. Traphagen v. Kirk, 30 Mont. 562, 77 Pac. 58.

Acts of Congress granting lands in aid of the construction of railways, excepting mineral lands, give no authority to issue patents in any case to mineral lands; and this necessarily involves the duty to determine whether the lands to which patents are sought are mineral or not; and, where a patent is issued for lands, this duty will be presumed to have been performed, and the patent will be deemed conclusive. Cowell v. Lammers, 10 Sawy. 246, 21 Fed. 200; Winscott v. Northern P. R. Co. 17 Land Dec. 274.

And an exception of all mineral land in a patent issued to a railroad company under the acts of Congress granting lands to the railway company to aid in the construction thereof, not required by the acts to be inserted, does not affect the conclusiveness of the patent, or leave any part of the land covered open to location for mining purposes. Cowell v. Lammers and Francoeur v. Newhouse, supra.

To constitute mineral lands within an exception of mineral lands in a patent of lands of the United States granted to a railroad, however, it is not sufficient that the lands had been profitably worked for gold prior to the issuance of the patent; it must clearly appear that they were, at the date of the grant, more valuable for mining than for agriculture, and were known to be so. Hunt v. Steese, 75 Cal. 620, 17 Pac. 920.

Lands containing mineral of sufficient quantity and promise to justify expenditure for its extraction, and for further exploration, are mineral lands within the meaning of that term as used in the act of Congress of July 2, 1864, excluding all mineral lands from a grant of lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Casey v. Northern P. R. Co. 15 Land Dec. 439.

But evidence that placer mining for gold had previously been carried on in a stream on a tract of land, but that it had been abandoned as worked out, and that neither a mining claim, whether or not such statute so declares the penalty, the clause of our law (Bellinger & C. Comp. § 3984), providing that any attempted location of a quartz-mining claim that shall not be in accordance therewith shall be null and void, adds nothing to the enactment which would be so construed in the absence thereof, in case of adverse claimants.

State legislation, supplemental to the acts of Congress, which prescribes the method to be pursued by a locator as a condition precedent to making a valid appropriation of the public lands of the United States containing valuable mineral deposits, is designed as a rule of evidence only, to determine the rights of an adverse claimant of the premises under a subsequent location thereon of a mining claim. This must, upon principle, be the object of such laws; otherwise the enactments, in case no adverse claim is interposed, would be an interference with the primary disposal of the soil by a state which is inhibited by the enabling act by which it became a part of the Union. Congress has impliedly invited miners to adopt rules and regulations and, in the same manner, requested state and territorial legislatures to enact laws protecting the rights of claimants of mineral lands; which rules and laws are recognized, when not in conflict with the Federal statute, and enforced by the courts in cases involving a contest. The right of the defendants to the Doctor claim depends upon acts of the plaintiffs, constituting an alleged equitable es-at that time nor since had there been any mines on the land producing mineral and capable of being worked at a profit, is insufficient to establish the mineral character of the land, within the meaning of a reservation of mineral lands from a grant of public lands to a railroad. United States v. Central P. R. Co. 93 Fed. 871.

Nor does the mere fact that portions of land contain particles of gold, or a vein of gold-bearing quartz, necessarily impress it with the character of mineral lands, within the meaning of an exception of mineral lands in an act of Congress granting public lands to a railway company; it must at least be shown that the land contains metals in quantities sufficient to render it available and valuable for mining purposes. Alford v. Barnum, 45 Cal. 482.

So, in determining whether lands are mineral within an exception of mineral lands from a railway land grant, present contingencies or probabilities are of no effect; the issue is confined to the time when the lands were sold or patented by the government; and it is not material that at that time the lands would have been valuable for mining purposes if water could have been had to work them, and that water has since been secured. Hunt v. Steese, supra.

(3) Determination as to mineral character.

On the question as to whether the lands are mineral within an exception of such lands from a grant of public lands to a railway company, contemporaneous construction of the word "mineral" by the executive officers whose duty it is to construe the land laws is, in case of ambiguity, of persuasive force. Northern P. R. Co. v. Soderberg, 43 C. C. A. 620, 104 Fed. 425.

And the presumption raised by a mineral return of public lands will remain until disapproved by testimony. Re Central P. R. Co. 13 Copp, Land Owner, 218, Mineral Law Dig. 341.

So, the facts that land granted by a railway land grant had been surveyed at a time when mineral lands were not authorized to 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

be surveyed, and the maps had been filed without designating the land as mineral land, are prima facie evidence that they were not mineral in character, and were included in the congressional grant, and patentable as such. Cowell v. Lammers, 10 Sawy. 246, 21 Fed. 200.

And a return by a surveyor who surveyed public lands, that they were of little, if any, value for agricultural purposes, and chiefly valuable for timber, imposes the burden of proof of their mineral character upon a person asserting it, as against a person applying to purchase under the timber and stone act of Congress of June 3, 1878. Purtle v. Steffee, 31 Land Dec. 400.

Where lands included in a railway land grant, excepting mineral lands, have been located as a mining claim, however, the burden of proof to establish that they are not mineral in character rests with the railroad company. Northern P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 17 Land Dec. 545.

And where locations of mining claims were made in conformity with United States statutes and local rules and regulations of the district, it must be presumed that the lands located are mineral in character; and in such case the burden of proof rests with a railroad company claiming under a land grant from the United States to show that they are not mineral in character. Sweeney v. Northern P. R. Co. 20 Land Dec. 394.

So, the classification as mineral, by the board of commissioners, of lands under the act of Congress of February 26, 1895, providing for the classification of lands in certain land districts within the land and indemnity grant limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, constitutes a cancellation of the selection of such land by the railroad company, and a determination that it is mineral in character, so that thereafter neither the railroad company nor persons claiming under it can be heard to question its mineral character. Luthye v. Northern P. R. Co. 29 Land Dec. 675.

(f) Exchanges for forest reservations.

The act of Congress of June 4, 1897, is a toppel, tantamount to an abandonment; and, as the plaintiffs did not make a subsequent location of the premises, we do not think they are in a position to insist upon a strict performance of the state statutory requirements by the defendants whose rights, if they exist, must rest upon the alleged abandonment.

It is the discovery by a qualified person of a lode or vein of mineral-bearing rock in place, on the vacant land of the United States, and the appropriation thereof, evidenced by posting a notice, and recording the same when so required, and by marking on the ground the boundaries so that they may be readily traced, that initiates a valid mining claim, the right to the continued possession of which is maintained by annually performing the work prescribed for its development, until a patent has been secured. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424; Or. Laws 1898, § 1, p. 16; Bellinger v. C. Comp. Stat. § 3975; Jackson v. Roby, 109 U. S. 440, 27 L. ed. 990, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560; O'Reilly v. Campbell, 116 U. S. 418, 29 L. ed. 669, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 421. It is very doubtful if either Perelli or Candiani found a vein of mineral-bearing rock in place, within the Doctor claim, prior to posting the respective notices thereon; but the testimony shows that the latter, after February 14, 1900, discovered a lode therein, and, if no adverse rights have accrued, the subsequent discovery validates the prior insufficient location. Zollars & H. Chief Consol. Min. Co.

standing offer upon the part of the government to exchange any of its land that is vacant and open to settlement for a like quantity of similar land within a forest reservation, for which it had previously issued a patent, not including lands more valuable for minerals than for forest purposes. Olive Land & Development Co. v. Olmstead, 103 Fed. 568.

And the selection of land under that act operates instantly at the time of the selection to vest the full and complete and equitable title in the selector, provided the selected land was at the time of selection vacant and open to settlement; and no subsequent discovery of mineral thereon can impair such title, nor alter the legal character of the land. Ibid.

Where a selection has been made in lieu of patented lands surrendered, presumptively the character and condition of the selected tract are such as are indicated by the books of the Land Office; and an equity arises in the selector which entitles him to protection until the fact respecting the character and condition of the selected lands is determined by the Land Department; and the only question that remains open to inquiry by the Land Department up to the time of the issuance of a patent therefor is whether or not the selected land was vacant and open to settlement at the time of its selection. Ibid.

And the fact that lands selected were selected in the hope of finding oil in them does not alter the effect of the selection of vesting equitable title to the land in the selector, and rendering it no longer a part of the public domain and open to location for mining purposes. Ibid.

Nor do the facts that land selected is situated in the vicinity of producing oil wells, and that it has surface indications of oil, make it mineral land within the meaning of that act. Ibid.

But, under the regulations of the Land Department, adopted pursuant to that act, which have the force of law, and which require all applications thereunder to be forwarded by the local officers to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for consideration, together with a report as to the status of the tract applied for, the equitable title to the land selected does not vest in the applicant until approval of the selection by the department, and until such approval the selection is subject to be defeated by proof that the land is in fact mineral in character. Cosmos Exploration Co. v. Gray Eagle Oil Co. 61 L.R.A. 230, 50 C. C. A. 79, 112 Fed. 4.

And land in the possession of persons prospecting for oil thereon with the intention of locating it as mineral land is not vacant and open to settlement within the meaning of that act. Ibid.

It devolves upon the person making the selection of public lands to establish by proof that they are vacant and open to settlement, and therefore subject to selection in lieu of the relinquished forest reserve lands covered by patent, unless such facts are shown by the records. Ibid.

c. What substances in lands are mineral.

The rule has been asserted that a reservation of minerals in a land grant includes every substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth for the purpose of profit, unless there is something in the context or nature of the transaction to induce a more limited meaning. Hext v. Gill, L. R. 7 Ch. 699. And that gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, and copper, expressly named in the statute, are valuable mineral deposits within the meaning of the Federal mining laws, has never been denied. So, diamonds are a mineral substance. Copp, Min. Lands. 88; 1 Lindley, Mines, 2d ed. § 420. And land containing agate is mineral if it is most valuable therefor. Re Gill, Oct. 8, 1894, Mineral Law Dig. 27. And the same rule applies to land containing opal. Re Palmer, July 19, 1894, Mineral Law Dig. 29.

So, iron is a mineral, and mines of iron may be located as lode claims when it is in rock in place, and as placer claims when it is in the form of a deposit. Re Stewart, 1 Copp, Land Owner, 34, 1 Copp, Min. Lands

v. Evans, 2 McCrary, 39. 5 Fed. 172, 4 Morrison Min. Rep. 407; Patchen v. Keeley, 19 Nev. 404, 14 Pac. 347. Thus, in Brewster v. Shoemaker, 28 Colo. 176, 53 L.R.A. 793, 89 Am. St. Rep. 188, 63 Pac. 309, it was held that when the location of a mining claim was void because no mineral had been found within its boundaries, a subsequent discovery of precious metal therein, made after filing the certificate of location, but before the rights of adverse parties had attached, would sustain the location. In deciding that case, Mr. Chief Justice Campbell, speaking for the court, says: "The order of time in which these several acts are performed is not of the essence of the requirements, and it is immaterial that the discovery was made subsequent to the completion of the acts of location, provided only all the necessary acts are done before intervening rights of third parties accrue. All these other steps having been taken before a valid discovery, and a valid discovery following, it would be a useless and idle ceremony, which the law does not require, for the locators again to locate their claim and refile their location certificate, or, file a new one." The patent plaintiffs secured for that part of the Louise and the Lucky Boy No. 4 mining claims, not in conflict with the Doctor lode, having established the validity of the former claims as hereinbefore stated, no subsequent location could be made thereon unless they abandoned their rights thereto so as to render the premises in dispute a part of the unappropriated public domain. They did not 124, Mineral Law Dig. p. 28. It is expressly provided by the congressional land grant of July 2, 1864, to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, however, that the mineral land excluded from its operation does not include the iron or coal. Pacific Coast Marble Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 25 Land Dec. 233.

So, umber is a mineral substance. Re Clayton, Jan. 30, 1875, Copp, Min. Lands, 161, Mineral Law Dig. 32. And graphite, plumbago, and black lead are minerals. Re Conrad, Sept. 19, 1893, Mineral Law Dig. 28. And lands valuable for deposits of phosphate are mineral lands within the meaning of the laws relating to the disposal of the public domain. Re Florida C. & P. R. Co. 26 Land Dec. 600.

So, mica is a mineral and lands containing it are excluded from railroad land grants. Re Arnold, 2 Copp, Land Owner, 131, Copp, Min. Lands, 182, Mineral Law Dig. 28. And land chiefly valuable for phosphate deposits is mineral in character, and subject to appropriation under the mineral laws. Gary v. Todd, 18 Land Dec. 58. And guano is a mineral, and lands valuable for deposits of guano are mineral lands within the meaning of the mining laws, and are not subject to selection by the state under the act of Congress of July 16, 1894, § 8, granting public land for the use of an agricultural college in the state. Richter v. Utah, 27 Land Dec. 95. And it has been held that coprolites are a substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth for the purpose of profit, and therefore fall distinctly within the definition of minerals. Atty. Gen. v. Tomline, L. R. 5 (Ch. Div. 702).

Likewise, the term "valuable mineral deposits," as used in the mining act of May 10, 1872, includes alkaline substances, such as borax, alkaline earths, sulphur, alum, and asphalt. Re Mineral Lands, 1 Land Dec. 561. And potash is a mineral substance. Maxwell v. Brierly, 10 Copp, Land Owner, 50, Mineral Law Dig. 29. And so is rock salt. Re Megarrigle, 9 Copp, Land Owner, 113. Contra, Re Southwestern Min. Co. 14 Land Dec. 597, Mineral Law Dig. 30. And 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) saline lands are mineral lands within the meaning of the act of Congress of June 16, 1880, granted to the state of Nevada a quantity of land to be selected by the state from unappropriated nonmineral public lands. Garrard v. Silver Peak Mines, 36 C. C. A. 603, 94 Fed. 983, Affirming 82 Fed. 578. And they are expressly included in the provisions of law with regard to the disposition of the public lands for mining purposes. Re Pagosa Springs, 1 Land Dec. 562.

So, soda is a mineral. Circular of July 15, 1873, 1 Copp, Land Owner, 11, Mineral Law Dig. 30. And so is natural gas, within the meaning of a statute which gives corporations power to sell or lease mineral rights under highways. Ontario Natural Gas Co. v. Gosfield, 18 Ont. App. Rep. 626. And land containing a deposit of gypsum, which is more valuable on that account than for agriculture, can be appropriated only as mineral land, and is not subject to school-land indemnity selection. McQuiddy v. California, 29 Land Dec. 181. And albertite is a mineral. Re Noble, April 12, 1892, Mineral Law Dig. 27. And so is fahlband. Circular July 15, 1873, 1 Copp, Land Owner, 11, Mineral Law Dig. 28. And brick clay. Departmental decision of June 19, 1888. Re Blake Placer, on review, Jan. 17, 1889, Mineral Law Dig. 27; Montague v. Dobbs, 9 Copp, Land Owner, 165, Mineral Law Dig. 102.

So, it has been held that placer locations may include quarries of rock valuable for building purposes. Freezer v. Sweeney, 8 Mont. 508, 21 Pac. 20.

And that the word "mineral," as used in the exception in the act of Congress of June 2, 1864, granting lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, includes every variety of stone and rock; and that lands which are chiefly valuable for the building stone which they contain are reserved from the grant. Northern P. R. Co. v. Soderberg, 99 Fed. 506.

But, previous to statutory regulation, the prevailing rule appears to have been that the words "mines and minerals," as used in an exception in a royal grant, are to be unmake a location subsequent to defendants', so as to initiate a new right and thus to take advantage of the invalidity of the defective notice, or for any other reason; and hence the only questions to be determined are the alleged abandonment and the identity of the premises embraced therein.

It will be remembered that Dyson and Standish, two of the cotenants, made some markings on the ground to evidence part of the boundaries of the Doctor lode. All the cotenants, except Moore and Zimmerman, were at the mines and saw Candiani working on the Doctor claim, to which for eighteen months they made no objections, but congratulated him on the progress he was making in cutting the tunnel, until he had expended about $8,000 and discovered valuable ore, when it was ascertained that he was trespassing on their property. The testimony shows that when Candiani first went to the mines Zimmerman informed him of the number of mineral claims plaintiffs possessed, and told him about how they were situated with respect to each other. Dyson and Standish were pioneers in the Blue river district, and at the time Candiani first posted a notice on the Doctor lode, they were in possession of the Louise and the Lucky Boy No. 4 mining claims. The latter claims were originally surveyed in 1890, the center line "brushed out" and stakes set at the corners; but the country where these mines are situated is mountainous and the surface covered with dense brush and timber. We think it fairly inferable from the testimony

And that "mineral," as the term is used in the mining laws of the United States, embraces nothing but valuable deposits of mineral ore, and does not include mere masses of nonmineralized rock, whether rock in place or scattered about through the soil; and that a valid location cannot be made of land entirely devoid of ore under the mineral laws of the United States because of the existence therein of a ledge of rock or a deposit of limestone. Wheeler v. Smith, 5 Wash. 704, 32 Pac. 784.

In the above case Freezer v. Sweeney, supra, was disapproved. And Johnston v. Harrington, 5 Wash. 73, 31 Pac. 316, infra. V. d, was limited and explained; the court saying that that case upheld the title to the stone in question when severed, but had nothing to do with the land from which it was quarried, except by way of argument and illustration.

Under this rule, lands valuable for ordinary building stone are not mineral in character in the sense in which the term "mineral lands" is used when applied to land grants. South Dakota v. Vermont Stone Co. 16 Land Dec. 263; Clark v. Ervin, 16 Land Dec. 122. And its presence does not render the land containing the same subject to appropriation under the mining laws, or except it from homestead pre-emption. Conlin v. Kelly, 12 Land Dec. 1; Clark v. Ervin, supra; Re Randolph, 23 Land Dec. 329. Apparently Overruling Re Bennet, 3 Land Dec. 116.

And this rule included lands chiefly valuable for red sandstone suitable for building purposes, paving, and curbstones. Hayden v. Jamison, 24 Land Dec. 403. And so of lands chiefly valuable for a deposit of glass, sand, and building stone, and, where such lands are located, a subsequent intervening homestead entry of another defeats the right of the locator to perfect his claim under an act subsequently passed authorizing such location. Re Delaney, 17 Land Dec. 120.

are not mineral lands within the meaning of the mining laws, though they are more valuable for such deposits than for agricultural purposes. King v. Bradford, 31 Land Dec. 108; Re Dunluce Placer Mine, 6 Land Dec. 761.

By the act of Congress of August 4, 1892, however, it was provided that any person authorized to enter lands under the mining laws of the United States may enter lands that are chiefly valuable for building stone under the provisions of the law with relation to placer-mining claims, provided that lands reserved for the benefit of public schools, or donated to the state, shall not be subject to entry under this act. Re Harper, 16 Land Dec. 110; Re Minnekahta Stone Mine, 15 Land Dec. 256; South Dakota v. Vermont Stone Co. 16 Land Dec. 263; Forsythe v. Weingart, 27 Land Dec. 680.

And a placer location of such lands precludes the sale thereof to a subsequent applicant under the timber and stone act of June 3, 1878. Forsythe v. Weingart, supra.

But the act providing that certain kinds of stone quarries may be entered under the placer-mining laws does not authorize a finding that such stone quarries constitute mineral lands in the sense in which such lands are exempted from land grants. Van Doren v. Plested, 16 Land Dec. 508.

And the passage of that act cannot validate prior locations in the face of intervening adverse rights. Departmental Instructions of August 29, 1896, Mineral Law Dig. 101.

Stone not only useful for general building purposes, but also valuable for ornamentation of buildings, and for monuments, and other purposes, however, is mineral within the meaning of the mining laws of the United States; and land containing a deposit of such stone may be entered as a placer-mining claim. McGlenn v. Wienbroer, 15 Land Dec. 370; Van Doren v. Plested, supra.

In McGlenn v. Wienbroer, Conlin v. Kelly, 12 Land Dec. 1, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the Land Department refused to cancel an en-that until June, 1901, when the "Lucky Boy Group" was surveyed for a patent, neither of the respective parties nor their predecessors in interest knew that the Doctor lode conflicted with either of plaintiffs' mining claims. Candiani was a novice in mining, while Dyson and Standish, and most of the other cotenants claiming the Louise and the Lucky Boy No. 4, were experienced in extracting ores, and must have known the method generally adopted of marking on the ground the boundaries of mining claims, of which Candiani was ignorant. The means of information were, therefore, not equal to the respective parties, and, this being so, an estoppel may arise to prevent the plaintiffs from asserting their right to the premises in conflict, on the ground of abandonment.

try which had been existing for seven years, upon the plea that it was fraudulently made, on the ground that common building rock used for general purposes is mineral, and that in that case the stone was useful only for general building purposes, while in this case the stone is not only useful for those purposes, but also very valuable for ornamentation of buildings, and for monuments and other purposes.

So, lands more valuable on account of limestone deposits contained in them than for agricultural purposes are mineral lands within the meaning of the mining laws, and within the meaning of the act of February 26, 1895, providing for the classification of lands within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad grant. Morrill v. Northern P. R. Co. 30 Land Dec. 475. And public lands more valuable on account of deposits of gypsum and limestone than for agricultural purposes are subject to appropriation under the mineral laws. Re Hooper, 1 Land Dec. 560. And so are lands more valuable on account of sandstone contained therein than for agricultural purposes; and a homestead entry thereof is unauthorized. Hayden v. Jamison, 26 Land Dec. 373, Vacating and Reversing 24 Land Dec. 403. And they should be so classified under the act of Congress of February 26, 1895, providing for the examination and classification of certain mineral lands in certain states. Beaudette v. Northern P. R. Co. 29 Land Dec. 248.

So, marble and slate are mineral substances, and as such their existence on land in quantity sufficient to render the land more valuable on that account than for agricultural purposes makes it mineral land within the meaning of the mineral laws, and within the meaning of the excepting clause of the grant of public lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and therefore not subject to indemnity selection on account of such lands. Schrumpf v. Northern P. R. Co. 29 Land Dec. 327; Pacific Coast Marble Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 25 Land Dec. 233.

And land chiefly valuable for deposits of slate found thereon, which are unfit for agri-

Abandonment, it is true, is generally understood to mean the intentional relinquishment of a known right. Oviatt v. Big Four Min. Co. 39 Or. 118, 65 Pac. 811. The rights of the plaintiffs and of their predecessors in interest to that part of the Louise and of the Lucky Boy No. 4 mining claims, which is in conflict with the Doctor lode, were inchoate when Candiani first attempted to locate a vein thereon, and hence they were susceptible of abandonment, which is equivalent to a relinquishment to the United States of all interest therein. An abandonment results from a mere exercise of the will, and, so far as it relates to a vested estate in real property, is ineffectual to transfer the title. Philadelphia v. Riddle, 25 Pa. 259. Experience in the mining re-culture, may be appropriated under the act of June 3, 1878, providing for the sale of lands within designated states and territories, valuable chiefly for timber or stone, but unfit for cultivation. Parks v. Hendsch, 12 Land Dec. 100.

And lands containing stone suitable for making lime may be located and entered as a placer-mining claim, or may be entered or purchased under the stone and timber act. Shepherd v. Bird, 17 Land Dec. 82.

So lands chiefly valuable for granite of a good, merchantable quality are mineral lands within the meaning of an exception in grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, made by the act of Congress of June 2, 1864, and do not pass under such grant. Northern P. R. Co. v. Soderberg, 43 C. C. A. 620, 104 Fed. 425. And fire clay and kaolin are minerals. Maxwell v. Brierly, 10 Copp, Land Owner, 50; Re Crockwell, 2 Copp, Land Owner, 66, Mineral Law Dig. 27. And china clay is a mineral, within the meaning of an exception of mines and minerals in a land grant. Hext v. Gill, L. R. 7 Ch. 699. Likewise, asphaltum is included in an exception, from a royal grant, of all mines and minerals. Gesner v. Halifax Gas Co. 2 N. S. 72, 7 N. B. 595.

So, lands chiefly valuable for deposits of asphaltum are mineral lands specifically excepted from the railway grant of public lands to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and are not subject to selection as indemnity under that grant. Tulare Oil & Min. Co. v. Southern P. R. Co. 29 Land Dec. 269.

And so are lands containing a deposit of gypsum cement, which are more valuable on account of such deposit than for agriculture; and they are not subject to agricultural entry. Phifer v. Heaton, 27 Land Dec. 57.

And auriferous cement is a mineral. Maxwell v. Brierly, 10 Copp, Land Owner, 50, Mineral Law Dig. 27.

But, probably pursuant to the theory that, to be mineral, lands must contain mineral ore, it has been held that lands containing mineral springs are subject to sale under the gions teaches that locations of mineral-bearing rock are frequently made on public land for speculative purposes only, and are often considered of little value until paying ore is discovered in the immediate vicinity, when, without any expense to the locators, they may become of immense worth. Such possible fluctuations in value demand a different rule from that which usually governs vested estates in land, and necessitate immediate assertion of inchoate rights in mining claims, when, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, the locators could have discovered that their premises were being invaded. Dyson, Standish, and Frank and Fred Sharkey, who are experienced miners and should have known the location of the boundaries of the Louise and of the Lucky Boy No. 4 mining claims, ought to be estopped to assert that they had any interest therein in conflict with the claim of Candiani as originally indicated on the ground. To allow them to assert an adverse claim to that part of the Doctor lode now in controversy, as it should be surveyed, would be violative of every principle of equity, and result in rewarding them for encouraging the development of the property. Zimmerman, who owns five twelfths of the Lucky Boy group of mines, resides in Portland, and, though he knew Candiani had located a mine in the Blue river district, he was not aware that it conflicted with either claim in which he was interested. Frank C. Sharkey, as superintendent and managing partner, however, represented Zimmerman and also general laws, and not under acts relating to mineral lands. Re Pagosa Springs, 1 Land Dec. 562; Smith v. Wallace, Departmental Decision March 24, 1896, Mineral Law Dig. 30. And that the presence of such springs constitutes no bar to an agricultural entry. Smith v. Wallace, supra. And it has been held that aluminium is not such a mineral as will exempt land containing it from settlement and entry as agricultural land, or warrant the appropriation thereof for mining purposes. Jordan v. Idaho Aluminium Min. & Mfg. Co. 20 Land Dec. 500.

d. Placer deposits.

The question whether a location should be made as a lode or a placer claim depends upon the geological formation of the deposits, and is one for the locator to decide. Re Butler, June 13, 1892, Mineral Law Dig. 97.

"Placers," in mining parlance, are superficial deposits which occupy the beds of ancient rivers or valleys. Moxon v. Wilkinson, 2 Mont. 421.

And, by express statutory enactment (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2329, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1432), claims usually called placers are declared to include all forms of deposits excepting veins of quartz, or other rock in place. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401.

The term "placers," as used in that act, means ground within defined boundaries, which contains mineral in earth, sand, or gravel, including valuable deposits not in place,—that is, not in fixed rock,—but which are in a loose state, and may, in most cases, be collected by washing or amalgamation, without milling. United States v. Iron Silver Min. Co. 128 U. S. 673, 32 L. ed. 571, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195; Gregory v. Pershbaker, supra.

And the provision of that act, that claims, usually called "placers," which include all forms of deposit, except veins of quartz or other rock in place, shall be subject to entry and patent under like circumstances and conditions, and upon similar proceedings, as 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

are provided for the vein or lode claims, when construed in connection with §§ 2320 to 2324 inclusive (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1424–1426), laying down rules governing the location of mining claims upon veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place, bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable deposits; and with § 2319 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424) thereof, opening to exploration all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States,—does not restrict placer-mining claims to deposits of the same kind or nature of gold, silver, lead, cinnabar, tin, or copper, but includes all forms of mineral deposits of whatever kind or nature, whether metallic or otherwise, excepting veins of quartz, or other rock in place. Pacific Coast Marble Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 25 Land Dec. 233.

In the above case, Tucker v. Florida R. & Nav. Co. 19 Land Dec. 414, and all other cases in conflict with the views expressed in it, were overruled.

Within this rule, deposits of fire clay or kaolin, though nonmetalliferous in character, are properly subject to entry as placers, and not as lode claims. Re Dobbs Placer Mine, 1 Land Dec. 565.

And lands containing mica are subject to appropriation under the placer-mining laws. Copp, Min. Lands, 182, 1 Lindley, Mines, 2d ed. § 420.

And land containing valuable deposits of building stone, or limestone, may be pre-empted as placer claims under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2319, 2329, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1424, 1432, relating to the entry and patent of mining claims. Johnston v. Harrington, 5 Wash. 73, 31 Pac. 316; Re Bennet, 3 Land Dec. 116; Freezer v. Sweeney, 8 Mont. 508, 21 Pac. 20.

And where lands containing stone suitable for making lime are claimed by location and entry under the placer-mining law by one claimant, and by another by entry under the timber and stone act, the rights of the parties must be determined by priority in the assertion of their claims. Shepherd v. Bird, 17 Land Dec. 82.

his predecessor in interest, Moore, in supervising the property; and, though such agent could not, ordinarily, without special authority from all the cotenants, abandon any greater interest that he alone possessed (Beers v. Sharpe, 44 Or. 386, 75 Pac. 717; Conn v. Oberto, 32 Colo. 313, 76 Pac. 369), the character of his employment and the kind of property in controversy induce the conclusion that he possessed sufficient authority from all the cotenants to bind them by his negligence in permitting Candiani to take, hold possession of, and improve their property for such a length of time.

This brings us to a consideration of the boundaries of the Doctor lode as they should be established. The evidence shows that,

So, lands valuable only on account of marble deposits contained in them are subject to placer entry under the mining laws. Pacific Coast Marble Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. supra.

As to ordinary stone as a mineral substance subject to appropriation as such under the mining rules, and as to statutory authority to enter lands chiefly valuable for building stone under the provisions of the law with relation to placer-mining claims, see supra, V. c.

So, the finding of gold in sufficient quantities to justify the expending of money for the purpose of exploration, with the reasonable expectation that the lands will be found to be valuable therefor, justifies the location of a placer-mining claim. Lange v. Robinson, 148 Fed. 799.

And umber is a mineral substance, and lands containing it are subject to appropriation under the placer laws. Copp, Min. Lands, 161, 1 Lindley, Mines, 2d ed. § 420.

And the same rule applies to diamonds. Copp, Min. Lands, 88, 1 Lindley, Mines, 2d ed. § 420.

Where a claim is, in effect, one for a water right only, however, and there is nothing to show the existence of mineral within it, it is not competent to locate or patent the same as a placer claim. Re Hale, 3 Land Dec. 539.

Though the fact that mineral did not exist upon an oil placer-mining claim located in good faith is no defense to a prosecution under Wyo. Sess. Laws 1888, chap. 40, § 10, making it a misdemeanor to injure or remove certain specified property on a mining claim. Van Horn v. State, 5 Wyo. 501, 40 Pac. 964.

And lands valuable for zinc ores found in them in leads or lodes are not subject to locations as placer-mining claims. Buffalo Zinc & Copper Co. v. Crump, 70 Ark. 525, 91 Am. St. Rep. 87, 69 S. W. 572.

So, land containing a valuable deposit of mineral-paint rock in place constitutes a lode claim, if a mineral claim at all within the meaning of the law; and is not subject 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

October 26, 1898, F. C. Sharkey and Geo. A. Dyson located a quartz-mining claim, known as the "Gold Dollar," the description of which, as given in the notice, is as follows: "Commencing at this tunnel and notice and running in a southerly direction towards Main Quartz creek and situated about 400 feet west of the Lucky Boy ledge, and was formerly known as the Jo. Andrews claim." Until the plaintiffs secured a survey for a patent, June, 1901, they evidently thought that the Gold Dollar claim was located west of and parallel with the Lucky Boy group, for when Candiani and Perelli first went to the district with a view of securing a claim, they were informed by Dyson that unappropriated mineral land of the United States could be found at the norther-to location as a placer claim. Re Barnes, 7 Land Dec. 66.

Though a deposit of gold-bearing gravel is a placer mine as that term is used in the acts of Congress with reference to mining, although the same lies between defined strata of rock and has an average drop of several degrees; that of itself not making a gravel deposit a lode with a top or apex. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401.

Nor is the placer-mining law intended as a catch-all system of taking public lands and allowing parties to play fast and loose to suit their own caprice; and locators, insisting upon the validity of a location by reason of a particular mineral, must show that the location was made for that purpose, and no other. Clark v. Ervin, 17 Land Dec. 550.

And a location of lands valuable only for common building stone as a placer-mining claim, unwarranted by law at the time it was made, and therefore invalid, cannot be sustained or validated by a subsequent discovery of fire clay, or some other material which is subject to entry under the placer-mining law. Ibid.

But the ownership of stone by a person taking it from public lands of the United States is not affected by the fact that it was obtained in an attempt to develop a coal claim thereon. Johnston v. Harrington, supra.

As to iron as a placer deposit, see supra, V. c. As to coal and oil as placer deposits, see infra, V. e.

e. Coal and oil lands.

Coal lands are mineral lands, within the meaning of the term as used in the statutes regulating the disposition of the public domain. Mullan v. United States, 118 U. S. 271, 30 L. ed. 170, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1041.

And as such they are subject to entry under the mining laws. McKean v. Buell, Copp, Min. Lands, 343; Re Coalville Townsite, 4 Copp. Land Owner, 46; Re Norager, 10 Copp. Land Owner, 54, 1 Lindley, Mines, ly end of the Gold Dollar claim, the corners of which, on that line, were evidenced by stakes which he pointed out to these visitors. The survey referred to disclosed that the side lines of the Louise and of the Gold Dollar claims extended north 40° 30' west, and north 13° 30' west respectively, and that the north center end of the latter claim was situated about 480 feet southerly from the northwest corner of the Louise claim and on or near the western boundary thereof. The Lucky Boy No. 4 claim is a northerly extension of the Louise, and the Doctor lode, as surveyed, is a northerly extension of the Gold Dollar claims, the side lines of which are 260 and 683 feet respectively. Dyson, as plaintiffs' witness, testified that, having been employed by Candiani to mark on the ground the boundaries of the Doctor lode, he placed a center-end notice on the stump of a tree a few feet north of the boundary of the Gold Dollar claim; that he put up stakes at the northeast and northwest corners of the latter claim for the southeast and southwest corners, respectively, of the Doctor lode; that, going northerly about 900 feet, he put up another center and notice, and also nailed to a tree another stake on which he wrote, as near as he could remember, "Northwest center-end stake of the Doctor mine," and signed the names of Candiani and Perelli as locators; that, having done the writing found on the stake, he was able to read it, saying the word "center" is what he put on it. The stake last referred to was torn down, identified by the witness, offered 2d ed. § 97. And as such they are excluded from pre-emption and homestead claims. Re Coalville Town Site, 4 Copp, Land Owner, 46, Mineral Law Dig. 385.

And the provision of the act of Congress of 1864 for disposal in a prescribed mode of any tract embracing coal beds or coal fields, constituting portions of the public domain, and which as mines are excluded from the pre-emption act of 1841, and which, under past legislation, are not liable to ordinary private entry, constitutes a legislative construction of the provisions of the pre-emption act to the effect that coal lands are to be included in the definition of the terms "mines" and "mineral lands," used therein; and, under that act, known coal lands are not subject to selection by the state in lieu of sections 16 and 36, for school purposes. United States v. Mullan, 7 Sawy. 466, 10 Fed. 785, Affirmed in 118 U. S. 271, 30 L. ed. 170, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1041.

Nor can coal lands be included in a town-site entry. Re Coalville Town Site, 4 Copp, Land Owner, 46, Mineral Law Dig. 452.

So, school sections containing coal are subject to disposal as other coal and mineral lands. Re Norager, 10 Copp, Land Owner, 54; Re Fox, 4 Copp, Land Owner, 66, Mineral Law Dig. 393.

And coal lands are not subject to selection in lieu of school lands, by the state of California, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1853, conveying certain lands to the state for school purposes. Mullan v. United States, 118 U. S. 271, 30 L. ed. 170, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1041.

And the fact that coal lands were in fact listed to the state by the proper officers of the government as in lieu of school lands does not render them subject to selection as such by the state under the act of Congress of March 3, 1853; and such selection can be vacated, and the titles under it annulled, in a suit in equity brought by the United States directly for that purpose. Ibid.

The mere statement of witnesses that lands contain large deposits of coal, and are chiefly valuable therefor, is not sufficient, however, to subject them to entry as 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

coal lands under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2347. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1440, where it does not appear that any coal has actually been found upon the lands. Kings County v. Alexander, 5 Land Dec. 126.

And coal lands are expressly excluded from the operation of the exception of mineral lands in the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, of July 2, 1864. Pacific Coast Marble Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 25 Land Dec. 233.

So, petroleum is a mineral substance obtained from the earth by processes of mining, and land from which it is obtained may properly be called mining land within the meaning of a statutory provision for mortgaging and leasing mining lands. Gill v. Weston, 110 Pa. 316, 1 Atl. 921.

But, previous to special legislation by Congress on the subject, lands containing petroleum were not regarded as falling within the contemplation of the mineral laws, and could not be located and entered as a placer-mining claim. Re Union Oil Co. 23 Land Dec. 222.

In the above case the Secretary of the Interior refused to follow Gill v. Weston, supra, but distinguished it as being a case of trover and conversion, and not arising under the mining laws.

By 29 Stat. at L. 526, chap. 216, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1434, however, lands containing petroleum or other mineral oils, chiefly valuable therefor, may be entered and patented under the provisions of the laws relating to placer-mining claims. Chrisman v. Miller, 197 U. S. 313, 49 L. ed. 770, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 468, Affirming 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444; Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. 13 Okla. 425, 73 Pac. 936; Re Union Oil Co. 25 Land Dec. 351.

And, under that act, land containing a deposit of petroleum, which is more valuable on that account than for agriculture, can be appropriated only as mineral land, and is not subject to school indemnity selection. McQuiddy v. California, 29 Land Dec. 181.

And it is not subject to selection as in-in evidence, and is sent up for our inspection. There is written on the upper line thereof, with a lead pencil, the following: "N. W.," and a word that is illegible, but appears to begin with the letter "C" and to have the letter "t" therein. The second line is, "of Doctor Mine;" the third, "Perelli;" and the fourth "Candiani." A re-examination of the testimony convinces us that, when Dyson and Standish originally indicated on the ground the boundaries of the Doctor lode, it was their intention to extend the side lines of the Gold Dollar about 900 feet, so as to include the claim attempted to be located by Candiani and Perelli. Standish appeared as plaintiffs' witness, but he did not attempt to corroborate Dyson's testimony to which reference has been made. In the absence of such supporting declarations under oath, and from the fact that the Doctor lode was intended and attempted to be located as an extension of the Gold Dollar claim, we think Dyson's testimony should be disregarded, and conclude that the surveyor properly treated the tree having the stake so marked thereon as the northwest corner instead of the northwest center end.

The decree heretofore rendered will be changed to conform with the views now expressed, thereby affirming the decree of the court below; the defendants to recover their costs and disbursements in both courts.

demnity under a railroad land grant, from the operation of which mineral lands are excepted. Re Union Oil Co. 25 Land Dec. 351.

But lands are subject to entry and location as placer-mining claims because of petroleum or other mineral oils contained in them, only where they are chiefly valuable for such petroleum or mineral oils. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. supra.

And, while the act of Congress of February 11, 1897, expressly confirms claims to lands containing petroleum theretofore initiated, this confirmation must be construed as applying only to cases where, prior to the enactment thereof, no adverse claim to the land involved had been acquired under other than the mineral law. Re Oil Lands, 24 Land Dec. 183.

The question whether lands are chiefly valuable for their mineral oils, so as to be open to location under the placer-mining law, is one of fact, to be proved by a person asserting its mineral character, as against a homestead entry. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. supra.

VI. Who may locate.

a. The general rule.

The general rule is that, in the absence of positive law forbidding it, any person, whether minor, adult, or alien, may lawfully locate upon and take possession of a part of the unsurveyed public domain for mining purposes, and rest secure in that possession until the government calls it in question, and no individual or person may unlawfully interfere; and the power of the courts may be invoked to restrain unlawful interference. Davis v. Dennis (Wash.) 85 Pac. 1079.

Previous to the enactment of the Federal statutes on the subject, the public mineral lands of the state were open to the occupancy of every person who in good faith chose to enter upon them for the purpose of mining. Smith v. Doe, 15 Cal. 100.

And the fact that persons taking possession of a gold mine and working it were foreigners and without a license afforded no apology to trespassers; the state alone could enforce the law prohibiting foreigners from working in the mines without a license. Mitchell v. Hagood, 6 Cal. 148.

b. Citizens.

1. The provisions of the Federal statutes.

By U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2319, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424, mineral lands of the United States are made subject to location by citizens thereof, or by those who have declared their intention to become such. Strickley v. Hill, 22 Utah, 257, 83 Am. St. Rep. 786, 62 Pac. 893.

So, a citizen of the Choctaw nation, making a discovery of coal or other mineral, acquires an exclusive right, by virtue of art. 7, § 118, of the Constitution of the Choctaw nation, providing that any citizen of this nation who may find any mineral or minerals shall have the exclusive right or privilege to extract them from the earth, so long as he may choose, within 1 mile in any direction from his works or improvements. Provided, however, he does not interfere with the rights of the former settler to mine the same in any direction within 1 mile from the point of discovery, or at which he commenced work; and this right extends not only to the vein or lead on which the discovery is made, but to all of the gold or other mineral in the earth within 1 mile from the initial point of his commencing work. McCurtain v. Grady, 1 Ind. Terr. 107, 38 S. W. 65.

But the act of Congress of March 2, 1897, defining and regulating the rights of aliens to acquire real estate in the territories, has reference only to lands the title to which has passed from the United States, and has become the subject of private ownership, and does not confer upon aliens the right of occupying or purchasing mining claims from the government under the mining laws. Re Alien Act, March 2, 1897, 28 Land Dec. 178.

And the act of Congress of May 14, 1898, § 13, according certain privileges in Alaska to citizens of the Dominion of Canada, was confined in its application to the district of Alaska, and did not extend to any other territory or part of the United States; and, since it has been found impracticable thus far to promulgate or enforce any rules or regulations to carry this provision into effect, it is now inoperative. Ibid.

2. Early rule as to effect of alienage.

The earlier cases, in construing the Federal statute on the question of citizenship of the locator of a mining claim, adopted the rule that an alien unnaturalized, and who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, can acquire no right by location to any of the mineral lands of the United States. Lee v. Justice Min. Co. 2 Colo. App. 112, 29 Pac. 1020; Bohanon v. Howe, 2 Idaho, 453, 17 Pac. 583.

And that a party seeking to acquire a right of location for mining purposes must be a citizen of the United States, or must have declared his intention to become such. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Lee Doon v. Tesh, 68 Cal. 43, 6 Pac. 97, 8 Pac. 621; Justice Min. Co. v. Lee, 21 Colo. 260, 52 Am. St. Rep. 216, 40 Pac. 44; Bohanon v. Howe, supra; Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312; Re Kemp-ton Mine, 1 Copp, Land Owner, 178, Mineral Law Dig. 49.

And that the fact of alienage, if raised at the proper time by anyone adversely interested, will defeat the acquisition of title thereto. Justice Min. Co. v. Lee, 21 Colo. 260, 52 Am. St. Rep. 216, 40 Pac. 44, Reversing 2 Colo. App. 112, 29 Pac. 1020.

Under this view, the right to possession of a mining claim comes only through a location, and such location can be made only by a citizen, or one who has declared his intention to become such. Lee Doon v. Tesh, supra.

And an alien who has never declared his intention to become a citizen cannot hold a mining claim, either by actual possession or by location, against one who connects himself with the government title by compliance with the mining law. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. supra.

And he can acquire no right of location which he can convey to a citizen; and such a conveyance by an alien conveys no title. Lee v. Justice Min. Co. 2 Colo. App. 112, 29 Pac. 1020.

Nor does the subsequent naturalization of an alien, deprived by this rule of the right to explore, purchase, or occupy mineral lands, retroact so as to affect a prior location or occupation by him. Wulf v. Manuel, 9 Mont. 279, 23 Pac. 723.

And a foreigner who posts a notice upon a placer-mining claim, and on the next day makes a declaration of intent to become a citizen of the United States, acquires no right thereby. Anthony v. Jillson, 83 Cal. 296, 23 Pac. 419.

So, a person holding mining ground under location, the title to which is in the United States, who sues for trespass thereon, must, in order to recover, plead and prove that he is a citizen of the United States, or that he has declared his intention to become such. Bohanon v. Howe, supra.

And persons who located a mining claim and occupied the same previous to the act of Congress of 1866, who were not citizens and had not declared their intention to become such, did not acquire any vested right to possession under that act, and, having none thereunder, no rights were preserved to them by act of Congress of May 10, 1872, providing that nothing contained in this chapter should be construed to impair in any way rights or interests of mining property acquired under existing laws; since, prior to the act of Congress of 1866, the occupation and working of mining lands did not confer upon the occupant any right or title thereto as against the government of the United States or its grantees. Lee Doon v. Tesh, 68 Cal. 43, 6 Pac. 97, 8 Pac. 621.

The rights of a joint locator of a mining claim, who is a citizen, however, and of his grantees, are not affected by the fact that his colocator is not a citizen. Strickley v. Hill, 22 Utah, 257, 83 Am. St. Rep. 786, 62 Pac. 893; Providence Gold Min. Co. v. Burke, 6 Ariz. 323, 57 Pac. 641.

The whole claim is not thereby thrown open to relocation. Providence Gold Min. Co. v. Burke, supra.

Where several persons located a mining claim in common, and one of the colocators was an alien, but there is nothing to show that the others had any knowledge of his disability, the law is vindicated by holding that the alien's claim is void, but that the location is good as to the rest. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. supra.

And where a mining claim contained no more than one man is authorized to locate, and one or more of the locators were citizens, the validity of the title of a grantee of the locators is not affected by the fact that another of the locators was an alien. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Providence Gold Min. Co. v. Burke and Strickley v. Hill, supra.

And a conveyance by the locators through an alien to another citizen conveys a complete title to the claim located. Strickley v. Hill, supra.

So, while proof of citizenship of the locator of a mine is essential to the case of a grantee in an action to quiet title thereto, it may be proved under a general allegation of title, and need not be specially pleaded. Altoona Quicksilver Min. Co. v. Integral Quicksilver Min. Co. 114 Cal. 100, 45 Pac. 1047.

And an act of a territorial legislature, providing that, if any alien claims any right, title, or interest in, or to, any placer mine, the same may be forfeited to the territory in a proper action, is invalid as in excess of territorial sovereign authority, and as contravening a provision of the organic act of the territory, prohibiting a territorial legislature from passing any law interfering with the primary disposition of the soil; since, upon such a forfeiture, the territory would acquire a possessory title which would directly interfere with the primary disposal of the soil to the citizen by the general government. Territory v. Lec. 2 Mont. 124.

And it cannot be upheld as in aid of an act of Congress excluding aliens from the grant of the right to locate mineral lands, since that act does not forfeit the right of title of aliens, and, if it did, the forfeiture would take place to the United States, and not to the territory. Ibid.

3. The more modern rule.

The more modern rule, and the one which is now practically universal, is that a location of a mining claim by an alien is voidable only, and not void. McKinley Creek Min. Co. v. Alaska United Min. Co. 183 U. S. 563, 46 L. ed. 331, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 84; Stewart v. Gold & Copper Co. 29 Utah, 443, 110 Am. St. Rep. 719, 82 Pac. 475; McEvoy v. Megginson, 29 Land Dec. 164; Leary v. Manuel, 12 Land Dec. 345.

And under it an entry upon mining land by an alien constitutes a segregation of the land, and a location thereafter on the land thus segregated confers no interest upon the locator as against the entry man or the government. Leary v. Manuel, supra.

And an alien who makes a discovery and takes proper steps toward the location of a mining claim, and then declares his intention to become a citizen, is entitled to the benefit and advantage of what he has previously done toward locating his claim, where no adverse interests have intervened. Cresus Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. v. Colorado Land & Mineral Co. 19 Fed. 78; McEvoy v. Megginson, supra.

His act of declaring his intention to become a citizen relates back to the date of his location, and, in the absence of adverse rights attaching prior to the date of the actual declaration of intention, it operates to validate the location. Lone Jack Min. Co. v. Megginson, 27 C. C. A. 63, 48 U. S. App. 452, 82 Fed. 89.

So, a location of a mining claim, made by an alien, may be cured by a grant by the alien to a citizen. Stewart v. Gold & Copper Co. supra.

And proof of citizenship of locators of a mining claim is not necessary upon the application for a patent; proof of citizenship of applicants for patents, or adverse claimants only, is necessary. Re Cash Lode, 1 Copp, Land Owner, 98, Mineral Law Dig. 104.

So, citizens uniting with an alien in the location of a mining claim cannot, after the alien has expended time, labor, and money in prospecting for and locating the mine, oust him therefrom because of his alienage, or refuse him the right of participating in the proceeds thereof. Billings v. Aspen Min. & Smelting Co. 2 C. C. A. 252, 10 U. S. App. 1, 51 Fed. 338.

Nor is an agreement between two persons to explore the public domain and discover and locate mining claims for the joint benefit of the contracting parties rendered invalid or unenforceable by a court of equity by the fact that the parties thereto are aliens. Shea v. Nilima, 133 Fed. 209, 66 C. C. A. 263.

And a person, though not a citizen, who performs all the acts necessary to make a valid location of a mining claim, and does the work necessary to keep his claim good had he been a citizen, acquires such a right thereunder that he can convey a good and valid claim thereto to a citizen. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. supra; Wilson v. Triumph Consol. Min. Co. 19 Utah, 66, 75 Am. St. Rep. 718, 56 Pac. 300; Sherlock v. Leighton, 9 Wyo. 297, 63 Pac. 580, 934.

Under this view of the statute, the location of a mining claim by an alien is not subject to attack by anyone except the government. McKinley Creek Min. Co. v. Alaska United Min. Co. 183 U. S. 563, 46 L. ed. 331, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 84; Tornanses v. Melsing, 47 C. C. A. 596, 109 Fed. 710; Billings v. Aspen Min. & Smelting Co. 3 C. C. A. 69, 10 U. S. App. 322, 52 Fed. 250; Stewart v. Gold & Copper Co. and Sherlock v. Leighton, supra.

Or in a proceeding in which the government is a party. Tornanses v. Melsing, supra.

It cannot be attacked by a subsequent locator whose purpose is to appropriate the claim to himself. Ibid.

An alien locating a mining claim holds a right and title indefeasible against all the world save the sovereign, and defeasible by the latter only by direct proceedings for that purpose. Billings v. Aspen Min. & Smelting Co. supra.

Where the object of a suit is to adverse a party applying for a United States patent to a mining claim, however, it is necessary both to allege and prove that the plaintiffs, claiming under the location, are citizens of the United States, or have declared their intention to become such. Allyn v. Schultz, 5 Ariz. 152, 48 Pac. 960; Harris v. Kellogg, 117 Cal. 484, 49 Pac. 708; Keeler v. Trueman, 15 Colo. 143, 25 Pac. 311.

But, in a contest between individuals as to the right of possession of a mining claim by way of ejectment, the question of alienage of a locator does not arise and cannot be considered; it is only where a party applies for a patent that the government is interested in the case, and the citizenship of parties must be shown before they will be entitled to a patent. Wilson v. Triumph Consol. Min. Co. 19 Utah, 66, 75 Am. St. Rep. 718, 56 Pac. 300.

And it is not necessary to allege citizenship of a person owning or claiming an interest in a mining claim, in an ordinary civil action, to recover damages from a wrongdoer. McFeters v. Pierson, 15 Colo 201, 22 Am. St. Rep. 388, 24 Pac. 1076.

And, as against a mere intruder or trespasser, or one having no higher or better right than the occupant, possession of a mining claim is prima facie evidence of right of possession, whether the occupant is an alien or not. Wilson v. Triumph Consol. Min. Co. 19 Utah, 66, 75 Am. St. Rep. 718, 56 Pac. 300.

Nor can the question of citizenship of the locator of a mining claim be first raised on appeal, in an action to quiet title thereto, where the location notices recited that he was a citizen, and there was no specification of the invalidity of his location upon the ground that he was not a citizen, and no objection was made to the introduction of notices on that ground. Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488; O'Reilly v. Campbell, 116 U. S. 418, 29 L. ed. 669, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221.

And the rule that citizenship of a locator must be both alleged and proved in an action to adverse a claim to possession of government lands for mining purposes does not apply in an action brought for recovery of the possession of a mining claim based on title. Harris v. Kellogg, 117 Cal. 484, 49 Pac. 708.

In the above case, Bohanon v. Howe, 2 Idaho, 453, 17 Pac. 583, supra, VI. a, 2, was disapproved, the court saying that no argument in support of the holding was presented in the opinion, and that the cases cited in support thereof were actions brought under the provisions of the Federal statutes.

4. Proof of citizenship.

Natural persons, residents of the United States, locating a mining claim, will be presumed to be citizens of the United States, or to have declared their intention to become such, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Garfield M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153; Jantzon v. Arizona Copper Co. 3 Ariz. 6, 20 Pac. 93; Re Wandering Boy Lode, 2 Copp, Land Owner. 2, Mineral Law Dig. 54.

The fact that a party was not a citizen before disposing of a mining claim must be affirmatively shown by an adverse claimant. Re Kempton Mine, 1 Copp, Land Owner, 178, Mineral Law Dig. 50.

If citizenship is alleged, and the allegation is not controverted, this is sufficient under the law. Mono Min. Co. v. Magnolia E. & W. Co. 2 Copp, Land Owner, 68, Mineral Law Dig. 50.

And the testimony of a locator of a mining claim who had parted with all his interest in the premises located, that he was not a citizen when he made the location, is not conclusive as against his grantee or those claiming under him. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312.

So, proof of birth within the United States, in the absence of a showing of subjection to foreign power, is sufficient proof of citizenship of locators of a mining claim to sustain the location. Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 528, 14 Pac. 182.

And approval by officers of the Land Department, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, of an application for a patent, raises a presumption that the citizenship of the locator has been established; and the determination is conclusive on this question as against third parties. Justice Min. Co. v. Lee, 21 Colo. 260, 52 Am. St. Rep. 216, 40 Pac. 444, Reversing 2 Colo. App. 112, 29 Pac. 1020.

Likewise, the affidavit of the locator of a mining claim that he is a citizen is admissible in evidence to prove his citizenship. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 503, 11 Fed. 125.

And the oath of one of the locators of a mining claim, accompanying the recorded notice of location, as to the citizenship of the locators, is prima facie evidence of the fact, and will be deemed sufficient to sustain the location until doubt is thrown on the accuracy of his statement. Hammer v. Garfield Min. & Mill. Co. 130 U. S. 291, 32 L. ed. 964, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548, Affirming 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153.

It has been held, however, that the fact of naturalization, or of intention to become a citizen, by the locator of a mining claim, must be proved by the record of some court of competent jurisdiction, where the fact is of recent occurrence, and the locator's right has been contested from the very hour that it accrued. Wood v. Aspen Min. & Smelting Co. 36 Fed. 25.

And that testimony of a witness that he saw in the possession of the locator of a mining claim certain naturalization papers in which the locator swore to his citizenship is not competent on the question of the locator's citizenship, where full search had been made in the records of the proper county and elsewhere in the state, and no record of any declaration of intention to become a citizen, or of his naturalization, could be found. Ibid.

And that the citizenship of the locator of a mining claim is not sufficiently established by a record of entry of land by a person of the same name in another state on oath that he was a citizen of the United States, and by proof offered in support of the entry, showing that the person entering the land was the head of a family, with a wife and seven children, and that he resided with his family on the land between specified dates, where it appears that the locator of the mining claim had only six children, and that his wife and children were in Canada at the time. Ibid.

But evidence that the locator of a mining claim was born in Scotland, that he lived in the United States for many years, that he voted at territorial and state elections many times, and that he subscribed to and swore to a registration oath before voting, stating that he was a naturalized citizen; and that he was a soldier in the war and was honorably discharged, and drew a pension from the United States government,—has been held to be sufficient to sustain a finding that he was a citizen, upholding the validity of his location, though no direct evidence of his naturalization was ever found. Strickley v. Hill, 22 Utah, 257, 83 Am. St. Rep. 786, 62 Pac. 893.

And in Providence Gold Min. Co. v. Burke, 6 Ariz. 323, 57 Pac. 641, it was held that evidence that the locator of a mining claim had made declarations of his citizenship to his friends and companions, and had voted at the elections held in the territory; and that his name appeared upon the register; and that he had located many mining claims through a long period of years under the declaration that he was a citizen of the United States,—is competent to show, and tends to show, his citizenship.

Whether a person attempting to locate a mining claim was at the time a citizen, or had declared his intention to become such, is a question of fact, to be determined by the evidence, on an issue as to the validity of the location. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312.

c. Corporations.

A corporation created under the laws of one of the states of the Union, all of the members of which are citizens of the United States, is competent to locate, or join in the location of, a mining claim upon the public land of the United States, in like manner as an individual citizen. McKinley v. Wheeler, 130 U. S. 630, 32 L. ed. 1048, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638; Thomas v. Chisholm, 13 Colo. 105, 21 Pac. 1019.

And a corporation of another state may locate a mining claim in the state through a resident agent. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

So, corporations are associations of persons, within the meaning of the act of Congress of March 3, 1873 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2350, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1441), authorizing only one entry of vacant coal lands by a person or association of persons, United States v. Trinidad Coal & Coking Co. 137 U. S. 160, 34 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57, Reversing 37 Fed. 180.

A person claiming a right to a mine under an entry and location by a corporation must, however, before being entitled to recover, aver and prove that the corporation was organized under the laws of the United States, or some state or territory thereof, and that the members of such corporation were citizens of the United States and severally and individually competent to make a location. Thomas v. Chisholm, supra.

But the citizenship of stockholders of a corporation need not be proved for the purpose of establishing its right to a mining claim, otherwise than by showing it to have been organized under the laws of a state of 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which its stockholders are conclusively presumed to be citizens. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 17 C. C. A. 190, 44 U. S. App. 204, 70 Fed. 455, Affirming 55 Fed. 11.

And a properly authenticated certificate of incorporation, filed by a corporation applying for a mineral patent, is sufficient proof of citizenship under the statute. Re Rose Lode Claims, 22 Land Dec. 83; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2321, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1425.

So, the act of Congress of March 3, 1897, omits, and thereby repeals, the restriction in the former act placed upon the acquisition of public lands by a corporation, a part of the stock of which is owned by persons, corporations, or associations, not citizens of the United States; and since that act a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any state or territory thereof, may, under the United States mining laws, occupy and purchase mining claims from the government, irrespective of the ownership of stock therein by persons, corporations, or associations not citizens of the United States. Re Alien Act of March 2, 1897, 28 Land Dec. 178.

An instruction in an action involving the validity of a mining location, however, that a corporation is not entitled to the privilege of making a mineral location of lands belonging to the United States, if erroneous, is not reversible error, in the absence of anything to show that the corporation made the location in question. Stemwinder Min. Co. v. Emma & L. C. Consol. Min. Co. 2 Idaho, 456, 21 Pac. 1040, Affirmed in 149 U. S. 787, 37 L. ed. 960, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1052.

And the right to enter upon, explore, and possess mineral lands belonging to the United States is given to citizens and persons who have declared their intention to become citizens, and all others are excluded by necessary implication; and such exclusion applies to a state or territory as well as to an alien. Territory v. Lee, 2 Mont. 124.

Nor is a miners' relief and poor fund either a person or an association of persons authorized to locate a mining claim. Terrible v. Gunboat, Copp, 80, Barringer & Adams, Mines & Mining, p. 208.

d. Nonresidents, minors, etc.

A citizen of the United States who is a resident of one state may take up and locate mining claims in another state in his own name, or employ citizens and residents of the state to locate claims in their own names for his benefit. Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra.

In the absence of mining rules and regulations disqualifying nonresidents to locate mining claims, they stand in the same position as residents of the district; and a mining claim may be located by a third person for a nonresident. Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816.

So, the fact that locators of a placer-mining claim were minors at the time does not affect the validity of the location, there being no requirement that a citizen qualified to locate shall be of any particular age. Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 528, 14 Pac. 182; Davis v. Dennis (Wash.) 85 Pac. 1079; Re Stilson, June 15, 1893; Re Cunningham, 7 Copp, Land Owner, 179, Mineral Law Dig. 49.

And a person in possession of unsurveyed government lands on which he had discovered a coal vein, and of which, during his temporary absence, another had taken possession, need not, in an action to recover possession, allege that he was of the age of twenty-one years, or that he had the necessary qualifications to enter government lands, since the prior peaceable possession is the only inquiry. Davis v. Dennis, supra.

Nor is any distinction on account of sex made on the question of the right to locate a mining claim. Re Eureka Office, Nov. 13, 1877, 4 Copp, Land Owner, 179, Mineral Law Dig. 49.

The disqualification of a deputy United States mineral surveyor, or other officer or employee of the Land Office, from locating or holding mineral lands, prescribed by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 452 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 257), providing that officers, clerks, and employees in the General Land Office are prohibited from directly or indirectly purchasing, or becoming interested in the purchase of, any public land, however, is not removed by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2319 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), providing that all valuable mineral deposits in land belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase by citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become such; it being the intention of Congress to prohibit, on the ground of public policy, the officers, clerks, and employees in the General Land Office from acquiring, directly or indirectly, any interest in the purchase from the government of any of the public lands of the United States. Lavagnino v. Uhlig, 26 Utah, 1, 99 Am. St. Rep. 808, 71 Pac. 1046, Affirmed in 198 U. S. 443, 49 L. ed. 1119, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 716; Floyd v. Montgomery, 26 Land Dec. 122; Re Maxwell, 29 Land Dec. 76.

e. Agents, partners, etc.

1. Validity and effect of location by.

A mining claim may be located by an agent; it is not necessary that a party shall personally act in taking up a mining claim, or in doing the acts required to give evidence of appropriation, or to perfect it. McCulloch v. Murphy, 125 Fed. 147; Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. 60 C. C. A. 155, 123 Fed. 209; Moore v. Hamerstag, 109 Cal. 122, 41 Pac. 805; Gore v. McBrayer, 18 Cal. 582; Murley v. Ennis, 2 Colo. 300; Schultz v. Keeler, 2 Idaho, 568, 21 Pac. 418; Dunlap v. Pattison, 4 Idaho, 473, 95 Am. St. Rep. 140, 42 Pac. 504.

And an agent or attorney in fact may do everything necessary to perfect such location, including the making of the affidavit that he is acquainted with the mining ground described in the notice, and that the same has not, to the best of his knowledge, been before located, or, if so located, that the same has been abandoned, as required by Idaho Rev. Stat. § 3104. Dunlap v. Pattison, supra.

And including, also, other prospecting and discovery. Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. supra.

Nor is a contract by which one person agrees to furnish the money to make payment for, and the other to do the work required in, locating mineral lands, invalid as in violation of the act of Congress respecting the appropriation of such lands. Lipscomb v. Nichols, 6 Colo. 290.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2319 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), sanctioned and continued in force all local laws and customs with reference to location of mining claims not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, including the rule authorizing location of a mining claim by an agent. Schultz v. Keeler, 2 Idaho, 333, 13 Pac. 481.

And U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426), making express mention of co-owners of mining locations, without reference to whether they are upon placers or rock in place; and § 2330 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1432), thereof, providing for joint entry and patent of contiguous placer claims,—recognize the right of parties to locate placer claims jointly. Chapman v. Toy Long, 4 Sawy. 28, Fed. Cas. No. 2,610.

And where two persons agree in writing to locate mining claims in partnership, mines located by one of them during the continuance of the relation become their common property, though located by one of the partners in his own name. McMahon v. Meehan, 2 Alaska, 278.

Nor does an agent who locates a mining claim for and in the name of his principal acquire an interest in the title thereto without an express prior agreement to that effect. Ibid.

So, when a location of a mining claim is made for another not present, all the title anybody can acquire by location vests in the person for whom the claim was so located, and he cannot be divested of it except by his own voluntary act, or by forfeiture in not complying with the prescribed rules and regulations. Rush v. French and Moore v. Hamerstag, supra; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

And a location by an individual in whom the possessory right apparently remains is sufficient to support the issue of a patent on the application of a company, where it is shown that in fact said location was made for and in behalf of the company. Re Sold Again Fraction Min. Lode, 20 Land Dec. 58.

And where a complaint alleges the location of a mining claim by an agent, and the answer admits it, the fact of location by an agent is in the case as fully as it would have been had there been evidence to that effect. Schultz v. Keeler, 2 Idaho, 568, 21 Pac. 418.

So, one who locates a mining claim in his own name, pursuant to an agreement between two or more to explore the public domain and discover and locate mining claims for the joint benefit of the contracting parties, holds the legal title to the interests of the others in trust for them. Shea v. Nilima, 66 C. C. A. 263, 133 Fed. 209; Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra; Moritz v. Lavelle, 77 Cal. 10, 11 Am. St. Rep. 229, 18 Pac. 803; Copper River Min. Co. v. McClellan, 2 Alaska, 134.

And where several persons agree to prospect for and locate mines, and that all mines located in the name of either shall be owned in common by all; and they locate several mines, each in his own name,—the legal title is in the locator named for each mine, and the others have such interest with him as constitutes, under the mining laws, a holding in common,—to the extent, at least, of making work done for the development of all satisfy the law, if sufficient in quantity and value. Eberle v. Carmichael, 8 N. M. 169, 42 Pac. 95.

And one who, while prospecting under such an agreement, discovers and locates a valuable mine, may be compelled to convey a moiety thereof to his partner, or to account for his partner's share of the proceeds of the sale thereof. Raymond v. Johnson, 17 Wash. 232, 61 Am. St. Rep. 908, 49 Pac. 492.

Nor is it a fraud upon anyone for one man to locate another in a mine and receive back from the latter a deed to the property, where no misrepresentations were made to him as to the transfer. Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816.

And a location of a mining claim by one person for and in behalf of another is not rendered invalid as to the absent locator because of a fraudulent intent upon the part of the person locating for him, unless he had knowledge of, and acquiesced in, such fraudulent intent, with the purpose of carrying it out. Ibid.

But where several persons united for the purpose of locating a placer-mining claim; and some of them merely permitted their names to be used as locators to enable the others to obtain possession of, and patents for, mineral lands to a greater extent than they were entitled to by law, with the understanding that, after possession and title were acquired, they would convey to the others,—the whole transaction is tainted with fraud; and a court of equity will not interfere to compel an equal division between the locators intended to be benefited by it. Mitchell v. Cline, 84 Cal. 409, 24 Pac. 164.

And a court of equity will not adjudge the locator of a mining claim who is in peaceable possession under a clear record title, to be a trustee of that title for another upon an alleged oral agreement to locate it for him, except on full, clear, and satisfactory evidence. Copper River Min. Co. v. McClellan, 2 Alaska, 134.

Nor can a party to a contract for a joint venture in locating mines, who fails to perform his part of the contract, enforce specific performance against the other. McMahon v. Meehan, 2 Alaska, 278.

And one who gratuitously stakes a mining claim for, and in the name of, another cannot enforce specific performance of an oral promise made by the principal that he will, after he acquires title by location, convey an interest in the claim to him in consideration for his services, since such a promise is within the statute of frauds. Cascaden v. Dunbar, 2 Alaska, 408.

Where the record owner of a mining claim engages in working it and extracting gold therefrom on joint expense with the one who located it for him as his agent, they are mining partners in the work and its profits, but not in the title to the claim. McMahon v. Meehan, supra.

2. Authority to act.

An agreement between several persons to engage in the business of prospecting for, and the development of, lode mining property, makes each the agent of the others in prosecuting the joint adventure. Lawrence v. Robinson, 4 Colo. 567; Murley v. Ennis, 2 Colo. 300.

And if two men enter into a prospecting agreement providing for their joint prosecution of the labor, the agreement will be taken to include the continuance of work until a valid location is made on a legal discovery. McLaughlin v. Thompson, 2 Colo. App. 135, 29 Pac. 816.

And, if the first occupant of a mining claim, while his right is still incipient, admits another into possession with him upon the agreement that the labor of development shall be performed by both for their common benefit, this amounts to an abandonment pro tanto; and, if the development is afterwards effected by their joint labors, the better right, which is thereby acquired, inures to the two jointly. Murley v. Ennis, supra.

Nor need authority to locate a mining claim for the benefit of another be in writing. Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra; Gore v. McBrayer, 18 Cal. 582; Reagan v. McKibben, 11 S. D. 270, 76 N. W. 943.

The object of the statute of frauds is to guard the owner of an estate in lands against any new estate in the same property being created by another out of the estate of the owner, except by his own written consent; and it does not operate to prevent the location of a mining claim by one person for another without written authority. Rush v. French, supra.

And the statute of frauds has no application to an agreement by one person to locate a mining claim for the joint benefit of himself and another. Moritz v. Lavelle, supra.

Nor is an agreement between two or more persons to explore the public domain and discover and locate lodes for the joint benefit of all within the statute of frauds; and it need not be evidenced by writing. Meylette

v. Brennan, 20 Colo. 242, 38 Pac. 75; Murley v. Ennis, supra; Hirbourn v. Reeding, 3 Mont. 15; Eberle v. Carmichael, 8 N. M. 696, 47 Pac. 717; Raymond v. Johnson, supra.

And the same rule applies to such an agreement between two corporations. Shea v. Nilima, supra.

Where one person located a mining claim in the name of another, however, legal title to the claim vested in the latter; and when, at the time of the location, he did not occupy a fiduciary relation to the actual locator, and it was not made pursuant to any prior agreement to hold it for the actual locator, a subsequent parol promise by the person in whose name the location was made, to hold it in trust for the actual locator, was void under the statute of frauds. Moore v. Hamerstag, 109 Cal. 122, 41 Pac. 805.

In the above case, Gore v. McBrayer and Moritz v. Lavelle, supra, were distinguished upon the ground that in them the location was made under a prior agreement between the parties that it should be for the joint interests of both.

Nor is any authority at all, either express or implied, necessary to enable one to locate a mining claim for another; mere action for the benefit of another makes the actor the agent of the other. Rush v. French, supra; Morton v. Solambo Copper Min. Co. 26 Cal. 527.

And a notice of location of a 'placer-mining' claim by a father in behalf of his children will not be deemed invalid for want of authority, where the children united in bringing the suit to quiet title to the claim. Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 528, 14 Pac. 182.

And one who joined with another in claiming ground as a discovery claim, and afterwards recognized the rights of the other, and accepted from him his proportionate share of money expended for work and labor, is estopped from subsequently relocating the claim in his own name, and from claiming that his colocator was an alien, and that the former location was invalid. Sever v. Gregovich, 16 Nev. 325.

Nor is it material whether or not the party for whose benefit the location was made had knowledge of it. Gore v. McBrayer, supra.

And when a location is made for an absent locator, whether with or without authority, or with or without his knowledge, whatever rights are given to him by such location vest in him at once; and even the person locating such absentee without authority cannot take down the name of such absentee and insert another, though he does it before the absent locator has knowledge of the fact that he has been located. Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816; Morton v. Solambo Copper Min. Co. and Gore v. McBrayer, supra.

To warrant the location of a mining claim by a partnership or association, however, the association between the parties must exist at the time of the alleged discovery and location in order to give the parties associated an interest in the property; if it does not then exist, so that the person acting in the field making the discovery and location can be said to be acting for the others as well as for himself, no interest can be acquired by those who are not personally present. Johnstone v. Robinson, 3 McCrary, 42, 16 Fed. 903.

And the fact that prospective miners were partners imposes no duty upon any of them, where the partnership is dissolved by mutual consent, to go on and complete defective locations for the benefit of the others; and where a partner goes on and completes such a location in his own name, he is entitled to the benefit thereof, and is not chargeable as trustee of the others. Page v. Summers, 70 Cal. 121, 12 Pac. 120.

And if one of two men who entered into a prospecting agreement providing for their joint prosecution of the labor of locating a mining claim quits the work before a vein is found, and the other continues until he finds a vein, the reward is his, and does not inure to the benefit of his former coprospector. McLaughlin v. Thompson, 2 Colo. App. 135, 29 Pac. 816.

So, where four persons were owners in common of a mining claim, and one of them conveyed his interest to another, and he afterwards discovered that his claim was too wide, leaving a small fraction on one side not located, and called the attention of the others to it, who instructed him to locate it, saying nothing about doing so in trust, and he did so in his own name, marking the boundaries of the fraction and doing some work upon it, one of the other partners also doing some, the evidence being conflicting as to who sunk the discovery shaft, a finding that he located the fraction for himself, and not in trust for others, will not be disturbed. Reagan v. McKibben, 11 S. D. 270, 76 N. W. 943.

And where a laborer, employed by a mine owner to excavate and grade a quartz-mill site on public land, discovers and extracts from the upper edge of a sloping rock left by the excavations a pocket of gold and gold-bearing rock not included in the mineral location, he is entitled to appropriate the same; and where it is wrongfully seized and converted by his employers, he is entitled to recover from them the value thereof. Burns v. Clark, 133 Cal. 634, 85 Am. St. Rep. 233, 66 Pac. 12.

VII. Discovery.

a. Necessity of.

In all legislation, whether by Congress or state or territory, and by all mining regulations and rules, discovery and appropriation are recognized as the source of title to mining claims. Marshall v. Harney Peak Tin Min. Mill. & Mfg. Co. 1 S. D. 350, 47 N. W. 290; O'Reilly v. Campbell, 116 U. S. 418, 29 L. ed. 669, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 421.

The purpose of the requirement under the act of Congress requiring that no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of the claim located, as well as under state legislation and miners' rules and regulations, is to prevent fraud upon the government by persons attempting to acquire a patent to land not mineral in its character. Shoshone Min. Co. v. Rutter, 31 C. C. A. 223, 59 U. S. App. 538, 87 Fed. 801; Lange v. Robinson, 148 Fed. 799; Sanders v. Noble, 22 Mont. 110, 55 Pac. 1037.

And the rule adopted to effectuate this purpose is that a proper discovery, is a prerequisite to the vesting in a competent locator of a complete possessory title to a lode-mining claim. Erwin v. Perego, 35 C. C. A. 482, 93 Fed. 608, Affirming, 85 Fed. 905; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787; Van Zandt v. Argentine Min. Co. 2 McCrary, 159, 8 Fed. 725; King v. Amy & S. Consol. Min. Co. 152 U. S. 222, 38 L. ed. 419, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; Tuolumne Consol. Min. Co. v. Maier, 134 Cal. 583, 66 Pac. 863; Daggett v. Yreka Min. & Mill. Co. (Cal.) 86 Pac. 968; Johnson v. Young, 18 Colo. 625, 34 Pac. 173; Wolfley v. Lebanon Min. Co. 4 Colo. 112; Upton v. Larkin, 5 Mont. 600, 6 Pac. 66; Foote v. National Min. Co. 2 Mont. 402; Overman Silver Min. Co. v. Corcoran, 15 Nev. 147; Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442; Patterson v. Tarbell, 26 Or. 29, 37 Pac. 76; Marshall v. Harney Peak Tin Min. Mill. & Mfg. Co. supra; Lockhart v. Farrell (Utah) 86 Pac. 1077; Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah, 410, 64 Pac. 1019; Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Mahler, 4 Morrison, Min. Rep. 390; Waterloo Min. Co. v. Doe, 17 Land Dec. 111; Etling v. Potter, 17 Land Dec. 424; Re Winter Lode, 22 Land Dec. 362; Bunker Hill, etc. Co. v. Shoshone Min. Co. 33 Land Dec. 142; Reins v. Raunheim, 28 Land Dec. 526; Redden v. Harlan, 2 Alaska. 402; Bulette v. Dodge, 2 Alaska, 427; Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532.

The fact that land is returned as mineral by the surveyor general does not in any event avoid the necessity of a discovery of mineral; and a location made without a discovery is void without reference to such return. Reins v. Murray, 22 Land Dec. 409.

And a location of a mining claim is insufficient, and will not support a patent, where the lands upon which are situated the discovery shaft and improvements have been expressly excluded therefrom in favor of a subsequent locator, and the proof fails to show a discovery of mineral on the claimed ground. Re Lone Dane Lode, 10 Land Dec. 53; Re Independence Lode, 9 Land Dec. 571; Re Antediluvian Lode, 8 Land Dec. 602.

Nor will a record of a prior location and proof of marking it on the ground defeat a subsequent location, in the absence of proof of discovery by the prior locator; the record and the marking of the claim not being sufficient to authorize a presumption of a discovery. Smith v. Newell, 86 Fed. 56; Bulette v. Dodge, supra.

And entries and patents of lode-mining claims, in proceedings in which a claimant of a tunnel site located across them prior to the entries was not, and was not required to be, a party, will not estop him from establishing by testimony of witnesses who knew, and by other customary evidence, the fact that no discoveries of mineral in rock in place had been made in the lode claims before the claim of the tunnel site was located across them. Uinta Tunnel Min. Transp. Co. v. Ajax Gold Min. Co. 73 C. C. A. 35, 141 Fed. 563.

Even in a controversy between two mineral claimants on the simple question as to who is entitled to priority, there must be such a discovery of mineral to sustain a location as gives reasonable evidence of the fact either that there is a vein or lode carrying precious mineral, or, if it is claimed as placer ground, that it is valuable for placer mining. Chrisman v. Miller, 197 U. S. 313, 49 L. ed. 770, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 468, Affirming 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444.

And the use of unclaimed ground by a mining company for buildings, and for the construction of a tunnel thereunder to aid in the working of the company's claim, does not initiate, any right to the ground as an independent mining claim. Waterloo Min. Co. v. Doe, 56 Fed. 685.

Persons who locate a mining claim and record a location certificate thereof, however, cannot, as against one who purchases an interest in the claim, prove that the location is void for want of discovery of minerals in place. McCarthy v. Speed, 11 S. D. 362, 50 L.R.A. 184, 77 N. W. 590, 12 S. D. 7, 50 L.R.A. 190, 80 N. W. 135.

Prior to the discovery of minerals prospectors have equal rights. Hibschle v. Gildersleeve, 8 Copp, Land Owner, 65, Mineral Law Dig. 34.

A person who has made no discovery upon a mining claim, and has done no work to protect it, cannot be said to be in actual, bona fide possession thereof, developing it under the requirements of the statute; and in such case any other person has the right to enter and locate peaceably. Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444; Charlton v. Kelly, supra.

But the entry of one prospector upon the possession of another must be peaceable, open, and above board, and made in good faith, or no right can be founded upon it. Miller v. Chrisman, supra.

One who in good faith makes a location of a mining claim, remains in possession, and with due diligence prosecutes his work toward a discovery, is fully protected against all forms of forcible, fraudulent, surreptitious, clandestine entry and intrusion upon his possession. Ibid.; Bulette v. Dodge, supra.

A prospector on the public mineral domain may protect himself, as to land of which he is in actual possession, while he is searching for mineral; and his possession, so held, is good as a possessory title against all the world, except the government of the United States. Crossman v. Pendery, 2 McCrary, 139, 8 Fed. 693.

And one who makes a location before the discovery of a vein or ledge can hold the same while continuously and industriously seeking for one believed to exist therein, as against all persons having no better right thereto; and he may eject them therefrom if they intrude upon his possession. Field v. Grey, 1 Ariz. 404, 25 Pac. 793; Charlton v. Kelly, supra.

But one who goes upon uninclosed and unimproved mineral land and prospects for veins of mineral-bearing rock is, previous to a discovery, simply a prospector upon the public domain, and his rights are confined to the ground in his actual possession only, and do not include the tract sought to be taken or located, so as to warrant a court in enjoining a trespass thereon. Gemmell v. Swain, 28 Mont. 331, 98 Am. St. Rep. 570, 72 Pac. 662.

And the act of a prospector on public mineral lands, of posting up notices of location at his shafts before making a discovery, does not enlarge his rights as against a trespasser upon portions of the tract claimed, not in his actual possession. Ibid.

Nor can competing prospectors who have made no discovery make use of a writ of injunction to secure priority of discovery or location thereon, or apparent superiority of the right to a mining claim; and the fact that one such prospector has been wrongfully enjoined from continuing his work does not entitle him to an injunction against the other against trespassing upon the tract claimed by him. Ibid.

And a prospector on the public mineral domain, previous to discovery, who stands by and allows another to enter upon his claim and first discover mineral, loses his right as against the actual discoverer. Crossman v. Pendery, supra.

Actual possession within these rules depends largely upon the character of the ground. Tents, houses, and actual residence therein, on the claim, are evidences of possession, though not necessary to constitute legal possession, and actual work constitutes possession; but merely placing a tent and a few tools and a small supply of provisions upon a claim do not alone and of themselves constitute actual possession thereof. Charlton v. Kelly, supra.

c. What constitutes.

1. Generally.

A discovery which will support the location of a mining claim within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), providing that no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of the claim located, consists of the disclosure of a well-defined body of rock in place, carrying gold or other precious metal, which body afterwards proves to be continuous. Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Mahler, 4 Morrison, Min. Rep. 390; Fox v. Myers (Nev.) 86 Pac. 793.

It is the finding of ore or metalliferous rock in place in a defined vein. Muldrick v. Brown, 37 Or. 185, 61 Pac. 428.

The finding of rock in place containing mineral constitutes a discovery. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

The finding upon the public land, of a belt or zone of quartz or rock held in place by the adjacent country rock, containing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable deposits, is a discovery which will authorize the location of a lode claim. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787.

And that there is gold and silver bearing rock showing upon the surface of a claim is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Federal statute. Score v. Griffin (Ariz.) 80 Pac. 331.

And when metallic vein matter appears on the surface a valid location of a ledge deep in the ground to which such vein matter leads may be made. Hayes v. Lavagnino, 17 Utah, 185, 53 Pac. 1029; Harrington v. Chambers, 3 Utah, 94, 1 Pac. 362.

2. The vein or lode discovered.

(a) Definitions.

"Lode" is a term in general use among the tin miners of Cornwall, and was introduced on the Pacific coast by miners from Cornish mines, and signifies a fissure filled either with metallic or with earthy matters. Re Drummond, Land Office, July 15, 1873, Copp, Min. Lands, pp. 50, 51, 1 Snyder, Mines, § 283.

In the language of miners, a lode is a vein containing ore. Moxon v. Wilkinson, 2 Mont. 421.

And veins, in mining parlance, are narrow plates of rock intersecting other rocks, and are the fillings of cracks or fissures. Ibid.

As used by miners before being defined by any authority, the term "lode" simply meant that formation by which a miner could be led or guided; it is an alteration of the verb "lead," and whatever a miner could follow, expecting to find ore, was his lode. Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Consol. Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 302, Fed. Cas. No. 4,548, Affirmed in 103 U. S. 839, 26 L. ed. 557.

And in practical mining the terms "vein" and "lode" apply to all deposits of mineralized matter within any zone or belt of mineralized rock, separated from the neighboring rock by well-defined boundaries; and the discoverer of such a deposit may locate it as a vein or lode. Hayes v. Lavagnino, supra.

So, a lode existed, within the meaning of the mining act of Congress of 1866, where-ever miners could follow and find ore. Harrington v. Chambers, supra.

And the words "vein or lode," as used in the United States statute with reference to the location of mining claims (Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), which superseded the act of 1866, are applicable to any zone or belt of mineralized rock lying within clearly defined boundaries, separating it from the neighboring country or nonmineral rock. Book v. Justice Min. Co. and Meydenbauer v. Stevens, supra; Stevens v. Williams, 1 McCrary, 480, Fed. Cas. Nos. 13,413, 13,414; Eureka Case, supra; Buffalo Zinc & Copper Co. v. Crump, 70 Ark. 525, 91 Am. St. Rep. 87, 69 S. W. 573; Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401; Hayes v. Lavagnino, supra.

And apply to any kind of a vein or lode of quartz, or rock-bearing mineral, in whatever kind, character, or formation the mineral may be found. Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra.

And they include all deposits of mineralized matter found through a mineralized zone or belt coming from the same source, impressed with the same forms, and appearing to have been created by the same processes. Meydenbauer v. Stevens; Gregory v. Pershbaker; and Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Consol. Min. Co.,—supra.

So, a vein or lode authorized to be located as a mining claim has been defined to be a seam or fissure in the earth's crust filled with quartz or some other kind of rock in place, carrying gold, silver, or other valuable mineral deposit. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

A belt or zone of quartz or rock held in place by the adjacent country rock, containing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper or other valuable mineral deposit, constitutes a lode. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787.

And a quartz lode is defined to be a fissure or seam in the country rock filled with quartz matter bearing gold or silver. Foote v. National Min. Co. 2 Mont. 402.

So, a mineral-bearing vein, within the meaning of the statute, is a continuous bed of mineral-bearing rock in place in the general mass of the surrounding formation. Beals v. Cone, 27 Colo. 473, 83 Am. St. Rep. 92, 62 Pac. 948.

The definition of a lode as the term is used in the Revised Statutes must always have special reference to the formation and peculiar characteristics of the particular district in which the lode or vein is found. Fox v. Myers (Nev.) 86 Pac. 793.

(b) Distinguishing features generally.

A lead or lode, in mining parlance, is not an imaginary line without dimensions, or a thing without shape or form; before a thing can be legally and rightfully denominated a lead or lode, it must have length and depth; it must be capable of measurement, and it 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

must occupy defined space and be capable of identification. Foote v. National Min. Co. supra.

And a lode or vein of mineral must be continuous in the sense that it can be traced through the surrounding rock. Buffalo Zinc & Copper Co. v. Crump, supra.

It is the finding of mineral in rock in place, as distinguished from float rock, that constitutes discovery of a lode, and warrants a prospector in making a location of a lode-mining claim. Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra.

A slight interruption of mineral-bearing rock, however, would not, alone, be sufficient to destroy the identity of the vein; nor would a short partial closure of the fissure have that effect, if a little further on it recurs again with mineral-bearing rock within it. Buffalo Zinc & Copper Co. v. Crump, supra.

And a quartz lode may be wide or narrow, varying in width from 1 inch or less to 100 feet or more, the sides of which are represented and defined by walls of the country rock. Foote v. National Min. Co. and North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. supra.

And it is not required that well-defined walls shall be developed, or paying ore be found, within them, to constitute a vein; but something must be found in place, as rock, clay, or earth, so colored, stained, changed, or decomposed by the mineral elements as to mark and distinguish it from the inclosing country. Burke v. McDonald, 2 Idaho, 679, 33 Pac. 49.

Nor is uniformity of structure in the formation of a zone of mineral required to constitute a good discovery. It may be thick or thin, and may narrow down and pinch out in places, and suddenly expand and swell out in others; and it is not necessary that the minerals or valuable deposits shall be evenly distributed. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, supra.

And a horizontal deposit of mineral, irregular in form, and in no wise resembling a fissure vein, and not capable of being traced by its outcrop, falls within the meaning of the descriptive terms "vein" and "lode," as used in the statute. Re Breece Min. Co. 3 Land Dec. 11.

So, a quartz ledge made a subject of location includes all the gold in detached or decomposing quartz so far as the general formation of the ledge can be traced; and it is immaterial whether the ledge has been thrown above the surface of the earth, and, having fallen, is lying flat upon it, or whether it is still standing perpendicular in the earth, or whether it is still one solid mass of quartz rock, or has become entirely decomposed, and of no greater density than the ordinary rock around it. rown v. 49 & 56 Quartz Min. Co. 15 Cal. 152, 76 Am. Dec. 468.

To warrant the location of a mining claim, however, it is not enough to discover detached pieces of quartz, or mere bunches of quartz, not in place. Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666.

Nor is the mere discovery of mineral in a broken or fragmentary condition sufficient. Terrible Min. Co. v. Argentine Min. Co. 5 McCrary, 639, 89 Fed. 583; Van Zandt v. Argentine Min. Co. 2 McCrary, 159, 8 Fed. 725.

And a discovery which will support a location is not established by evidence that samples of porphyry rock taken from a hole made a year after the location were assayed and an appreciable amount of gold was found in every sample, in the absence of proof of anything like a continuous vein or lode of quartz or rock extending in any direction. Ledoux v. Forester, 94 Fed. 600.

Nor is land containing a ledge of limestone subject to location and entry as a lode claim; and the location of it as such is a nullity. Wheeler v. Smith, 23 Land Dec. 395; Long v. Isaksen, 23 Land Dec. 353.

And, while metalliferous rock in place, not in a fissure, may be found under such conditions, within clearly defined boundaries, as to require recognition as a vein or lode, a broad metalliferous zone having within its limits true fissure veins, plainly bounded, cannot be regarded as a single vein or lode, although such zone may, itself, have boundaries which can be traced. Mt. Diablo Mill & Min. Co. v. Callison, 5 Sawy. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 9,886.

In the above case, the Eureka Case, 4 Sawy. 302, Fed. Cas. No. 4,548, supra, VII. c, 2, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case clearly defined boundaries were found, while in this case there are none; and the court limited that case, saying that it never was intended in that case that every metalliferous zone of country, to which boundaries can be found, must be regarded as one vein or lode, since this would reduce all mining districts to one lode.

(c) Rock in place.

"Rock in place," as used in the mining statutes, means rock that is inclosed and embraced in the general mass of the mountain, as distinguished from float soil and débris of the surface. Jones v. Prospect Mountain Tunnel Co. 21 Nev. 339, 31 Pac. 642.

The quartz rock designated as in place in the mineral laws must be suspended between, or lie within, or be inclosed by, walls of rock constituting the general mass of the earth's crust in the immediate vicinity of the zone or belt. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787.

By the use of the phrase "rock in place," Congress intended to make a distinction between rock or quartz held in place by the adjoining country rock and bunches or blotches of rock simply lying or resting upon the earth's surface without any walls, and also pieces of boulders detached from the earth's crust, commonly called "float," and usually found in mountain gulches and in the beds of streams in a mineral country. Ibid.

To constitute rock in place, as used in the mining statutes, however, it is not material where the rock or mineral was originally formed or deposited, or that the vein matter is loose, or broken, or disintegrated. Jones v. Prospect Mountain Tunnel Co. supra.

And a vein or lode cannot be in place, within the meaning of those acts, unless it is within the general mass of the mountain; it must be inclosed within the general mass of fixed and immovable rock; if it comes to the surface and passes out of the rock in place, it ceases to be a lode. Leadville Min. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 4 Morrison, Min. Rep. 380, Fed. Cas. No. 8,158.

The term "rock in place," as used in the mining acts, should be given the most liberal construction that the language will admit of, and every class of claims that, according to either scientific accuracy or proper usage, can be classed or applied for as a vein or lode, may be patented under this law. Re Boles, July 20, 1871, Sickels, Min. Dec. 522, Mineral Law Dig. 9.

3. The question of value of the deposit.

When the controversy is between two mineral claimants, the rule respecting the sufficiency of mineral is more liberal than when it is between a mineral claimant and one seeking to make an agricultural entry. Chrisman v. Miller, 197 U. S. 313, 49 L. ed. 770, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 468, Affirming 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444; Lange v. Robinson, 148 Fed. 799.

And when the locator of a mining claim finds rock in place containing mineral he has made a discovery, within the meaning of the statute, whether the rock or earth is rich or poor, and whether it assays high or low. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Fox v. Myers (Nev.) 86 Pac. 793.

And the locator of a mining claim need not show that he has made assays of the vein located when no one disputes a prima facie showing by evidence of the prospector that the vein is a good one, and appears to be sufficiently good to justify locating and subsequently working it. Davidson v. Bordeaux, 15 Mont. 245, 38 Pac. 1075.

A valid location of a mining claim may be made whenever the prospector has discovered such indications of mineral that he is willing to spend his time and money in following with the expectation of finding ore; the test being willingness on his part, and not justification. Burke v. McDonald, 3 Idaho, 296, 29 Pac. 98; Hayes v. Lavagnino, 17 Utah, 185, 53 Pac. 1029.

And the discovery of a crevice or seam filled with mineral deposit, by means of which a prospector anticipates being led to an ore body or deposit of commercial value, is a sufficient discovery of a vein to support the location of a mining claim; the expectation need not be of finding paying mineral in the particular crevice, vein, or seam in which mineral-bearing rock in place is discovered. McShane v. Kenkle, 18 Mont. 208, 33 L.R.A. 851, 56 Am. St. Rep. 579, 44

Pac. 979; Shreve v. Copper Bell Min. Co. 11 Mont. 309, 28 Pac. 315.

In Shreve v. Copper Bell Min. Co. supra, Davis v. Wiebbold, 139 U. S. 507, 35 L. ed. 238, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628, supra, V. c. 2, (c), (1), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the court was examining the status of the land at the time of the sale as a town site, and not at the time of a sale as a mining claim.

If the rock in place is sufficiently encouraging to warrant an ordinarily prudent man, not necessarily a miner, in spending his time or money upon it, it is sufficient to constitute a discovery of a vein or lode within the meaning of the Federal statutes, as against a subsequent locator for mining purposes. Muldrick v. Brown, 37 Or. 185, 61 Pac. 428; Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra; Cascaden v. Bartolis, 146 Fed. 739; Lange v. Robinson, supra; Castle v. Womble, 19 Land Dec. 455; Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532.

The question of a valid discovery of a mining claim does not depend upon whether or not the facts are such as would cause a practical miner to feel justified in developing the claim, but upon the existence or non-existence of the required metal-bearing rock. McShane v. Kenkle, supra.

The finding of ore or metalliferous rock in place in a defined vein is sufficient although it does not contain ore in paying quantities. Muldrick v. Brown, supra; Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Mahler, 4 Morrison, Min. Rep. 390.

And it is not necessary that it should appear that for labor and capital expended in working the ground it would yield a reasonable profit. Cascaden v. Bartolis and Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra.

And that seams containing mineral-bearing earth and rock, which were discovered before the location was made, were similar in character to the seams or veins of mineral matter which had induced other miners to locate claims in the same district, which, by continued development, had led to a well-defined lode or vein containing ore of great value, sufficiently complies with the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424 requiring a discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of the claim before a valid location thereof could be made. Shoshone Min. Co. v. Rutter, 31 C. C. A. 223, 59 U. S. App. 538, 87 Fed. 801.

To constitute a good discovery, however, a belt or zone must bear some of the minerals or valuable deposits mentioned in the mineral laws. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787.

Mere indications of the presence of minerals are not sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute. Charlton v. Kelly, supra.

There must be something more than a mere guess on the part of the miner, such as the discovery of precious metals in it, or in such close proximity to it as to justify a reasonable belief in their existence. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560. Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860; Waterloo Min. Co. v. Doe, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Nor is mere willingness on the part of the prospector to further expend his labor and means sufficient. The question should not be left to the arbitrary will of the locator. Willingness, unless evidenced by actual exploitation, could not be satisfactorily proved. Charlton v. Kelly, supra.

And the term "lode," as used in the acts of Congress, does not include a bed of gravel from which particles of gold may be washed. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401.

So, the question whether, prior to the date of the location of a mining claim, the locators had made such a discovery of gold thereon as entitled them to locate the land, should be decided not only with reference to the gold actually found within the limits of the claim located, but also in view of its situation with reference to other lands known to contain valuable deposits of placer gold, and whether its rock and soil formation is such as is usually found where these deposits exist in paying quantities. Lange v. Robinson, 148 Fed. 790.

And an actual discovery of gold upon a claim located, and the fact that the claim was situated near other lands presenting the same surface indications, which at the date of the location of the junior claim were known to be valuable for placer gold which they contained, constitute sufficient discovery of gold upon the lands in controversy to entitle the locator to make a valid location of the same as a placer-mining claim. Ibid.

And in such a case, where the location was made in good faith, it cannot be held to be invalid upon the ground that the claim was prospectively valueless, and that the lauds were not mineral lands, and the locator had no right to locate or explore them. Lorenz v. Waldron, 96 Cal. 243, 31 Pac. 54.

Nor does the fact that other matters than the existence of deposits of valuable mineral entered into the estimate of the worth of a mining claim invalidate it; and the existence of a valuable growth of timber on the land does not affect the applicant's claim to a patent therefor. United States v. Iron Silver Min. Co. 128 U. S. 673, 32 L. ed. 571, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195.

d. The apex with reference to discovery and holding surface.

The possession of a vein recognized and protected by the mining laws is that of one who holds the surface where the vein makes its apex. Eilers v. Boatman, 3 Utah, 159, 2 Pac. 66.

And the top or apex of a vein for the purpose of discovery and possession, within the meaning of the mining laws, is the highest point, or end, or edge where it approaches nearest to the surface of earth. Stevens v. Williams, 1 McCrary, 480, Fed. Cas. Nos. 13,413 and 13,414; Iron Mine v. Loella Mine, 2 McCrary, 121, 3 Fed. 368.

And this is so without regard to the depth from the surface at which it may be found.

If found at any depth, and the locator can define on the surface the area which will inclose it, he can hold it by location. Iron Mine v. Loella Mine, supra.

So, for the purposes of exploration, discovery, and purchase under the mining laws, the legal apex of a vein, in a case in which the actual apex is within a placer claim, and the United States has dealt with and disposed of the placer, is that portion of the vein within the public lands which would constitute its actual apex if the vein had no actual existence in the ground so disposed of. Woods v. Holden, 26 Land Dec. 198.

And, where a claim is located upon a broad horizontal or blanket lode covering the entire area within the limits of the side and end lines of the location, the apex of the lode must be regarded as coextensive with the distance between the side lines of the location and every part or point of such apex within these limits is as much the middle of the vein, within the intent and meaning of the mining laws with reference to discovery, as any other part, and the loss of the original point of discovery, by its inclusion in some other mineral claim, is immaterial as affecting the validity of the location. Re Homestake Min. Co. 29 Land Dec. 689.

Nor is the apex of a vein upon which a claim may be located necessarily a point. It is often a line of great length; and the disclosure of any portion of the apex on the course or strike of the vein, found within the limits of a claim, constitutes a sufficient discovery to enable the locator to obtain title. Larkin v. Upton, 144 U. S. 19, 36 L. ed. 330, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, Affirming 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

But the dip or apex of a vein should be broken on its edge, so as to appear to be the beginning or end of a vein; if a vein at its highest point turns over and pursues its course downward, then such point is simply a swell in the mineral matter, and not a true apex. Stevens v. Williams, supra.

And a location of a mining claim based upon discovery on the dip or downward course of a vein or lode, whose top or apex lies inside the vertical lines of a prior subsisting valid location, is wholly illegal and void; and a charge that a location is so based imposes on the Land Department the duty to determine the question before the issuance of a patent. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Shoshone Min. Co. 33 Land Dec. 142.

In Iron Mine v. Loella Mine, 2 McCrary, 121, 3 Fed. 368, however, it was suggested that a location made on a dip of a vein would be valid as against a location of a later date, made higher up; and that, if a location is made upon the dip of a vein, the locator may pursue it in the downward course though he may not in the upward course, and he may hold the whole which lies within his location below it as against any person locating subsequently on a higher point in the same vein; but the case was decided upon other grounds.

the same vein within the boundaries of two claims, the one first located carries with it the right to work the vein. Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co. 122 U. S. 478, 30 L. ed. 1140, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1356.

What constitutes the top or apex of a vein is a question of law. Illinois Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Raff, 7 N. M. 330, 34 Pac. 544.

But its existence is a question of fact, to be passed upon in each case as it arises, under the law applicable to the state of facts as established. Ibid.; Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Largey, 49 Fed. 289.

And it does not involve a Federal question within the meaning of the removal-of-causes act. Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Largey, supra.

e. By whom made.

It is not necessary under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424, providing that no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of the claim located, that the locator of a mining claim should be the first discoverer in order to make the location valid; if it appears that the locator knew at the time of making his location that there had been a discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of his location, he may base his location upon it. McMillen v. Ferrum Min. Co. 32 Colo. 38, 105 Am. St. Rep. 64, 74 Pac. 461; Hayes v. Lavagnino, 17 Utah. 185, 53 Pac. 1029; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

It makes no difference who made the first discovery so long as it was in fact made by the first locator before his location. Willeford v. Bell (Cal.) 49 Pac. 6.

And, while a discovery is necessary to entitle a claimant to make a valid location of a mining claim, the locator need not do the actual manual labor of exposing the gold; he may, and usually does, employ others to do the work for him, and it may be done in his absence, or even without his knowledge. Russell v. Dufresne, 1 Alaska, 486.

To sustain a location of a mining claim based on a discovery made by another, however, the locator must not only have knowledge of the former discovery, but such discovery must be adopted and claimed by him. Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. 98 Fed. 673; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. and McMillen v. Ferrum Min. Co. supra.

And he must base his location upon it. McMillen v. Ferrum Min. Co. supra.

Under the early Spanish and Mexican laws, however, a new discovery could not be made on a vein known and worked in other places. United States v. Castellero, 2 Black, 17, 17 L. ed. 360.

f. Time of making.

While there can be no location of a mining claim before the discovery of a vein on unappropriated public land, the order in which the acts requisite to a location are done is immaterial provided they are completed before the rights of others intervene. Perigo v. Erwin, 85 Fed. 904; Heman v. Griffith, 1 Alaska, 264; Healey v. Rupp (Colo.) 86 Pac. 1015; Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. 60 C. C. A. 155, 123 Fed. 209; Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Mahler, 4 Morrison Min. Rep. 390; DWINNELL v. DYER.

And a location of a mining claim is not invalid because the location was made before the discovery; the marking of the boundaries of the claim may precede the discovery, or the discovery may precede the marking; if both are completed before the rights of others intervene, the earlier act will inure to the benefit of the locator as of the date of the later one. Erwin v. Perego, 35 C. C. A. 482, 93 Fed. 608, Affirming 85 Fed. 904; Uinta Tunnel Min. & Transp. Co. v. Ajax Gold Min. Co. 73 C. C. A. 35, 141 Fed. 563; Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444; Cedar Canyon Consol. Min. Co. v. Yarwood, 27 Wash. 271, 91 Am. St. Rep. 841, 67 Pac. 749; Re Mitchell, 2 Land Dec. 752; SHARKEY v. CANDIANI; Redden v. Harlan, 2 Alaska, 402.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, providing that no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of the vein or lode within the limits of the claim located, means nothing more than that no location shall be considered complete until there has been a discovery; and a discovery of a vein or lode before any other steps are taken to perfect a location is not thereby required. Creede & C. C. Min. & Mill. Co. v. Uinta Tunnel Min. & Transp. Co. 196 U. S. 337, 49 L. ed. 501, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 266.

And where a location is properly made and marked on the ground, and notice thereof properly posted; and it is followed by actual possession of the ground by those claiming it; and a subsequent discovery of mineral within its limits is made,—the requirements of the mining laws in respect to the location are sufficiently complied with, where no rights of any third persons intervened before the discovery. Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. 98 Fed. 673.

A location of a mining claim without a discovery is made valid by the subsequent discovery of a vein or lode within it, when made before any rights are acquired in the same claim by others. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; Brewster v. Shoemaker, 28 Colo. 176, 53 L.R.A. 793, 89 Am. St. Rep. 188, 63 Pac. 309; Re Mitchell, supra; Reins v. Raunheim, 28 Land Dec. 526.

And in such case the location inures to the benefit of the locator, and his possessory rights become complete as of the date of such discovery. Healey v. Rupp and Cedar Canyon Consol. Min. Co. v. Yarwood, supra.

And where a mining claim is located without discovery, and is afterwards located by another person without discovery, after which the first locator makes a discovery and completes his location, the first locator has the better title. Barnette v. Freeman, 2 Alaska, 286.

The validity of location of a mining claim depends primarily, however, upon the discovery of a vein or lode within its limits; and the location is valid from the time of the discovery only. Beals v. Cone, 27 Colo. 473, 83 Am. St. Rep. 92, 62 Pac. 948; McPherson v. Julius, 17 S. D. 98, 95 N. W. 428; Redden v. Harlan, supra.

While a previous location may be made valid by a subsequent discovery of mineral there can be no valid claim to the land, and it must be treated as government land up to the time of such discovery. Tuolumne Consol. Min. Co. v. Maier, 134 Cal. 583, 66 Pac. 863.

And a prior locator of a mining claim without a discovery acquires no right as against a subsequent locator who first makes a discovery upon the ground in controversy. Crossman v. Pendery, 2 McCrary, 139, 8 Fed. 693; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522.

And where an attempted location was made, but there was no discovery of mineral for about two years, after which a relocation was made and a certificate filed, the original location certificate is not competent evidence on an issue as to the right to the claim. Beals v. Cone, supra.

Montana, however, has adopted the contrary rule, that a location void at the time it is made because of no discovery, or because the discovery was made on a claim already located and patented, continues and remains void, and is not cured or made effectual by subsequent discovery on the claim located. Upton v. Larkin, 5 Mont. 600, 6 Pac. 66; Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

And under that rule evidence as to the width and richness of the vein discovered, as shown by work subsequent to discovery, is incompetent. Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

g. Place of.

1. Generally.

To support the location of a mining claim, there must have been a discovery of a vein or lode on unoccupied and unappropriated mineral lands of the United States. Lockhart v. Farrell (Utah) 86 Pac. 1077; Upton v. Larkin, 5 Mont. 600, 6 Pac. 66; Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Mahler, 4 Morrison Min. Rep. 390.

And it must have been upon land open to exploration. Re Winter Lode, 22 Land Dec. 362.

And, where a lode mining claim is partly embraced within the limits of a town site, to sustain an entry for a patent thereon the claimant must duly show the discovery of mineral upon the ground embraced within the location outside of the town site. Re Laney, 9 Land Dec. 83.

Nor can a valid location of a mining claim be made until the discovery of a vein or lode, or other mineral, within the limits of the claim located. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; Tuolumne Consol. Min. Co. v. Maier, supra; Michael v. Mills, 22 Colo. 439, 45 Pac. 429; Upton v. Larkin, 5 Mont. 600, 6 Pac. 66; Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Mahler, supra; Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Shoshone Min. Co. 33 Land Dec. 142; Waterloo Min. Co. v. Doe, 17 Land Dec. 111.

The top or apex of the vein must be within the boundaries of the claim in order to enable the locator to perfect his location and obtain title. Larkin v. Upton, 144 U. S. 19, 36 L. ed. 330, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, Affirming 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

The lode is the principal thing in a mining location, and the surface ground is incident thereto; and a person making a location not embracing the lode he seeks to secure cannot be heard to complain that others have explored and occupied adjacent territory and discovered therein a lode which might have been embraced in his location. Wolfley v. Lebanon Min. Co. 4 Colo. 112.

And the exclusion of that portion of the claim which contains the discovery shaft renders it incumbent upon the locator applying for a patent to show the existence of mineral within the remainder of the claim, prior to the allowance of entry thereof. Re Cayuga Lode, 5 Land Dec. 703.

So, the central idea of a mining location under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 26, 1866, was that there must be a discovered lode within it, whose locus in its onward course or strike is embraced by its boundaries. Wolfley v. Lebanon Min. Co. supra.

The fact that only a portion of a discovery is within a claim sought to be located, however, and the rest of it is in another claim, does not invalidate the discovery and location. Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

In the above case, Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 45, 29 L. ed. 348, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1110, supra, V. a, 2, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the discovery relied upon was entirely within the boundaries of a claim that was patented after the location in question.

And a locator cannot follow a vein beyond his end lines; and beyond such end lines it is subject to further discovery and appropriation. Larkin v. Upton, 144 U. S. 20, 36 L. ed. 330, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614.

So, any discovery will meet the requirements of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424, providing that no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of the claim located, provided it is made before location and within its boundaries; and location need not be based upon and confined to what is found in the discovery shaft adopted and claimed as such. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302.

And that the discovery and improvements of a mining location were upon ground specified in the public notice of application for a patent is not a good ground for objection, where, in adverse judicial proceedings, the ground so excluded has been awarded to the plaintiff. Re Stranger Lode, 28 Land Dec. 322.

2. Effect of discovery upon another claim.

A location of a mining claim based upon a discovery made within the limits of another existing valid location is void. Tuolumne Consol. Min. Co. v. Maier, 134 Cal. 583, 66 Pac. 863; Sierra Blanca Min. & Reduction Co. v. Winchell (Colo.) 83 Pac. 628; Sullivan v. Sharp, 33 Colo. 348, 80 Pac. 1054; Lockhart v. Farrell (Utah) 86 Pac. 1077; Watson v. Mayberry, 15 Utah, 265, 49 Pac. 479; Gwillim v. Donnellan, supra; Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Mahler, supra; Branagan v. Dulaney, 2 Land Dec. 744; Hibsche v. Gildersleeve, 8 Copp, Land Owner, 66, Mineral Law Dig. 107.

And a second discovery within the limits of a legal location does not affect the rights of the first locator. Hibsche v. Gildersleeve, 8 Copp, Land Owner, 65, Mineral Law Dig. 34.

Nor is the discovery of a lode within the limits of a prior patented lode claim of any effect, and it will not support a mineral entry. Re Williams, 20 Land Dec. 458.

So, a discovery within the boundaries of a mining claim will not authorize or support a location of another claim outside of such boundaries. Upton v. Larkin, 5 Mont. 600, 6 Pac. 66; McPherson v. Julius, 17 S. D. 98, 95 N. W. 428.

And a valid location cannot be made by the discovery of a vein upon an adjoining location, though the vein, if maintaining the same strike as at the point of discovery, would pass into the claim attempted to be located. Michael v. Mills, 22 Colo. 439, 45 Pac. 429.

Nor can the same discovery point be used for the location of two or more mining claims; a single discovery, though made by more than one person, must be treated as an entirety. Reynolds v. Pascoe, 24 Utah, 219, 66 Pac. 1064; Re Poplar Creek Consol. Quartz Mine, 16 Land Dec. 1.

And one discovery of mineral by two persons cannot be used as the basis of two locations, one by each discoverer, having a common end line that bisects the discovery shaft. Re Poplar Creek Consol. Quartz Mine, supra.

In the above case, Larkin v. Upton, 144 U. S. 20, 36 L. ed. 330, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, supra, VII. g, 1, was distinguished upon the ground that there were two adjoining claims, and each owner asserted that the discovery was made on his site, while in the case at bar no discovery had been made in either location, except in one shaft; and it is not a question as to which is entitled to the benefit of the discovery, but as to whether two locators, by combining, may initiate two claims.

So, where a junior claim is located across a senior claim, it is invalid where the only mineral found within the limits of the junior claim is also within the limits of the senior claim. Reynolds v. Pascoe, supra.

In such case the entire claim based upon the discovery is void, and all of the location without the boundaries of the prior location remains unappropriated public lands subject to location; and the locator of the invalid claim has the right to discover a lode and locate a claim upon that portion of his former claim which remained unappropriated, as well as any other locator. Erwin v. Perego, 35 C. C. A. 482, 93 Fed. 608, Affirming 85 Fed. 904.

And instructions in an action involving the validity of a location of a mining claim, based upon the theory that the defendant had located two claims upon the same discovery, placing the burden of proof on the plaintiff to show which of the two locations was invalid, and which part of the ground was subject to relocation, were improper. McKinstry v. Clark, 4 Mont. 370, 1 Pac. 759.

Nor is a location of a mining claim upon ground then covered by a valid subsisting mining claim void only as to the subsisting claim. It is void ab initio as to the whole world, and the subsequent forfeiture of the subsisting claim does not inure to the benefit of the junior locator, or in any way validate his claim; and it remains void as against a subsequent locator conforming to the statutory rules and requirements. Lockhart v. Farrell, supra.

In the above case, Lavagnino v. Uhlig, 198 U. S. 443, 49 L. ed. 1119, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 716, supra, V, a, 3, (b), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the court dealt with the question of a mere conflict of area, a case of overlapping claims between a senior and a junior location, predicated on the hypothesis that both were valid.

And where a person located a mining claim conflicting with a senior claim, and the discovery monument of both claims was at the intersection of the veins in each about 10 feet apart, and the discovery point of the junior claim was at the same blow-out where the discovery was made on the senior, and both discoveries were upon the same mineral and within the lines of the senior claim; and afterwards another locator located a third claim which crossed them both,—the third claim is good as against the second, since the second is invalid because the same discovery point was used for the location of the first and the second. Reynolds v. Pascoe, 24 Utah, 219, 66 Pac. 1064.

Where the location of a mining claim is attacked on the ground that the discovery was made on ground previously appropriated for mining purposes, however, the locator should be permitted to prove the invalidity of the alleged previous location. Crown Point Min. Co. v. Buck, 38 C. C. A. 278, 97 Fed. 463.

And two overlapping mining claims located and held by the same person, resting on separate discoveries of parallel veins, are 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sufficient to sustain an entry for a patent, notwithstanding the fact that the discovery forming the basis of one of the locations was made within the other, the earlier one, where the overlap is excluded from the earlier location; the later location being treated in such case as an abandonment of the earlier one to the extent of the overlap. Re Golden Link Min. Leasing & Bonding Co. 29 Land Dec. 384.

So, the action of the senior locator of a mining claim, of permitting a junior adverse applicant to include in his claim the land embracing the discovery on which the senior claim rests, under an agreement that the land in conflict will be deeded to the holder of such claim on his securing title thereto, does not work such a loss of the discovery on the part of the senior locator as will defeat his entire location, where the agreement was carried into effect, and the senior locator was at all times in possession of the grant in question, and the discovery and improvements were not made the basis on which patent was secured under the junior location. Re Duxie Lode, 27 Land Dec. 88.

And an instruction that a discovery within the limits of the claim located, of a vein or crevice of quartz or ore, with at least one well-defined wall on the lead, lode, or ledge of rock in place, containing gold, silver, or other valuable mineral deposits, is necessary to make a valid location, is not subject to the objection that the jury are thereby led to suppose that the original discovery would be sufficient, though it was upon ground which was afterwards patented to others, where the jury were also instructed that, although one may discover a vein within the limits of the ground claimed, yet, if the top or apex of such vein lies without his claim, he will acquire no title thereto. Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

Nor is the validity of a properly located mining claim affected by the fact that after such location part of it, including the discovery, was transferred to other parties; and such a transfer does not defeat the right of the locators to hold the portions not disposed of. Little Pittsburgh Consol. Min. Co. v. Amie Min. Co. 5 McCrary, 298, 17 Fed. 57.

And a location of a mining claim is not open to the objection that it is invalid because the discovery of ore was made by the locator while he was working in another mine, and that the same discovery cannot be used for two locations, and that a location cannot be based upon a discovery made within the limits of another existing and valid location, where the evidence as to the discovery is not confined to what the locator found in the supposed limits of an existing mine, but shows that he found quartz at different points, outside the tunnel in which he was mining. Reiner v. Schroeder, 146 Cal. 411, 80 Pac. 517.

3. Shifting discovery point.

While the location of a mining claim based exclusively upon the discovery of mineral within the limits of another existing and valid location is void, where the two claims are not identical this fact would not vitiate the entire location, where mineral was found, and the discovery thereof made, within the undisputed limits of the conflicting location within the time allowed the locator thereof to perfect his location, and before conflicting rights of third parties attached; and in such case the claim is good as to land not conflicting with the first location, as against a subsequent conflicting locator. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonspah Min. Co. 125 Fed. 408.

And where two mining locations conflict, and the discovery of the junior location is in the conflicting area; but the junior locator afterwards discovers a vein upon that portion of his location which is exclusive of the senior location,—the staking, recording, and improving thereof will inure to his benefit, and the validity of the junior location will date from the time of such discovery. Golden Terra Min. Co. v. Mahler, 4 Morrison Min. Rep. 390.

So, where a senior locator of a mining claim permits a junior location, including within its surface boundaries his original discovery, to go to patent without protest; but before such patent he makes a new discovery on his prior location without the boundaries of the junior location as patented, but within the surface boundary of his prior location as originally located, and prosecutes development work thereon in good faith,—his claim is valid, and includes all the grounds not included in the patent of the junior location, notwithstanding the loss of the original discovery. Silver City Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Lowry, 19 Utah, 334, 57 Pac. 11; Perigo v. Erwin, 85 Fed. 904.

And this is so though there was no notice of the new location, the location being complete as of the date of the second location. Perigo v. Erwin, supra.

So, where a mining claim is located with the point of discovery within another valid claim, the locator can treat his location as absolutely void, and make another location, placing his discovery upon a point where there is valuable mineral on ground subject to location. Watson v. Mayberry, 15 Utah, 265, 49 Pac. 479.

But where a locator of a mining claim placed the discovery point within another valid claim, and afterwards made another location placing his discovery at a point where there was valuable mineral outside of the other claim, to prevail over a junior conflicting discovery, his shifting of the point of discovery must have been made before the making of the junior location. Ibid.

h. Determination as to existence and discovery of ore.

Whether there is a vein or lode within the boundaries of a mining location is a question of fact for the determination of a jury from the evidence, under definitions and instructions given by the court. Meydenbauer v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Steves, 78 Fed. 787; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

And it is one arising under the laws of the United States, to try which a Federal court has jurisdiction. Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Miller, 97 Fed. 681.

So, whether the locator actually found mineral on or in the ground claimed is one for the jury. Charlton v. Kelly. 2 Alaska, 532.

And whether a vein, lode, or ledge is such a one as is referred to in the mineral acts of Congress is a question of fact, and not of law, and is to be determined from the use of those terms among practical miners. Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Largey, 49 Fed. 289; Charlton v. Kelly, supra.

But the decision thereof involves no Federal question within the meaning of the removal-of-causes acts. Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Largey, supra.

So, to sustain a lode-mining claim the evidence of discovery must show the place where and time when such discovery was made; the general direction of the lode or vein, and all the material facts in relation thereto, must be clear and positive and based on actual knowledge of the facts, and the witnesses' means of information must be clearly set forth. Re Silver Jennie Lode, 7 Land Dec. 6.

And a person claiming title to a mining location, based upon prior discovery and the performance of all the acts required to make and maintain a valid location thereon, as against one who had performed all the acts necessary to a valid location on his part, has the burden of proving his prior discovery; thus establishing that the ground was not unappropriated land of the government when the other's claim was initiated. Sands v. Cruikshank, 15 S. D. 142, 87 N. W. 589.

Evidence tending to establish a senior locator's discovery will be viewed in the most favorable light which it will reasonably justify, however, as between a prior and a subsequent locator of the same ground as a lode claim. Ambergis Min. Co. v. Day (Idaho) 85 Pac. 109.

And evidence that the locators of a mining claim were first on the ground, and tending to show an outcropping of mineralized rock in place thereon, and of work done by them to determine where to locate their discovery shafts, and that notices were posted, and a lode of mineral in place was discovered, and that the veins were apparent on the surface in places, and could be traced on the surface in places by outcroppings, is sufficient to establish a discovery, as against a person relying upon a conflicting location. Columbia Copper Min. Co. v. Dutchess Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. 13 Wyo. 244, 79 Pac. 385.

So, evidence that there was an outcropping which probably carried value; and that a person attempting to locate a mining claim intended to base his claim of a discovery upon such outcropping; and that both of the two rival claimants sought to hold the ground in controversy under the same claim of discovery at the same point,—is sufficient to go to the jury on that question. Fox v. Myers (Nev.) 86 Pac. 793.

Nor is evidence of the actual existence of a gold-bearing lode upon a location; and that previous to the location the locator had done a great deal of work on it, and had sunk a shaft 25 or 30 feet deep, and had taken from it a considerable amount of quartz rock, which formed a dump,—insufficient to sustain a finding of a discovery before the location. Conway v. Hart, 129 Cal. 483, 62 Pac. 44.

And a verdict upholding a location of a mining claim is sufficiently supported by the testimony of one witness describing the courses and stating that a discovery of gold was made on the claim before location, in the absence of anything tending to show the contrary. Moore v. Steelsmith, 1 Alaska, 121.

Nor can a negative finding that a discovery was not made upon a specified date be upheld as against uncontradicted evidence of the locator, corroborated by several witnesses, that he had sunk a shaft on the ground to a proper depth, and that on that day he discovered a lead about 14 inches wide in the bottom of the shaft, carrying silver, lead, and iron, and that there was a foot wall, and that he afterwards sunk 4 feet in the clear on the lead. Walsh v. Mueller, 16 Mont. 180, 40 Pac. 292.

But evidence of indications and conditions found in a particular mining property, which led up to a rich ore body over which a litigant has absolute control and from which he may exclude every other person, is not competent for comparison on the question whether or not a valid mineral discovery has been made, unless such litigant permits his adversary to examine and inspect such property for the purpose of introducing rebuttal evidence, if he so desires. Ambergris Min. Co. v. Day (Idaho) 85 Pac. 109.

And where the existence of mineral in a discovery shaft is sought to be shown, and, to meet the evidence, samples from the shaft, claimed to contain no mineral matter, are introduced, this evidence cannot be rebutted by other samples from the shaft containing mineral. Beals v. Cone, 27 Colo. 473, 83 Am. St. Rep. 92, 62 Pac. 948.

So, the issuance of a patent for a mining claim is conclusive as to the proper making of the location, including discovery of a lode. Garson City Gold & S. Min. Co. v. North Star Min. Co. 28 C. C. A. 333, 48 U. S. App. 724, 83 Fed. 658.

Due discovery of mineral, being a condition to the right of possession of a mining claim, is necessarily in issue in adverse proceedings brought to determine such right; and a judgment in such proceedings presupposes a finding upon that issue favorable to the claimant declared to have the right of possession; and this may be accepted by the department as against a subsequent allegation of nondiscovery on the part of a conflicting claimant. Reins v. Raunheim, 28 Land Dec. 526.

ent for a mining claim, alleging the absence of a valid discovery upon the part of the applicant, and that consequently the location is void, is unavailing, and presents no sufficient ground for action, where, prior thereto, by final judicial determination in adverse proceedings, the land embracing the claimed discovery of the plaintiff was awarded to him. Re Hallett & Hamburg Lodes, 27 Land Dec. 104.

And a claimant of a lode in placer ground is not entitled to attack the placer location on the ground that no discovery of any valuable mineral placer deposit was ever made upon the placer-mining claim, and that the same did not contain any valuable placer mineral deposit, where the entry of the placer claim was regularly allowed on satisfactory proof, and had been sustained in the courts, and it was not claimed that the existence of any veins or lodes claimed by the lode locator was known at the time of the placer application, and the location of the lode claim was made many years after the allowance of the placer entry. Meaderville Min. & Mill. Co. v. Raunheim, 29 Land Dec. 465.

So, where land has been located as a mining claim, it will be presumed that the locators complied with the law, and made a discovery of mineral prior to location. Northern P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 17 Land Dec. 545; Tam v. Story, 21 Land Dec. 440; Fox v. Myers (Nev.) 86 Pac. 793; Vogel v. Warsing, 146 Fed. 949.

And this presumption is particularly applicable in a summary proceeding instituted at the beginning of a suit, where the granting or the withholding of an injunction depends upon facts presented by evidence, and where a subsequent locator attacks the title of a prior locator, or that of his successor in interest. Vogel v. Warsing, supra.

And every reasonable presumption should be indulged in favor of a discovery of a lode by the locator of a mining claim after the claim has stood unchallenged for years, and work of importance has been prosecuted thereon at various points, and the claim has been transferred to an innocent purchaser. Cheesman v. Hart, 42 Fed. 98; Vogel v. Warsing, supra.

And where the original locators of a mine affirmed under oath that they discovered a vein, persons undertaking to show, a long time afterwards, by witnesses sent to the old openings to obtain evidence by inspection, that no vein was in fact found, must sustain such an attack by evidence so clear and persuasive as fully to satisfy the jury that the claimed discoveries were in fact false. Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787.

So, whether or not there was such a vein or indication as a miner would be likely to follow with reasonable expectation of finding ore, which would warrant the location of a mining claim, may be proved by the opinions of practical, experienced miners. Harrington v. Chambers, 3 Utah, 94, 1 Pac. 362.

And such opinions, offered in evidence on an issue as to the validity of a mining location, are not subject to the objection that the witnesses are thereby required to state what the opinion of other miners would be. Ibid.

And the testimony of an assayer as to the result of assays of rock taken from a mining claim is competent as tending to prove a discovery of a vein, though the rock was taken long after the date of the location. Southern Cross Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Europa Min. Co. 15 Nev. 383.

But negative evidence of a large number of witnesses, that there was no vein in a discovery shaft at the time of the discovery of a mining claim, and that, if there had been, the witnesses would have seen it, and that the discovery shaft was in the top rock, and not in rock in place, is sufficient to support a finding of no discovery within the boundaries of the claim, as against the testimony of the locator and his witnesses that there was quartz in place in the discovery, and in a cut connecting therewith run after the location, and that of two witnesses, that they had assayed some quartz within the discovery and found silver. Ormund v. Granite Mountain Min. Co. 11 Mont. 303, 28 Pac. 289.

And the bare assertion of witnesses that a discovery had been made upon a claim, and that a vein extended into it, is not sufficient to establish such discovery, where a witness testified that the vein did not crop out on the surface, and the fact that it extends through the location cannot be determined without a great deal of additional development and large cost. Re Silver Jennie Lode, 7 Land Dec. 6.

Nor is proof of discovery confined to the discovery point; and testimony tending to show that there were also indications of ore or vein matter at other points on the surface of a mining claim may be given on issue as to the validity of a mining location, for the purpose of showing the continuity of the vein at the discovery point. Harrington v. Chambers, 3 Utah, 94, 1 Pac. 362.

And for the purpose of strengthening testimony already in with reference to the indications at the point of discovery. Ibid.

And evidence of indications which miners had successfully followed in the same district and on contiguous ground in attempting to find a lode or mineral deposit is admissible in determining whether or not a valid mineral discovery had been made by one who attempted to locate a lode claim on similar indications and showing upon adjacent ground. Ambergis Min. Co. v. Day (Idaho) 85 Pac. 109.

1. Discovery in placer mining.

1. Generally.

Appropriate discovery is as necessary to the location of a placer-mining claim as to the location of a lode claim. Steele v. Tanana Mines R. Co. 148 Fed. 678; Barnette v. Freeman, 2 Alaska. 286.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1901, p. 1424, specifically providing that no location shall be made until the discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of the claim located, is applicable to placer claims, and to land containing petroleum and other oils. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. 13 Okla. 425, 73 Pac. 936.

And the rule adopted by the earlier cases was that, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2331, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1432, providing that no placer location shall include more than 20 acres for each individual claimant, construed in connection with § 2329 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1432), thereof, providing that placers shall be subject to entry and patent under like circumstances and conditions, and under similar proceedings, as are provided for vein or lode claims, and § 2320 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), thereof, providing that no location of a mining claim shall be made until a discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of the claim located, there must be a discovery of mineral on each 20 acres, on a placer location of 160 acres, made by an association; and such a location, based upon a single discovery, is void except as to the 20 acres immediately surrounding the discovery. Ferrell v. Hoge, 18 Land Dec. 81; Re Louise Min. Co. 22 Land Dec. 663; Re Union Oil Co. 23 Land Dec. 222.

Where, however, under the rules of the Land Office in force at the time of the location of a placer-mining claim of 160 acres by an association, a single discovery was considered sufficient, and a patent is asked for on such a location based on a single discovery, opportunity should be given the locators for a further showing. Ferrell v. Hoge, 19 Land Dec. 568.

And the more modern and now existing rule is that a placer location, if made by an association of persons, may include 160 acres, and, whatever its area, it is but a single location, and but one discovery of minerals within its limits is required preceding its location. Re Union Oil Co. 25 Land Dec. 351, Overruling Ferrell v. Hoge, 18 Land Dec. 81, 29 Land Dec. 12; Reins v. Raunheim, 28 Land Dec. 526; Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444; McDonald v. Montana Wood Co. 14 Mont. 88, 43 Am. St. Rep. 616, 35 Pac. 668.

Under this rule, but one discovery of mineral is required to support a placer location, whether it is one of 20 acres by an individual, or one of 160 acres or less by an association of persons. Ferrell v. Hoge, 27 Land Dec. 129.

And a discovery, either single or on each 20 acres as the case may be, may, in the absence of any claim or evidence to the contrary, be treated as sufficiently establishing the mineral character of the entire claim to justify the patenting thereof. Ferrell v. Hoge, 29 Land Dec. 12.

And serves to except the whole location from selection as indemnity for deficit of school lands under the congressional grant of such lands. Quigley v. California, 24 Land Dec. 507.

But a single discovery upon which a placer-mining claim is based does not conclusively establish the mineral character of all the land included in the claim, so as to preclude further inquiry in respect thereto; the entire area that may be taken as a placer claim cannot be acquired as appurtenant to placer deposits which are shown to exist only in a portion thereof. Ferrell v. Hoge, 29 Land Dec. 12.

So, as in the case of lode-vein claims, the validity of the location of a placer mine is not dependent upon actual discovery of valuable minerals in the land previous to the location. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401.

And where a location of a mining claim has been made by associates, such associates have a right or title which they can convey before the location is perfected by discovery; and a conveyance, or attempted conveyance, by such associates to one of their number, does not work a destruction of the whole location. Miller v. Chrisman, supra.

2. For petroleum or mineral oil.

The rule that a discovery within the limits of land located is a condition precedent to the valid location of a mining claim applies to placer mining for petroleum or mineral oils. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. and Miller v. Chrisman, supra; Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Miller, 97 Fed. 681; Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. 98 Fed. 673.

And the location as an oil placer-mining claim of public lands upon which no discovery of oil has been made is invalid, and confers no rights upon the locator as against the United States, or as against a person purchasing from the United States, prior to a discovery. Olive Land & Development Co. v. Olmstead, 103 Fed. 568.

A mining claimant is not permitted to make a location for the purpose of speculation, or of prospecting for oils. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. supra.

The vein or deposit from which the oil is drawn must be discovered before the location can be completed. Ibid.

The mere fact that other lands in the vicinity contain oil does not establish the character of the lands as mineral lands where such lands were returned as agricultural. Roberts v. Jepson, 4 Land Dec. 60.

And it has been asserted that mere surface indications of mineral oils do not constitute a discovery upon which a valid location may be based. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. 13 Okla. 425, 73 Pac. 936; Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. supra.

So, in Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444, it was said that while, perhaps, it would be stating it too broadly to say that no case could be imagined where a surface discovery could be made of oil sufficient to fill the requirements of the statute, yet it is certainly true that no such case has ever 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

been presented to our attention, and that in the nature of things such case will seldom, if ever, occur.

And it was held in that case that evidence that a prospector walked over the land in question at the time he posted his notice, and saw a spring with oil coming out and floating over the water in the summer time when it was hot, and that it was dripping over the rock, but there was no pool, is not sufficient to establish a discovery, within the meaning of the law with reference to location of mining claims; and that the act of one knowing that, at the time of his alleged discovery of oil, another was in possession of the territory where it was discovered, of entering upon the land and locating a claim at night, adopting existing boundaries, his discovery consisting in observing the oil from the occupant's well, cannot be made the basis of any right.

The rule is announced in a late case, however, that, if surface indications of oil are found sufficient to warrant a prospector in spending his time and money on the property with reasonable prospect of reaching deposits of greater commercial value, such indications will protect the prospector as against any new locator until he can follow up his indications and make the discovery; but the discovery is a condition precedent to a valid location. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. supra.

And if a competent locator of a placer-mining claim finds upon unappropriated public land petroleum, or other mineral, in or upon the ground, and so situated as to constitute a part of it, it is a sufficient discovery to justify a location, without waiting to ascertain by exploration whether the ground contains the mineral in sufficient quantities to pay. Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. supra.

And the question whether a particular piece of public land is more valuable for mineral than for agricultural purposes is one that does not arise in the case of a discovery of petroleum or other mineral in or upon ground upon which it is sought to base the location of a placer-mining claim. Ibid.

VIII. The notice of location.

a. When required.

The Federal mining law does not require the posting of a notice of location upon the claim sought to be located; it leaves this to the regulation of the local laws. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187, 23 Pac. 361; Anderson v. Caughey (Cal. App.) 84 Pac. 223; Willeford v. Bell (Cal.) 49 Pac. 6; Allen v. Dunlap, 24 Or. 229, 33 Pac. 675.

And it is only where the local customs and rules of miners of the district require these steps that they are necessary. Anderson v. Caughey, supra.

And in the absence of mining regulations upon the subject, locations are valid without notice of location, placed on the ground. Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra.

In all, or nearly all, the mining states and territories, however, the posting of a notice of claim upon the ground sought to be taken is required by statute or local regulation. Deeney v. Mineral Creek Mill. Co. 11 N. M. 279, 67 Pac. 724.

And state statutes providing for additional requirements for the location of a mining claim to those required by the acts of Congress in the way of posting location notices are not in violation of the United States Constitution, or of the acts of Congress with reference to the location of mining claims. Mares v. Dillon, 30 Mont. 117, 75 Pac. 963; Upton v. Santa Rita Min. Co. (N. M.) 89 Pac. 275.

And compliance with provisions of this class is essential to the validity of a location. Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787; Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah, 410, 64 Pac. 1019; Upton v. Santa Rita Min. Co. supra.

b. The purpose or object.

One of the main purposes of requirement of posting of notice on the claim is for the guidance and protection of other miners seeking to locate claims. Gird v. California Oil Co. 60 Fed. 531.

The object of putting a notice on a mining claim is that it shall speak for the owner in his absence, and give notice to parties coming on the premises that someone has claimed them. Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816.

And to advise the public with reasonable certainty of the location and extent of the claim. Seidler v. LaFave, 5 N. M. 44, 20 Pac. 794.

And the posting of notice of claim is regarded as the real inception of the right of the locator. Deeney v. Mineral Creek Mill. Co. supra.

It is the first step in acquiring a mining right. Kahn v. Old Teleg. Min. Co. 2 Utah, 174.

A locator erecting his location monument and putting his location notice thereon in effect declares that at that point he has made a discovery; and the fact that a notice was posted at a certain point establishes that at that point the locator claims discovery. Fox v. Myers (Nev.) 86 Pac. 793.

And a simple notice of a discovery, and of the intention to claim the vein discovered, constitutes a protection to the discoverer during the process of location. Sanders v. Noble, 22 Mont. 110, 55 Pac. 1037; Pelican & D. Min. Co. v. Snodgrass, 9 Colo. 339, 12 Pac. 206; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560.

Thus, in Colorado, the law gives a person locating a mining claim, according to the location statutes, possession of his entire claim for the period of ninety days from the date of discovery, provided he posts his discovery notice, and, within sixty days next after posting such notice, he sinks his discovery shaft. Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 581.

And in South Dakota the locator is also given sixty days after disclosing a lode to sink a discovery shaft thereon. Marshall v. Harney Peak Tin Min. Mill. & Mfg. Co. 1 S. D. 350, 47 N. W. 290.

And, under such provisions, a location notice, properly made and posted upon a valid discovery of mineral, is an appropriation of the territory therein specified for a period of sixty days. Sierra Blanca Min. & Reduction Co. v. Winchell (Colo.) 83 Pac. 628; Omar v. Soper, 11 Colo. 380, 7 Am. St. Rep. 246, 18 Pac. 443; Marshall v. Harney Peak Tin Min. Mill. & Mfg. Co. supra.

And this is so though the boundaries of the claim are not marked. Omar v. Soper, supra.

And such notice takes precedence over and invalidates an overlapping claim on the same vein, made within such period, and based on the junior discovery. Ibid.; Marshall v. Harney Peak Tin Min. Mill. & Mfg. Co. supra.

And during that period no one can initiate a title thereto, which would be rendered valid by the mere failure of the first appropriator to perform the necessary discovery work within the time prescribed by law. Sierra Blanca Min. & Reduction Co. v. Winchell, supra.

So, while a notice of location of a mining claim is a mere declaration of intention to possess, it is evidence of possession, though alone it is not sufficient. Thompson v. Lee, 8 Cal. 276, 1 Morrison, Min. Rep. 610.

And it is proper evidence, in connection with a patent to mining lands, to show the claim to which the patent refers. Kahn v. Old Teleg. Min. Co. supra.

c. Posting.

Mining rules and regulations with reference to posting notices of location are to be liberally construed. Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187, 23 Pac. 361.

And a substantial compliance in good faith is sufficient. Donahue v. Meister, 88 Cal. 121, 22 Am. St. Rep. 283, 25 Pac. 1096.

The notice of discovery of a mining claim should be, and usually is, posted immediately at the discovery hole. Sanders v. Noble, 22 Mont. 110, 55 Pac. 1037.

And a recital in a notice of location offered as evidence for the purpose of proving the boundaries of a claim, of a location of 1,500 feet of "this vein or lode of gold-bearing rock," raises an inference that the notice as posted on the ground was placed on the croppings of the lode, or in such close proximity thereto that the croppings appeared or had been exposed. Daggett v. Yreka Min. & Mill. Co. (Cal.) 86 Pac. 968.

But, in order to hold a ledge of mineral, it is not necessary that the notice shall be placed on the ore or on any part of the lode or vein; it is sufficient if the notice is placed in such reasonable proximity and relation to the ledge as, in connection with the work done under it, to give notice to all comers what ledge is intended. Phillpotts v. Blasdel, 8 Nev. 61.

The mining law does not demand a marking of the lode. It is the surface land which is to be marked and described; and a notice of location claiming 1,500 feet "on this vein" is not objectionable because no vein was exposed where the notice was placed. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

And a prior lode claim, in locating which all the Federal and state statutory requirements have been complied with, except a mere failure to place a discovery notice upon the ground at the point of the only valid discovery upon the claim, is good as against another and subsequent valid location, where such notice was posted at the point of a former, but invalid, discovery, as recited in the recorded location certificate, and the boundaries remain the same after as before the true discovery. Treasury Tunnel, Min. & Reduction Co. v. Boss, 32 Colo. 27, 105 Am. Dec. 60, 74 Pac. 888.

Nor is a mining location rendered invalid by the mere fact that the portion of the claim, upon which the notice is posted, by mistake overlaps or conflicts with a pre-existing claim; the location is good as to the area not in conflict. Upton v. Santa Rita Min. Co. (N. M.) 89 Pac. 275.

So, under a requirement by statute or local regulation, of the posting of a notice of claim, and later a record in some form, the locator of a mining claim is entitled to no appreciable time after discovery to determine whether he desires to locate and claim the benefit of his discovery. A discovery and posting notice of the claim must be practically contemporaneous, as against a subsequent appropriator of the same ground entering peaceably. Deeney v. Mineral Creek Mill. Co. 11 N. M. 279, 67 Pac. 724.

But the failure of the locator of a mining claim to comply with the local laws and regulations in the matter of posting location notices and sinking discovery shafts is material only in a proceeding where adverse claimants to the same land are endeavoring to establish the superiority of their respective claims to possession of the ground in conflict. It furnishes no argument for the cancellation of an entry in the absence of an adverse claim legally asserted. Hughes v. Ochsner, 27 Land Dec. 396.

And where a resident of the United States made a mining location and recorded a notice thereof at or near the time, reciting the facts, it will be presumed that he duly posted his notice of claim. Jantzon v. Arizona Copper Co. 3 Ariz. 6, 20 Pac. 93.

So, notice of location of a mining claim, placed in a small tin can and the can placed by the locators on a little shelf in a rock mound, more than 2 feet high, erected by them near a tree on the claim, was sufficiently posted where the corners or the claim were properly and conspicuously marked, and the boundaries were so marked upon the ground that they could be readily traced. Gird v. California Oil Co. 60 Fed. 531.

And a notice of location of a quartz-mining claim conforming to local mining customs is not invalid as not having been conspicuously posted, because it was written on one side of a sheet of paper which was folded with the writing inside, and placed upon a mound of rocks 3 feet high, and upon it were placed two flat rocks, so that about $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch of the margin of the paper was exposed to view, the rest of it being covered by the stones, where the notice was not so placed for the purpose of concealing it, but for the purpose of protecting it from the weather. Donahue v. Meister, 88 Cal. 121, 22 Am. St. Rep. 283, 25 Pac. 1096.

Nor does the fact that a notice of location was recorded before it was posted render it invalid. Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 528, 14 Pac. 182.

And the posting of but one notice of a mining claim when the local regulation required two to be posted does not forfeit all claim to the location, in the absence of an express provision in the regulation of such forfeiture. Emerson v. McWhirter, 133 Cal. 510, 65 Pac. 1036.

1. Generally.

Statutes and mining rules specifying what notices of location shall contain are to be liberally construed, and a substantial compliance therewith is all that is required. Zerres v. Vanina, 134 Fed. 610; Wells v. Davis, 22 Utah, 322, 62 Pac. 3.

So, notices of location, required by mining rules and local regulations, or state laws, to be posted upon the ground, are subjected to an exceedingly liberal construction. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. 60 C. C. A. 155, 123 Fed. 209; Wiltsee v. King of Arizona Min. & Mill. Co. 7 Ariz. 95, 60 Pac. 896; McCann v. McMillan, 129 Cal. 350, 62 Pac. 31; Bramlett v. Flick, 23 Mont. 95, 57 Pac. 869; Farmington Gold Min. Co. v. Rhymney Gold & Copper Co. 20 Utah, 363, 77 Am. St. Rep. 913, 58 Pac. 832.

If, by any intentment, the proof can be recognized and made consistent with the statements made in them, the jury will be allowed to say whether or not, upon the whole proof, the identification of the claims is sufficient. Bramlett v. Flick, supra.

And where a location of a mining claim was evidently made in good faith, if by any reasonable construction in view of surrounding circumstances, the language employed in the description in the location notice will impart notice to subsequent locators, it is sufficient. Farmington Gold Min. Co. v. Rhymney Gold & Copper Co. supra.

And generally a notice of location, describing a mining claim as situated in a certain county a certain distance from another claim, defining it by courses marked by substantial monuments, readily identified by marks thereon, when taken in connection with evidence that the locator discovered gold-bearing quartz, and made a monument at the place of discovery, upon which he posted his notice of claim, sufficiently shows prima facie ownership of such claim, in an adverse action. Bramlett v. Flick, supra.

So, during the intermediate period from the discovery of a lode or vein to its excavation, a general designation of the claim by notice posted on a stake placed at the point of discovery, stating the date of the location, and the extent of ground claimed, and the designation of the lode, and the name of the locators, will entitle them to such possession as will enable them to make the necessary excavations, and prepare the proper certificate for record, and to hold the premises as against trespassers. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560, Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860.

A notice of location of a mining claim, offered in evidence, is properly rejected, however, where it does not conform to the statutes of the state. Baker v. Butte City Water Co. 28 Mont. 222, 104 Am. St. Rep. 683, 72 Pac. 617.

And a location notice which on its face is uncertain cannot be evidence for any purpose in the absence of anything to show what land is occupied. Reilly v. Berry, 2 Ariz. 272, 15 Pac. 26; Blackmore v. Reilly, 2 Ariz. 442, 17 Pac. 72.

Nor is proof of posting a location notice at a certain point, containing a recital therein that a discovery had there been made, evidence, prima facie, of a discovery, where the statute does not require the making of such a declaration in the notice. Fox v. Myers (Nev.) 86 Pac. 793.

But, where a location notice is uncertain on its face, the uncertainty may be aided by evidence of possession or of monuments. Reilly v. Berry and Blackmore v. Reilly, supra.

Parol evidence is admissible to define the tract embraced in a mining location. Re Prince of Wales Lode, 2 Copp, Land Owner, 2, Mineral Law Dig. 98.

But whether a practical and experienced engineer and surveyor, familiar with the methods of locating mining claims and with surveys in mountainous countries, and having knowledge of the neighborhood, could take the description given in a notice of location, and, starting at the point of discovery, find the claim included in it, calls for an opinion, and is incompetent evidence. Bramlett v. Flick, 23 Mont. 95, 57 Pac. 869.

So, where the description in a notice of location of a mining claim is merely defective, the objection goes to its effect, and not to its admissibility in evidence; and it should be left to the jury with the other evidence in the case. Flavin v. Mattingly, 8 Mont. 242, 19 Pac. 384.

But the mere fact that a location notice sufficiently describes the claim to be admissible in evidence does not render it conclusive. It may be shown by extrinsic evidence that the description therein, when applied to the premises with reference to permanent monuments, is misleading, unintelligible, or impossible, or that the alleged monuments were not in fact such. Dillon v. Bayliss, 11 Mont. 171, 27 Pac. 725.

Whether a notice of location and a description of the claim were sufficient to apprise other prospectors of its precise location is a matter of fact for determination 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the trial court. Eilers v. Boatman, 111 U. S. 356, 28 L. ed. 454, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432.

2. Name, date, etc.

In most, if not all, of the mining states and territories requiring a notice of location of a mining claim the name of the locators, the name of the claim, and the date of location, are required to be stated therein.

Under such a requirement as to the name of the mine, placing a notice of location headed "Colfax lode" upon a lode is christening the lode by that name. Phillipotts v. Blasdel, 8 Nev. 61.

And the same ledge may have two names by which it may be known indifferently, especially where it is not known that the parts of the ledge to which the different names are applied are identical; and a ledge may become as well or better known under a name derived from an invalid and subsequent location than under that given it in the earlier or valid location. Ibid.

So, a change in a notice of location after it was recorded, by the erasure of one of the names of the locators and the insertion of another name, does not invalidate it as against outsiders. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442.

And where a locator of a mining claim posted his notice and marked the boundaries, but was prevented from completing the location by sickness, and for a valuable consideration procured others to complete it, the fact that in completing it they posted a new notice on the ground, in which an addition of some descriptive terms was applied to the name originally given to the location, does not make it a new location. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 17 C. C. A. 190, 44 U. S. App. 204, 70 Fed. 455, Affirming 55 Fed. 11.

So, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, providing that all records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the date of location; the rights of the parties are defined by the fact of location of which the written date of the notice is at most but evidence, and error in the notice of location as to the date thereof must give way to the proved fact; and, where one person locates a claim upon October 20, and by mistake names the date in the notice as October 23, and another locates a conflicting claim on October 22, the former has the better right. Webb v. Carlon, 148 Cal. 555, 83 Pac. 998.

But a location notice omitting to state the date of the location when required by a state statute is invalid. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 9 Mont. 452, 8 L.R.A. 629, 23 Pac. 1018.

And an instruction on an issue as to the validity of a mining location, undertaking to tell the jury what the locator is required to do to make a location, telling them that he must post at the discovery shaft the usual notice, and place upon the corners and center of side lines stakes marked in the usual manner, is improper and erroneous in omitting to state that the sign at the discovery shaft must contain the name of the lode, the name of the locator, and the date of discovery, and in omitting to describe the necessary markings on the corner and side-line stakes. Bryan v. McCaig, 10 Colo. 309, 15 Pac. 413.

So, the dating back of a location notice for the purpose of defeating other claimants to land covered by it is a fraud upon the parties sought to be defeated, invalidating the location as to them. Muldoon v. Brown, 21 Utah, 121, 59 Pac. 720.

But one who seeks to avoid the effect of such notice, relying upon fraud, should plead the fraud; and, in the absence of such a plea, evidence tending to show it is inadmissible. Ibid.

And the admission of one of several locators of a mining claim, that he dated back the notice of location to a date previous to the time it was posted, for the purpose of defeating the claim of a prior locator, is inadmissible in evidence as against the other locators, where they were not present and did not make, or concur in the making of, the statement and admission. Ibid.

A location of a mining claim, made on Sunday, is not void if not prohibited by local law. Re Dolly Varden Lode, Departmental Decision July 17, 1879; Re Cunningham, March 29, 1880, Mineral Law Dig. 98.

3. Description of claim.

(a) Generally.

A common requirement is that the notice of location shall describe the claim, either generally, or in a specified manner, or with reference to some natural object or permanent monument, so as to identify the claim.

Compliance with such a requirement is necessary. Kahn v. Old Teleg. Min. Co. 2 Utah, 174.

But miners should not be held to technical accuracy in the matter of description of their claims. Re Prince of Wales Lode, 2 Copp, Land Owner, 2, Mineral Law Dig. 101.

And the description of a mining claim in a notice of location is not rendered absolutely void by indefiniteness. Bennett v. Harkrader, 158 U. S. 441, 39 L. ed. 1046, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 863.

And an objection to the admission in evidence of a location notice as being indefinite and uncertain in the description of the claim cannot be sustained, when it does not appear from the face of the notice that the circumstances and surroundings were such as to render the description impossible. Dillon v. Bayliss, 11 Mont. 171, 27 Pac. 725.

A notice of location of a mining claim is sufficient when, by reference to natural objects and monuments erected by the locator, it contains directions which enable a person of ordinary intelligence to find the claim and trace its boundaries. Bramlett v. Flick, 23 Mont. 95, 57 Pac. 869.

And one describing the claim by reference to an adjoining claim, as being on the southeast, and containing a description of its exterior as beginning at the southwest boundary of such adjoining claim, is prima facie admissible in evidence. Dillon v. Bayliss, supra.

So, however defective in form a notice of location may be, it is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing the time when the possession was taken, and to indicate the property of which possession was taken. Bennett v. Harkrader, supra.

Nor is a notice of location of a mining claim objectionable for not stating that the claim is within a specified district, where the notice was posted upon the vein or lode itself in that district, and stated that it was for a specified portion of that vein or lode. Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187, 23 Pac. 361.

And where local mining regulations provide that notices of location shall contain a description of the claim or claims located, by reference to some natural object or permanent monument which will identify the claim, a notice sufficiently describing the center lines, and stating that the claim is for a certain number of feet on each side, is sufficient. Ibid.

So, the insertion of wrong legal subdivisions in a notice of a mining claim, used in describing it, does not invalidate the claim, where the remaining description sufficiently identifies the land. Duryea v. Boucher, 67 Cal. 141, 7 Pac. 421.

And a posted and recorded notice describing the land by adjoining tracts on the north, east, south, and on the west by unoccupied lands, is sufficient, where it designates the amount of land claimed. Ibid.

Nor need a location of a mining claim contain a description of the markings upon the ground. Seidler v. LaFave, 5 N. M. 44, 20 Pac. 789; Farmington Gold Min. Co. v. Rhymney Gold & Copper Co. 20 Utah, 363, 77 Am. St. Rep. 913, 58 Pac. 832.

And it is not required to show the precise boundaries of the claim as marked upon the ground; it is sufficient if it contains directions which, taken in connection with such boundaries, will enable a person of reasonable intelligence to find the claim and trace its lines. Bonanza Consol. Min. Co. v. Golden Head Min. Co. 29 Utah, 159, 80 Pac. 736.

So, a notice of location calling in some instances for stakes, whereas in fact instead of stakes trees were blazed and squared up and marked, does not constitute a material variance, since it has no tendency to mislead. Hansen v. Fletcher, 10 Utah, 266, 37 Pac. 480.

And a notice is not rendered invalid and inadmissible in evidence because it was therein declared that two corners of the claim located were marked by pine trees, when in fact they were sufficiently marked by stakes. Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728.

So, in determining the sufficiency of the description in a notice of location of a mining claim, the court will take judicial notice of those general methods and rules of locating and marking mines upon the public domain in a particular locality that are so wide spread, and well known, and fixed in the mining system as to be familiar to all miners and in all mining districts, such as, that the first discovery is called and known as the discovery claim, and that when a discovery is within a gulch or on a stream the claims are marked or numbered from the discovery claim up or down the gulch or stream, and that claims are frequently numbered or marked by reference to one which is so definitely established as to be used by all the miners in the same course as the initial claim, and as a permanent monument. And a notice of a mining discovery, describing it as claim No. 3, located on a named stream in a named mining district and territory, beginning at initial stake at the east end of claim No. 2, thence following a plain line of stakes around the premises to the point of beginning, is sufficient when based upon a system of locating and describing boundaries of mines by numbers, in the absence of any evidence that a system beginning with discovery or No. 1 is not a well-known system of surveys and locations by which the mine in question can be easily and certainly located. Butler v. Good Enough Min. Co. 1 Alaska, 246.

(b) With reference to course of vein or lode.

Where statutory provisions or mining regulations require a description of a mining claim in a notice of location thereof, with reference to the general course or strike of the vein or lode, a notice naming the mining district, county, and territory, and stating that the claim is 600 feet in length along the vein or lode, and 300 feet on each side thereof, commencing at a stake and notice situated about 300 feet in a northwesterly direction from another named mine, and that it is an extension of a third named mine, and running thence along the vein or lode in a southerly direction to a similar stake or notice; and that the locators claim 600 linear feet in a southerly direction from this stake and notice to a similar stake and notice,—is in substantial compliance therewith. Morrison v. Regan, 8 Idaho, 291, 67 Pac. 955.

And so is a notice claiming by right of discovery the ledge, lode, or deposit upon which it was placed, describing it as "350 feet in a northwesterly direction from this notice, and 300 feet on each side of this vein," properly dated and giving the name of the lode. Columbia Copper Min. Co. v. Duchess Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. 13 Wyo. 244, 79 Pac. 385.

So, a notice of location claiming 300 feet in width on each side of the middle of the lode at the surface, and all the veins, lodes, or ledges within the boundaries of said claim with their dips, angles, and variations, and 1,305 feet on the lode running a specified direction from the discovery post, and 195 feet running in another specified direction on the lode from the discovery post, is in substantial compliance with the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

provisions of Nev. Comp. Laws 1900, § 208, providing that a notice of location must contain the number of linear feet claimed in length along the course of the vein each way from the point of discovery, with the width on each side from the center of the vein, and the general course of the vein or lode as near as may be, and is sufficient. Zerres v. Vanina, 134 Fed. 610.

And a written notice posted on a stake at the point of discovery of a mineral-bearing lode or vein, which declares that the locators claim 1,500 feet on the lode, vein, or deposit, is, to the extent of 750 feet on the course of the lode or vein in each direction from the discovery point, a sufficient notice of discovery and original location. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560, Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860.

And a notice of location, locating 1,500 linear feet on a lode or ledge, and describing it as commencing at this notice and running 750 feet in a southwesterly direction and 750 feet in a northeasterly, locates 750 feet from the notice in each direction, and is not subject to the objection that it simply goes 750 feet in a certain direction and back to the starting point. Allen v. Dunlap, 24 Or. 229, 33 Pac. 675.

Likewise, a notice of location of a mining claim, reciting a claim of 1,200 feet on the face of this hill, running 1,200 feet from a stake, with all its dips, angles, and spurs, and from thence to the center of the hill, manifests an intention of the locators to claim a lode therein with all its dips, angles, and spurs, and is not subject to the objection that it is a notice of a hill location under which no title to a lode can be taken. Weill v. Lucerne Min. Co. 11 Nev. 200.

A written notice of location posted at the point of discovery, not stating the number of feet claimed on each side of the discovery point, however, limits the location to 750 feet on the course of the lode or vein in each direction from that point. Erhardt v. Boaro, supra.

And where it is found, in an action for the recovery of possession of a part of a quartz-mining claim, that 1,500 feet running southerly along the ledge from the locator's northern stake and shaft, as described in his notice of location, would end a short distance north of what the locator claims to be his southerly end line, the court may properly confine his claim to the actual 1,500 feet. Conway v. Hart, 129 Cal. 483, 62 Pac. 44.

So, an attempted location of a mining claim, in which the notice does not contain the number of linear feet claimed along the vein or lode each way from the point of discovery, with the width on each side of said vein or lode, and the general course or strike of the vein or lode as nearly as may be, as required by Oregon Laws 1898, § 1, p. 16, is void under § 10, p. 18, thereof, providing that locations, or attempted locations, of mining claims, not complying with the pro-

(c) With reference to natural objects or permanent monuments.

Under the statutory provisions of a number of the states and territories, the notice of location of a mining claim is required to describe the claim with reference to some natural object or permanent monument. It is to be observed, however, that in these states and territories the record of the claim is required to be made by recording the notice of location, and the matter of description by reference to natural objects or permanent monuments seems to have been added to the other requirements for the purpose of fitting the notice for a record, rather than for fitting it for service as a notice. For this reason, and for the reason that description with reference to natural objects or permanent monuments is a general, if not universal, requirement in case of records of mining claims, cases arising under these provisions are considered, in connection with cases arising under similar provisions with reference to records of mining claims, in a subsequent division of this note. See infra, XII. e, 4.

In the absence of a state or territorial statute, or a mining regulation, requiring it, a notice of location of a mining claim is not defective because it does not contain a description of the claim by reference to some natural object or permanent monument; it is only the record of the claim which is required to contain such a description under the Federal statute. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442; Brady v. Husby, 21 Nev. 453, 33 Pac. 801; Poujade v. Ryan, 21 Nev. 449, 33 Pac. 659.

(d) Effect of mistakes in courses and distances.

Notices of location of mining claims are not rendered invalid because of mere mistakes therein as to courses and distances. Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. 60 C. C. A. 155, 123 Fed. 209.

And the fact that a line of a mining claim as staked on the ground did not reach a lode claim to which it was stated in the location notice to run, but fell short by a few feet by a mistake of the locator as to where the true boundary of that claim was, does not render the location notice inadmissible. Garner v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 371, 20 Pac. 654.

So, a location notice is not too vague and indefinite to be admissible in evidence on an issue as to the right to a mine, on the ground that it failed to indicate the direction of the closing line, where, if the monument in the center of the claim is the point of beginning, the closing line would be a diagonal one from a particular corner to the center of the claim; and it is evident that the locator intended to describe his closing line to meet the center side-line monument on that side. Providence Gold Min. Co. v. Burke, 6 Ariz. 323, 57 Pac. 641. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And an alteration in a notice of location as recorded, by striking out "easterly and westerly" as to the course of the vein, and inserting the words "northerly and southerly," made without fraudulent intent, does not vitiate the notice. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra.

So, the terms "easterly" and "westerly," used in a notice of location of a mining claim, without qualifying language, do not, as in a deed, denote due east or due west; in such a notice the terms denote the general direction of a vein or location running nearer toward the east or toward the west, as the case may be, than any other of the cardinal points of the compass. Wiltsee v. King of Arizona Min. & Mill. Co. 7 Ariz. 95, 60 Pac. 896.

Nor is the word "northerly," in a notice of location stating the direction of the claim, confined in meaning to due north, but includes, and may mean, any meridian line or course between north and northwest, where the direction is made certain by the posting of stakes, or the building of monuments, at the corners of the location or along the lines thereof, such stakes and monuments controlling the courses specified in the notice. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

And a notice of location which gives the course of the location as running westerly a specified number of feet, and easterly a specified number of feet, from a discovery shaft or point of discovery, must be held, until the boundaries are definitely located by the erection of monuments, to reserve from entry the surface area which might be located within any location so made that, if a line were drawn lengthwise from the center of said claim from the west center end through the point of discovery to the east center end of said claim, the line would lie at some point between east 45 degrees north and east 45 degrees south of the point of discovery. Wiltsee v. King of Arizona Min. & Mill. Co. supra.

And this rule is not affected by a statute requiring the locator to give the general course as near as may be. Sanders v. Noble, 22 Mont. 110, 55 Pac. 1037.

e. In placer mining.

In locating a placer-mining claim, as in lode mining, the Federal statutes do not require a preliminary notice of location; this is left to local legislation and regulation. A number of the mining states and territories, however, including Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, have made provision therefor by statute. These provisions differ but little in the different states and territories, and they substantially conform to the requirements with reference to lode claims, except that the number of feet or acres claimed is usually required to be stated, instead of the length and course of the vein; and it would appear that provisions with reference to notice of location of lode claims have been treated as applicable irrespective of local legislation or regulation.

Thus, notices placed upon a stump in a creek, claiming 1,500 feet along the creek bottom, and 300 feet each way from the center of the creek, and stating that it is an extension of another named claim a stated distance from the first falls in said creek, sufficiently located a placer-mining claim. McKinley Creek Min. Co. v. Alaska United Min. Co. 183 U. S. 563, 46 L. ed. 331, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 84.

Nor is a notice "that we, the undersigned, have this day located this ground for borate mining purposes," describing the claim as 1,500 feet long and 600 feet wide, defective as a notice of a placer-mining claim. McCann v. McMillan, 120 Cal. 350, 62 Pac. 31.

And a placer mine described in the notice of location as commencing at the upper or north end of claim No. 4; thence running along the bed of a creek, 1,500 feet; thence 300 feet east and west from the center stake; there being two center stakes, one at each end,—is correctly located as a parallelogram 1,500 feet long by 300 feet in width on each side of a straight line drawn from one center stake to the other, and not along the sinuosities of the stream. Steen v. Wild Goose Min. Co. 1 Alaska, 255.

A notice of location of a mining claim, required by rules of a mining district, however, may refer to subdivisions of a United States survey for the boundaries of the claim; and such a reference is sufficient whether the survey from which the map was made was ultimately approved or not. Gird v. California Oil Co. 60 Fed. 531.

The above cases are merely illustrative of the application of rules with reference to notices of lode claims to placer claims, and are not given as covering the whole law of the subject. The whole subdivision with reference to preliminary notices of location should be read in this connection, and must be taken as authoritative on this subject.

IX. Discovery or development work.

a. Provision for.

Under the Federal mining laws, in the absence of state or local regulation, a location of a mining claim is complete upon proper discovery and marking the claim upon the ground. Nothing in the way of discovery or development work is required to complete it; and this applies to the existing conditions in California and Utah in which no such regulations have been adopted. In most of the other mining states and territories, however, Federal legislation on this subject has been supplemented by requirements for the performance of certain work in the way of development after discovery, which is a condition precedent to the completion of the location.

These requirements have usually taken the shape of a provision for the sinking of a discovery shaft upon the lode or vein discovered, or for an equivalent thereto. In 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the different states and territories they are substantially alike in principle and in their general trend, differing only in detail. The Colorado statute (Mills's Anno. Stat. §§ 3152, 3155), which is a fair sample of the trend and substance of all, is as follows: "Before filing such location certificate the discoverer shall locate his claim by . . . sinking a discovery shaft upon the lode to the depth of at least ten feet from the lowest part of the rim of such shaft at the surface, or deeper if necessary to show a well-defined crevice." "The discoverer shall have sixty days from the time of uncovering or disclosing a lode to sink a discovery shaft thereon."

b. Purpose and validity.

Preliminary work is required to define and secure a located mining claim. The law protects the first discoverer in the possession of the claim until sufficient excavations and developments can be made so as to disclose whether a vein or deposit of such richness exists as to justify work, up to the time limited by the statute for doing such work. Marshall v. Harney Peak Tin Min. Mill. & Mfg. Co. 1 S. D. 350, 47 N. W. 290.

It is competent for the legislature of a state to require a reasonable additional amount of work over that required by the Federal laws to complete the location of a mining claim. Sisson v. Sommers, 24 Nev. 379, 77 Am. St. Rep. 815, 55 Pac. 829.

And statutes requiring the locator of a mining claim to sink a discovery shaft, or do other equivalent work, within a specified time from discovery, or the posting of the notice of location, do not conflict with the acts of Congress giving the locator of a mine one year after making his location to do the required amount of work in order to hold it. Ibid.

In Flick v. Gold Hill & L. M. Min. Co. 8 Mont. 298, 20 Pac. 807, however, it was said that Mont. Comp. Stat. § 1479, div. 5, requiring that there must be a discovery of a vein or crevice of quartz or ore, with at least one well-defined wall, before a declaratory statement or notice of location of a quartz lode can be recorded, is of doubtful authority when considered in connection with the prohibition of the organic act of the territory against the passage of any law interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; but that any doubt as to this point should not be construed as conflicting with the decision of O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302, upholding the provisions of that act requiring a declaratory statement of a quartz location to be made on oath.

c. Effect of noncompliance.

Under provisions of this class, work in the way of sinking a discovery shaft, or the equivalent, is required to be performed as a prerequisite to the completion of location. Sisson v. Sommers, supra; Strepey v. Clark, 7 Colo. 614, 5 Pac. 111.

And failure substantially to comply with such requirements by sinking a discovery shaft, or doing the prescribed discovery work, invalidates and forfeits the location. Sisson v. Sommers, supra; Wright v. Lyons, 45 Or. 167, 77 Pac. 81.

And the claim becomes subject to location by any qualified locator. Sisson v. Sommers, supra; Walsh v. Henry (Colo.) 88 Pac. 449.

And a locator thus failing to comply with the statute cannot hold the claim as against a junior locator. Sisson v. Sommers, supra.

And this is so whether the laws and rules provide for a forfeiture for the noncompliance or not. Ibid.

So, where a person opens a tunnel and discloses a vein of mineral therein, but takes no further steps toward perfecting a mining location, he acquires no interest whatever in the ground in which the discovery was made as against intervening rights. Pelican & D. Min. Co. v. Snodgrass, 9 Colo. 330, 12 Pac. 206.

And where several persons located 1,500 feet on a lode, claiming to hold in severalty, and not as a company, one shaft upon the whole claim is not a sufficient compliance with the New Mexico statute requiring the sinking of a shaft within a specified time to perfect a location. Zeckendorf v. Hutchison, 1 N. M. 476.

So, until the provisions of N. M. Rev. Stat. § 4, p. 728, giving a miner twelve months in which to perfect his title by sinking a shaft of not less than 20 feet in depth, are complied with, the miner has only a contingent claim to his location; and, if he sells the same, the purchaser is required, before his claim can become valid, to comply with the requirements of that law within the period of one year from the time the claim was located; and, if he fails to comply, the right to the claim ceases at the expiration of the year. Ibid.

One who locates a lode or vein, and posts thereon a proper notice of location; but who, before being able to sink a discovery shaft as required by law, is driven away from the claim by threats of violence, and prevented from completing the work required to perfect his location and prepare a certificate for record, however,—is entitled to recover possession of such claim from the trespasser. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560, Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860.

d. Location of shaft.

The statutory provision is for sinking the discovery shaft upon the lode.

Under this requirement, when a lode is discovered in a discovery shaft, and does not outcrop on the surface, it will be assumed that the shaft marks the middle of the vein, in the absence of a contrary showing. Re Johnson, 7 Copp, Land Owner, 35, Mineral Law Dig. 10.

And, in the absence of a contrary showing, it will be assumed that that portion of a vein on which a discovery shaft is sunk is the middle of the vein, from which surface ground on each side is to be measured. Re Hope Min. Co. 5 Copp, Land Owner, 116, Mineral Law Dig. 147.

And, where a locator of a mining claim testifies that he discovered a vein within the surface lines of his claim, and sunk a discovery shaft upon it, and traced the vein in an easterly and westerly direction, he opens the door for any proper cross-examination relative to the location of the discovery shaft and course or strike of the discovery vein, and the location and character of the assessment work done upon the claim which might throw light upon the question of the course of the vein, and whether, as matter of fact, the discovery shaft was actually sunk upon the vein; and he may be asked on such cross-examination whether or not a second shaft was sunk upon the discovery vein. Hickey v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. 33 Mont. 46, 81 Pac. 806.

Nor does a question asked a witness, as to whether or not a second shaft was sunk upon the discovery vein, call for expert or opinion testimony, since it has reference to a matter as to which any prospector or person familiar with the work done can testify. Ibid.

So, the discovery shaft must be sunk upon the claim located.

A location of a mining claim cannot be made by a discovery shaft upon another claim which has been previously located, and which is a valid location. Little Pittsburgh Consol. Min. Co. v. Amie Min. Co. 5 McCrary, 298, 17 Fed. 57; Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 395; Butte Consol. Min. Co. v. Barker (Mont.) 89 Pac. 302.

And the fact that the locator of a mining claim sank his discovery shaft upon ground overlapping another mining claim is a matter which can be taken advantage of by the locator of the latter claim in any conflict that may arise as to the overlapping ground between the two claims. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. 125 Fed. 408.

Nor does the sinking of a shaft just outside of the ground in dispute give the person doing so any right to the ground in dispute, upon which he can maintain ejectment therefor, unless it appears that a lode was discovered in the shaft, and that such lode extends from that point to the territory in controversy. Zollars v. Evans, 2 McCrary, 39, 5 Fed. 172.

If, after sinking a shaft in one place and failing to find a lode, a miner sinks another and finds one, however, he may make the second his discovery shaft upon which location may be based. Terrible Min. Co. v. Argentine Min. Co. 5 McCrary, 639, 89 Fed. 583.

And, where a mining claim was located properly in all respects except that the discovery shaft was sunk and notice posted upon a prior patented claim; and afterwards, upon learning that the discovery shaft was on patented ground, the locator sank another shaft and discovered mineral in the same vein, but clear of the patented claim, and did the necessary assessment work, but omitted to post any notice at the new discovery shaft, and to file an additional certificate of location, and to change the boundaries of the original location,—the location is good and valid as against conflicting claims located subsequent to the second discovery of mineral. Treasury Tunnel, Min. & Reduction Co. v. Boss, 32 Colo. 27, 105 Am. St. Rep. 60, 74 Pac. 888.

So, a charge that the discovery shaft of a mining claim was sunk on ground embraced within a prior valid subsisting location is sufficiently answered by a determination in a judicial proceeding awarding the land, including the discovery shaft, to the junior locator. Mitchell v. Brovo, 27 Land Dec. 40.

And, where the line of conflict between two overlapping claims was agreed upon and adjusted by the locators thereof so as to leave the discovery shaft upon the claim located with reference to it, an adjoining junior locator of other ground, conflicting with the claim so located in another place, cannot complain or take advantage thereof upon the theory that the claim was originally invalid and the ground was open to location because the discovery had been upon another claim. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. supra.

e. The disclosure of mineral.

To constitute a good location of a mining claim under provisions of this class, the crevice or vein which the discovery shaft must show must contain mineral in rock in place. Bryan v. McCaig, 10 Colo. 309, 15 Pac. 413; Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787.

The locator must show in his discovery shaft a vein or lode of valuable ore in rock in place, as well as compliance with the statute in other respects. Terrible Min. Co. v. Argentine Min. Co. supra; Van Zandt v. Argentine Min. Co. 2 McCrary, 159, 8 Fed. 725.

The disclosure of mineral in fragmentary condition is not sufficient. Ibid.

And it must appear that the vein or lode was cut at a depth of 10 feet below the surface. Dolan v. Passmore (Mont.) 85 Pac. 1034.

So, the disclosure of mineral must be made in the discovery shaft. A discovery outside of the discovery shaft would not be sufficient for the purposes of location. Fleming v. Daly, 12 Colo. App. 439, 55 Pac. 946; Beals v. Cone, 27 Colo. 473, 83 Am. St. Rep. 92, 62 Pac. 948; Van Zandt v. Argentine Min. Co. supra.

The disclosure of mineral must be at the point claimed and designated, or made the point of discovery by the locator, and so designated in the location certificate and relied upon in making the location. Cheesman v. Shreeve, supra; McMillen v. Ferrum Min. Co. 32 Colo. 38, 105 Am. St. Rep. 64, 74 Pac. 461.

And he may not, after intervening rights have attached, abandon and disregard his discovery, and neglect to comply with the statutory requirements, and select another discovery upon which his location was not originally predicated. McMillen v. Ferrum Min. Co. supra.

And, where a miner relocates an abandoned mining claim, and sinks his discovery shaft, and posts his notice several hundred feet from the discovery shaft of the abandoned claim, designating in his certificate his discovery as in the shaft sunk by him, but fails to make a discovery therein, his location is not rendered valid by the fact that he knew of a vein of ore on the claim, that had been found in the abandoned discovery shaft. Ibid.

In the above case, O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302, supra, VI. g, 1, was distinguished upon the ground that no provision for a discovery shaft exists in either the Federal statutes or the statutes of Montana.

Nor can a prior locator of a mining claim, who bases his claim upon an alleged discovery of mineral in his discovery shaft, where it appears that no valid discovery has been made in such shaft, prove an underground discovery made through an adjoining claim, where such discovery was not followed by the filing of an amended location certificate, and was made after a subsequent locator had perfected a valid location of the same claim. McMillen v. Ferrum Min. Co. supra.

Where the evidence in an action involving the validity of such a location shows that, if a discovery was made, it was within the discovery shaft, however, an instruction submitting a claim of the discovery of a lode, but omitting to submit the claim of its discovery in the discovery shaft, is not reversible error. Fleming v. Daly, supra.

And, after entry for a patent, in the absence of evidence of fraud, and on a question between the government and the applicant only, mineral will be found to have existed in the discovery shaft, if necessary to sustain the applicant's claim, whenever there is a conflict of evidence on the question. Wight v. Tabor, 2 Land Dec. 738.

So, under state statutes requiring the sinking of a discovery shaft upon a lode to show a well-defined crevice, it is held in Colorado that the term "crevice" means merely a mineral-bearing vein. Beals v. Cone, supra.

And that the boundaries of a mineral-bearing vein may or may not be ascertained and visible. Ibid.

And that it does not require an exposure of the walls of the vein. Fleming v. Daly, supra.

But an instruction on an issue as to the validity of a mining location, that it must appear that a lode was located by sinking a shaft at least 10 feet from the lowest part of the rim at the surface, showing a well-defined crevice, is improper in not stating that the crevice must contain mineral-bearing rock in place. Bryan v. McCaig, 10 Colo. 309, 15 Pac. 413.

It has been held under this statute, in Montana, however, that the sides of a lode represented and defined by walls of the country rock must be discovered, and the lode identified thereby, before it can be located and held as such; and that, before a quartz claim can be legally located, at least one well-defined wall or side to the lode must be found. Foote v. National Min. Co. 2 Mont. 402.

But an instruction in an action involving an issue as to the validity of a mining location, that it is sufficient if, at the time of location, the vein or lode is exposed to view, and its existence known by the locator; and that it is not necessary that the work of exposure should have been done by the locators, is not subject to objection as not showing that the vein must have at least one well-defined wall rock, where an instruction to this effect has already been given to the jury. Wenner v. McNulty, 7 Mont. 30, 14 Pac. 643.

f. Time of completion.

The laws of the United States do not prescribe any time in which excavations necessary to enable a locator of a mining claim to prepare and record a certificate shall be made; this is left to the state legislation and to mining rules. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560, Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860.

And, whenever there are statutory provisions fixing the time within which, after discovery, the prescribed work necessary to a valid location must be done in order to secure the claim, the discoverer has the full time provided in the statute to complete it. Bramlett v. Flick, 23 Mont. 95, 57 Pac. 869.

And a state statute providing that the discovery shaft of a mining location shall be sunk within sixty days, or any specified period, from the date of the discovery, fixes the question absolutely as to what shall be deemed a reasonable time within which such shaft shall be sunk; though a person, the validity of whose location is at issue, cannot be heard to complain of an instruction submitting the question of reasonable time to the jury, and fixing a limit permitting a finding of a period longer than the statutory one. Patterson v. Hitchcock, 3 Colo. 533.

So, where the statute provides that, before filing a location certificate with the county recorder, the discoverer shall locate his claim by sinking a discovery shaft upon the premises to a specified depth; and that the discoverer shall have ninety days from the date of discovering the lode and the posting of notices thereupon to perform the discovery work thereon, the discovery shaft may be sunk at any time within the ninety days from the date of the discovery of the lode and the posting of the notices thereon. Wiltsee v. King of Arizona Min. & Mill. Co. 7 Ariz. 95, 60 Pac. 896.

Failure of the locator of a mining claim to prosecute the development work within the time required by law, however, where he had fully complied with all other requirements of a valid location, does not prejudice his rights where he was prevented from completing his location and complying with the statute by the act of a trespasser who forcibly ejected him. Erhardt v. Boaro, 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860; Miller v. Taylor, 6 Colo. 41.

On this subject, see also infra, XIV.

g. Equivalent of the shaft.

Most, if not all, of the states and territories providing for a discovery shaft also provide for an equivalent. The provisions for an equivalent are substantially that any open cut, cross cut, or tunnel which shall cut a lode at the depth of 10 feet below the surface, or an adit of at least 10 feet in along the lode from the point where the lode may be in any manner discovered, is equivalent to the discovery shaft.

In the construction of these statutes the terms "open cut," "cross cut," "tunnel," and "adit" should receive such reasonable interpretation as will leave the provisions thereof of practically operative. Electro Magnetic Min. & Development Co. v. Van Auken, 9 Colo. 204, 11 Pac. 80.

By them an open cut, a cross cut, and an adit are each made the equivalent of a discovery shaft. Gray v. Truby, 6 Colo. 278.

And an adit, in mining law, is an excavation in and along a lode. Electro Magnetic Min. & Development Co. v. Van Auken, supra.

And it denotes the opening by which a mine is entered, or by which water and ores are carried away, and it is also called the drift. Gray v. Truby, supra.

The statute contemplates that the 10 feet in length of the adit may be either open or under cover, or open in part and under cover in part, dependent upon the nature of the ground. Electro Magnetic Min. & Development Co. v. Van Auken, supra.

And it need not, at its face, have a depth of at least 10 feet; but it must always be such in its dimensions and character as to make it fairly equivalent to a discovery shaft. Gray v. Truby, supra.

Here, as in the case of a discovery shaft, however, it is essential to the validity of the location that a vein or lode be cut at a depth of 10 feet below the surface, or that an open cut be run at least 10 feet along the vein; and a statement not showing these facts is insufficient. Dolan v. Passmore (Mont.) 85 Pac. 1034.

And a cross cut intersecting the vein on a mining claim 132 feet below the surface does not comply with the provisions of the Montana Political Code, that a cross cut which cuts the lode at the depth of 10 feet below the surface is equivalent to a discovery shaft, where the only means of reaching the cross cut was down a shaft located upon a neighboring patented claim. Butte Consol. Min. Co. v. Barker (Mont.) 89 Pac. 302.

X. The surface area of the location.

a. Surface incident to lode.

Previous to the enactment by Congress of the mining laws, in locating a mining claim the main thing was the vein. It was this that was intended to be taken up; and, as the exact direction of this could not be ascertained and accurately described until it was followed up or explored, a location was not rendered invalid because the vein, as subsequently ascertained, ran in a different direction from that of the surface claim, as indicated by the notice of location. Johnson v. Parks, 10 Cal. 447.

And, where a person located a mining claim on certain croppings, and another person located, shortly afterward, in the immediate neighborhood; and there was no objection upon the part of the former locator; and an opinion was expressed by him that there was no conflict between the two claims,—the former locator should be deemed to have admitted that, if there were two distinct ledges, the subsequent locator was entitled to the one upon which he located, and he had located but one ledge, and did not claim all the ledges outcropping at the place, though the outcroppings of the two ledges were mingled, confused, and blended upon or near the surface. Van Valkenburg v. Huff, 1 Nev. 142.

So, under the mining law as it stood prior to May 10, 1872, each locator of a mining claim was entitled to but one vein. Blake v. Butte Silver Min. Co. 2 Utah, 54.

And, under the Idaho quartz law, a prospector was allowed to hold but one ledge by location. Atkins v. Hendree, 1 Idaho, 95.

But the fact that other ledges existed within the limits of his location was required first to be established, before a subsequent claimant had any lawful right to pass within his boundaries or interfere with his apparent rights. Ibid.

And locations of mining claims, made under the act of Congress of 1866, the surface lines of which included more than one vein or lode, are recognized as valid by the mining acts of Congress of May 10, 1872. Mt. Diablo Mill & Min. Co. v. Callison, 5 Sawy. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 9,886.

Under that act, the location is of a piece of ground including the vein or lode. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442.

And the locator is entitled to all veins having their top or apex inside his surface lines. Blake v. Butte Silver Min. Co. supra; Patterson v. Hitchcock, 3 Colo. 533; Mt. Diablo Mill & Min. Co. v. Callison, supra.

But the surface ground of a mining claim is an incident to the lode, and a location of the ground which does not include any part of the lode claimed to have been discovered therein is invalid. Branagan v. Dulaney, 2 Land Dec. 744; Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co. 122 U. S. 478, 30 L. ed. 1140, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1356; Wolfley v. Lebanon Min. Co. 4 Colo. 112.

While in the location of a mining claim, the vein is the principal thing in the sense that it is for the sake of the vein that the location is made, and the surface is of no value without it, and no location can be made until a vein has been discovered within the limits of the surface claim, the location is of a piece of land including the vein. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra.

And, although the act of Congress of 1872 enlarges the rights of a locator of a mining claim by a grant of all veins, lodes, or ledges the top or apex of which lies within his surface lands, his right to the surface ground continues to be dependent upon his right to the principal lode; and his right to other lodes within his surface limits is equally dependent thereon. Patterson v. Hitchcock, supra.

A vein can be located in no other way than by means of a surface claim; and it can be held only to the extent that it is included within the surface lines. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra.

The surface ground is taken by a location on each side and including the vein; and, when the locator locates and claims his surface, he locates and claims the vein or lode within it. McCormick v. Varnes, 2 Utah, 355.

And, if a location is extended beyond the limits of the lode upon which it is located, in so far as it goes beyond the lode it is invalid, since the location gives no right to the surface except in connection with the lode. Terrible Min. Co. v. Argentine Min. Co. 5 McCrary, 639, 89 Fed. 583.

So, if the lode or vein makes a material departure from the surface ground located, the location cannot be said to be on the lode or vein. Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Tarbet, 98 U. S. 463, 25 L. ed. 253.

It is not necessary, however, that a lode or vein shall crop out upon the surface, in order that locations may be made upon it. If it lies entirely beneath the surface, and the course of its apex can be ascertained by sinking shafts at different points, such shafts may be adopted as indicating the position and course of the vein; and locations may be properly made on the surface above it, so as to secure the right to the vein underneath. Ibid.

b. Location with reference to strike of vein.

1. Generally.

The provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424, that a lode-mining claim may equal, but shall not exceed, 1,500 feet in length along the vein or lode; and no lode-mining claim shall extend more than 300 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface; nor shall any claim be limited by any mining regulations to less than 25 feet on each side of the middle of the vein,—contemplate that the location of a lode or vein mining claim shall be along the course of the vein. Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co. and Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Tarbet, supra; Doe v. Sanger, 83 Cal. 203, 23 Pac. 365; Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 393; McCormick v. Varnes, supra.

The vein is the principal thing in the location of a mining claim, and the location should be made in conformity with the strike thereof. Armstrong v. Lower and Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra; Last Chance Min. Co. v. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. 66 C. C. A. 209, 131 Fed. 579.

And the rule was the same under the mining act of Congress of 1866. Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Tarbet, supra.

And these statutes were founded upon the general practice of miners, previously existing, that the surface locations of such claims should be made lengthwise along the general direction of the lode or vein, with the side lines along the lode and the end lines across it. Doe v. Sanger, supra.

A mistake upon the part of a miner in locating a lode claim, however, by which he misapprehends the direction of the lode, and accordingly extends the length of his claim in a direction other than along it, is not fatal to the validity of his claim. Water-vale Min. Co. v. Leach, 4 Ariz. 34, 33 Pac. 418.

It operates only to diminish the extent of the lode that he might have included within the boundaries of his claim. Ibid.

If located otherwise than along the vein or lode, the location will secure only so much of it as it actually covers. Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Tarbet, supra.

If a located lode terminates at any point within the location, or departs at any point from the side lines, the location beyond the point of termination or departure is defeasible, if not void. Patterson v. Hitchcock, 3 Colo. 533.

And a miner who asserts title to a full claim of 1,500 feet in length and 300 feet in width, as provided for by law, must prove a lode extending throughout the claim. Zollars v. Evans, 2 McCrary, 39, 5 Fed. 172.

The locator who does not locate in conformity to the strike of the vein pays the penalty by the loss of his surface ground, and also his lode beyond the point of departure thereof from his side lines. Armstrong v. Lower, supra.

The right of the locator of a lode-mining claim to follow the strike of the lode ceases at the point where the lode crosses the line of the location; and it makes no difference, on the question of the validity of the location, whether the lode crosses the end line or the side line. Beik v. Nickerson, 29 Land Dec. 662.

One who has discovered a lode upon the unappropriated public domain, and has, within the proper time, in good faith performed all the subsequent acts essential to a valid location as provided by law, however, is entitled to the presumption that the lode extends through the full length of the claim; and another who, by subsequent and conflicting location, undertakes to hold a portion of his claim on the ground that the lode does not extend to the conflicting premises, has the burden of proving such fact. Armstrong v. Lower, supra.

And an instruction, in a suit to adverse a patent of a mining claim, that, if the plaintiff, with knowledge of the direction of his vein, fraudulently located his claim in disregard thereof for the purpose of appropriating surface ground to which he would not have been entitled had he located his claim along the line of the vein, the location would be void, though it was in other respects sufficient, is improper and erroneous in the absence of evidence of any such fraudulent purpose. Walsh v. Mueller, 16 Mont. 186, 40 Pac. 292.

The course of a vein longitudinally as it passes through the country is its strike, within the meaning of these rules; and, where the dip of the vein is vertical, or practically vertical, the line of its ore bodies may mark the line of its strike. Grand Central Min. Co. v. Mammoth Min. Co. 29 Utah, 490, 83 Pac. 648.

And, in determining the location and strike of a vein, the geological features of the adjacent country are to be taken into consideration. Ibid.

The contiguity of ore or mineral matter constituting the length and breadth and extent of any particular lode is a question of fact to be determined by a jury. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

2. Effect of lode crossing or leaving claim.

The end lines of a mining claim as designated in the location certificate are not necessarily, in law, the end lines of the claim, unless they actually cross the actual outcrop of the vein. Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787.

The side lines of the location of a mining claim become the end lines, and the end lines the side lines, where the course of the vein is across the claim instead of in the direction of its length. Last Chance Min. Co. v. Tyler Min. Co. 157 U. S. 683, 39 L. ed. 859, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 733; King v. Amy & S. Consol. Min. Co. 152 U. S. 222, 38 L. ed. 419, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510; Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co. 122 U. S. 478, 30 L. ed. 1140, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1356; Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, 4 C. C. A. 329, 7 U. S. App. 463, 54 Fed. 284; New Dunderberg Min. Co. v. Old. 25 C. C. A. 116, 49 U. S. App. 201, 79 Fed. 598; Empire Mill. & Min. Co. v. Tombstone Mill. & Min. Co. 100 Fed. 910, 131 Fed. 339; Cosmopolitan Min. Co. v. Foote, 101 Fed. 518; Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. 48 C. C. A. 665, 109 Fed. 538; Last Chance Min. Co. v. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. 66 C. C. A. 290, 131 Fed. 579.

In such case the end lines are those which measure the width of the claim as it crosses the lode, and the side lines are those which measure the extent of the claim on each side of the middle of the vein. Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co. supra.

And this is the rule where the side lines of a mining claim, as located, cross the vein, whether so intended by the locator at the time of the location or not. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. supra.

And in such case the end lines become the side lines in the sense that the locator may follow the dip of the vein outside of a plane extending vertically down therefrom. Empire Mill. & Min. Co. v. Tombstone Mill. & Min. Co. 100 Fed. 910.

So, where a lode is discovered, and, by mistake, a claim is located thereon crossing it; and, after the completion of the location, another lode is discovered therein running lengthwise of the claim, the existence of the second lode does not prevent the side lines of the claim from being end lines, so as to cut off the extralateral rights of the second lode as well as the first. Cosmopolitan Min. Co. v. Foote, supra.

Where the end lines of a mining claim have been established they remain the end lines as to all veins found within its surface boundaries. St. Louis Min. & Mill. Co. v. Montana Min. Co. 56 L.R.A. 725, 44 C. C. A. 120, 104 Fed. 664.

Where a mining location is placed along the strike of a vein, however, and one end line thereof is placed within the limits of a prior location for the purpose of securing the locator's underground rights attaching to possession and ownership of the surface, so that one corner of the claim as located is cut off by the side line of the senior claim, and the apex of the vein crosses one end of his location and passes out of his location at the other end through the side lines of the senior claim, thus cutting off the corner of his claim, the side line of the senior claim is not the end line of his claim. Del Monte Min. & Mill. Co. v. Last Chance Min. & Mill. Co. 171 U. S. 55, 43 L. ed. 72, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 895.

In the above case, Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. ed. 735, supra, V. a, 3, (a), and Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 45, 29 L. ed. 348, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1110, supra, V. a, 2, were distinguished upon the ground that the question presented in them was whether a second location is effectual to appropriate territory covered by a prior subsisting valid location.

So, where a lode located in its true course lengthwise crosses one of the side lines of the location, the locator may abandon his right to the surface beyond the point where the lode thus passes out, and draw his end line parallel with his location at that point, so as to include only the ground in which the lode extends lengthwise within the side lines of the location. Last Chance Min. Co. v. Tyler Min. Co. 9 C. C. A. 613, 15 U. S. App. 456, 61 Fed. 557, 71 Fed. 848.

And in such case the locator may follow the dip beyond his side line, the same as if one original end line had been drawn in at such crossing parallel to the other end line. Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, supra; Tyler Min. Co. v. Last Chance Min. Co. 71 Fed. 848.

In Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, supra, Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Elgin Min. & Smelting Co. 118 U. S. 208, 30 L. ed. 102, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177, infra, X. c, 2, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the exterior lines of the claim formed a figure resembling a horseshoe, and the court held that the lines marked as end lines were not such; while in the case in hand the location was 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

made in the form of a parallelogram along the course of the lode or vein.

An issue as to whether or not the apex of the vein of one mining claim is cut by the end or side line of another mining claim is one of fact, to be determined by the evidence, and is not a Federal question within the meaning of the removal-of-causes acts. Blue Bird Min. Co. v. Largey, 49 Fed. 289.

1. Of lode claims.

The provision of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424, providing that a lode-mining claim may equal, but shall not exceed, 1,500 feet in length along the vein or lode, and no claim shall extend more than 300 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface; nor shall any claim be limited by any mining regulation to less than 25 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface,—contemplates the location of a lode claim in the form of a parallelogram. Empire Mill. & Min. Co. v. Tombstone Mill. & Min. Co. supra; Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787; Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 17 C. C. A. 190, 44 U. S. App. 204, 70 Fed. 455, Affirming 55 Fed. 11; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

The theory is that the claim should have its side lines equidistant, and not exceeding 300 feet from the center of the lode as it outcrops on the surface, and not exceeding 1,500 feet in length, and with end lines parallel to each other. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, supra.

And when the strike of the vein passes perpendicularly through the end line of a mining location, the mere meanderings of the outcrop between the end lines, caused by the surface influences, or slides and débris on the mountain sides, do not control the question of the parallelism of the side lines; the spirit and reason of the statute require that the settled and permanent course of the vein or strike as nature fixes it shall control, the zigzagging being restricted to slight variations from the general trend and direction of the strike. Cheesman v. Hart, 42 Fed. 98.

But, while the statutes contemplate a parallelogram in form, they do not prescribe the shape of a lode claim, so as to render a departure from the contemplated shape a ground of invalidity. Re Breece Min. Co. 3 Land Dec. 11.

And, under the act of Congress of 1866, it was immaterial on the question of extralateral rights whether the claim was in the form of a parallelogram or not. Carson City Gold & S. Min. Co. v. North Star Min. Co. 28 C. C. A. 333, 48 U. S. App. 724, 83 Fed. 658.

The formation of the mineral deposit must govern. Re Breece Min. Co. supra.

The primary purpose of the statute is to grant the mineral, and, if a fissure vein deviates from a straight line, it is proper that the location should deviate with it. Ibid.

And an irregular location of a horizontal deposit of mineral, irregular in form, and in no wise resembling a fissure vein, and not capable of being traced by its outcrop, is authorized as well as in the case of a fissure vein. Ibid.

And a location of a claim running a part of its length in a certain direction, thence at right angles to its former course, and thence the remainder of the distance parallel to its original course, is properly sustained where it appears that the underlying mineral consisted of a comparatively level deposit, irregular in form, in no wise resembling a fissure vein, and not capable of being traced by its outcroppings. Ibid.

Nor does the fact that a mining location is not in the form of a parallelogram affect the extralateral right of the locator in any vein or lode whose apex is found within its boundaries. Carson City Gold & S. Min. Co. v. North Star Min. Co. supra.

So, while the rule is that, where a vein crops out along the surface, or is so slightly covered by foreign matter that the course of its apex can be ascertained by ordinary surface exploration, the act of Congress requires that this course shall be substantially followed in locating claims and locations upon it, and the end lines should cross the vein at right angles, the extralateral rights conferred upon a locator by statute exist without regard to the angles at which the end lines cross the general course of the vein. Last Chance Min. Co. v. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. 66 C. C. A. 299, 131 Fed. 579.

To secure such rights it is not necessary that the end lines shall be limited to 45 degrees, or to any other particular variation from the true dip. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Iaho Min. & Developing Co. 134 Fed. 268.

Tracts of land which merely corner on each other, however, do not constitute a piece of land which may be located under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2325, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1429. Re Tomera Placer Claim, 33 Land Dec. 560.

And a mining claim in the form of an isosceles triangle, no two sides of which can be parallel to each other, does not conform to the statute with relation to parallelism of the end lines, and is good as a surface claim only. Montana Co. v. Clark, 42 Fed. 626.

2. Parallelism of end lines.

As we have seen, previous to the Federal mining laws, the lode or vein was located, and not the surface, and only such rights to the surface were acquired as were necessary to the proper working of the lode.

So, the act of Congress of 1866 contained no requirement that the end lines of a lode-mining claim should be parallel. Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. 4 Sawy. 302, Fed. Cas. No. 4,548, Affirmed in 103 U. S. 839, 26 L. ed. 557; East Central Eureka Min. Co. v. Central Eureka Min. Co. 204 U. S. 266, 51 L. ed. —, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258.

Though under that act the end lines of a lode-mining claim were required to be straight. Walrath v. Champion Min. Co. 171 U. S. 293, 43 L. ed. 170, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 909.

The act of Congress of 1872 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), however, expressly provides that the end lines of each claim shall be parallel with each other.

The purpose of this requirement is to bound the underground extralateral rights which the owner of the location may exercise. Del Monte Min. & Mill. Co. v. Last Chance Min. & Mill. Co. 171 U. S. 55, 43 L. ed. 72, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 895.

And the rule of the earlier cases was that it was directory only, and that a substantial compliance was all that was necessary. Doe v. Sanger, 83 Cal. 203, 23 Pac. 365; Horswell v. Ruiz, 67 Cal. 111, 7 Pac. 197; Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. supra.

And that no consequence attached to a deviation from its direction. Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. and Horswell v. Ruiz, supra.

And that a location made in substantial compliance with the intent of the statute, having two side lines running along the course of the vein, and two shorter lines running across it, so that the two sets of lines were distinct and apparent, was not void, but gave the right to follow the vein laterally, although the original end lines were not exactly parallel. Doe v. Sanger, supra.

The rule is established by the later cases, however, that parallelism of the end lines of a surface location is essential to the existence of any right in the locator or patentee of a surface lode-mining claim to follow the vein outside of the vertical planes drawn through the side lines. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Elgin Min. & Smelting Co. 118 U. S. 196, 30 L. ed. 98, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177, Affirming 4 McCrary, 279, 14 Fed. 377.

And, under it, if a location is so laid out that its end lines are absent, or if they are so placed as not to define the right of the locator to the exterior parts of the lode, or so that no part of the lode lies between them, the defect cannot be supplied; and, while the location may be valid for all that can be found within the surface lines, it does not enable the locator to follow the lode beyond his side lines. Ibid.

Nor does a mining claim in the form of an isosceles triangle, which has but three sides, no two of which can be parallel to each other, conform to the statutes with relation to parallelism of end lines; and it confers no extralateral rights upon the locator. Montana Co. v. Clark, supra.

But the requirement of parallelism of the end lines of lode-mining locations, made by the act of Congress of May 10, 1872, cannot be deemed to apply where the location had been made at the time of the passage of that act, and the proceedings under the act of July 26, 1866, had then so far advanced as to exclude adverse claims; the purpose of the act of 1872 being to protect all rights previously acquired under existing laws. East Central Eureka Min. Co. v. Central Eureka Min. Co. supra.

And where the end lines of a location are not parallel, and the date of the location does not appear, it will be deemed to have been made under the act of Congress of 1866, not requiring such parallelism, and not under the act of 1872, requiring it. Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. supra.

So, where a mining claim as located does not have parallel end lines, a corner of the claim as originally located may be drawn in in order to make the end lines parallel, thus saving the extralateral rights. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 54 Fed. 935; Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, 4 C. C. A. 329, 7 U. S. App. 463, 54 Fed. 284.

And where the end lines of a mining claim converge in the direction of the dip of the vein, the owner of an adjoining claim cannot complain of the lack of parallelism, since the effect is to limit the extralateral right so as to give less of the vein or lode in depth than at the surface. Carson City Gold & S. Min. Co. v. North Star Min. Co. 28 C. C. A. 333, 48 U. S. App. 724, 83 Fed. 658.

In the above case, Lakin v. Dolly, 53 Fed. 333, and Lakin v. Roberts, 4 C. C. A. 438, 7 U. S. App. 539, 54 Fed. 462, infra, X. d. 2, (a), were distinguished upon the ground that they did not involve any construction of the law appertaining to extralateral rights in a lode; but that the question there was whether, by virtue of the surface ground, the owner of a mining claim could include real estate within the surface boundaries situated more than 300 feet from the lode.

Whether or not the end lines of a mining claim were substantially parallel is a question of fact for a jury under all the evidence. Cheesman v. Hart, 42 Fed. 98.

But a patent of a mining claim showing parallel lines is conclusive, and the patentee's right to follow the dip of the lode therein cannot be defeated by showing that in the original location of the claim the end lines were not parallel. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. supra.

3. Of placer claims.

Prior to the act of Congress of July 9, 1870, there were no provisions fixing the form of placer-mining claims, except such as were imposed by the miners by their local rules and regulations. Price v. McIntosh, 1 Alaska, 286.

But by that act it was provided that, where the lands have been previously surveyed by the United States, the entry in its exterior limits shall conform to the legal subdivisions of the public lands; and that no further survey or plat in such case shall be required.

The express requirement of this act, that placer locations shall conform to the lines of the public surveys, however, was found to be unreasonable, a hardship, and in contravention of the established custom, and therefore L.R.A. (N.S.)

fore was modified by the act of May 10, 1872, requiring conformity to legal subdivisions as near as practicable, so as to provide for exceptional cases where reason and common sense required a different regulation. Re Rablin, 2 Land Dec. 764.

This act makes practicability the test; the conformity need be only as near as practicable. Re Pearsall, 6 Land Dec. 227.

And, where part of a legal subdivision is nonmineral, and the gold deposit is in a ravine, a placer location that follows the mineral deposit conforms to the public survey as near as practicable. Re Esperance Min. Co. 10 Copp, Land Owner, 338, Mineral Law Dig. 110.

So, where the entire placer deposit in a canyon within certain limits is clay, and the adjoining land on either side is totally unfit for mining or agriculture, an exceptional case arises under that act, in which a placer location need not conform to the lines of the public surveys. Re Rablin, supra.

An irregular location will not be sustained, however, in the absence of any showing of reasons for the irregularity. Southern Pacific R. Co. v. Griffin, 20 Land Dec. 485.

A placer-mining claim not conforming to the legal subdivisions on surveyed land is prima facie illegal, in the absence of evidence as to the impracticability of such conformity. Re Pearsall, supra.

And every feature of the conditions relied upon to entitle the location of a placer-mining claim to be made without conforming it to the system of public-land surveys as required by the mining laws should be explicitly and directly set forth, and, if reasonably obtainable, a report under oath with respect to physical conditions should be procured from the deputy mineral inspector who surveyed the claims; and such other evidence should be required as may be deemed necessary satisfactorily to establish the existence of proper and requisite conditions. Re Wood Placer Min. Co. 32 Land Dec. 363, 401.

And a mere affirmative showing that a creek which flows through a placer-mining location runs through a narrow canyon between steep and rugged mountains devoid of placer-mining deposits, and valueless for any purpose, is not sufficient to establish the existence of conditions necessary to warrant omission to conform to the system of public land surveys, where much of the showing with respect to the situation and scope of the claims themselves, the depth and abruptness of the canyon, or gorge, etc. is more by way of implication than by direct averment. Re Wood Placer Min. Co. 32 Land Dec. 363.

Nor can a placer location of a narrow strip 12,000 feet long, extending through three sections, be held to conform as near as practicable to the rectangular subdivisions of the public surveys, unless the adjoining lands had been previously appropriated or reserved. Re Rablin, 10 Copp, Land Owner,

3, Reversed in 2 Land Dec. 764, Mineral Law Dig. 331.

But when a placer-mining claim does not conform to the legal subdivisions upon surveyed land, upon application for a patent, the applicant will be allowed a reasonable time within which to file evidence showing legality thereof. Re Pearsall, supra.

So, the rule has been asserted by the Land Department that the placer-mining act, as amended, requires placer-mining claims to conform in shape and size to the system of public-land surveys and the rectangular subdivisions thereof, whether the locations are upon surveyed or unsurveyed lands. Re Miller Placer Claim, 30 Land Dec. 225; Re Wood Placer Min. Co. 32 Land Dec. 198, 32 Land Dec. 363.

But in Price v. McIntosh, 1 Alaska, 286, it was held that all placer-mining claims in Alaska in which the public-land surveys have not been extended may be located, surveyed, platted, and patented without regard to the public surveys, and need not conform thereto in any particular. And that U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424), fixing the length and width of lode claims; not to exceed 1,500 feet in length along the vein or lode and 300 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface, does not apply to placer claims; and, unless some rule, regulation, or custom of miners within the district limits the locator, he may locate his claim to follow the pay strike in any form he chooses, not to exceed 20 acres in extent.

Tracts of land which merely corner on each other, however, do not constitute a piece of land which may be located under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2325, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1429. And a locator, cannot, by virtue of a discovery of mineral within the limits of one parcel of ground, embrace within his location another and entirely different parcel lying wholly without such limits, having separate and distinct boundaries, merely because the two parcels corner with each other. Re Tomera Placer Claim, 33 Land Dec. 560.

So, in Price v. McIntosh, supra, it was held that no miners' rule, regulation, or custom can limit the miner in the form of his claim to a placer mine; and that a rule or custom of a mining district, that a placer-mining claim should be 1,320 feet by 660 feet, no more and no less, is void for unreasonableness, since to enforce it would frequently require a miner, desiring to locate 1 acre of placer deposit, fraudulently to include 19 acres of agricultural or nonmineral land in his location.

In the above case, Rosenthal v. Ives, 2 Idaho, 205, 12 Pac. 904, holding that a custom limiting all placer-mining claims in a locality to 80 rods in length is reasonable and in harmony with the spirit of the laws, and in no way in conflict with the acts of Congress or the laws of the territory, was disapproved; the court saying that its conclusion is in direct opposition to the construction given for many years by the Land Department, and approved by every other authority having occasion to pass upon it.

Under a general custom of miners in Alaska, by which the boundaries of a mining location are marked by one center stake at each end of the claim, the boundaries are formed by end lines at right angles to a center line drawn from center stake to center stake, and by side lines parallel to and equidistant from the center line, and far enough therefrom to embrace 20 acres of land within the parallelogram. Loeser v. Gardiner, 1 Alaska, 641.

1. Under act of 1866.

By the act of Congress of 1866 it was provided that no location hereafter made shall exceed 200 feet in length along the vein for each locator, with an additional claim for discovery to the discoverer of the lode. The object of this act was to encourage the location and development of mining claims by rewarding the adventurous and enterprising prospector, who had explored mineral regions in search of minerals, by an additional claim for discovery; the mineral lodes in many mining districts being concealed from public view. Rose v. Richmond Min. Co. 17 Nev. 25, 27 Pac. 1105.

And the right to an additional 200 feet was, of course, confined to the original discoverer of the lode. Rose v. Richmond Min. Co. 17 Nev. 25, 27 Pac. 1105, Affirmed in 114 U. S. 576, 29 L. ed. 273, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1055.

But where a person located an interest for discovery upon a lode previously discovered, but not known to be upon the same lode at the time the location was made, the location was not entirely void under that act; and, if voidable at all, it was so only as to the extent of the discovery interest. Rose v. Richmond Min. Co. 17 Nev. 25, 27 Pac. 1105.

And the right of the locator of a mining claim to hold 200 feet additional as discoverer under the statute will be sustained after five years of unquestioned possession, though there was a mistake as to his discovery of a new vein or lode; no one having been injured at the time the claim was made. Richmond Min. Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 576, 29 L. ed. 273, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1055, Affirming 17 Nev. 25, 27 Pac. 1105.

2. Under act of 1872.

The act of Congress of 1872 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320), superseding the act of Congress of 1866, provides that a lode-mining claim may equal, but shall not exceed, 1,500 feet in length along the vein or lode; and no claim shall extend more than 300 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface. Nor shall any claim be limited by any mining regulation to less than 25 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface.

In the absence of any mining rule or custom in force at the time of the location of a mining claim, the location may extend, under this act, to the distance of 300 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface, and may be 1,500 feet in length along the vein by 600 feet in width. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Parley's Park Silver Min. Co. v. Kerr, 130 U. S. 256, 32 L. ed. 906, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 511; Hauswirth v. Butcher, 4 Mont. 299, 1 Pac. 714.

But the Land Department has no jurisdiction, power, or authority, under this act, to issue a patent for a quartz lode to any surface ground exceeding 300 feet in width on each side of the middle of the vein or lode; and a patent for more than that amount of surface is absolutely void as to the excess. Lakin v. Dolly, 53 Fed. 333; Lakin v. Roberts, 4 C. C. A. 438, 7 U. S. App. 539, 54 Fed. 461.

And the provision of that act, that no mining claim shall extend more than 300 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface, is not confined in its application to claims located under it, but extends, also, to claims located under the act of July 26, 1866, under which a location can be extended in width to conform to local laws and customs. Lakin v. Roberts, supra.

The provision of this act, that no mining claim shall be limited by any mining regulation to less than 25 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface, however, authorizes miners, by implication, to adopt rules and regulations or customs limiting the width of mining claims to not less than 25 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface. Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. and North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. supra.

And, where a mining claim was located to the full width allowed by the act of Congress when a limitation by a miner's rule to 50 feet on each side of the vein was in force, the location is valid to the extent of the 50 feet, and no more. Ibid.

But a local mining regulation or custom adopted after the location of a claim cannot be applied to limit the extent of that claim. Table Mountain Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan, 31 Cal. 387.

And any defect in a mining claim caused by noncompliance with the district regulations through excessive width of location is cured by a formal annulment of the local laws prior to entry of a claim for patent. Re Childs, 10 Land Dec. 173.

But the disregard or disuse of a miners' rule or regulation with reference to the width of a mining claim, which will render it inapplicable, must be something more than a mere violation by a few persons; it must have become so extensive as to show that in practice it is generally disused. Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. supra.

And the fact that a rule limiting the width of mining claims was adopted and 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

kept on foot in the laws of miners for a considerable period of time is prima facie evidence, nothing to the contrary appearing, that it was in force; upon which a presumption would arise that it continued in force until something appears tending to show that it had been repealed. Ibid.

Whether a valid regulation existed and was in force in a mining district, limiting the size of a mining claim, is a question of fact for the jury on an issue as to the validity of a location. Ibid.

(b) The measurement.

The measurement of the location of a mining claim must be from the middle of the point of discovery, unless the vein has been actually established and run. Stemwinder Min. Co. v. Emma & L. C. Consol. Min. Co. 2 Idaho, 456, 21 Pac. 1040, Affirmed in 149 U. S. 787, 37 L. ed. 960, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1052.

And a person locating a mining claim is entitled, under the statutes, to 300 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the point of discovery, and no more. Ibid.

And, where a notice of location of a mining claim is indefinite in not stating the number of feet in width claimed on each side of the point of discovery, or monuments referred to therein, the claim should be limited to an equal number of feet on each side. Farmington Gold Min. Co. v. Rhymney Gold & Copper Co. 20 Utah, 363, 77 Am. St. Rep. 913, 58 Pac. 832; Mt. Diablo Mill & Min. Co. v. Callison, 5 Sawy. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 9,886.

So, posting a notice of location at a point of discovery, in which is stated a claim of 1,500 feet in length on the lead, gives the prospector a right for the statutory period to 1,500 feet along the lead; but his right is limited to 750 feet on each side of the point of discovery. Bramlett v. Flick, 23 Mont. 95, 57 Pac. 869.

And, under Mills's Anno. Stat. (Colo.) § 3148, permitting the length of a vein to be 1,500 feet along the vein, and § 3149 thereof, providing that the width of the lode claims in named counties shall be 75 feet on each side of the center of the vein or crevice, neither side line of a location may be distant from the vein or discovery shaft more, though it may be less, than 75 feet; and, where a claim is located in violation of this rule, such parts of the surface as lie outside of a line parallel to the side lines, and 75 feet from the discovery shaft, are located without authority, and as to such excess the location is void. Taylor v. Parenteau, 23 Colo. 368, 48 Pac. 505.

And an innocent mistake in marking a mining claim, including within the claim 400 feet on the easterly side line, and 200 feet on the westerly, 40 feet on the northerly end line, and 50 feet upon the southerly, in excess of the amount allowed by law, does not render the whole location void; the excess may be rejected and the claim held good for the remainder, where previously acquired rights are not interfered with. Hansen v. Fletcher, 10 Utah, 266, 37 Pac. 480.

And a mining claim marked easterly of the discovery point about 150 feet longer than the calls of the notice, and considerably wider than allowed by law, while the westerly 1,000 feet were marked substantially correctly in size, is not invalid as against subsequent locators, where the ground was such that accuracy in measurement could not be expected, and the conflicting location was mostly on the westerly end, where it was correctly marked; since in such case it cannot be presumed that subsequent locators were misled. Burke v. McDonald, 2 Idaho, 679, 33 Pac. 49.

Nor does the fact that, in making a location, a person who became entitled by his notice to 750 feet each side of the point of discovery, in marking his location thereafter, included within his boundaries ground not legitimately covered by his notices, affect the validity of the location if this was done in good faith as the result of ignorance or inadvertence. Bramlett v. Flick, supra.

So, where the end lines of a lode claim are not at right angles with the side lines, their length does not represent the distance between the side lines, and the width of the claim is the distance between the side lines measured at right angles; and a claim not wider than the law permits, when thus measured, is not rendered invalid by the fact that the end lines are longer than the distance prescribed by law for the width of a claim. Davis v. Shepherd, 31 Colo. 141, 72 Pac. 57.

The act of the legislative assembly of Montana, of December 26, 1864, giving the locator of a lead, lode, or ledge of gold or silver 50 feet on each side of the lead or lode for working purposes, however, means 50 feet from each wall or side of the lead or lode; the 50 feet cannot include any of the lead or lode; whether it be wide or narrow the discoverer is entitled to his full lead and 50 feet on each side thereof. Foot v. National Min. Co. 2 Mont. 402.

(c) Effect of excess in size.

A mining claim excessive in size, made so with fraudulent intent, is void. Burke v. McDonald, supra.

And a mining claim made so much larger than the law allows that it cannot be deemed the result of innocent error will be presumed to be fraudulent and void. Ibid.

And a mining claim made so large, and with such indistinct markings, that its boundaries cannot be readily traced, is invalid as against a subsequent location in good faith by persons who, in the use of reasonable diligence, could not find the former location. Ibid.

So, in Pratt v. United Alaska Min. Co. 1 Alaska, 95, while the question was not passed upon, it was said that a mining notice which includes by its terms more land than is permitted by the mineral laws of 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the United States is clearly a violation of the law, and invalidates the location.

To claim more than the law allows in the location of a mining claim, however, is not of itself an attempted fraud, invalidating the whole claim; in such case the location is void only as to the excess. Atkins v. Hendree, 1 Idaho, 95; Hansen v. Fletcher, 10 Utah, 266, 37 Pac. 480.

And where an excessive location of a mining claim, not affecting accrued rights, has been made through mistake in good faith, as, where the locator sets his stakes and estimates his distances without chain or compass, it is void only as to the excess. Gohres v. Illinois Min. Co. 40 Or. 516, 67 Pac. 666; Taylor v. Parenteau, supra; Stemwinder Min. Co. v. Emma & L. C. Consol. Min. Co. 2 Idaho, 456, 21 Pac. 1040, Affirmed in 149 U. S. 787, 37 L. ed. 960, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1052; Richmond Min. Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 576, 29 L. ed. 273, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1035, Affirming 17 Nev. 25, 27 Pac. 1105.

Unless the excess is so large as to give rise to an inference of bad faith. Gohres v. Illinois Min. Co. supra.

And a mining claim staked 650 feet in length in excess of the amount allowed by law is void only as to the excess, where there was no fraud on the part of the locators in including such excess. McPherson v. Julius, 17 S. D. 98, 95 N. W. 428.

Nor is a mining claim staked in excess of the length prescribed by law thereby rendered invalid as against a junior conflicting location, where the defect was corrected before the junior location became a valid mining claim. Ibid.

And a mining claim, defective because when located it contained 650 feet in length in excess of the amount allowed by law, is cured as against a subsequent locator of a conflicting claim, where, before discovery of ore by the junior locator within the boundary lines of his claim, and outside the boundary lines of any other valid location, the senior locator had his claim resurveyed and the excess located under other names, and the boundaries properly marked as prescribed by law. Ibid.

But a location of a mining claim, shown by the stakes and boundaries thereof to be 2,000 feet in length, is no protection to the locator as to the 500 feet in length more than the law authorizes. Hauswirth v. Butcher, 4 Mont. 299, 1 Pac. 714.

And, while a location in other respects in conformity to law, which is greater in length or width than the law permits, is not, for the mere error in that respect, void, except as to the excess, if a location is so excessive in length that a person measuring from the stakes at one end of the claim the required distance in the direction indicated by the notice does not find the other end stakes, or anything else to guide him to the place where the stakes may be found, he may reasonably conclude that such other corner stakes have not been set; and in such case the location is void. Ledoux v. Forester, 94 Fed. 600.

So, the act of the locator of a mining claim which was greatly in excess of the statutory limit, who, on attempting to sell the same, discovered the excess, of procuring a third person to locate a part of the original tract in his own name for the purpose of making the conveyance, constitutes a positive assertion on his part unequivocally indicating where the excess of the original location was, which precludes him from shifting it to another segment thereof; so that, on its appearing that the location by the third person was void, a subsequent locator is entitled to claim that portion of the original location as excess. Gohres v. Illinois Min. Co. supra.

3. Of placer claim.

Prior to the act of Congress of July 9, 1870 (U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2330, 2331. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1432), there were no limits to the area of placer mines, except such as were imposed by the miners by their local rules and regulations. Price v. McIntosh, 1 Alaska, 286.

By that act it was provided that no location of a placer-mining claim shall include more than 20 acres for each individual claimant, and that no location of a placer-mining claim shall include more than 160 acres for any one person or association of persons.

The policy of the government, in the enactment of that law, was to make a general distribution among as large a number as possible of those who wished to acquire such lands for their own use, rather than to favor a few individuals who might wish to acquire princely fortunes by securing large tracts of such lands. Durant v. Corbin, 94 Fed. 382.

And under it a placer location cannot exceed 20 acres for each individual locator. Mitchell v. Cline, 84 Cal. 409, 24 Pac. 164; Kirk v. Meldrum, 28 Colo. 453, 65 Pac. 633; Re Regulations Circular June 24, 1899, ¶ 35, 28 Land Dec. 599; Re Mineral Land Circular, ¶ 35, 25 Land Dec. 573.

And a location by two persons cannot exceed 40 acres, and one by three persons cannot exceed 60 acres, and so on. Ibid.

And it cannot exceed 160 acres in any one claim. Kirk v. Meldrum, supra.

Nor can one person be permitted to locate more than 20 acres of placer ground by one location, by the device of using the names of his employees and friends. Durant v. Corbin, supra.

And the statutory prohibition limiting the amount which can be located to 20 acres of land applies to a location made by three persons for and in the interest of a company. Gird v. California Oil Co. 60 Fed. 531.

An excess over 20 acres in a placer-mining location, however, does not invalidate it, but merely renders it voidable as to the excess. Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. 60 C. C. A. 155, 123 Fed. 209; Pratt v. United Alaska Min. Co. 1 Alaska, 95.

And, if an individual becomes the purchaser and possessor of separate mining claims of 20 acres each or less, he may be permitted to include in his application for a patent any number of such claims contiguous to each other, not exceeding in the aggregate 160 acres. Re Circular of Instructions, 1 Land Dec. 695.

But, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1873 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2347, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1440), giving every person who is a citizen, or who has declared his intention to become such, a right to enter by legal subdivisions any quantity of vacant coal lands of the United States, not otherwise appropriated or reserved by competent authority, and under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2350 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1441) thereof, authorizing only one entry by the same person or association of persons,—where members of a corporation and its employees were its agents in obtaining from the government for it coal lands that could not rightfully have been entered in its own name, the corporation having already entered the full amount allowed by law, the lands obtained by the members and agents were fraudulently obtained, and patents therefor are void. United States v. Trinidad Coal & Coking Co. 137 U. S. 160, 34 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57, Reversing 37 Fed. 180.

And a corporation which has violated that act by procuring through its agents more than one entry of vacant coal lands can be required to surrender them before being reimbursed the amount expended by it in procuring the legal title. Ibid.

And where a person or company has entered as much coal land as the statute permits, a contract whereby another person is to enter additional coal land and obtain title and convey it to the other is invalid as contrary to public policy. Johnson v. Leonhard, 1 Wash. 564, 20 Pac. 591.

A miners' rule, regulation, or custom limiting one in the area of his claim to a placer mine, or in its width or length, however, has been held to be void as in conflict with both the spirit and the letter of placer-mining law. Price v. McIntosh, 1 Alaska, 286.

e. Fixing boundaries; swinging claim.

The Federal statutes, in the absence of mining rules and regulations, allow a prospector, after discovery of a vein, a reasonable time in which to develop its course, and then mark accordingly the boundaries of his claim. Burke v. McDonald, 2 Idaho, 679, 33 Pac. 49; Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 17 C. C. A. 190, 44 U. S. App. 204, 55 Fed. 11, 70 Fed. 455.

The surface claim is not required to be defined immediately upon the discovery of the vein. The locator is allowed a reasonable time for that purpose; and, in the meantime, he is protected in his claim to 1,500 feet of the vein. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442; Patterson v. Hitchcock, 3 Colo. 533.

And a notice of location posted at the discovery point, claiming 1,500 feet on the lode, vein, or deposit, is not subject to objection for indefiniteness previous to opportunity to disclose the direction of the lode by excavation. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560.

But a location is not complete until the surface claim is defined. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra.

So, in Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Elgin Min. & Smelting Co. 118 U. S. 196, 30 L. ed. 98, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177, it was said that, where a vein has been discovered, the rules of miners and the legislative regulations of mining states and territories generally allow some specified time for explorations, before the location is definitely marked.

What is a reasonable time within which to define the surface claim under this rule depends upon the circumstances affecting the ability of the locator to ascertain the course of the vein. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 70 Fed. 455.

And illness of the locator is not such a circumstance. The circumstances must be such as pertain to the ground to be located, its character, and the means of properly working it. Ibid.

And, in the absence of mining rules or regulations fixing the time within which the locator of a mining claim must establish the exterior boundaries thereof, thirty days is a reasonable time. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 55 Fed. 11.

So, under state statutes providing that any citizen who discovers a mineral-bearing vein or lode may locate a claim thereon by posting notices of such location at the point of discovery, which notice must contain the number of linear feet taken in length along the course of the vein or lode as near as may be; and, that before the expiration of a specified period from the date of posting such notice, there must be filed in the office of the county clerk of the county in which the lode or claim is situated a declaratory statement which must contain such a description of the location as will identify the claim,—the locator may, within the statutory period after his discovery and the posting of such notice, swing his claim in any direction required to include the vein within its boundaries, so as to take in ground not embraced in the notice of discovery, and this though the notice laid the course to the points of the compass; no bad faith being shown. Sanders v. Noble, 22 Mont. 110, 55 Pac. 1037.

And, under Mont. Comp. Stat. div. 5, § 1477, providing that the discoverer of a mining claim shall have twenty days in which to complete the location and make the necessary record, a discoverer who posted a notice of location claiming 1,500 feet "on this lead with twenty days for prospecting," in good faith and with an intention to complete the location within the prescribed time, thereby acquired a right to all the ground along the lead legitimately covered by the notice; and one subsequently locating thereon did not acquire a superior title, though he filed his statement and record within 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) twenty days, and the former did not. Bramlett v. Flick, 23 Mont. 95, 57 Pac. 869.

So, the object of the Colorado statute requiring a discovery shaft or other discovery work is to ascertain the true course of the lode discovered so as to enable the locator to mark the boundaries of the location, and the claim is protected during the statutory period provided therefor. Omar v. Soper, 11 Colo. 388, 7 Am. St. Rep. 246, 18 Pac. 443.

Where the location of a mining claim has been completed, however, the locator thereof cannot afterwards change the lines of his claim so as to take in other ground when such change will interfere with the rights acquired by others in the meantime. Cresus Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. v. Colorado Land & Mineral Co. 19 Fed. 78.

And, under the Federal statutes with reference to the location of mining claims unaided by any local rules, the locator of a mining claim is bound by the marking out of a surface claim and the working of the lode within its boundaries; and the lines fixed by the monuments on the ground cannot be changed so as to interfere with other claims subsequently located. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312.

And a locator who, at the time of posting his notice, in addition to giving the general course of his vein, places monuments at the center of each end line, thus definitely giving notice to subsequent locators as to the meaning and intent of the language used in his notice as to the general course of his location, is bound by the location thus made and defined; and he may not thereafter, and during the ninety days permitted for the perfection of his location, change the course of his location to the prejudice of intervening rights. Wiltsee v. King of Arizona Min. & Mill. Co. 7 Ariz. 95, 60 Pac. 896.

Nor can a prospector who has made a discovery after posting his notice leave his claim incomplete, and go in quest of other claims, and post his notices here and there over the country to the exclusion of other prospectors, and at his leisure prospect and mark out his claims. Burke v. McDonald, 2 Idaho, 679, 33 Pac. 49.

And the location of a vein or lode as running in a certain direction, not marked or developed for years, but simply indicated by the notice, is invalid as against a claim subsequently located on ground different from that indicated, after a development of the latter claim without objection, although subsequent explorations of the first location disclose the fact that the vein in its true course covers the subsequent claim. O'Reilly v. Campbell, 116 U. S. 418, 29 L. ed. 669, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221.

So, Mont. Pol. Code, § 3610, providing that any discoverer of a mineral deposit may locate a claim on a vein, lode, or deposit by posting a certain notice showing the number of linear feet claimed in length along the course of the vein each way from the point of discovery, with the width on each side from the center of the vein, and the general course of the vein or lode as near as may be; and § 3611 thereof, as amended by Sess. Laws 1901, p. 140, requiring the locator, within sixty days from the posting of the notice, to do certain discovery work on the claim,—do not empower a locator, by posting his notice, to withdraw absolutely from the public domain and appropriate for a period of sixty days an area thereof equal to a circle whose radius is the longest distance claimed along the lode from the point of discovery, so that any other location made on any part of this area during this period is invalid; they only preclude trespassers from the acquisition of rights within such area which would interfere or conflict with the right of the prior discoverer to swing his claim so as to lay it along a lead after his explorations demonstrate the strike; and, after the first discoverer has completed his work and located his claim, a junior discoverer is secure in any location made by him in the meantime upon other portions of the area, not in conflict with the rights of the first discoverer; and where, in such case, the first discoverer fails to fulfil the conditions subsequent by the completion of his location after posting his notice, such failure does not cause lands within his circle, located by the junior discoverer, to revert to the public domain, so as to defeat the junior location. Helena Gold & I. Co. v. Baggaley (Mont.) 87 Pac. 455.

The purpose of these statutes, together with § 3612 thereof, providing that within ninety days there must be filed in the office of the county clerk a statement showing the number of linear feet claimed in length of the lode along the course of the vein each way from the point of discovery, with the width on each side of the center of the vein, and the general course of the lode or vein, the dimensions and location of the discovery shaft, or its equivalent, is that the claim may be identified by the notice, so that one going on the ground with it may find the claim and know from the evidence there found that the statute has been complied with, and to do away with the practice, previously prevailing, whereby one person, with little labor, could make a number of locations in the same locality, and thus withdraw from exploration by other prospectors a large area of the public land. Ibid.

In the above case, it was said that, if Sanders v. Noble, 22 Mont. 115, 55 Pac. 1037, and Bramlett v. Flick, supra, are to be understood as declaring the law to be that the posting of the preliminary notice effects for the time being an absolute withdrawal of the whole area of the circle for exploration, they are in conflict with the decision of Lavagnino v. Uhlig, 198 U. S. 443, 49 L. ed. 1119, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 716, supra, V. a., 3, (b), and that they must be construed as modified so as to conform to this decision.

So, in Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 496, 48 Pac. 488, it was held that persons completing the location of a mining claim in a proper manner were entitled to hold it as against another who had previously made a discovery thereon, the case appearing to 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

turn on the question of priority of marking the ground.

And in Patterson v. Tarbell, 26 Or. 29, 37 Pac. 76, the opposing rule, that a discoverer is not entitled to a reasonable time in which to continue his explorations, and trace the course or strike of the vein or lode, in the absence of local rules or regulations governing the matter; but that he must immediately mark the claim upon the ground in order to hold it against a subsequent location peaceably made,—was announced and acted upon.

In the above case, Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 444, supra, was explained, the court saying that there was a dictum in that case to the effect that a discoverer of a vein might have a reasonable time to trace its course before being compelled to define his surface claim, but that no such question was presented by the record. And Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Elgin Min. & Smelting Co. 118 U. S. 198, 30 L. ed. 98, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177, and Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560, supra, were distinguished upon the ground that they both arose under the laws of Colorado, which allowed the discoverer a specified time for exploration before marking the boundaries of his claim. And Field v. Grey, 1 Ariz. 404, 25 Pac. 793, supra, VII, b, was distinguished on the ground that in that case the party in possession was held to have a right to hold the surface while he was seeking for a vein or lode believed to exist thereon, as against all parties not having a better right thereto; which is simply an application of the general doctrine that one in possession of real property may hold the possession as against all persons except those who can show a better right.

Marking boundaries on the ground evidences, and logically follows, and is clearly connected with, the location of the boundaries of a mining claim; and the subdivision of this note with reference to time of marking boundaries on the ground, infra, XI, c, should be considered in this connection.

f. Laying over adjoining claims.

1. Right to overlap.

A locator of a mining claim may, for the purpose of conforming to the Federal statute by making his end lines parallel, and in order to include all the unoccupied surface to which he is entitled, with all the underground and extralateral rights which attach to possession and ownership of the surface, lay any of his lines or corners within, upon, or across the surface of a valid senior location, or of other private property, where he claims only unoccupied ground; and this can be done without objection on the part of the owner. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State Idaho Min. & Developing Co. 106 Fed. 471, Reversed on other grounds 52 C. C. A. 219, 114 Fed. 417; Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min.

& Developing Co. 134 Fed. 268; Del Monte Min. & Mill. Co. v. Last Chance Min. & Mill. Co. 171 U. S. 55, 43 L. ed. 72, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 895; Re Stranger Lode, 28 Land Dec. 322; Re Hallett & Hambur Lodes, 27 Land Dec. 104; Re Hidden Treasure Lode, 29 Land Dec. 156; Re Grassy Gulch Placer Claim, 30 Land Dec. 191.

And an objection by the owner of a mining location to the act of another in locating a mining claim, of overlapping his claim for the purpose of securing extralateral rights, to be effectual, must be made at the time of the location of the overlapping claim; subsequent objections are of no effect. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. 134 Fed. 268.

Though a mining location is laid largely upon previously appropriated ground, where the discovery shaft is located, and the discovery is made, not within the boundaries of any other claim, but upon unappropriated land, the location vests in the locator all the unappropriated public land within its limits, and every vein whose apex is found in such unappropriated public land within the surface lines of the claim thus secured, extended downward vertically, whether it is all or only part of the tract within the boundary lines of the claim. Crown Point Min. Co. v. Buck, 38 C. C. A. 278, 97 Fed. 463.

And this is the rule though the unclaimed ground occupied by the apex is but 10 feet, and the overlap is 1.490 feet. Bunker Hill & S. Min. Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. supra.

Where the end lines of a mining claim are substantially parallel with each other the requirements of the law are satisfied; and the fact that one end of the claim extends beyond, or is intercepted by, another claim, may be disregarded. Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787.

And locating a mining claim so that one corner thereof is cut off by a senior claim does not make it a five-sided figure without parallel end lines, which will give the locator no extralateral right to follow his lode or vein on its dip; in such case an end line may be drawn at the point where the vein or lode passes out of the junior location into the senior one. Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, 4 C. C. A. 329, 7 U. S. App. 463, 54 Fed. 284.

Nor does the requirement of the Federal statute that a location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced make it necessary that the marks should be upon the actual ground included within the mining claim; they may be upon any ground adjoining, near enough readily to designate the boundaries. West Granite Mountain Min. Co. v. Granite Mountain Min. Co. 7 Mont. 356, 17 Pac. 547.

And the facts that a stake of a mining claim was placed on another existing claim, and that a portion of the claim sought to be located is included within the existing claim as marked on the ground, do not invalidate the location, where the locator intended to claim only that portion of the premises not in conflict with the other claim. Perigo v. Erwin, 85 Fed. 904; Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 55 Fed. 11; West Granite Mountain Min. Co. v. Granite Mountain Min. Co. supra.

In West Granite Mountain Min. Co. v. Granite Mountain Min. Co. supra, Hauswirth v. Butcher, 4 Mont. 307, 1 Pac. 714, supra, X. d, 2, (c), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the stakes were set beyond the limits fixed by the statute, while in this case they were set within the statutory limits, but on adjoining claims.

Nor is the rule affected by the fact that the senior conflicting claim has been patented; and any of the location lines of a lode claim may, if established openly and peaceably, be laid within, upon, or across the surface of patented lode-mining claims for the purpose of embracing and including the discovery vein, and all other veins apexing within the free and unappropriated ground within such location lines, and the ground itself as well, and of defining and securing extralateral underground rights upon all such claims. Re Hidee Gold Min. Co. 30 Land Dec. 420, Apparently Overruling, though not mentioning, the contrary holding in Re Grassy Gulch Placer Claim, supra.

And the same rule applies to laying lines within, upon, or across the surface of patented agricultural lands. Re Alice Lode Mining Claim, 30 Land Dec. 481.

And a mining claim legally located may be surveyed according to the lines of the location as marked on the ground, though the survey lines may, in part or in whole, fall upon patented lands, where sufficient data are furnished thereby, or by the records of the surrounding or overlapping patented claims, considered in connection therewith, to enable the government in issuing its patent to make proper exclusion from the patent of all previously patented lands embraced within the exterior lines of the survey, and such a survey is regular and lawful as a basis for a patent. Re Mono Fraction Lode Mining Claim, 31 Land Dec. 122.

Nor does the fact that a location was made in the nighttime, and that by mistake its marks and boundaries were placed over and upon adjoining claims, affect the validity of the location, so far as the ground attempted to be located was vacant. Doe v. Tyler, 73 Cal. 21, 14 Pac. 375.

The lateral rights of the locator of a mining claim are not saved by the fact that his claim as located had parallel end lines, however, where he set his stakes upon another claim, and claimed some of the ground belonging to it, and, when compelled to relinquish such ground, his end line was destroyed. Montana Co. v. Clark, 42 Fed. 626.

And the junior locator's rights do not extend beyond an end line passing through the point where the lode in its strike or onward course intersects the exterior line of the senior location. Re Consolidated Min. Co. 11 Land Dec. 250; Re Stranger Lode, 23

Land Dec. 322; Re Engineer Min. & Developing Co. 8 Land Dec. 361.

And a land-office regulation to this effect is not in conflict with, but is in conformity to, and in aid of, Federal statutory provisions restricting locations on veins or lodes to the public domain, and giving exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of the locations, and withholding from a locator or possessor of a vein or lode which extends in its downward course beyond the vertical lines of his claim the right to enter upon the surface of a claim owned or possessed by another. Re Correction Lode, 15 Land Dec. 67.

And in such case it is proper to require the end lines to be readjusted so as to be parallel. Re Engineer Min. & Developing Co. supra.

The surface right of a mining claim is simply an adjunct to the lode, and cannot extend beyond the point where the lode intersects the exterior line of a senior location. Re Plevna Lode, 11 Land Dec. 236; Re Correction Lode, supra.

Nor does the provision of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2336, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1436, for a right of way through a space of intersection, which divides the two sections of an intersected vein or lode for the purpose of conveniently working the mine, have any application to a case where the end of the lode claim is made to project into the surface of another prior claim. Re Correction Lode, supra.

So, where a person locates two mining claims which interfere with each other, the junior location includes only so much ground as is exclusive of the senior one. Golden Terra Min Co. v. Mahler, 4 Morrison, Min. Rep. 390.

A location of a mining claim conflicting with another prior location based upon a proper discovery, however, is valid against all persons except the prior locator; and, if the claim of the prior locator is abandoned, forfeited, or any part of the claim in conflict is not rightfully held by the prior locator, the subsequent location attaches to so much of the ground, not legally held by the prior locator, as is within the lines of the subsequent location. McPherson v. Julius, 17 S. D. 98, 95 N. W. 428.

And when part of the end of a location is adjudged to be in conflict with a prior claim, and thereupon the owners of the prior claim quitclaim the land in conflict to the owners of the junior claim, whose possession thereof is not interrupted, the location will continue to include the land in conflict. Cheesman v. Hart, 42 Fed. 98.

So, where a person located a mine so that one corner overlapped another's location, the fact that he did not contest the latter's right to the overlapping piece, and thereby allowed him to take it, does not deprive him of his right to draw the end line of his location so as to leave out the overlapping piece at or near the point where the lode actually passes out of the part retained by him, and thus save his extralateral rights to that point. Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, 4 C. C. A. 329, 7 U. S. App. 463, 54 Fed. 284.

2. Effect of intersection by senior claim.

Where a mining location is intercepted by another valid claim going through its perpendicularly or obliquely, the line of intersection becomes the end line of the location, where the location extends beyond the intersecting claim. Cheesman v. Hart, supra.

A person having a discovery on a small tract of land, in which there is a vein or lode, cannot make a valid location on that vein or lode of a portion of the land not contiguous, and separated therefrom by lands held and owned by others. Re Griffin, 2 Land Dec. 736; Re Silver Queen Lode, 16 Land Dec. 186. And see Re Tomera Placer Claim, 33 Land Dec. 560, supra, X. c. 1.

A lode claim which is divided into two parts by an intersecting patented mill site is good only as to that part which contains the discovery shaft and improvements. Re Andromeda Lode, 13 Land Dec. 146; Re Howard, 15 Land Dec. 504; Re Mabel Lode, 26 Land Dec. 675.

And a lode-mining claim intersected by a mill site can stand for only one of the two parts, and the discovery of mineral must appear on the part sought to be sustained. Re Paul Jones Lode, 28 Land Dec. 120.

And, where there is a conflict between a mining claim and a prior pre-emption claim the lands embraced within the mining claim, that lie beyond the point where the lode or vein intersects the pre-emption claim, must be excluded from the mineral survey. Re Bi-metallic Min. Co. 15 Land Dec. 309.

Nor does the provision of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2336, relative to the priority of title upon the intersection of two or more veins, have any application to, or affect, a lode claim divided into two parts by an intersecting patented mill site, so as to save the part not containing the discovery shaft and improvements. Re Andromeda Lode, supra.

But, where two veins intersect, the junior location has, by the provision of that act, a right of way through the space of intersection for the purpose of convenient working of a mine; and an entry based upon such subsequent location might be allowed for noncontiguous portions of ground. Re Silver Queen Lode, supra.

And, where a lode-mining claim is located across a mill-site claim so that the mill-site claim divides it into two parts, if the same lode or vein, upon the discovery of which on one side of the mill site location was based, has also been discovered in the ground on the other side of the mill site, the patented mill site furnishes no valid objection to the validity of the location. Re Paul Jones Lode, 31 Land Dec. 359.

So, in a proper case a location of a mining claim may be extended to include land properly subject to location, entirely across a prior excluded location and the end line established at a point within a junior excluded location. Re War Dance Lode, 29 Land

Dec. 256; Re Hustler & New Year Lode Claims, 29 Land Dec. 668.

And a lode-mining claim so located as to cross and overlap a prior valid location entitles the locator to the lode throughout its entire depth, up to the point where in its onward course or strike it intersects the side lines of the prior location and passes within it; and confers upon him the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of the location, except the parts within the excluded conflicts, and of all veins and lodes and ledges throughout their entire depth the top or apex of which lies within such surface lines. Re Hustler & New Year Lode Claims, supra.

And where a placer and a lode mining claim were so located that the placer claim cut the lode claim in two parts; and, on an application for a patent for the lode claim, the Land Department refused to patent the whole because of its division, but gave the locator the right to elect which of the two tracts should be patented,—the decision did not cancel the entry made by the plaintiff for the patent on the whole, and so long as no allegation was made by the locator and no further action taken by the Land Office, neither part of the location was restored to the public domain and reopened to location. Gurney v. Brown, 32 Colo. 472, 77 Pac. 357.

Where a lode-mining location is made across a patented mill site, and no vein or lode is shown to exist in the ground on the one side of the mill site, however, it cannot be presumed, merely from the discovery of the vein in the land on the other side of the mill site, in view of the fact that the mill site was patented as nonmineral ground, that the vein so discovered passes through the mill site and extends into the ground on the other side thereof. Re Paul Jones Lode, supra.

XI. Marking upon the ground.

a. Provision for and purpose of.

It is provided by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, that the location of a mining claim must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced.

And this proposition has been announced in words, or in substance, in many cases, among which are, Elgin Min. & Smelting Co. v. Iron Silver Min. Co. 4 McCrary, 279, 14 Fed. 377, Affirmed in 118 U. S. 196, 30 L. ed. 98, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177; Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 17 C. C. A. 190, 44 U. S. App. 204, 70 Fed. 455, Affirming 55 Fed. 11; Erwin v. Perego, 35 C. C. A. 482, 93 Fed. 608, Affirming 85 Fed. 905; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Reilly v. Berry, 2 Ariz. 272, 15 Pac. 26; Blackmore v. Reilly, 2 Ariz. 442, 17 Pac. 72; Eaton v. Norris, 131 Cal. 561, 63 Pac. 856; Daggett v. Yreka Min. & Mill. Co. (Cal.) 86 Pac. 968; Sweet v. Webber, 7 Colo. 443, 4 Pac. 752; Gilpin County Min. Co. v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Drake, 8 Colo. 586, 9 Pac. 787; Hauswirth v. Butcher, 4 Mont. 299, 1 Pac. 714; Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713; Kahn v. Old Teleg. Min. Co. 2 Utah, 174; Hansen v. Fletcher, 10 Utah, 266, 37 Pac. 480.

In Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. supra, it was said that it cannot be asserted that Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187, 23 Pac. 361, overruled earlier California cases asserting this requirement, since the question presented in that case was the sufficiency of a location notice under the local rules of the district, and not as to the markings of the boundary of a claim.

The object of the law in requiring the location of a mining claim to be marked upon the ground is to fix the claim and prevent swinging or floating, so that those who, in good faith, are looking for unoccupied ground in the vicinity of previous locations, may be able to ascertain exactly what has been appropriated, in order to make their locations upon the residue. Book v. Justice Min. Co. and Daggett v. Yreka Min. & Mill. Co. supra; Sanders v. Noble, 22 Mont. 110, 55 Pac. 1037; Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442.

This provision has been repeated in words, or in substance, by the statutes of a number of the mining states and territories; and a number of them have supplemented the requirement of the Federal statute by specifying the particular manner in which a claim shall be marked, and such supplementary provisions have been acted upon and sustained by both the local and the Federal courts, see infra, XI. d, 2.

The right of a state to pass acts supplementing the Federal mining law with reference to marking boundaries is recognized by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324. Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah. 410, 64 Pac. 1019.

And local rules and regulations with reference to marking mining claims have been widely adopted, and their validity has been sustained. Myers v. Spooner, 55 Cal. 257.

b. Necessity of compliance.

Compliance with the requirement that the location of a mining claim must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced, is necessary to its validity. Sanders v. Noble, supra; Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444; Gelcich v. Moriarty, 53 Cal. 217; Redden v. Harlan, 2 Alaska, 402; Bulette v. Dodge, 2 Alaska, 427; Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532.

It is a prerequisite to the vesting in a competent locator of a complete possessory title to a lode-mining claim. Erwin v. Perego and Sweet v. Webber, supra.

The ultimate fact in determining the validity of location of a mining claim is the placing of such marks upon the ground as to identify the claim. Eaton v. Norris, supra.

And evidence of the staking of a mining location is competent, in an action of forcible entry and detainer brought by the locator, to show the extent of the claimant's possession. Boardman v. Thompson, 3 Mont. 387.

A location is not complete until it is distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra.

And failure so to mark off the boundaries invalidates the claim. White v. Lee, 78 Cal. 593, 12 Am. St. Rep. 115, 21 Pac. 363; Anthony v. Jillson, 83 Cal. 293, 23 Pac. 419; Gelcich v. Moriarty, supra.

Since the passage of the act of Congress (Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426), providing that the location of a mining claim must be definitely marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced, a party can show a right to the possession of a mining claim when no patent has been issued, only by showing actual possession, as against a mere wrongdoer, or a compliance with the regulations of that act. Funk v. Sterrett, 59 Cal. 613.

Nor is the failure to mark the location of a mining claim upon the ground cured by an admission, upon the trial of an action involving the issue of location, that the boundaries of the claim were identical with those of the ground sued for, the objection going to the regularity of the location. Sweet v. Webber, 7 Colo. 443, 4 Pac. 752.

The boundaries of a mining claim are fixed by the original location, consisting of recording a notice, planting stakes, etc., and not by subsequent recognition of different boundaries. Overman Silver Min. Co. v. American Min. Co. 7 Nev. 312.

Though evidence of the erection of a compromise monument along the alleged line between two disputed claims, offered not for the purpose of establishing a boundary, but to show that the parties ran lines by agreement, so as not to interfere with each other, and placed the monument for the purpose of showing that they had done so, and for the purpose of showing where the location was as it was understood by all the parties, is not subject to objection as an attempt to establish the location of a mining claim by parol. Stemwinder Min. Co. v. Emma & L. C. Consol. Min. Co. 2 Idaho, 456, 21 Pac. 1040, Affirmed in 149 U. S. 787, 37 L. ed. 960, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1052.

Nor is a location of a mining claim valid where local rules and regulations requiring the boundaries to be marked with a ditch and with stakes placed at the corners were not complied with. Myers v. Spooner, supra.

And the circumstance that ground located as a mining claim was extremely rough and mountainous does not relieve the locator of the obligation imposed upon him by law so to mark the boundaries that the location can be readily traced. Gird v. California Oil Co. 60 Fed. 531.

A subsequent locator of a mining claim cannot object that a prior location thereof was not sufficiently marked on the ground at the time of its location, however, where such prior location was sufficiently marked before the subsequent locator made any location or acquired any rights. North Noon- 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

day Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666.

And the failure of a locator of a mining claim to mark the location upon the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced does not prevent a successor in interest, entering into possession of part of the claim under a deed conveying the whole property by metes and bounds, from having constructive possession, which will entitle him to maintain ejectment against an intruder who subsequently attempts location, but fails to mark the boundaries of his location upon the ground. Neubaumer v. Woodman, 89 Cal. 310, 26 Pac. 900.

Nor is it necessary that the marking of the location of a mining claim on the ground be done by the locator in person; it may be done by his agent or employees. Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. 60 C. C. A. 155, 123 Fed. 209.

And a finding, in a suit to quiet title to mining claims, that the marks of location were of such a character that it is evident that the boundaries can be readily traced, is sufficient; and in such case, if there is, in addition to the special finding, a general finding to the contrary, the general finding will be disregarded or set aside. Eaton v. Norris, 131 Cal. 561, 63 Pac. 856; Howeth v. Sullenger, 113 Cal. 547, 45 Pac. 841.

c. Time of.

Where the time within which a location must be marked upon the ground is expressly prescribed by a state statute, a proper marking within the prescribed time is sufficient. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560. Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860; Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah, 410, 64 Pac. 1019.

And the rule has been asserted that, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2320, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424, providing that no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of the lode or vein within the limits of the claim located; and that the location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries may be readily traced,—a locator has a reasonable time after discovery in which to mark the boundaries of his claim. Union Min. & Mill. Co. v. Leitch, 24 Wash. 585, 85 Am. St. Rep. 961, 64 Pac. 829; Burke v. McDonald, 2 Idaho, 679, 33 Pac. 49.

Under this rule, where a prospector discovered mineral on the 16th day of September, and set discovery stakes then, and partially staked and marked his claim on the 17th, and on the 18th completed the staking and marking according to law, the discovery and location date from the 16th of September, and take precedence over any other discovery or location made after that date on the same, or part of the same, ground. Burke v. McDonald, 3 Idaho, 296, 29 Pac. 98.

And eight days in which to mark the boundaries of a mining claim upon the ground after discovery is not an unreasonable time, where, after discovery, the provisions of the locator and his party ran out, and they were compelled to go to the nearest supply station to renew their supply. Union Min. & Mill. Co. v. Leitch, supra.

In the above case, Newbill v. Thurston, 65 Cal. 419, 4 Pac. 409, and Patterson v. Tarbell, 26 Or. 29, 37 Pac. 76, supra, were disapproved as overlooking the general rule, that, when no time is limited for the doing of an act, a reasonable time therefor is impliedly given.

But, even under this rule, the law does not permit a discoverer, after having posted his notice, to leave his claim incomplete and go in quest of other claims, and post his notices here and there over the country, to the exclusion of other prospectors, and at his leisure prospect and mark out his claims. Burke v. McDonald, 2 Idaho, 679, 33 Pac. 49.

What constitutes a reasonable time after discovery within which to mark the boundaries of a mining claim upon the ground in this connection is a question of law, depending upon the circumstances of each particular case. Union Min. & Mill. Co. v. Leitch, supra.

On the other hand, however, the contrary rule has been asserted, that a person locating a mining claim must, under the act of Congress of May 10, 1872, in the absence of any organized mining district governed by miners' rules, as soon as the claim is discovered, mark off its boundaries on the ground; and that he is not entitled to a reasonable time after the discovery in which to continue his explorations and trace the course or strike of the vein or lode before being required to mark his boundaries on the ground. Patterson v. Tarbell, supra.

And that, where two parties claim to have made locations of a mining claim in themselves valid, and the question is, Which of the two has made the prior location?—the prior actual or constructive possession, evidenced by posting a notice and marking the boundaries in the manner required by statute, must prevail, at least unless there has been unreasonable delay in recording the notice. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401.

This rule is based upon the theory that the act of Congress authorizing the location of mining claims is, in effect, an offer by the government to grant to its citizens and to those who have declared an intention of becoming such a certain definite portion of the public mineral lands, on condition that a discovery of a mineral-bearing lode or vein is made thereon, and the surface of the ground claimed along such vein or lode is distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced; and, until these conditions are complied with, no right is conferred as against another valid location. Patterson v. Tarbell, supra.

And under it, it is held that a notice posted on the ground, with reference to location of a mining claim, gives no information, and is of no effect, unless it appears that the party posting it is proceeding to indicate with reasonable diligence, or is about to indicate, the boundaries by marking them. Gregory v. Pershbaker, supra.

Where a person is on the ground actually engaged in making a location, however, another cannot locate over him. Newbill v. Thurston, 65 Cal. 419, 4 Pac. 409.

And where a discovery of mineral has been made, and a proper notice of location filed, the claim is good and valid if the boundaries are marked on the ground before intervening rights have accrued. Brockbank v. Albion Min. Co. 29 Utah, 367, 81 Pac. 863.

A subsequent locator of a mining claim cannot object that a prior location was not marked in time, provided it was sufficiently marked before his location. Crown Point Min. Co. v. Crismon, 39 Or. 364, 65 Pac. 87.

And this is so though the statute prescribes certain conditions which must be performed in order properly to locate a mining claim, and provides that a failure to comply therewith shall annul every attempted location. SHARKEY v. CANDIANI.

But a locator of a mining claim, who delays marking the boundaries thereof, delays at his peril, since he thereby assumes the risk of intervening rights of third persons. Brockbank v. Albion Min. Co. supra.

On this question, see also supra, IX. f, and infra, XIV. a.

d. Sufficiency of.

1. Under the Federal statute.

(a) General rules.

Any marking upon the ground, whether by stakes, monuments, mounds, or written notices, whereby the boundaries of a mining claim can be readily traced, is a sufficient compliance with U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, requiring that the location shall be distinctly marked on the ground. Oregon King Min. Co. v. Brown, 55 C. C. A. 626, 119 Fed. 48; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666.

The statute does not require that the boundary lines shall be indicated by physical marks or monuments. Oregon King Min. Co. v. Brown, supra.

The marking on the ground may be by any physical marks placed upon the ground, or natural objects already there, which of themselves, or in connection with writings, signs, or other things upon the ground, will tend to inform one seeking to identify the claim as to the quantity and identity of the land claimed. Worthen v. Sidway, 72 Ark. 215, 79 S. W. 777.

And the physical marks or natural objects which may be used to mark a mining claim may be stakes driven in the ground, stone monuments, blazed trees, confluences of streams, mining shafts, mountain peaks, crossings of roads, or streams. Ibid.

Nor, in determining whether the marking of a location is sufficient, is the court confined to the monuments placed at the corners of the claim at the inception of the location for the purpose of marking it; it may consider, also, all other objects placed on the ground, either then or subsequently, prior to the inception of the conflicting claims, for the purpose of serving either as monuments, or otherwise. Eaton v. Norris, 131 Cal. 561, 63 Pac. 856.

And a location of a mining claim by the adoption of stakes already upon the ground, which so distinctly mark the location that the boundaries can be readily traced, is not open to the objection that the locator should have actually put up new stakes. Conway v. Hart, 129 Cal. 483, 62 Pac. 44.

So, the locator of a mining claim, in marking his claim on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced, need not be exact in running the lines or in fixing the corner or other posts; substantial compliance with the law is sufficient. Eilers v. Boatman, 3 Utah, 159, 2 Pac. 66.

To be valid, however, a mining locator must so mark his claim upon the ground that any person of reasonable intelligence can go upon the ground, either with or without a copy of the notice of location, and readily trace the claim out and find its boundaries and limits. Willeford v. Bell (Cal.) 49 Pac. 6.

The requirement that the location of a mining claim must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced, is intended to require that the boundaries shall be so designated by marks that they can be ascertained by an inspection of the ground without the aid of a surveyor, and can be readily traced thereby. Worthen v. Sidway, supra.

And whether a witness found the boundaries of a claim without assistance, and whether the blazing upon the posts appeared to be old or new, and whether the marks on the boundaries of the claim appeared to be old or new, and whether he could readily find the blazes on the trees along the end line, and whether they could be traced or observed from one to the other,—are questions of fact, and not objectionable as calling for the opinion of the witness. Bramlett v. Flick, 23 Mont. 95, 57 Pac. 869.

In the above case, Dillon v. Bayliss, 11 Mont. 171, 27 Pac. 725, supra, VIII. d, 3, (a), was distinguished and explained upon the ground that in that case the question whether the opinions of engineers or prospectors can be admitted for such a purpose was reserved for the court.

The question as to the sufficiency of the marking of a mining claim to enable the location to be traced always depends, to a great extent, upon the conformation and condition of the ground located. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532.

If the condition of land upon which a mining location was made was such that a person passing over the land could see nothing to indicate that another had made a location; or if whatever had been done toward such a location at some prior time was so hidden that persons honestly looking for mineral lands upon which to locate could not be expected to observe it, it would not be such a location as the statute contemplates, and as would sever the particular tract from the mineral lands of the United States; and it would not avail against a person in good faith, making a subsequent location according to law. Moore v. Steelsmith, 1 Alaska, 121.

And a location of a mining claim on a hill covered with a dense forest might require more definite marking than a location on a bald mountain, where the stakes, wherever placed, could be readily seen. Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra.

So, where the country is broken, and the view on a mining location from one corner to another is obstructed by intervening gulches and timber and brush, in marking the location it is necessary to blaze trees along the lines, or cut away the brush, or set more stakes at such distances that they may be seen from one to another, or dig up the ground in a way to indicate the lines, so that the boundaries may be readily traced. Ledoux v. Forester, 94 Fed. 600; Charlton v. Kelly, supra.

And a mining claim the locators of which marked their boundaries with stakes so as to include 1,763 feet in length, the statute limiting a lode location to 1,500 feet in length, is not sufficiently marked on the ground within the meaning of the statute, and is void for uncertainty. Leggatt v. Stewart, 5 Mont. 107, 2 Pac. 320.

But a mining claim is sufficiently marked on the ground where the stakes and monuments are set at accessible places, and the inaccessible parts are distinctly referred to by courses and distances, which are sufficient to point out, to anyone honestly endeavoring to ascertain, where the lines of the claim run. Eilers v. Boatman, supra.

Whether or not a mining claim is so marked upon the ground that its boundaries can be readily traced is a question of fact to be determined from proof aliunde. Farmington Gold Min. Co. v. Rhymney Gold & Copper Co. 20 Utah, 363, 77 Am. St. Rep. 913, 58 Pac. 832.

And it is one for the jury in ejectment. Charlton v. Kelly, supra.

(b) Particular marking.

Fencing a mining claim is not necessary to the possession thereof if its boundaries are sufficiently marked in some other way. Rogers v. Cooney, 7 Nev. 213; Garrard v. Silver Peak Mines, 82 Fed. 578, Affirmed in 36 C. C. A. 603, 94 Fed. 983.

And as a general rule stakes and stone monuments placed at each corner of a mining claim, and at the center of the end lines, is a sufficient marking of the boundary lines under the Federal statutes. Southern Cross Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Europa Min. Co. 15 Nev. 383; Howeth v. Sullenger, 113 Cal. 547, 45 Pac. 841.

Nor need corner stakes of a mining location be marked with the name of the claim, unless the boundaries could not be readily traced without it. Smith v. Newell, 86 Fed. 56.

And where the relative position of stakes of a mining claim showed their connection and indicated a parallelogram, and the discovery notice nailed on the discovery stake and placed within the parallelogram gave all the information that the markings on the stakes would have given, and there is no difficulty in seeing the corner stakes, the claim is sufficiently marked on the ground, though its name was not marked on the corner stakes. Ibid.

So, where two claims adjoin each other, and each is marked at the corners by four oak stakes about 1½ feet in length, flattened on two sides and driven into the ground 4 or 5 inches, two of them being at the ends of the dividing line and common to both claims; and some of the stakes are in brush and others in open ground; and in the middle of the dividing line is an oak tree blazed on two sides, on which the notices of location are posted; and in these the claims are described respectively by courses and distances, running from the tree to a stake, and from stake to stake to the point of beginning; and there is also opened up and uncovered a ledge a considerable distance from the tree each way; and a house is built upon one of the claims near the common boundary,—the marking is sufficient. Eaton v. Norris, 131 Cal. 561, 63 Pac. 856.

And proof that monuments were erected at the center of each end of mining claims, and also at each of the four corners of the claims; and that notices of location were posted on the initial monument of each; and that the notices were duly recorded, and that they appeared to be sufficient in every respect,—is sufficient to sustain the location, as against the evidence of adverse claimants that they saw no other than the initial monuments, though they looked for them. Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488.

But the requirement of the mining laws that mining claims must be so marked upon the ground that the boundaries thereof can be readily traced is not fulfilled by simply setting a post at or near the place of discovery, and setting stakes at each of the corners of the claim and at the center of the end lines, unless the topography of the ground is such that a person accustomed to tracing the lines of mining claims could, after reading the description of the claim in the posted notice of location, by a reasonable and bona fide effort to do so, find all the stakes and thereby trace the lines. Ledoux v. Forester, supra; Taylor v. Middleton, 67 Cal. 656, 8 Pac. 594.

And whether or not the conformation of the land was such that monuments or stakes placed at the center of each end, and at each corner, of a mining claim, were such that the boundaries thereof might be readily traced, is a question for the jury on an issue as to the validity of a location. Taylor v. Middleton, supra.

So, where the corners of a mining location, only, are marked, and no side lines are laid down, the question whether or not the boundaries can be traced therefrom is one of fact for the trial court, in an action involving that issue. Du Prat v. James, 65 Cal. 555, 4 Pac. 562.

And where a mining claim upon a comparatively barren hillside was marked with stakes 2 by 4 inches and 4 feet long, posted one at each of the four corners, upon which stakes were letters or numbers designating the corners of the claim where the stakes were posted, and, at places where the stakes could not be driven in the ground because of the snow, monuments of rock were placed around them to hold them in place, and in the spring they were renewed, it was so marked that its boundaries could be readily traced, within the meaning of the statute. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

So, evidence, in an action to quiet title to a mining claim, that the locator marked the corners by placing a stake or blazing a tree at each corner of the claim, and in places brushed out the lines so that a person could get through, and placed a notice in the center of the claim defining its boundaries, is sufficient on the question of marking the location on the ground. Souter v. Maguire, 78 Cal. 543, 21 Pac. 183.

Nor is the mere fact that locators of a mining claim did not place a monument at a certain corner of the claim they intended to locate fatal to the location as a matter of law; it would still be good if it was so distinctly marked on the ground that its boundaries could be readily traced. Anderson v. Black, 70 Cal. 226, 11 Pac. 700.

The omission to stake one corner of a mining location does not invalidate it where the other three corners, the center of the two end lines, and the point of discovery were appropriately marked. Warnock v. DeWitt, 11 Utah, 324, 40 Pac. 205.

And evidence that a marked stake existed at a point other than that at which an adverse claimant claimed that it was located warrants evidence in rebuttal, that no such stake stood at such place. Chamberlain v. Raymond, 3 Utah, 117, 1 Pac. 850.

Whether or not the omission to mark a corner of a mining location is fatal, is a question for the jury, in an action involving the validity of the location. Anderson v. Black, supra.

So, the statutory requirement that the location of a mining claim must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced was not insufficiently complied with, as matter of law, because the corners only were established, and no side or end lines were in any way laid down; if the stakes or mounds at the corners were prominent and permanent monuments, by which, and the descriptions in the notices, the claims could be identified, it is sufficient. Du Prat v. James, supra.

Nor is a mining claim marked by means of two stakes at the ends of the claim on the lines of the croppings, and by a location monument at the point of discovery, without stakes at the corners, insufficiently marked on the ground so that its boundaries cannot be readily traced, where the claim is required to be in the form of a parallelogram with parallel ends, and to extend an equal distance each side of the vein. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442.

And, if the center line of the location of a lode claim lengthwise along the lode is marked by a prominent stake or monument at each end thereof, and upon one or both is placed a written notice showing that the locator claims the length of said line from stake to stake and a certain specified number of feet in width on each side of said line, the claim is so marked that the boundaries may be readily traced, within the requirement of the statute. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522.

But posting a notice on a tree at each end of a mining claim is not a sufficient compliance with the Federal statute. Holland v. Mt. Auburn Gold Quartz Min. Co. 53 Cal. 149.

Nor is the placing of a monument upon a vein in a mining claim, and the posting of a notice thereon claiming a certain number of feet each way, and a specified number on each side thereof, a sufficient marking of the boundaries thereof. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 17 C. C. A. 190, 44 U. S. App. 204, 70 Fed. 455, Affirming 55 Fed. 11; Worthen v. Sidway, 72 Ark. 215, 79 S. W. 777; Gelcich v. Moriarty, 53 Cal. 217.

Though this was sufficient previous to the enactment of the mineral law of 1872. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. supra.

And a location of a mining claim, made by posting a notice on a house on lands sought to be appropriated, without marking the location on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced, is insufficient, and confers no legal claim. Malecek v. Tinsley, 73 Ark. 610, 85 S. W. 81.

But, while posted notices of location of a mining claim cannot be substituted for the marking, they may be an aid in determining the situs of the monuments, and they constitute a part of the marking, as does every other object placed on the ground, if it in fact does help to mark it; and this may be of particular significance where the location is followed up by actual and continued working of the claim. Eaton v. Norris, 131 Cal. 561, 63 Pac. 856.

2. Under local statutes and miners' regulations.

In Colorado and Wyoming a mining claim is required by statute to have its boundaries so marked upon the surface as to be easily traced by means of six substantial stakes at the corners of the claim, and one at the center of each side line thereof, which stakes must be of substantial character, and sunk in the ground, and newed on the two sides of the corner stakes which are in toward the claim, and the side stakes on the sides which are toward the claim. Cheesman v. Shreeve, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

40 Fed. 787; Sherlock v. Leighton, 9 Wyo. 297, 63 Pac. 580, 934.

Statutory monuments substantially complying with these requirements control courses and distances; so that, where there is a variation between the course and distance given in the certificate of location and the monument on the ground, the latter will prevail. Pollard v. Shively, 5 Colo. 309.

And a stump of sufficient size and stability, standing at a point where a statutory post should be located in locating a mine, may be hewed, marked, and adopted as a location post; but the descriptive survey should give both its real and assigned character, otherwise it will not satisfy the call of the location certificate. Ibid.

But cutting a letter into the solid rock, either at the corner of a mining claim, or at a given distance therefrom, is not equivalent to a stake planted in the ground, or in a pile of stones, within the meaning of Mills's Case. Anno. Stat. § 3153, providing that the surface boundaries shall be marked by six substantial posts sunk in the ground; or, where it is practically impossible on account of bed rock to sink such posts, they may be placed in a pile of stones. Taylor v. Parenteau, 23 Colo. 368, 48 Pac. 505.

And the provision of that act, that, when one or more of the posts which must be erected for the purpose of marking the surface boundaries of a mining claim fall upon precipitous ground, and the proper placing of them is impracticable, or dangerous to life or limb, it shall be legal to place the post or posts at the nearest practicable point suitably marked to designate the proper place, cannot be invoked when the setting of the stake at the true corner is merely difficult or inconvenient. Beals v. Cone, 27 Colo. 473, 83 Am. St. Rep. 92, 62 Pac. 948; Cresus Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. v. Colorado Land & Mineral Co. 19 Fed. 78.

Nor does it apply where the place where the stake should be placed can be reached by a circuitous route, or by waiting until later in the season for the snow and ice to pass away. Cresus Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. v. Colorado Land & Mineral Co. supra.

And the fact that a corner of a mining claim falls upon a railroad embankment 12 or 15 feet in height does not excuse a failure to place a corner post at its proper place, unless it would be in such close proximity to the rails as to be interfered with by the passage of trains. Beals v. Cone, supra.

The requirement that the side posts of a mining location be placed in the center of the side lines, however, is satisfied if they are substantially in the center; but, where there is a discrepancy of 150 feet, they cannot be said to be in the center. Pollard v. Shively, supra.

And, where a mining claim is otherwise marked as required by statute, failure to place the side posts in the center of the side lines does not necessarily invalidate the location; it may still be good if the traceability of the side lines is not substantially impaired by the omission. Ibid.

And evidence of the marking of the boundaries of a mining claim located a number of years previously by setting posts in the ground at the four corners, and that each post was marked so as to indicate the particular corner which it represented, is sufficient to establish the proper marking of the claim, notwithstanding an uncertainty as to the placing of posts on the side lines. Sherlock v. Leighton, supra.

Omission to establish the center end posts or monuments is fatal to the location of a mining claim, however, under Bellinger & C. Or. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 3975, providing that the boundaries of a location shall, within thirty days after the posting of notice, be marked by six substantial posts projecting not less than 3 feet above the surface of the ground, and not less than 4 inches square or in diameter, or by substantial mounds of stone and earth at least 2 feet in height; and that one of such posts or mounds shall be established at each corner and one at each center end of the claim. Wright v. Lyons, 45 Or. 167, 77 Pac. 81.

But a mining claim at the discovery shaft of which a notice of location was posted, and the boundaries of which were defined by blazed trees, stakes, and stumps of small trees, the tops of which were cut off 4 to 6 feet above the ground and the stumps squared, is so marked that its boundaries can be readily traced, within the meaning of the statute. Allen v. Dunlap, 24 Or. 229, 33 Pac. 675.

And a finding that monuments marking a mining location were originally constructed in conformity to the requirements of local rules requiring them to be 2 feet high is warranted by evidence that the locator of the claim was seen at work building them, and that he was engaged long enough in making the location to have built the monuments the required height, and that they had withstood the storms of fourteen years, which were heavy in that locality, and that some of the monuments still stood at the height of 7 or 8 inches. Gird v. California Oil Co. 60 Fed. 531.

Nor does the fact that a center side line and stake of a mining location was fastened to a tree by small twigs, instead of being firmly set in the ground, as required by S. D. Comp. Laws, § 2002, invalidate the location as against a junior conflicting location, where it was properly staked before the junior conflicting location became a valid claim. McPherson v. Julius, 17 S. D. 98, 95 N. W. 428.

So. N. M. Sess. Laws 1889, chap. 25, § 2, requires the surface boundaries of all surface claims to be marked by four substantial posts, or four monuments of stone, at each corner, such posts or monuments to be plainly marked so as to indicate the direction of such claim from each; and omission to refer to this requirement in instructing on an issue as to the sufficiency of the marking of a mining location is error. Deeney v. Mineral Creek Mill Co. 11 N. M. 279, 67 Pac. 724.

And the phrase "stake off," in the mining regulations of a district requiring the locators of lode claims to post stakes, or otherwise indicate upon the surface the ground or the vein appropriated; and that no claim shall be regarded as valid unless staked off with the owner's name, giving the direction, length, width, and date when the same was made,—refers to marking the boundaries of the claim by stakes, or, at least, to the posting of stakes along the vein or its croppings, so as to indicate to other prospectors the ground intended to be appropriated; and the requirement is not satisfied by the erection of a single stake, denominated the discovery stake, containing a notice of discovery. Becker v. Pugh, 9 Colo. 589, 13 Pac. 906.

e. Marking placer claims.

The provisions of the Federal statutes with reference to the marking of a location of a mining claim upon the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced refer to placer as well as to lode claims. Sweet v. Webber, 7 Colo. 443, 4 Pac. 752; Worthen v. Sidway, 72 Ark. 215, 79 S. W. 777.

And the necessity of marking off the boundaries of a mining claim so that they can be readily traced is not dispensed with by the fact that the public surveys have been extended over the land, and the claim is for the whole of a legal subdivision. White v. Lee, 78 Cal. 593, 12 Am. St. Rep. 115, 21 Pac. 363; Worthen v. Sidway, supra. Contra, Reins v. Murray, 22 Land Dec. 409.

And merely posting a notice on a tree on lands sought to be appropriated as a placer-mining claim is not a proper location. Worthen v. Sidway, supra.

But where a person locating a mining claim cut off a standing tree some 6 feet above the earth, hewed the side thereof, and wrote a notice upon the tree, claiming a certain number of feet up the creek and 330 feet on each side, making a claim of 20 acres as described in the notice; and at the upper end of the claim a tree was cut in the same way, hewed on four sides, and a notice posted thereon, showing this to be the upper end of the claim, its width, the names of the claimants, etc., the location is so marked that the boundaries may be readily traced, in compliance with the Federal law. Moore v. Steelsmith, 1 Alaska, 121.

Nor is a placer-mining claim, marked by a blazed tree at a point where the notice of location was posted, and on one of the boundary lines, and by three corner stakes placed at specified distances from the notice and from each other, the distance of the lines leading to and from a corner at which no stake was placed being accurately stated, insufficient, within this requirement. Waleh v. Erwin, 115 Fed. 531.

And evidence showing that a quarter section of land located for oil-mining purposes was surveyed out carefully by a competent surveyor employed by the locator; and that the northwest corner of a certain section was the northwest corner of the quarter section constituting the location, and was found by the surveyor as it had been located and monumented with a pile of rocks by the government surveyor; and that the lines of the quarter section were run, and stakes 2 to 3 inches in diameter and standing 1 foot above the ground were set at each corner.—is sufficient to show a substantial compliance with the requirement as to marking on the ground, though some of the monuments had rotted away and were gone, where they were originally placed about nine years before. Temescal Oil Min. & Development Co. v. Salcido, 137 Cal. 211, 69 Pac. 1010.

In the above case, White v. Lee, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case no attempt of any kind had been made to monument the claim, but the claimant relied solely on the government survey as sufficient to mark the boundaries of his claim.

So, a location of a placer-mining claim of 160 acres, by an association of persons, based upon but one discovery upon the entire tract, and marked as one tract, is proper under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2330, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1432, providing that no location of a placer-mining claim shall exceed 160 acres for any one person or association of persons; it is not necessary that there shall be a discovery on each 20-acre tract contained in the land sought to be located, and that each 20-acre tract shall be marked upon the surface thereof, or that a separate location of each 20-acre tract shall be made. McDonald v. Montana Wood Co. 14 Mont. 88, 43 Am. St. Rep. 616, 35 Pac. 668; Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444.

Where the monuments put upon the ground to indicate the exterior boundaries of a placer-mining claim were few, and placed at great intervals, whether a compliance with the requirements of the Federal statute is shown is a question of fact for the jury. McKay v. McDougall, 25 Mont. 258, 87 Am. St. Rep. 395, 64 Pac. 669.

If the calls as to the distances and courses set out in the description of a mining claim in the notice thereof vary from the markings actually made on the ground, the latter will prevail, since it is the markings on the ground which establish the boundaries of the claim in contemplation of the statute. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787; Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. 60 C. C. A. 155, 123 Fed. 209; Steen v. Wild Goose Min. Co. 1 Alaska, 255; Upton v. Santa Rita Min. Co. (N. M.) 89 Pac. 275.

Mining locations distinctly marked on the ground, so that their boundaries can be readily traced, are sufficient, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, as against subsequent locators, irrespective of the posting of notices. Haws v. Victoria Copper Min. Co. 160 U. S. 303, 40 L. ed. 436, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282.

And a mistake in a notice of a location, as to the direction of its lines, does not affect the validity thereof, where it was described and staked off in such a manner that it could easily be identified by any prospector or other person who was desirous of ascertaining the boundaries of the particular ground that had been located. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106.

So, where a miner discovered a vein containing minerals, and placed a discovery stake in the ground near the vein, and commenced to mark its boundaries, and erected two stone monuments thereon, when he was compelled to suspend work by sickness, after which others went upon the ground in his behalf and completed the location, but not in precise accordance with the discovery notice put up by him, or with the subsequent monuments put up by him, subsequent conflicting locators cannot claim that they were misled by the two monuments put up by the discoverer, where the location, as finally completed, was such as to embrace the ground included between them. Newbill v. Whitfield, 63 Cal. 81.

Nor is a placer location void for a discrepancy between the courses and distances mentioned in the notice, and the stakes and monuments set by the locator to mark the boundaries of his claim; where there is such a conflict the stakes and monuments must prevail. Price v. McIntosh, 1 Alaska, 286.

So, where monuments are found upon the ground, or their position or location can be determined with certainty, the monuments govern as to the mining claim, rather than the location certificate or declaratory statement. Treadwell v. Marrs (Ariz.) 83 Pac. 350; Walker v. Pennington, 27 Mont. 369, 71 Pac. 156.

And a defective description in the record of a declaratory statement of a mining location may be cured if the stakes or monuments on the ground identify the claim. Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713.

The boundaries marked upon the ground, however, should substantially conform to the location indicated by the discovery monument and notice of location. Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah, 410, 64 Pac. 1019.

And the rule applying to the location of mining claims, that monuments should control the courses and distances, is recognized only in cases in which the monuments are clearly ascertained; if there is doubt as to the monuments, as well as to the courses and distances, there can be no reason for holding that the monuments should prevail. Thallman v. Thomas, 102 Fed. 935.

And, where the courses and distances of a mining location are not defined with certainty by monuments or stakes, the calls in the location notice are controlling. Treadwell v. Marrs, supra.

So, marking the boundaries of the surface claim, as required by statute in making a mining location, operates to determine the right of the claimant as between himself and the general government, and to notify third persons of his rights; and, where the record fails in its constructive notice, the statutory monuments must perform their statutory duty of giving actual notice; and a claimant who has not kept up his boundary posts will not be permitted to show the courses and distances of his recorded location to be erroneous, when the rights of an intervening locator, without notice, will be prejudiced. Pollard v. Shively, 5 Colo. 309.

And a map introduced in evidence for the purpose of showing the lines of a mining location is of little value in the absence of supporting evidence of a person knowing the position of the monuments which defined the lines, and where it departed from data established by the best evidence which could be produced as to the original location. Daggett v. Yreka Min. & Mill. Co. (Cal.) 86 Pac. 968.

Where it is sought to establish the location of a mining claim by monuments upon the ground, as against differing statements in a location certificate, the person thus seeking to establish the location must show the existence and location of these monuments. Treadwell v. Marrs, supra.

And the fact that the lines and monuments of an official survey on a mining location did not correspond and run identical with those of the original location affects the location, and renders it invalid, only as to the excess. Howeth v. Sullenger, 113 Cal. 547, 45 Pac. 841.

g. Removal or obliteration of marks.

When the location of a mining claim is once sufficiently marked upon the surface so that its boundaries can be readily traced, and all the other acts of location are performed as required by law, the right of possession becomes fully vested in the locator, and cannot be divested by the removal or obliteration of stakes, monuments, marks, or notices, without the act or fault of the locator, during the time he continues to perform the necessary work upon the claim, and comply with the law in all other essential respects. Book v. Justice Min. Co. supra; Smith v. Newell, 86 Fed. 56; Moore v. Steelsmith, 1 Alaska, 121.

And a locator of a mining claim conflicting with a senior claim is not entitled to assert that the senior claim was not so monumented and marked that the boundaries could be readily traced, merely because the corner thereof had been moved by others, where it was originally established and marked by a monument and stake, and had never been moved by the owner, and the subsequent locator, at the time of locating, made no attempt to ascertain its lines. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. 125 Fed. 408.

Nor does the act of one of two discoverers of a mineral lode, of acquiring the interest of the other therein, and then erasing the name of the other from the notice of discovery, and changing the date thereof from the time of discovery to the time of acquiring the whole interest, and continuing in possession, developing the lode and claiming in good faith to be the owner, constitute an abandonment; and he does not lose or forfeit any rights acquired by the previous discovery by such act. Omar v. Soper, 11 Colo. 380, 7 Am. St. Rep. 246, 18 Pac. 443.

Proof of the original markings cannot be dispensed with, however, and the presumption indulged in, of their former existence and removal or destruction, though the claim was an old one which had been worked for years. Daggett v. Yreka Min. & Mill. Co. supra.

And, where the locator of a mining claim, who set up the monuments, afterwards died, testimony by a colocator who assisted him in making the location, but was otherwise occupied when he set up the corner monument in question, but to whom deceased afterwards pointed it out, that the monument so pointed out determined the corner of the claim, and that the monument was on a ledge of marked peculiarities easy to be remembered, is sufficient, in the absence of any reason for doubting the truthfulness of the witness, to establish that the monument had not been moved after it was first set up. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 55 Fed. 11.

So, the testimony of witnesses that they did not see monuments when they looked for them on a location for mining purposes, some years after they were placed there, raises no presumption that they were not so placed, as against evidence that they were so placed. Temescal Oil Min. & Developing Co. v. Salcido, 137 Cal. 211, 69 Pac. 1010.

XII. Record.

a. Necessity of, under the Federal statute.

It is provided by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, that all records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the name or names of the locators, the date of location, and such a description of the claim or claims located, by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, as will identify the claim.

Under this statute, no record of the location of a mining claim is necessary unless the laws of the state or territory, or the rules and regulations of the mining district in which the claim is located, require it. Peters v. Tonopah Min. Co. 120 Fed. 587; Haws v. Victoria Copper Min. Co. 160 U. S. 303, 40 L. ed. 436, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; Moore v. Steelsmith, 1 Alaska, 121; Anthony v. Jillson, 83 Cal. 296, 23 Pac. 419; Souter v. Maguire, 78 Cal. 543, 21 Pac. 183; Southern Cross Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Europa Min. Co. 15 Nev. 383; Deeney v. Mineral Creek Mill. Co. 11 N. M. 279, 679, 67 Pac. 724; Payton v. Burns, 41 Or. 430, 69 Pac. 134.

It is necessary only when made obligatory by local regulations. Southern Cross Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Europa Min. Co. supra.

And, except in jurisdictions or districts in which a record of a mining claim is made an act of location, or one of the acts necessary to constitute location, a location properly made is complete and perfect, though not recorded. Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. and Payton v. Burns, supra.

The mining laws of Congress do not require a record, but provide what a record shall contain when it is required by local rules. Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. supra.

b. Provisions for, by state and territorial statutes.

1. Summary.

By statute, in most, if not all, of the mining states and territories, a record of a mining claim is required. This is required to be made within a specified time from the date of discovery, by a location certificate containing specified statements, in a number of the states, among which are Colorado, Nevada, North Dakota, South Dakota; and Wyoming, Montana, and Washington require practically the same thing, but in Montana it is called a declaratory statement, and in Washington a notice. In Alaska the requirement is for the filing of the notice of location, and in a number of the other states and territories, among which are Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, Oregon, and Utah, it is provided that a copy, or a substantial copy, of the notice of location, shall be recorded or filed for record within a specified period after the location or discovery. In states and territories in which a copy of the notice of location is required to be filed, the contents of the notice of location are prescribed by law in substantial accord with the prescribed contents of certificates of location and declaratory statements, in states in which they are required. It will be seen, therefore, that these various provisions, though giving the instrument to be recorded a different name, and though differing in detail and to some extent as to the period of time within which the record is required to be made, are substantially the same, consisting, in most of them, of a requirement for the record within a specified number of days after discovery or posting notice of location, of an instrument containing the name of the lode or claim, the name of the locator, the date of location, the number of feet claimed along the lode, each way from the point of discovery, the width on each side of the lode, the general course or strike of the vein as near as may be, and such a description by reference to natural objects or permanent monuments as will identify the claim.

Thus, to constitute a valid location of a mining claim under the Colorado statute, a certificate of location must be filed within three months from the discovery, for record in the county in which the lode is situated, containing the designation of the lode, the names of the locators, the date of the location, the number of feet claimed on each side of the center of the discovery shaft, the general course of the lode, and such a description of the claim by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify it with reasonable certainty. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1113, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560. Reversing 3 McCrary, 19, 8 Fed. 860; Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787.

And omission substantially to comply with any of the provisions of Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, §§ 3975-3977, providing for the location of a mining claim by posting a notice of discovery, and the marking of the lines thereof upon the ground, and the recording of a copy of the notice duly verified as provided for therein, and the sinking of a discovery shaft or its equivalent, is fatal to the valid initiation of title. Wright v. Lyons, 45 Or. 167, 77 Pac. 81.

In New Mexico the notice of location is positively required to be in such form that a copy thereof may be recorded; it must be such a notice as will, when recorded, answer all the requirements of a valid location notice, elsewhere called a location certificate. Deeney v. Mineral Creek Mill. Co. supra.

Under Nev. Comp. Laws, § 210, providing that, within twenty days of posting the location notice upon a mining claim, the locator shall record his claim with the mining district recorder, and the county recorder of the mining district or county in which such claim is situated, by a location certificate; and providing for the contents of the certificate of location, several of the requirements being the same as those for a notice of location; but providing, in addition thereto, that it must contain other matters, such as the dimensions and location of the discovery shaft, or its equivalent, sunk upon the claim, and the location and description of each corner with the markings thereon,—the certificate of location is separate and distinct from the location notice, and it is the certificate of location, and not the notice of location, of the claim, which is required to be recorded. Peters v. Tonopah Min. Co. supra.

A location of a mining claim is not required to be recorded, however, by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, providing that the miners of each mining district may make regulations regarding the recording of claims, and Hill's (Or.) Anno. Laws, § 3831, providing that, when a mining district has been organized, the claims therein shall be recorded, where the locality in which it is situated is not organized into a district. Payton v. Burns, supra.

And the effect of the repeal of Cal. act March 27, 1897, prescribing certain particulars that a location notice must contain, and requiring the recording of such notice within certain limited periods, by the act of February, 1900, was to make the validity of mining regulations solely dependent, from that time forward, upon a compliance with the laws of the United States, and such valid regulations as the miners themselves may have adopted in their respective districts. DWINNELL v. DYER.

But that repeal does not affect the right or duty of the county recorder to record notices and proofs of a mining location under the California county government act, prescribing his duties and providing that a notice of location of mining claims may be recorded. Kern County v. Lee, 129 Cal. 361, 61 Pac. 1124.

In the above case, San Bernardino County v. Davidson, 112 Cal. 503, 44 Pac. 650, infra, XII. h, 1, was distinguished upon the ground that that decision was based upon the fact that the statute concerning county recorder, as it then stood, made no provision for the recording of notices of location of mining claims.

So, the act of Oregon of October 14, 1889, requiring the locator of a mining claim to file a copy of the notice of location posted by him upon the lode claim, within a specified time, with the clerk of the county, or with the recorder of conveyances, if there be one, does not make it essential to the validity of the location that the record shall be a literal copy of the notice posted; it is sufficient if it is a substantial copy. Oregon King Min. Co. v. Brown, 55 C. C. A. 626, 119 Fed. 48.

2. Legality.

Provisions of this class requiring a record of a mining claim are in addition to, and in aid of, and not repugnant to, the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2334, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1435, providing that all records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the names of the locators, the date of the location, and such a description of the claim or claims located by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify the claim. Wright v. Lyons, supra; Van Buren v. McKinley, 8 Idaho, 93, 66 Pac. 936; O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302. And see DWINNELL v. DYER.

And the provision of the Montana Political Code, requiring a declaratory statement of a mining location, which must contain a description of each corner, and the markings thereon, is within the legislative power of the assembly. Purdum v. Laddin, 23 Mont. 389, 59 Pac. 153.

So, the provision of Mont. Anno. Codes, § 3612, that the declaratory statement of a mining location, filed in the office of the clerk of the county in which the lode or claim is situated, must contain the dimensions and location of the discovery shaft, or its equivalent, sunk upon the lode or placer claims, and the location and description of each corner with the markings thereon, is not invalid as too stringent, and therefore in conflict with the liberal purposes manifested by Congress respecting mining claims. Butte City Water Co. v. Baker, 196 U. S. 119, 49 L. ed. 409, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 211, Affirming 28 Mont. 222, 104 Am. St. Rep. 686, 72 Pac. 617.

S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, prescribing the contents of such a record when one is required, because they require verification, which is not required by the Federal statute. Hickey v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. 33 Mont. 46, 81 Pac. 806; Wright v. Lyons, supra.

And the provisions of Utah Laws 1897, chap. 36, § 8, requiring county recorders to perform the duties performed by district mining recorders, and requiring the latter to deposit the books and records of their offices with the county recorders of their respective counties, are not in conflict with the statutes of the United States regulating the disposition of the state mineral lands. Re Monk, 16 Utah, 100, 50 Pac. 810.

So, in the title of the Utah act providing for the manner of locating quartz and placer mining claims, the term "manner" means the method and way of locating and recording the claims, and includes the instrumentalities and means to be used in effecting their location and the recording of them; and the two provisions of that act requiring county recorders to perform the duties before performed by district mining recorders, and requiring the district recorders, within thirty days after the law took effect, to deposit the books and records pertaining to their offices with the county recorders, are sufficiently indicated by the title, within the meaning of the state Constitution, requiring that no bill shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title. Ibid.

c. Provision for, by rules and regulations of miners.

The Federal mining laws allow miners to provide for the recording of mining claims. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312.

Under the Federal statutes authorizing miners of each district to make regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States, or in conflict with the laws of the state or territory in which the district is situated, governing the location and manner of recording, etc., of a mining claim, and making no provision for a recorder in mining districts, the authority to provide for recorders and the recording of all papers relating to mining locations and holding mines is left to the states in which such locations are made; and, if the state does not exercise the power, the miners in the district may. Re Monk, 16 Utah, 100, 50 Pac. 810.

And record books of a mining district, containing the record of the location of quartz mines since the organization of the district, showing a custom among miners of that district requiring locations to be recorded with the mining recorder of said district, are competent for the purpose of proving the custom of miners with reference to recording claims, and may be introduced for that purpose in an action involving the validity of a mining location. Flaherty v. Gwinn, 1 Dak. 509. Appx.

So, the pre-emption book of a county is admissible in evidence in an action to quiet the title of a mining claim, without producing the original notice of the claim, to establish the existence of a custom of the district to record certain claims in the county recorder's office designating the boundaries in a particular way, and to show compliance by the locator with such regulations; the entry thus shown being the original notice, and not a record or copy of an independent original. Pralus v. Pacific Gold & S. Min. Co. 35 Cal. 30.

Mining rules and regulations with reference to recording mining claims, however, are to be liberally construed. Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187, 23 Pac. 361.

And a rule or regulation established by miners, providing for the recording of claims, whether by resolution or by usage and custom, to be obligatory, must be of such a character that, if complied with, it would give to the party recording some right under it, and, if neglected, would deprive him of some right which he otherwise would have. Flaherty v. Gwinn, supra.

And proof of a record of a mining claim is irrelevant and of no effect, in the absence of proof of some regulations making the record obligatory, or giving it some effect. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. supra.

Nor need a notice be recorded where there is no mining district recorder, and the rules and regulations of the district are no longer in force and effect. Haws v. Victoria Copper Min. Co. 160 U. S. 303, 40 L. ed. 436, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282.

And failure locally to record a notice of location is cured by a formal annulment of the local laws providing therefor, prior to entry of a claim for a patent. Re Childs, 10 Land Dec. 173.

So, to effect a forfeiture of a mining claim by a mining regulation for failure to record the location thereof, the regulation must expressly provide that such failure to record shall work a forfeiture. Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666.

And, in the absence of such a provision, the fact that a mining claim was not recorded in the records of the mining district will not invalidate it as to any party having actual notice of location. Ibid.

d. Purpose and effect.

The purpose or object of provisions for recording mining claims is to give notice of the appropriation of the lands claimed, to others seeking to locate upon unappropriated lands. Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816; Gamer v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 371, 20 Pac. 654; Wenner v. McNulty, 7 Mont. 30, 14 Pac. 643; Baxter Mountain Gold Min. Co. v. Patterson, 3 N. M. 269, 3 Pac. 741, Overruled on other grounds in Seidler v. La Fave, 5 N. M. 44, 20 Pac. 789; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. supra.

And to show a compliance with mining laws and customs. San Bernardino County v. Davidson, 112 Cal. 503, 44 Pac. 659.

requisite to constitute a perfect mining location, and it constitutes notice to the world of the facts therein set forth, such as a description of the premises claimed, and by whom, and when located. Strepey v. Stark, 7 Colo. 614, 5 Pac. 111.

The acts which, taken together, amount to the location of a mining claim, begin with the discovery and terminate with the filing for record of the declaratory statement; and, since the location is not complete until such declaratory statement is filed, the date of its filing is the date to which a patent relates; and, where the declaratory statement is invalid, one of the essentials of a legal location is wanting, and there is no date to which a patent can relate. Hickey v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. 33 Mont. 46, 81 Pac. 806.

But, where the statute does not require, or authorize, or give any definite legal effect to the posting and recording of notices of location of a mining claim, such posting and recording do not in themselves constitute a location, but are merely acts tending to show a proper marking of the surface locations by which the boundaries of the claim may be traced. Daggett v. Yreka Min. & Mill. Co. (Cal.) 86 Pac. 968.

And it was the probable intention of Congress that the record should have some practical effect, such as to hold the claim for a reasonable time until the vein could be developed so as to admit of an intelligent marking of its surface boundaries. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312.

A recorded certificate of location is a statutory writing affecting realty, being in part the basis of the miner's right of exclusive possession and enjoyment of his mining location granted by law; the purpose of the description in the certificate being to identify the claim with reasonable certainty. Pollard v. Shively, 5 Colo. 309.

But the purpose of recording notices of location of mining claims is entirely distinct from the statutory system of recordation by which parties are permitted to have transfers of property and certain other written instruments recorded in the recorder's office, so as to give constructive notice thereof. San Bernardino County v. Davidson, supra.

And a location certificate differs from the ordinary documentary muniments of title in that it is not a title, nor proof of a title; nor does it constitute, nor of itself establish, the possessory right in issue to which it relates. Strepey v. Stark, supra.

But, where a recording act attaches no penalty to a failure to record a location notice, the recording of location notices is in fact but a registration act, and recorded location certificates simply impart constructive notice like any other registration. Jordan v. Duke, 6 Ariz. 55, 53 Pac. 197.

e. Application of rules to placer-mining claims.

It will be seen from the language of the provision of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, that all records of mining claims, hereafter made, shall contain the name or names of the locators, the date of the location, and such a description of the claim or claims located, by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, as will identify the claim, that it applies to all mining claims, including placer as well as lode claims; so that, if a record is required either by state or territorial statutes, or by miners' rules, it must conform to this provision. So far as the state and territorial statutes and miners' rules are concerned, they are frequently so expressed as to be applicable to both classes of claims; and generally where they are not so applicable separate provisions have been adopted with reference to placer claims, which in nearly all if not all cases correspond substantially with provisions for recording lode claims.

The act of the territorial assembly of Montana of May 8, 1873, requiring a person to make and file in the office of the county recorder a statement of the discovery of any mining claim upon any vein or lode, bearing gold or silver or other valuable deposit, however, does not include a placer-mining claim. Moxon v. Wilkinson, 2 Mont. 421.

1. General considerations.

While the acts of Congress do not require record of a location notice, yet, where the same is required by the local legislation or regulations of miners, then the requirements of the Federal statute as to location and identification become operative and imperative as to the record. Deeney v. Mineral Creek Mill. Co. 11 N. M. 279, 67 Pac. 724.

And it should contain the names of the locators, the date of the location, and such description of the claim located, by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, as will, with reasonable certainty, identify the claim. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Brown v. Levan, 4 Idaho, 795, 46 Pac. 661; Garfield M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153; Hauswirth v. Butcher, 4 Mont. 299, 1 Pac. 714; Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713; Hansen v. Fletcher, 10 Utah, 266, 37 Pac. 480; Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532.

And it must contain enough to enable a person of reasonable intelligence to find the claim and trace its boundaries. Gamer v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 371, 20 Pac. 654.

And an instruction on an issue as to the validity of a mining location, undertaking to tell the jury what the locator is required to do to make a location, is improper where it is too indefinite on the question of recording to mean anything except that some kind of a record is required: it should tell them what must be recorded, and when the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

record must be made, and where. Bryan v. McCaig, 10 Colo. 309, 15 Pac. 413.

A recorded notice failing to describe the claim is wholly void, and confers no rights to the premises as against another who peaceably entered and made location thereon. Deeney v. Mineral Creek Mill. Co. supra.

Certificates of mining locations required to be recorded by law, however, are to be liberally construed. Talmadge v. St. John, 129 Cal. 430, 62 Pac. 79; Morrison v. Regan, 8 Idaho, 291, 67 Pac. 955.

And the record of a mining claim is sufficient when it contains directions which, taken in connection with the markings of the claim on the ground, will enable a person of ordinary intelligence to distinguish the premises located from the public mineral lands open to exploration. Smith v. Newell, 86 Fed. 56.

Nor is it necessary, where a miners' regulation provides that a person desiring to locate a mining claim must have his notice of location recorded so as to show the name of the locator, date of location, and a description of the claim, that the record of a mining claim should be a literal and exact copy of the notice posted upon it. Gird v. California Oil Co. 60 Fed. 531.

The record in such case is intended to contain a more exact and specific description of the claim than the notice posted upon it. Ibid.

2. Name, date, etc.

As we have seen, a record of a mining claim, whether it is a recorded notice, a certificate of location, or a declaratory statement, is usually required to state the name of the lode, the name of the locator, and the date of location or discovery.

This is a prerequisite to a valid location under the Federal statute, when a record is required. Sweet v. Webber, 7 Colo. 443, 4 Pac. 752.

And, under the Colorado statutory provision to this effect, making and recording a location certificate containing the name, a description of the lode, the name of the locator, and the date of location is necessary to perfect a mining location. Strepey v. Stark, 7 Colo. 614, 5 Pac. 111.

The New Mexico statute requiring that the names of co-owners of mines must be recorded, however, does not mean those who are vested with a legal title; and, where several persons agree to prospect for and locate mines, and that all mines located in the name of either shall be owned in common by all; and they locate several mines, each in his own name,—the location is not subject to the objection that the name of each claiming an interest in each mine should have appeared on the location notice; the legal title is in the locator named for each mine, and the others have such interest with him as constitutes under the mining laws, a holding in common, to the extent, at least, of making work done for the development of all satisfy the law, if sufficient in quantity and value. Eberle v. Carmichael, 8 N. M. 169, 42 Pac. 95.

And, under the Idaho mining laws. § 5. providing that no person shall record claims in the name of any other person, unless he has the written authority of such person or persons, and exhibits the same to the recorder, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it will be presumed, where a notice is filed by one for himself and others, having a common interest with him, that the recorder has seen and made a minute of such written consent before the notice was recorded. Kramer v. Seattle, 1 Idaho, 485.

So, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, requiring all records of mining claims to contain the date of location, means the correct date, and not a fictitious, fraudulent, and incorrect one inserted for the purpose of defeating the just rights of some other claimant, or to defeat a location previously made. Muldoon v. Brown, 21 Utah, 121, 59 Pac. 720.

But the validity of the recorded notice of location of a mining claim made in compliance with the provisions of that act is not affected by the inclusion in it, preceding the date, of the words, "dated on the ground," this constituting a mere surplusage of words. Preston v. Hunter, 15 C. C. A. 148, 29 U. S. App. 621, 67 Fed. 996.

3. Description of claim and lay of the lode.

Statutory requirements as to the description of the claim and the lay of the lode, in records of mining claims, like other similar requirements, are mandatory, but, like them, are subject to liberal construction.

Thus, the length of a mining claim along the vein each way, measured from the center of the discovery shaft, is required to be given in a certificate of location, by Wyo. Rev. Stat. §§ 2546, 2547; and a certificate failing to give it is totally void. Slothower v. Hunter (Wyo.) 88 Pac. 36.

So, a recorded notice of location of a lode claim is not admissible in evidence on an issue as to the right of possession thereof, where it omits altogether a description of the discovery shaft, or of excavations made as an equivalent thereof, required by Mont. Pol. Code. § 3612. Hahn v. James, 29 Mont. 1, 73 Pac. 965.

And, while it may not be necessary that the notice should state definitely that the excavation cuts the vein at the depth or for the length required by the statute, yet the statement of dimensions must be such as to leave at least an inference that such is the case; and a notice which thus fails to set forth the work done does not conform to the spirit of the statute, and is invalid. Helena Gold & Iron Co. v. Baggaley (Mont.) 87 Pac. 455.

And a declaratory statement, containing a statement of but one dimension of excavations made as the equivalent of a discovery shaft, is insufficient and of no effect. Ibid.

§ 3612, that the declaratory statement of a mining location must contain the location, and the description of each corner, and the markings thereon, is mandatory; and a substantial compliance with its provisions is necessary to prove a valid location; and a statement describing a claim by metes and bounds, and giving no description of the corners or markings thereon, is invalid. Purdum v. Laddin, 23 Mont. 389, 59 Pac. 153.

In the above case, Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713, supra, XI. f; Flavin v. Mattingly, 8 Mont. 242, 19 Pac. 384, supra, VIII. d, 1; Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728, supra, VIII. d, 3; and O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302, infra, XII. f, 4, (c),—were distinguished upon the ground that they were decided prior to the adoption of the Political Code of 1895, under statutes not requiring that trees, stakes, or monuments must be marked so as to designate the corners of the mining claim, or that the declaratory statement must contain the description of and markings on each corner.

And where a notice of location of a mining claim gives the location of each corner, but does not show that there were any markings upon any of them, or their dimensions, or give a description of them in any other particular by the markings thereon, the location is of no value, and the notice is not admissible in an action to determine an adverse claim. Hahn v. James, 29 Mont. 1, 73 Pac. 965.

A declaratory statement of a mining claim, which fully meets all the requirements of the law, except that it omits to state that the corner posts of the claim are at least 4 feet 6 inches in length, however, is not rendered invalid by such omission under that act where the corner posts were in fact 4 feet 6 inches in length. Walker v. Pennington, 27 Mont. 369, 71 Pac. 156.

In the above case, Purdum v. Laddin, supra, was affirmed so far as it held that the provisions of Mont. Pol. Code. § 3612, are mandatory and must be substantially complied with, but was distinguished upon the ground that the declaratory statement in that case made no attempt at any description whatever of at least two of the corners, and did not show whether they were marked by trees, rocks in place, or posts.

And Mont. Pol. Code, §§ 3611, 3612, were amended by Sess. Laws 1901, p. 140. to avoid the effect of the decision in Purdum v. Laddin, supra, that a notice which failed to give the location and description of the corners, with the markings thereon, was insufficient. Helena Gold & Iron Co. v. Baggaley, supra.

So, under the Federal statute providing that a mining location must be described with reference to some natural object or permanent monument which will identify it, and the Colorado statute requiring a certificate of location to contain such a description as shall identify the claim with reasonable certainty, that degree of certainty with which the final survey for a patent for a mining claim fixes the locus and the subject matter of the grant is not required. Drummond v. Long, 9 Colo. 538, 13 Pac. 543.

Nor is a certificate of location of a mining claim subject to the objection that it does not state the distance from the discovery shaft to the side lines, there being no such requirement in the law. Quimby v. Boyd, 8 Colo. 194, 6 Pac. 462.

And a record of location of a quartz lode, made pursuant to a statutory provision that all claims shall be recorded in the county recorder's office within sixty days from the time of posting notices thereon, is not rendered inadmissible in evidence by the fact that it did not specify the number of feet claimed, this being unnecessary. Conner v. McPhee, 1 Mont. 73.

But, where the call of a location certificate of a mining claim is for a post at a named corner, parol evidence is not admissible to show that a stump was in fact established as that corner. Pollard v. Shively, 5 Colo. 309.

Nor is a recorded notice of location of a mining claim, which shows a discovery made upon a vein or deposit bearing precious metals, the amount of ground claimed, the length of the claim, giving the distance in opposite directions from the discovery, and stating that the claim was staked at both ends, and at the corners in a legal way; and referring to another claim as the one nearest to it; and containing the name of the claim, the signature of the locator, the date of location and of record, and the county and mining district in which located, placed upon the ground, which was actually marked in accordance with the notice, though in some respects indefinite,—subject to the objection that it does not describe any ground. Bonanza Consol. Min. Co. v. Golden Head Min. Co. 29 Utah, 159, 80 Pac. 736.

So, the Federal statute providing that the location of a mining claim must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced does not require that these boundaries, so marked on the ground, shall be put in the declaratory statement, or other record of the claim; and a state or territorial statute providing for such record, and requiring that it shall contain the name of the claim located, and such a description of it by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify it, does not require it. Gamer v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 371, 20 Pac. 654; McCann v. McMillan, 129 Cal. 350, 62 Pac. 31; Jackson v. Dines, 13 Colo. 90, 21 Pac. 918.

And a notice of location, recorded as provided by law, is not insufficient because of a failure to mention either the state or the county of the purported location, where it makes reference to the preliminary notice posted as required by law and recorded in the records of the county, and this preliminary notice named the county in which the claim was located. Talmadge v. St. John, 129 Cal. 430, 62 Pac. 79.

Nor is a recorded notice of a location subject to the objection that it does not show the particular district within which a mining claim is located where the posted notice sufficiently shows it, and the recorded notice is a copy thereof; and the local mining regulations merely require that the notice posted shall be recorded. Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187, 23 Pac. 361.

And a defective description in the record or declaratory statement of a mining location may be cured if the stakes or monuments on the ground identify the claim. Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713.

4. Reference to natural objects or permanent monuments.

(a) General rules as to.

Under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, as well as under similar state statutes, all records of mining claims must contain such a description of the claims located, by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, as will identify them. Brown v. Levan, 4 Idaho, 795, 46 Pac. 661; Drummond v. Long, supra; Gilpin County Min. Co. v. Drake, 8 Colo. 586, 9 Pac. 787; Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312; Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442.

And a recorded notice or certificate of location of a mining claim is invalid under that act where it contains no description of the claim by reference to any natural object or permanent monument by which it may be identified. Mutchmor v. McCarty (Cal.) 87 Pac. 85; Faxon v. Barnard, 2 McCrary, 44, 4 Fed. 702.

And it is inadmissible in evidence for any purpose. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. supra; Flavin v. Mattingly, 8 Mont. 242, 19 Pac. 384.

And recording a mere copy of a notice of location with a description of the locus of the claim appended thereto is not sufficient compliance with the statutory requirement. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. supra.

So, the reference, in a location notice or certificate designed for record, to some natural object or permanent monument to identify a mining claim, must be such as to furnish a reasonable certainty that the locus of the claim has not been, and cannot well be, changed. Brown v. Levan, supra.

It must be such as to fix the location with certainty, so that subsequent locators can determine what ground is included within the location. Hansen v. Fletcher, 10 Utah, 266, 37 Pac. 480.

And, where the description and reference to a natural object or permanent monument is of such a character that a mining engineer could not find the claim from the location notices, or such that the claim may be floated almost anywhere to suit the ground, or to cover ore that may afterwards be discovered, it cannot furnish a foundation for a valid location. Brown v. Levan, supra.

And the reference must be such as will enable a skilled engineer to identify the claim without reference to contiguous claims, the location of which is uncertain. Ibid.

The permanent monument which may be referred to in the notice or record of a mining claim must be of such a character as to permanence, and the reference to it in the notice must be so definitely made, that a prospector or other person looking for mineral deposits could, with the aid of the notice, find the monument, and from it and the description in the notice trace out the extent of the claim. Seidler v. LaFave, 5 N. M. 44, 20 Pac. 789; Baxter Mountain Gold Min. Co. v. Patterson, 3 N. M. 269, 3 Pac. 741.

And such as will enable a person endeavoring to locate a claim correctly to make a survey of it by means of reference made to such natural object or permanent monument. Baxter Mountain Gold Min. Co. v. Patterson, 3 N. M. 269, 3 Pac. 741, Overruled on other grounds in Seidler v. La Fave, 5 N. M. 44, 20 Pac. 789.

So, courses and distances from natural objects or permanent monuments to discovery stakes, or corner stakes, or some other objects, must be stated with reasonable certainty. Brown v. Levan, supra.

And a location notice of a mining claim, which fails to give the direction of the initial point or permanent monument to which it is attempted to tie the location from the point of discovery, is void under Idaho Rev. Stat. § 3101, providing that a notice of location shall specify the distance and direction from a discovery monument to such natural object or permanent monument, if any such there be, as will fix and describe in the notice itself the location of the claim. Clearwater Short Line R. Co. v. San Garde, 7 Idaho, 106, 61 Pac. 137.

The construction given to references in a notice of location and records of a mining claim to natural monuments, however, should be liberal, not technical. Wilson v. Triumph Consol. Min. Co. 19 Utah, 66, 75 Am. St. Rep. 718, 56 Pac. 300; Brown v. Levan, supra; Morrison v. Regan, 8 Idaho, 291, 67 Pac. 955.

And, where a mining claim has been located in good faith, if, by any reasonable construction, the language used in the notice or record in referring to natural objects and permanent monuments will impart notice to a subsequent locator, it is sufficient. Morrison v. Regan and Seidler v. La Fave, supra.

And this is so although it fails to designate the natural object or permanent monument as such in the precise language of the statute. Seidler v. La Fave, supra.

Nor are the natural objects or permanent monuments, with reference to which a mining claim must be located in a valid record thereof, required to be on the ground located, although they may be; and the natural objects may consist of any fixed natural object. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666.

And permanent monuments may exist before the location of a mining claim, or may be erected for the purpose of tying the claim to them. Brown v. Levan, 4 Idaho, 795, 46 Pac. 661.

So, where objects are named as the boundaries of a location of a mining claim, the presumption is that they exist, and the duty of showing the contrary is cast upon the disputing party. Shattuck v. Costello (Ariz.) 68 Pac. 529.

And a reference, in a record of a mining claim, to a natural object or permanent monument, will be presumed, in the absence of evidence upon the point, to be sufficient for identification. Brady v. Husby, 21 Nev. 453, 33 Pac. 801.

And such a record, containing such a reference to a natural object or permanent monument as might under any circumstances identify the claim, is admissible in evidence; it being a question of fact whether such reference is sufficient. Ibid.

Nor is it for the court to say, from an inspection of a location notice, whether or not a survey corner therein specified is a permanent monument; this is a matter of proof. Metcalf v. Prescott, 10 Mont. 283, 25 Pac. 1037.

And parol evidence is admissible on an issue involving the validity of a mining claim, for the purpose of proving that a thing named in the certificate of location as a natural object or permanent monument is in fact such. Londonderry Min. Co. v. United Gold Mines Co. (Colo.) 88 Pac. 455.

Nor is error in refusing to admit in evidence a certificate of location of a mining claim predicated upon its invalidity cured by testimony tending to show that the reference in it was not such as would serve to identify the claim. Ibid.

And an instruction involving the validity of a mining location, erroneous because predicated upon the supposed invalidity of a certificate of a prior location of the same claim, is not cured by a proper instruction given in the first instance, where, had the original certificate been admitted in evidence, it must have been determined to have been valid, and the jury might have determined that it was prior to the date of any discovery of minerals upon which the location in question was based. Ibid.

In Nevada it is held that a record of location of a mining claim, containing a reference to a natural object or permanent monument, is not required by statute; it is necessary only where district laws require it. Poujade v. Ryan, 21 Nev. 449, 33 Pac. 659; Brady v. Husby, supra.

But the rule has been asserted that the intention of a statute providing that a recorded certificate of location shall contain, among other things, such a description as shall identify the claim with reasonable certainty, is to give one seeking the locus of a recorded claim something in the nature of an initial point from which to start, and, following the course or distance given, find with reasonable certainty the claim located, and that therefore the identification must be by reference to some natural object or permanent monument. Drummond v. Long, 9 Colo. 538, 13 Pac. 543.

Mountains, prominent buttes, and hills satisfy the law as natural objects or permanent monuments, with reference to which a location of a mining claim must be described in a notice or record of the location. Ibid.; Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787.

And a location certificate locating a lode by reference to two mountain peaks, by giving the course or bearing of each from the discovery shaft in degrees and minutes, is prima facie sufficient to render such certificate of location admissible in evidence. Craig v. Thompson, 10 Colo. 517, 16 Pac. 24.

So, a mountain referred to in a notice of location of a mining claim in describing the claim will be assumed to be a recognized landmark in the absence of evidence to the contrary; and the notice is not subject to the objection that it pointed out no particular portion of the mountain as a beginning point. Vogel v. Waring, 146 Fed. 949.

Describing the lode as being on the south-west side of a named mountain and in a named gulch, however, does not furnish the definite location by reference to permanent monuments required by the statute. Drummond v. Long, 9 Colo. 538, 13 Pac. 543.

But, while a description of a mining claim by reference to its direction from mountain peaks, naming or describing them, or stating the distance therefrom, may be insufficient, such a description naming the county and mining district in which the claim is located, and stating the metes and boundaries thereof, and that it is situated on a named river near a named city, and that the shaft or cut 100 feet from the south side line is on the left bank of a small creek, which is named, stating the bearings of the perpendicular falls in said creek from the shaft or cut, is a sufficient description of the claim located by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, within the meaning of the statutes. Jackson v. Dines, 13 Colo. 90, 21 Pac. 918.

And a location certificate of a mining claim, which gives the government section in which it is located, and the course which the highest point of a well-known mountain bears from the discovery shaft, the surface boundaries on the ground, describing posts at the corners and center of the side lines, and tying the surface boundaries by course and distance to the discovery shaft, contains a sufficient description of the claim. Duncan v. Fulton, 15 Colo. App. 140, 61 Pac. 244.

In the above case, Gilpin County Min. Co. v. Drake, 8 Colo. 586, 9 Pac. 787, infra, xII. f, 4, (d), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case there was no point named from which the description should start; but the decision therein was disapproved as not being in accord with the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as it decided that a tie to a patented claim was not a good tie.

So, a ridge and a hog's-back have been held to be natural objects in this connection. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787.

And so have gulches, canyons, and ravines. Meydenbauer v. Stevens; Drummond v. Long; and Duncan v. Fulton, supra; Flavin v. Mattingly, 8 Mont. 242, 19 Pac. 384.

And a reference to a canyon renders a notice of location containing it admissible in evidence. Flavin v. Mattingly, supra.

But a location notice naming the mouth of a big canyon as the natural object or permanent monument to which it is sought to tie the location is fatally defective where it does not give the direction of the location from such monument. Clearwater Short Line R. Co. v. San Garde, 7 Idaho, 106, 61 Pac. 137.

And a certificate of location of a mining claim, stating that the claim is situated on the north side of a named gulch, about timber line, on the west side of a named mountain, does not sufficiently refer to any natural object or permanent monument. Faxon v. Barnard, 2 McCrary, 44, 4 Fed. 702.

Nor does a recorded notice of location of a mining claim, describing it as situated near the head of the right-hand fork of a named canyon, and about 5 miles from a named railroad, sufficiently describe the claim by reference to natural objects or permanent monuments; the reference to the canyon and the railroad being too indefinite. Darger v. Le Sieur, 8 Utah, 160, 30 Pac. 363, Affirmed on Rehearing in 9 Utah, 192, 33 Pac. 701.

So, streams, waterfalls, cascades, lakes, inlets, and bays or arms of the sea are natural objects. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, supra.

And so are confluences of streams. Drummond v. Long, supra.

And a creek is a natural object, within these rules. Smith v. Cascaden, 148 Fed. 792.

(c) Monuments, posts, and other erections.

Monuments of stone, and boulders, satisfy the requirements of the law as permanent monuments, with reference to which a location of a mining claim may be described in a notice or record of a mining claim. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787; Drummond v. Long, 9 Colo. 538, 13 Pac. 543; Talmadge v. St. John, 129 Cal. 430, 62 Pac. 79; Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713.

And a recorded notice of location describing the claim as beginning at a large boulder at the west end of a named lode, thence 240 feet to the discovery shaft, and thence 1,260 feet west to the east line of another named lode, giving the boundaries of the two sides by named lodes, and stating the distance in a northerly direction from a named person's house, contains such a description of the claim with reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will justify its admission in evidence. Gamer v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 371, 20 Pac. 654.

So, stakes and posts of proper size, and properly marked and planted in the ground, may be permanent monuments. Meydenbauer v. Stevens and Russell v. Chumasero, supra; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522.

And posts by which the lines of a mining claim are marked, from 5 to 7 inches in diameter, which are firmly planted in the ground and stand not less than 5 feet above the ground, are permanent monuments, within the meaning of the Federal statutes. Credo Min. & Smelting Co. v. Highland Min. & Mill. Co. 95 Fed. 911.

Where mining lode claims are found where there are no permanent monuments or natural objects other than rocks or neighboring hills, stakes driven in the ground are the most certain means of identification. Bennett v. Harkrader, 158 U. S. 441, 39 L. ed. 1046, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 863.

And, where a notice of a mining claim described the claim as beginning at the "northwest corner of Ed. Williams, 1-16, at a black oak post," the presumption is that "Ed. Williams, 1-16," is a well-known natural object, until the contrary appears. Buffalo Zinc & Copper Co. v. Crump, 70 Ark. 525, 91 Am. St. Rep. 87, 69 S. W. 572.

Where the description in a notice of a mining claim specifies a stake as the place of beginning, however, whether that stake was of such a size and so planted in the ground as to come within the meaning of the statutory term "permanent monument" is a question for the jury, under proper instructions from the court. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302.

And a declaratory statement or record of a mining location with reference to permanent stakes or monuments which do not exist as a fact on the ground is not good. Russell v. Chumasero, supra.

So, blazed trees may be permanent monuments within these rules. Drummond v. Long, supra.

A tree is a fixed natural object which may be used as a monument in locating a mining claim, as well as a post or stake; but it should be marked in some manner so as to be readily identified, unless it possesses peculiarities so different from trees in general that a description of it is sufficient to identify it. Quimby v. Boyd, 8 Colo. 194, 6 Pac. 462.

Likewise, a point of intersection of well-known roads satisfies the requirement of the law as a permanent monument. Drummond v. Long, supra.

And uncertainty in a notice of location of a mining claim referring to a depot as a permanent monument, and not giving the exact distance and direction of the claim 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

from the depot, is a matter which can be cleared up and explained by evidence outside of the notice; and, where the record contains evidence showing that at the time the location was made there was but one depot in the mining district, and that the mine could be located with reference to it, it is sufficient. Farmington Gold Min. Co. v. Rhymney Gold & Copper Co. 20 Utah, 363, 77 Am. St. Rep. 913, 58 Pac. 832.

(d) Mining claims, mines, and their appurtenances.

A reference to a patented mining claim which is well known and clearly defined is a sufficient compliance with laws requiring that the notice or record of a mining claim shall contain such a description as will identify the claim by reference to some natural object or permanent monument. Book v. Justice Min. Co. 58 Fed. 106; Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787; Duncan v. Fulton, 15 Colo. App. 140, 61 Pac. 244; Riste v. Morton, 20 Mont. 139, 49 Pac. 656.

And a description in a location certificate of a mining claim which ties the claim by course and distance to a patented claim is sufficient. Carlin v. Freeman, 19 Colo. App. 334, 75 Pac. 26.

So, a mining claim may be a permanent object, with reference to which another claim may be described as well when not patented as when patented. Londonderry Min. Co. v. United Gold Mines Co. (Colo.) 88 Pac. 455.

And a mining claim, with reference to which another mining claim is described, will be taken to be a permanent monument, in the absence of any evidence or presumption that it is not patented. Riste v. Morton, supra; Slothower v. Hunter (Wyo.) 88 Pac. 36.

Or until the contrary appears. Garfield M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153, Affirmed in 130 U. S. 291, 32 L. ed. 964, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548.

In the absence of evidence to show that the claim referred to was not a well-known and clearly defined mining claim, it will be presumed it was so, and therefore a natural object or permanent monument, within the meaning of the Federal statute. Smith v. Cascaden, 148 Fed. 792.

A description in a notice of location by reference to an adjoining mining claim is a sufficient reference to a permanent monument to allow the notice of location to be introduced in evidence, it then becoming a matter of proof as to whether the adjoining claim is a permanent monument. Dillon v. Bayliss, 11 Mont. 171, 27 Pac. 725; Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713; Kinney v. Fleming, 6 Ariz. 263, 56 Pac. 723; Shattuck v. Costello (Ariz.) 68 Pac. 529; Seidler v. La Fave, 5 N. M. 44, 20 Pac. 789, Overruling Baxter Mountain Gold Min. Co. v. Patterson, 3 N. M. 269, 3 Pac. 741.

And it casts upon the party attacking the notice the burden of showing that there is no such mine. Kinney v. Fleming, supra.

And, in order to determine whether or not the things described are permanent monuments within the meaning of the statute, parol testimony as to their character may be given. Seidler v. La Fave, supra.

A description in a notice or record of location of a mining claim as located a specified number of feet in a named direction from another mine is prima facie a sufficient description of the claim by reference to some natural object or permanent monument. Hammer v. Garfield Min. & Mill. Co. 130 U. S. 291, 32 L. ed. 964, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548, Affirming 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153; Morrison v. Regan, 8 Idaho, 291, 67 Pac. 955.

In Morrison v. Regan, supra, Clearwater Short Line R. Co. v. San Garde, 7 Idaho, 106, 61 Pac. 137, supra, XII. f. 4, (b), was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the location notice failed to give the direction of the mining claim from the natural object to which it was attempted to tie it; and Brown v. Levan, 4 Idaho, 794, 46 Pac. 661, infra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the claims referred to as a monument were not situated with reference to the claim sought to be located as stated in the location notice, and the mining claims named as adjoining claims were not located until sometime afterwards; but it was said that, if the rule laid down in this case in any manner conflicts with the rule laid down in that case, that case is overruled to the extent of such conflict.

So, a certificate of location of a mining claim, giving the mining district, county, and state of its location, and describing it as lying west of a named mining claim and south of another named mining claim, prima facie measures up to the requirements of the statute, so as to be admissible in evidence on an issue as to the validity of a location, though the distances from the mining claims are not mentioned. Slothower v. Hunter, supra.

And a record description of a mining claim, correctly describing the location with reference to well-established lines of another claim, so that, with the aid of the location stakes the lines of the claim can be easily ascertained, is sufficient, though it erroneously refers to the southeasterly end of another claim when that claim has no such boundary, and describes a distance of 400 feet as 4 feet, and gives the course of a boundary as northerly and southerly when it is not due north and south. Smith v. Newell, 86 Fed. 56.

So, a notice of location of a mining claim recorded in the district records sufficiently complies with the law, where it calls for stone monuments at each corner of the claim, and describes it as bounded by four other claims. Southern Cross Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Europa Min. Co. 15 Nev. 383.

And a description in a location certificate by metes and bounds, beginning at corner No. 1, describing a parallelogram by courses and distances, and concluding "corner No. 1 of Wichita lode, joining corner No. 4 of Wichita Eagle lode," furnishes such a reference to a permanent monument as to render the certificate prima facie competent as evidence of location. Londonderry Min. Co. v. United Gold Mines Co. (Colo.) 88 Pac. 455.

So, a location notice stating that the location is bounded on the east by a named mine, and is $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south of a named road, and about 3 miles east of a named town, contains sufficient reference to permanent monuments to sustain its validity. McCann v. McMillan, 129 Cal. 350, 62 Pac. 31.

And a reference to a known mining claim, with date of its location, or to recorded claims adjoining it, having a hoisting shaft, is sufficient. Wilson v. Triumph Consol. Min. Co. 19 Utah, 66, 75 Am. St. Rep. 718, 56 Pac. 300.

Nor is a notice of location of a mining claim which shows a discovery made upon a vein or deposit bearing precious metals, the amount of ground claimed, and its dimensions, and referring to another claim as the one nearest to it, and containing the name of the claim, the signature of the locator, the date of location and of record, and the county and mining district in which located, placed upon the ground which was actually marked in accordance with the notice, though in some respects indefinite, subject to the objection that it does not tie the claim to any natural object or permanent monument. Bonanza Consol. Min. Co. v. Golden Head Min. Co. 29 Utah, 159, 80 Pac. 736.

And a recorded notice of location, describing a placer-mining claim as in a named district, and claiming No. 13a below the discovery on Cleary creek, 1,320 feet up and down stream, and 330 feet each side of the center stake, sufficiently complies with the Federal statute requiring such notice to describe the claim located by reference to some natural object or permanent monument that will identify the claim, where in locating placer claims the custom is that the one first discovered upon a gulch or creek is called the discovery claim, and other claims are numbered from such claim up and down the gulch or stream; and it is customary in certain localities to give to side or bench claims the same number as those upon the creek, with the addition of a letter of the alphabet, to designate the tiers back from the creek claims. Smith v. Cascaden, 148 Fed. 792.

Referring to named mines and giving the direction as southwesterly, however, is not a sufficient reference to a permanent monument in a notice of location of a mining claim, where half a dozen mines might be located, each one of which would be in a southwesterly direction from the mines named. Brown v. Levan, 4 Idaho, 795, 46 Pac. 661.

Nor does a location certificate bounding the location as beginning at the westerly end of a named mining claim on a named lode in a named district, and running thence in a westerly direction, without naming the point of commencement in the westerly end of such claim, sufficiently describe the claim by reference to natural objects or permanent monuments. Gilpin County Min. Co. v. Drake, 8 Colo. 586, 9 Pac. 787.

And describing a discovery shaft as being about a specified number of feet north of a specified lode, consisting of a parallelogram 1,500 feet in length by 300 feet in width, containing about 10 acres, is not such a description, there being nothing to show from what point in the lode the measurement should start. Drummond v. Long, 9 Colo. 538, 13 Pac. 543.

And the survey referred to by Wyo. Rev. Stat. 1899, §§ 2546, 2547, providing that a certificate of location of a mining claim shall contain a description of the claim, if upon ground surveyed by the United States system of land surveys, by reference to section or quarter-section corners, which shall identify the claim beyond question, making the survey void if not conforming to the other requirements, means a completed survey by proper authority; and a survey made before the location, but which was not approved, is not a sufficient monument to which to tie it. Slothower v. Hunter (Wyo.) 88 Pac. 36.

So, the prospect hole, prominent monuments, and stakes of another properly marked mining location are permanent monuments within the meaning of this requirement. Hansen v. Fletcher, 10 Utah, 266, 37 Pac. 480; Drummond v. Long, supra.

And mining shafts of a neighboring mining claim satisfy the requirements of the law as permanent monuments, with reference to which a location may be described. Drummond v. Long, supra; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co. 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 299, 1 Fed. 522.

And drifts, tunnels, and open cuts are all permanent monuments. Meydenbauer v. Stevens, 78 Fed. 787.

(e) Determination as to existence and sufficiency.

It is for the court to define, in its instructions given to the jury upon an issue as to the validity of a mining location, what is a permanent monument within the meaning of the statute. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302.

But it is not for the court to say, by merely looking at the record or declaratory statement, what things referred to are, or what are not, natural objects or permanent monuments; this is a matter of proof. Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713.

The existence of a natural object, within the meaning of the statute, and the sufficiency of the description of the location of a mining claim with reference thereto, are questions of fact, to be determined like other questions of that class. Slothower v. Hunter, supra.

And the question whether an object referred to as a permanent monument, in a notice of location of a mining claim, amounts to a natural object or permanent monument within the meaning of the statute, is one for the jury. Seidler v. La Fave, 5 N. M. 44, 20 Pac. 789, Overruling Baxter Mountain Gold Min. Co. v. Patterson, 3 N. M. 269, 3 Pac. 741; Londonderry Min. Co. v. United Gold Mines Co. (Colo.) 88 Pac. 455; O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302.

Unless the reference thereto is so indefinite that it can be told from an inspection of the certificate that the claim cannot be identified thereby. Londonderry Min. Co. v. United Gold Mines Co. supra.

So, when there is a description, but it is merely defective, the question should be left to the jury, with the other evidence in the case. Flavin v. Mattingly, 8 Mont. 242, 19 Pac. 384.

And where the record of a mining claim describes the location with reference to a natural object, or a permanent monument, it is for the jury, on an issue as to its validity, to determine whether a miner seeking information from the record could go to the natural object or permanent monument, and, from the description, find the notice pointing out the location on the ground with reasonable certainty. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. supra.

g. Verification.

The statutes of some of the states require a verification of the instrument constituting the record, or the attachment thereto of an affidavit stating specified matter with relation to precedent steps taken toward location.

The object of this requirement is to prevent fraud by subjecting the locator to the penalties of perjury if he swears falsely. Wenner v. McNulty, 7 Mont. 30, 14 Pac. 643.

In Montana the declaratory statement of the location of a mining claim must be verified by the oath of the locator, or one of the locators, and, in case of a corporation, by an officer thereof, duly authorized to act. Davidson v. Bordeaux, 15 Mont. 245, 38 Pac. 1075; Mattingly v. Lewisohn, 13 Mont. 508, 35 Pac. 111.

This requirement is within the power of the state legislature. McCowan v. MacLay, 16 Mont. 234, 40 Pac. 602; Hickey v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. 33 Mont. 46, 81 Pac. 806.

And not in conflict with the laws of the United States upon the subject of the location of mining claims. Berg v. Koegel, 16 Mont. 266, 40 Pac. 605; O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. 302.

And it is not in conflict with the organic law of the territory. Metcalf v. Prescott, 10 Mont. 283, 25 Pac. 1037.

It simply imposes additional duties and burdens upon the locators of mining claims upon the public mineral lands of the United States, and does not constitute an interference with the primary disposal of the soil, within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1851, limiting the legislative power of the territories. O'Donnell v. Glenn, supra.

And, under it, a location notice or declaratory statement, defective because not verified, or because the verification does not conform to the statutory requirements, is incompetent to prove a location. Brownfield v. Bier, 15 Mont. 403, 39 Pac. 461.

And it is incompetent as evidence on an issue as to the right of possession of mining ground. Russell v. Hoyt, 4 Mont. 412, 2 Pac. 25; McBurney v. Berry, 5 Mont. 300, 5 Pac. 867.

So, an affidavit attached to a location notice, stating that the locators have fully complied with the requirements of the law and local customs, simply states a conclusion of law, and is not a verification of any fact. McCowan v. Maclay, supra.

Nor is the requirement of the filing of a declaratory statement on oath complied with by an affidavit of the locators that the foregoing notice by them subscribed is a true copy of the original notice of location above described, as posted on the claim on the day therein stated; and such a declaratory statement is invalid. Hickey v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co. supra.

And the same rule applies to a declaratory statement as to which there is no verification as to any portion of the location, except that the description of the lode as given in the notice is true and correct; the word "description," as used in the affidavit, meaning the delineation or account of the mining claim by the recital of its metes and bounds, or courses and distances, and its geographical position only, and not the whole location notice. McCowan v. Maclay, supra.

So, the date of location is an essential element of description in a mining claim, under the statutes of the United States; and, where it is given in the body of the location notice, but it is not sworn to, the location notice is not competent as evidence of location. O'Donnell v. Glenn, supra.

And a common error having the force of law is not shown by the fact that 33 per cent of the mining prospectors of one county in a large territory, during about two years, used a form of verification for location notices which was fatally defective under the law of Congress, by reason of omitting to state the date of location, where it does not appear that any considerable number of persons have relied on, or sought to fix their rights by, the alleged common error, or that large property interests depend upon upholding it. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 9 Mont. 452, 8 L.R.A. 629, 23 Pac. 1018.

Likewise, the oath to a declaratory statement of a mining location is required to be a part of the record; and extrinsic evidence that the oath was taken after the location and before the recording is inadmissible. Metcalf v. Prescott, 10 Mont. 283, 25 Pac. 1037.

And a statement on oath, which appears on its face to have been sworn to in the neighborhood of a year before the discovery and location, is not a declaratory statement of the location, within the meaning of the statute, in the absence of anything to show that the affidavit was wrongly dated by mistake of the notary. Berg v. Koegel, 16 Mont. 266, 40 Pac. 605.

Nor is a location notice, the affidavit to which does not contain notarial evidence that the party making it took oath, or was ever present before the officer, a declaratory statement in writing on oath, required to be recorded with the county recorder. Metcalf v. Prescott, supra.

Since the act of Congress does not require that the notice of location shall be verified by oath, however; and since the requirement of verification is an additional burden imposed upon the locator of a mining claim, —the courts should so construe it that it will not be more burdensome than can be reasonably helped. Wenner v. McNulty, 7 Mont. 30, 14 Pac. 643.

And a verification of a declaratory statement of the location of a mining claim, in form and substance in accordance with the statute, is prima facie sufficient; and the facts therein stated are prima facie true. Mares v. Dillon, 30 Mont. 117, 75 Pac. 963.

And an affidavit attached to a location notice is sufficient to sustain the notice, where it appears therefrom that the affiant was before the notary, and that she swore to the oath and subscribed to it, and her name appears as that of a subscriber, though it does not appear in the body of the affidavit. Davidson v. Bordeaux, 15 Mont. 245, 38 Pac. 1075.

In the above case, Metcalf v. Prescott, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the affidavit was not signed, and there was no jurat to it, and nothing about it to show that the alleged affiant ever signed or swore to it, or was ever before a notary.

Nor need the oath be made upon the personal knowledge of the affiant; it is sufficient if made upon information and belief. Wenner v. McNulty, supra.

And a declaratory statement verified in proper form is not rendered invalid by evidence disclosing the fact that it was made by the locator entirely upon information received by others, and not upon his personal knowledge. Mares v. Dillon, supra.

And where one person discovered a mining claim in the strict and literal sense by personally viewing a lode or lead of precious metal, and he informed an associate of the discovery, and was his agent in making it, and the location was made in their joint names, a notice of location, duly verified by oath of the associate, who did not personally make the discovery, which in all other respects complies with the provisions of the law of both the United States and the territory, is not invalid and inadmissible in evidence on the theory that it was not sworn to by the discoverer. Wenner v. McNulty, supra.

So, Idaho Rev. Stat. § 3104, requiring an affidavit to be attached to the location notice of a mining claim, stating the citizenship of the locator, that the location was properly made upon unoccupied ground, and performance of specified recovery work, is a reasonable regulation that the legislature is fully authorized to make, and is not in conflict with the laws of the United States. Van Buren v. McKinley, 8 Idaho, 93, 66 Pac. 936.

And the verification may be made by an agent. Dunlap v. Pattison, 4 Idaho, 473, 95 Am. St. Rep. 140, 42 Pac. 504.

But the affidavit must be sworn to before an officer authorized by law to administer oaths. Van Buren v. McKinley, supra.

And a notice of location, required by that act to have an affidavit attached, to which is attached a paper signed by the locator and purporting to have been sworn to before a deputy district recorder, is not admissible in evidence in an action to adverse a patent to a mining claim, under Idaho Rev. Stat. § 3103, providing for recording notices of mining claims; and that, "for the convenience of prospectors and locators, the county recorders of the several counties must appoint a deputy at any place where he may deem it necessary, and at all places more than 10 miles distant from an existing office;" and, upon failure of any recorder to make an appointment for ten days after a petition in writing presented to him, the resident miners in the district may appoint one of their number temporarily; there being nothing to authorize a district recorder to appoint a deputy. Ibid.

So, Bellinger & C. (Or.) Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 3976, providing that a locator of a mining claim shall, within sixty days from and after posting the location notice, file for record with the recorder of conveyances, if there is one, who shall be the custodian of miners' records and miners' liens, otherwise with the clerk of the county wherein such claim is situated, a copy of the notice of location, having attached thereto an affidavit showing the sinking of a discovery shaft, or its equivalent, is in addition to, and in aid of, and not repugnant to, the Federal statutes, providing that all records of mining claims must contain the name or names of the locators, and date of the location, and such a description of the claims by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify them; and is valid and binding upon the locator. Wright v. Lyons, 45 Or. 167, 77 Pac. 81.

And omission within the specified time to cause to be attached to the copy of a notice of location of a mining claim delivered to the clerk for record an affidavit in proof of work required to be done by the statute, so that the same is not recorded, is fatal to the validity of the location. Ibid.

h. The act of recording.

1. Method and place of.

State statutes and miners' rules and regulations, requiring a record of a mining claim, usually, if not universally, make provision with reference to the method of the filing and recording, and the officer with whom, or the office in which, it is to be done.

parties are permitted to have transfers of property and certain other written instruments recorded so as to give constructive notice thereof, cannot be required to record a miner's notice of location where this is not made his duty by law, and a recorder is provided for by local regulation. San Bernardino County v. Davidson, 112 Cal. 503, 44 Pac. 659.

But, in the absence of any organized mining district, the record of a mineral location should be made in the recorder's office of the county in which the land is situated. Re Rose Lode Claims, 22 Land Dec. 83.

The location of a mining claim recorded in strict compliance with the laws of the United States and of the state or territory in which the location is made, however, is valid though the recording was not in compliance with the local regulations of the mining district. Johnson v. McLaughlin, 1 Ariz. 493, 4 Pac. 130.

And the duty of a recorder to record notices and proofs of a mining location does not depend upon their validity or their effect, but upon the statute prescribing what may be recorded. Kern County v. Lee, 129 Cal. 361, 61 Pac. 1124.

Nor does the fact that the recording fees for recording a certificate of location of a mining claim were not paid in advance affect the question of the effect on the validity of the location of the failure of the recorder to record the certificate thereof, where the locator had done all the law required of him in respect thereto. Shepard v. Murphy, 26 Colo. 350, 58 Pac. 588.

And a mining location is not affected by a mistake of the recorder in recording the location in a wrong name, where the certificate itself complied with the statute, and no one was misled by the error. Weese v. Barker, 7 Colo. 178, 2 Pac. 919.

Nor does a mistake of the recorder in copying a notice of the location of a mining claim in the book of records by omitting one of the lines invalidate the location, where all the steps required by local rules and regulations were performed by the locators, and the lines were distinctly marked upon the ground. Myers v. Spooner, 55 Cal. 257.

And, under Mills's Anno. Stat. (Colo.) § 3150, providing that the discoverer of a lode shall, within three months from the date of the discovery, record his claim in the office of the recorder of the county in which the lode is situated, by a location certificate, where the locator of a lode has fully complied with all the provisions of the statute necessary to constitute a valid location, and has lodged his location certificate with the proper officer within the time required by law, and has been notified that it would be recorded, he has done all that the law requires of him in respect to recording his claim; and his location cannot be defeated by conflicting locations subsequently made, which were duly recorded, because the recorder omitted to record his location. Shepard v. Murphy, 26 Colo. 350, 58 Pac. 588.

But a record of the location of a placer-mining claim, made in a memorandum book without designating any natural object or permanent monument, or any work by which the claim can be identified, which book is retained in the possession of the locator, is not in compliance with U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, and U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, and is of no legal force as a record. Fuller v. Harris, 29 Fed. 814.

So, registry was expressly required by the Mexican mining ordinance; and this is not shown by proving that sheets of paper, not executed at the same time, but assumed to be sufficient, were, at some time, placed in the office of the alcalde, and that they remained there for a time in one of the pigeon holes of his desk. United States v. Castillero, 2 Black, 17, 17 L. ed. 360.

It will be assumed on appeal that the evidence in a case was sufficient to sustain the finding of the court below that a proper location notice had been filed and recorded, so as to preclude a contention of the party asserting the contrary, that no such notice was filed and recorded, where he omitted to preserve the evidence in this regard in the record. Score v. Griffin (Ariz.) 80 Pac. 331.

2. Time of.

State statutes and miners' rules and regulations requiring the recording of a mining claim usually fix a period of time after discovery, or after posting notice, within which the record must be made. These provisions are subject to the ordinary rules of construction.

Thus, the provision of Alaska Pol. Code, § 15, that notices of location of mining claims shall be filed for record within ninety days from the date of the discovery of the claim described in the notice, means not beyond ninety days from the date of discovery, and a compliance with the act at any time before the last day has expired is sufficient. Butler v. Good Enough Min. Co. 1 Alaska, 246; Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532.

And such a provision is reasonable and necessary in a country of great distances, bad trails, and rigorous climate like Alaska; and miners' rules or customs reducing the limit are invalid. Butler v. Good Enough Min. Co. supra.

So, a certificate of location of a mining claim, filed sixty-one days after the date of discovery, is not invalid because not filed within the sixty days required by law, where the last day of the sixty was Sunday, since in such case it would be excluded from the computation. Columbia Copper Min. Co. v. Duchess Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. 13 Wyo. 244, 79 Pac. 385.

And, where a location of a mining claim is attacked before the expiration of the time allowed by law for the filing of notices of location, the locator or owner, to support it, need show only acts of location, independent of a certificate of location. Kinney v. Fleming, 6 Ariz. 263, 56 Pac. 723.

Nor is failure to record the certificate of location of a lode-mining claim within the period prescribed by law a defense in an action by a locator against a trespasser, where the trespass was committed before the expiration of such period, and the trespasser had acquired no rights between such expiration and the record of the locator's certificate. Columbia Copper Min. Co. v. Duchess Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. supra.

So, the failure of the locator of a mining claim to record his notice of location within the time prescribed by a state statute does not work a forfeiture of the claim, where no such penalty is attached by that statute. Last Chance Min. Co. v. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. 66 C. C. A. 299, 131 Fed. 579.

And the same rule applies to failure of a locator to comply with a district regulation that all mining claims shall be recorded within a specified period after location. Johnson v. McLaughlin, 1 Ariz. 493, 4 Pac. 130.

Nor will failure to record a location certificate of a mining claim within the specified time from the date of discovery of the lode inure to the benefit of an overlapping claim based on a junior discovery, when the junior discoverers have neither made, nor attempted to make, a relocation. Omar v. Soper, 11 Colo. 380, 7 Am. St. Rep. 246, 18 Pac. 443.

So, objection that a notice of location was not filed within twenty days after the discovery thereof, as required by local law, is waived by a failure to assert it. Garfield M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153.

And failure to record a certificate of location of a lode-mining claim within the period prescribed by law will not invalidate the location, where no intervening rights of third persons to the same ground have been acquired previous to the actual filing. Columbia Copper Min. Co. v. Duchess Min. Mill. & Smelting Co. supra. Buffalo Zinc & Copper Co. v. Crump, 70 Ark. 525, 91 Am. St. Rep. 87, 69 S. W. 572; Faxon v. Barnard, 2 McCrary, 44, 4 Fed. 702; Preston v. Hunter, 15 C. C. A. 148, 29 U. S. App. 621, 67 Fed. 996.

The objection that a certificate of location of a mining claim was not recorded within the prescribed period does not vitiate the certificate, or render it void; the only effect of failure to record is that it cannot affect intervening rights. Slothower v. Hunter (Wyo.) 88 Pac. 36.

And the rule is the same though the statute requiring the certificate of a mining claim to be recorded within a specified period provides that any record of a location of a lode-mining claim, which shall not contain all the requirements made in this provision, shall be void. This provision relates to the time of making the record, provided no adverse rights have intervened in the meantime, and failure so to record a certificate of location does not make a location void; it is the record thereof only which is made void by the statute. Zerres v. Vanina, 134 Fed. 610.

And a location of saline lands, and the recording of the survey in accordance with the provisions of the statute, though not within the time specified are valid and sufficient against one who attempts to acquire an adverse title more than twenty years after such recording. Garrard v. Silver Peak Mines, 82 Fed. 578, Affirmed in 36 C. C. A. 603, 94 Fed. 983.

Under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426, making the manner of locating mining claims and recording them subject to the laws of the state or territory, and the regulations of each mining district, not in conflict with the laws of the United States; and under Colo. act February 13, 1874, requiring the discoverer of a lode, within three months from the date of his discovery, to record his claim in the office of the recorder of the county in which the lode is situated, however,—a person, locating a mining claim upon an Indian reservation, which reservation was afterwards extinguished by treaty, must, to sustain his location, within three months from the date on which the reservation was extinguished record his certificate of location; and, in case of his failure to do so, it does not lie with him to insist upon his wrongful entry upon the premises during the existence of the reservation, as against persons who went upon the premises after they had become a part of the public domain, and made a proper location thereon. Kendall v. San Juan Silver Min. Co. 144 U. S. 658, 36 L. ed. 583, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 779, Affirming 9 Colo. 349, 12 Pac. 198.

Whether a record of a mining claim was made within the prescribed time is a question for the jury in ejectment. Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532.

i. The record as evidence.

1. What may be proved by.

A location certificate when recorded, or other record of a mining claim, is competent evidence prima facie of all that the statute requires such certificate to contain, and which is therein sufficiently set forth. Streprey v. Stark, 7 Colo. 614, 5 Pac. 111.

And it is presumptive evidence of a proper discovery, and that the locator has complied with the law. Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787.

And, where a resident of the United States made a mining location and recorded a location notice at or near the time reciting the facts, it will be presumed that he posted the notice of his claim, and properly marked the ground. Jantzon v. Arizona Copper Co. 3 Ariz. 6, 20 Pac. 93.

So, the record furnishes presumptive evidence of the execution of the instruments of which it consists, and this presumption can be overcome only by countervailing testimony of a preponderating character. Kramer v. Settle, 1 Idaho, 485.

And, where evidence has been given on an issue as to the validity of a mining location, tending to establish the existence of a discovery notice, it is proper that the location certificates, original and amended, should be admitted for the consideration of the jury in connection therewith. Coleman v. Davis, 13 Colo. 98, 21 Pac. 1018.

The act of Congress of May 10, 1872, § 5, providing for the contents of the record of mining claims, however, gives no greater effect to the record of such claim than is given to the registration laws of the state, and does not exclude proof of actual possession and of its extent, as prima facie evidence of title. Campbell v. Rankin, 99 U. S. 261, 25 L. ed. 435.

And, while the local record of a mining community may be and probably is the best evidence of rules and customs governing the community, and to some extent the distribution of mining rights, it is not the best or only evidence of priority or extent of actual possession. Ibid.

Nor is the certificate of location of a mining claim by the probate judge of a county anything more than prima facie evidence of compliance by the locator with the law requiring the sinking of a shaft to complete the location. Zeckendorf v. Hutchison, 1 N. M. 476.

Or that the claim which was located by several persons was held by them as a company, and not in severalty as individuals. Ibid.

And an instrument purporting to be a record of a mining claim in dispute, not required, to be made and filed under the laws of a state or territory of the United States, or under miners' rules or regulations, is not legal notice of the rights claimed, and is not a link in the chain of title claimed, and is incompetent as evidence of a right of possession to placer-mining ground. Moxon v. Wilkinson, 2 Mont. 421.

So, where a recorded notice of a mining claim contains statements not required by law to be incorporated in it, it is not evidence as to such statements. Flick v. Gold Hill & L. M. Min. Co. 8 Mont. 298, 20 Pac. 807.

But a false statement in a recorded location notice may be rejected as surplusage where the description is sufficient to ascertain the premises to which it is intended to apply without the aid of the false statement, leaving the instrument to take effect without it. Metcalf v. Prescott, 10 Mont. 283, 25 Pac. 1037.

And a statement in a recorded notice, that the claim was situated in one county, when it was in fact situated in another, does not affect its validity or admissibility in evidence, where a statement of the county in which it was situated was not required by law. Ibid.

So, where the right of possession of a mining claim is founded upon an alleged compliance with the law relating to a valid location, all the necessary steps therefor, aside from the making and recording of the location certificate, must, when contested, be established by proof outside of such certificate. Streprey v. Stark, 7 Colo. 614, 5 Pac. 111; Farmington Gold Min. Co. v. Rhymney

Gold & Copper Co. 20 Utah, 363, 77 Am. St. Rep. 913, 58 Pac. 832.

And a copy of the record of a mining location, under Cal. special act 1875-76, chap. 562, p. 853, having special application to a particular county, requiring all notices of mining locations to be recorded in the recorder's office, is proof of nothing except the bare fact that such a notice had been recorded. It is not proof that the notice was posted on the claim, or that the location was so marked on the ground that its boundaries could be readily traced, or that they include the apex of a lode or any valuable mineral deposit. Mutchmor v. McCarty (Cal.) 87 Pac. 85.

2. Methods of proof.

Records of mining claims are subject to general rules with reference to methods of proof by record evidence.

Thus, a statutory provision that copies of papers duly filed in the recorder's office, certified by the recorder, shall be received with like effect in courts in actions and proceedings, as the original instruments, papers, and notices, applies to records of location of mining claims. Kramer v. Settle, 1 Idaho, 485; Willeford v. Bell (Cal.) 49 Pac. 6.

And district record books containing the records of mining claims are not objectionable as evidence of mining locations on the ground that they are not shown to have come from the proper custodian, where they are produced by the county recorder of the county in which the claim in question is situated, and the pleadings in the action admit that the claim is located in a specified mining district in that county. McCann v. McMillan, 129 Cal. 350, 62 Pac. 31.

So, the statutory rule by which the records, laws, and proceedings of mining districts are rendered admissible as evidence authorizes the proof of a certificate of location or a declaratory statement of a mining claim by office or certified copy, without preliminary proof of the existence or loss of the instrument recorded. Sullivan v. Hense, 2 Colo. 424; McKinstry v. Clark, 4 Mont. 370, 1 Pac. 759.

And the official records of a county, transcribed, under the supervision of the recorder, into a book which has been recognized as part of the public records of the office, the original book having been lost or destroyed, are admissible in evidence to prove the location of a mining claim. Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. ed. 735, affirming 3 Mont. 65, as to this point.

So, where the original records of mining claims of a district were destroyed by fire, and the miners, by a subsequent resolution, required the claims to be rerecorded in a new book, the new book, though not competent to prove the claim, is competent to prove that a claim had been recorded according to the rules of the vicinage. McGarrity v. Byington, 12 Cal. 426, 2 Morrison Min. Rep. 311.

A notice of a mining location in a recorder's book is the original notice, however, and not a record or copy of an independent original. San Bernardino County v. Davidson, 112 Cal. 503, 44 Pac. 659; Pralus v. Pacific Gold & S. Min. Co. 35 Cal. 36.

And a person asserting title under Mont. Stat. Ex. Sess. 83, § 1, providing that any person or persons who shall hereafter discover any mining claim upon any vein or lode bearing gold or silver or other valuable deposits shall, within twenty days thereafter, make and file for record in the office of the recorder of the county in which the discovery is made a declaratory statement thereof in writing, on oath before some person authorized by law to administer oaths, describing such claim in the manner provided by the laws of the United States, must produce in evidence the original declaratory statement duly signed and sworn to, or, if the same is lost or not within his power, a record thereof, or transcript of such record duly authenticated; and, where the original was not lost, but was under the control of the opposing claimant, no copy of the record or transcript thereof can be received in evidence. Stapleton v. Pease, 2 Mont. 550.

XIII. Additional or amended location.

a. Authority for and purpose and nature of.

Though there is no statutory provision for amendment of a location of a mining claim, or for amending notices of location, locators, who have apprehension as to the sufficiency of their locations or as to their notices of location, may put up another notice correcting the defect. Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 528, 14 Pac. 182.

And where several persons posted a notice of location of a mining claim, and signed the same as locators, while a subsequent notice posted on the same claim, signed by a part only of the original locators, and by other persons whose names were not on the first notice, is an original notice so far as the new locators are concerned, it does not affect the rights of the prior locators whose names were omitted, or operate as an abandonment of the first notice by the persons whose names were signed to both; and, in an action by all the persons whose names were signed to both notices, to quiet their title as against an adverse claimant, the second notice is admissible in evidence. Ibid.

In most of the mining states and territories, however, this is provided for by statute. These statutes, with perhaps one exception, are substantially alike, and provide that if at any time the locator of any mining claim heretofore or hereafter located, or his assigns, shall apprehend that his original certificate was defective, or erroneous, or that the requirements of the law had not been complied with before filing, or shall be desirous of changing the surface boundaries, or of taking in any part of an overlapping claim which has been abandoned; or in case the original certificate was made prior to the passage of this law, and he shall be desirous of securing the benefits of this act,—such locator, or his assigns, may file an additional certificate subject to the conditions of this act, and to contain all that this act requires an original certificate to contain, provided that such amended location does not interfere with the existing rights of others at the time such amendment is made; and no such amended location or record thereof shall preclude the claimant or claimants from proving any such title or titles as he or they may have held under previous location.

These statutes are supplemental to the Federal statutes, and not in conflict therewith. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. 25 Fed. 389.

And they embrace all classes of mining claims, including placers as well as lodes. Kirk v. Meldrum. 28 Colo. 453, 65 Pac. 633.

And an amended location of a mining claim, made to correct a mistake in the original location, though the amended declaration was filed before the enactment of the statute providing therefor, became a valid location by the enactment thereof, where it provided that an amended or additional declaratory statement, which may have been filed by the locator, shall have the same force and effect as though it had been filed thereunder. Wilson v. Freeman, 29 Mont. 470, 68 L.R.A. 833, 75 Pac. 84.

The purpose of provisions of this class is to permit the locator to cure errors and defects, and supply omissions, so that a location of a mining claim which is defective may be rendered perfect. Sullivan v. Sharp, 33 Colo. 346, 80 Pac. 1054.

And to take in territory embraced in abandoned overlapping claims if so desired. Ibid.

They are designed for the benefit of locators of mining claims, giving them opportunity to cure defects if any existed in the original notice, or the marking of the boundaries, and mistakes in marking the courses, etc. Porter v. Tonopah North Star Tunnel & Development Co. 133 Fed. 756.

And the intent is that the additional certificate shall operate to cure defects in the original, and thereby put the locator, when no other rights have intervened, in the same position that he would have occupied if no such defect had occurred. Strepey v. Stark, 7 Colo. 614, 5 Pac. 111.

And, where such amendment is made before other rights attach, the amendment relates back to the original location. McGinnis v. Egbert. 8 Colo. 41, 5 Pac. 652.

They enable a miner who, in good faith, has gone upon the public domain and expended time and money in performing substantial acts required to locate a mining claim, but through inadvertence or ignorance has failed to comply with the requirements of the statute in describing his claim, to cure such error at any time by an amendment correcting the defective description, and thus perfect his record as of the date of his original certificate. Frisholm v. Fitzgerald, 25 Colo. 290, 53 Pac. 1109.

An amended location, when made in accordance with these provisions, becomes the completed location of the discoverer, and is just as valid as if it had been made in the first instance; and parties coming upon the claim described in the amended certificate, subsequent to the perfection of the amended location in compliance with the mining laws, can acquire no rights therein. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. supra.

And a certificate of location, though insufficient, should be admitted in evidence on an issue as to the validity of the location, where it is followed by an additional or amended certificate, which either supplies what it lacks or conforms as a whole to the statute. Duncan v. Fulton, 15 Colo. App. 140, 61 Pac. 244.

Nor does the amendment of a location of a mining claim forfeit any rights acquired by the original location, except such as are inconsistent with the amendment. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. 134 Fed. 268.

And an amended location by a purchaser of a mining claim, wherein he makes use of a discovery of his own within the limits of his purchase and on a junior location, embraced for the greater part within the boundaries of the purchase, does not defeat or affect his right to the benefit of all the mineral veins and lodes in the claim purchased, as well as all the expenditures made by his grantor in the development thereof. Tam v. Story, 21 Land Dec. 440.

These provisions are for the benefit of locators, however. They are not obliged to act upon them. And, where the original notice is clear, definite, and certain, and the boundaries of the claim are so marked and monumented that the same can be readily traced and determined, it is not necessary that the locator should file an amended certificate of location; it is sufficient if he is satisfied with his original notice, to file the same within ninety days, and call it his certificate of location. Porter v. Tonopah North Star Tunnel & Developing Co. supra.

The amended location authorized by these provisions is essentially different from the relocation authorized by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1426. The former is made in furtherance of the original location and for the purpose of giving additional strength or territorial effect thereto, while the latter is a new and independent location, which can be made only where the original location, and all rights thereunder, have been lost by failure to make the necessary annual expenditure. Re Teller, 26 Land Dec. 484.

b. By whom it may be made.

An amended or additional location may be made by an authorized agent, and the authority need not be in writing. Morrison v. Regan, 8 Idaho, 291, 67 Pac. 955.

And an amended location made by a stranger to the record may be shown to have been made in trust for the real owner. Re

Silk Finish Lode, Nov. 2, 1894, Mineral Law Dig. 105.

But, where several persons acting jointly locate a mining claim, an additional location certificate cannot be filed by one of them, unless it is for the benefit and in the names of all. Hallack v. Traber, 23 Colo. 14, 46 Pac. 110.

And, where several persons locate a mining claim, and the claim is deeded to one of their number in trust, for the purpose of obtaining a patent thereto for the benefit of all the owners, and the trustee files an additional location certificate taking in additional territory, the trustee cannot retain in his own right, for his own individual use, the additional territory thus taken in, since to permit it would be to allow him to reap an advantage from the trust property and from his relation to it as trustee. Ibid.

c. Defects which may be reached and changes made.

1. General rules.

The filing of an amended certificate of location of a mining claim, if done under proper conditions, is effectual for all purposes enumerated in the statute. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. 125 Fed. 389; Johnson v. Young, 18 Colo. 635, 34 Pac. 173.

And this is so whether such purposes are mentioned in the amended certificate or not. Ibid.

The amended location provided for by these statutes, however, presupposes and is based upon the original location, and the locator is able to file an amended location certificate only by reason of the fact that the original has been filed. Hallack v. Traber, supra.

And the rights of a person making an amended location depend upon the locator's ownership of the original location; and, if his original location is entirely invalid, and at the time of the amended location the original is owned, wholly or in part, by others, their title will not be affected or divested by the amended location. Re Teller, supra.

It is the defective or erroneous certificate which may be amended, as distinguished from the one which is absolutely void. McEvoy v. Hyman, 25 Fed. 696; Morrison v. Regan, 8 Idaho, 291, 67 Pac. 955.

If a location of a mining claim is so defective as absolutely to fail to comply with the statutory requirements and define the claim, it is void, and a second certificate cannot be considered as amendatory thereof, so as to date back to the first and validate the claim; but, if the first certificate is not void, but merely lacks in technical detail, the second will be considered as amendatory, and will relate back to the first, and both should be regarded as one, and may be put in evidence as such. Moyle v. Bullene, 7 Colo. App. 308, 44 Pac. 69.

appears that there was an original location which was valid, though imperfect. Sullivan v. Sharp, 33 Colo. 346, 80 Pac. 1054.

And, where a mining claim was located upon ground not subject to location, and, after such land reverted and became a part of the public domain and subject to location, a second location was filed thereon, a subsequent amendment of the first location does not operate to validate it. Gurney v. Brown, 32 Colo. 472, 77 Pac. 357.

So, an amended location notice, made with reference to the original location for the purpose of curing possible errors therein, confers no new rights, and is of no effect, in the absence of any question as to the validity of the original location, except as to the question whether or not the ground was, at the time, subject to location. Jordan v. Duke, 6 Ariz. 55, 53 Pac. 197.

Nor is a location, invalid because based upon a discovery within the limits of an existing and valid location, subject to amendment. Sullivan v. Sharp, supra.

In the above case, Johnson v. Young, 18 Colo. 625, 34 Pac. 173, infra, XIII. c, 3, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the original location was valid, the discovery upon which it was based being upon ground subject to appropriation.

An original certificate of location, and an additional or amended one, may both be admitted in evidence as one, however, on an issue as to the validity of the location, though neither one, as a whole, is absolutely correct and in perfect conformity with the statute, where in both, or from both, there may be found and deduced all that the law requires, the statute being otherwise complied with, so that the miner's record is complete and his title is perfect. Duncan v. Fulton, 15 Colo. App. 140, 61 Pac. 244; Butte Consol. Min. Co. v. Barker (Mont.) 89 Pac. 302.

And the right at any time to amend a certificate of location of a mining claim, given by Colo. Gen. Stat. § 25, p. 724, is not taken away or affected by § 16 thereof, declaring that defective certificates shall be void; since, when read in connection with § 25, and qualified by it, it is to be understood as saying that defective certificates are lacking in force and sufficiency until amended as provided in § 25, but not wholly void. McEvoy v. Hyman, supra.

Nor can a person having no valid claim to a mining location complain of an amendment to correct a mistake in a prior location. Wilson v. Freeman, 29 Mont. 470, 68 L.R.A. 833, 75 Pac. 84.

And an additional certificate of location is not evidence of any after-acquired right or interest, but merely evidence relating to a right of possession which must have been acquired prior to the filing of such certificate, and prior to the acquisition of any intervening right of the controverting party; and its admissibility as evidence is not affected by the fact that it was filed subsequent to the commencement of the suit. Strepey v. Stark, 7 Colo. 614, 5 Pac. 111.

2. Mistakes in prior location.

An amended certificate of location may be used to cure a defective or erroneous certificate. Morrison v. Regan, supra; McGinnis v. Egbert, 8 Colo. 41, 5 Pac. 652.

And, in the absence of any statutory provision declaring that, where a certificate of location fails to describe the claim with reference to some natural object or permanent monument, it is void, an original certificate defective in this respect may be amended. Morrison v. Regan, supra.

And, where the only defect alleged to exist in a location certificate is that it fails to describe the claim with reference to some natural object or permanent monument, and the locator files an amended location, he is in a position to invoke the rule that a subsequent locator cannot object that all the steps necessary to a valid location were not performed at the time it was made, provided they are afterwards performed before other rights attach. McGinnis v. Egbert, supra.

So, Colo. Gen. Stat. § 2409, providing that a defective or erroneous certificate may be amended, qualifies the declaration of § 2400 thereof, that a certificate that shall not contain such a description as shall identify the claim with reasonable certainty shall be void, so as to give it some force and validity; and an amended certificate designed to correct an attempted location defective because there were no stakes upon the ground is not subject to objection on the ground that the original location was void, and that therefore no amendment could be made. Frisholm v. Fitzgerald, 25 Colo. 290, 53 Pac. 1109.

And an amendment of a declaratory statement of a mining claim, with reference to defects in the original certificate and failure to comply with the requirements of the law, relates back to the date of the original location, in the absence of any intervening rights. Butte Consol. Min. Co. v. Barker, supra.

Likewise, where a mining claim was located, and was valid in all respects except in a failure to file for record a valid certificate thereof, an amended certificate, made before third parties have acquired intervening rights, will, as to such third parties, relate back to preserve and keep intact the claim as originally located and staked. Craig v. Thompson, 10 Colo. 517, 16 Pac. 24.

The proviso of the statute withdrawing existing rights of others from the effect of an amended location is applicable only to amendments changing boundaries, and relocation taking in territory not before included within the claim; it does not apply to amendments correcting defective description for the purpose of perfecting the original record. Frisholm v. Fitzgerald, supra.

Nor does it apply to errors or defects in the certificate. McEvoy v. Hyman, 25 Fed. 596.

While an additional certificate of location does not relate back absolutely to the first certificate in the sense in which the term 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"relation" is employed to express the well-known legal doctrine, it does relate back to the right of the locator accruing by virtue of the prerequisite acts of discovery, prior possession, excavation, posting, and marking boundaries, done in attempted compliance with the law respecting the filing of a location certificate. Strepey v. Stark, supra.

The omission of the name of one of the original locators of a mining claim from the certificate of amended location, however, does not affect the title acquired by the original location, unless done with the knowledge and consent of the original locator. Re Auerbach, 29 Land Dec. 208.

Nor is an amended declaratory statement of a mining claim rendered defective by the addition therein of another name to the name originally given to the mining claim, where it refers to the location as originally named, and declares that it is intended as an amendment of the declaratory statement of that claim. Butte Consol. Min. Co. v. Barker, supra.

And the fact that an amended certificate of location contains names other than those set forth in the original cannot be taken advantage of by third persons; but such certificate may be treated as an original notice as to the persons whose names do not appear in the first, and as a supplemental or amended notice as to those whose names appear in both. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. 125 Fed. 389; Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 528, 14 Pac. 182.

3. Taking in new territory.

A change of boundaries may be effected by means of an amended location certificate, where intervening rights of others are not thereby interfered with. Seymour v. Fisher, 16 Colo. 188, 27 Pac. 240.

And the validity of an amended location including grounds not within its original boundaries is not affected by the fact that the locator had not discovered mineral in the added part. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. supra; Hallack v. Traber, 23 Colo. 14, 46 Pac. 110.

Nor is it affected by the fact that the locator had never been in actual possession thereof. Tonopah & S. L. Min. Co. v. Tonopah Min. Co. supra.

And a patent may be issued for the claim as amended, without additional outlay in the way of labor and improvements. Hallack v. Traber, supra.

So, under these provisions, if at any time the locator of any mining claim shall be desirous of taking in any part of an overlapping claim which has been abandoned, such locator, or his assigns, may do so by means of an additional certificate. Johnson v. Young, 18 Colo. 625, 34 Pac. 173.

And an additional certificate of location of a mining claim, filed for the purpose of taking in overlapping, abandoned ground, is not rendered ineffectual for that purpose by the fact that it did not specify in terms that it was filed for that purpose. Ibid.

So, where a location notice as posted did not definitely locate one end of the claim, the locator has the right, after initiating his claim, to locate that end. Wiltsee v. King of Arizona Min. & Mill. Co. 7 Ariz. 95, 60 Pac. 896.

And where an original location of a mining claim was defective or erroneous in that the locator misdescribed his claim as running easterly and westerly, he may file an amended declaratory statement that the claim ran in a northerly and southerly direction, to correspond with the marking of the claim on the ground. Wilson v. Freeman, 29 Mont. 470, 68 L.R.A. 833, 75 Pac. 84.

New rights cannot be added to a mining location by amendment, however, where they are inconsistent with those acquired by other locators, when locations were made between the dates of the original and the amended location. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. 134 Fed. 268.

And if an amended location includes land not included in the original location, and interferes with existing rights as to such land, the amended location does not relate back to the date of the original so far as the included land is concerned. Morrison v. Regan, 8 Idaho, 291, 67 Pac. 955.

And title to a mineral lode in the actual possession of persons claiming and engaged in developing it cannot be acquired by others by a survey and recording a location certificate. Omar v. Soper, 11 Colo. 380, 7 Am. St. Rep. 246, 18 Pac. 443.

Nor can an amendment to a location, describing different lands, or making certain that which was uncertain, revert back to the original defective location, so as to affect a town-site entry, or other claim, intervening after the first location. Reilly v. Berry, 2 Ariz. 272, 15 Pac. 26; Blackmore v. Reilly, 2 Ariz. 442, 17 Pac. 72.

And an amended location of a mining claim embracing additional ground, after the claim has been officially surveyed and the survey becomes a basis for patent proceedings which are carried to entry, though preceding entry, cannot be recognized as the subject of further patent proceedings to include the additional tract as a part of the original claim. Re Gilson Asphaltum Co. 33 Land Dec. 612.

It cannot be assumed, however, in the absence of anything tending to disclose when an amended certificate of location was filed, that the boundaries of the claim were so changed as to prejudice the rights of the owners of another claim. This fact must be established affirmatively by owners of the latter claim. Kirk v. Meldrum, 28 Colo. 453, 65 Pac. 633.

XIV. Full performance as a prerequisite to possessory title.

a. General rule.

A strict compliance with the Federal, state, and territorial statutes is necessary to acquire and preserve one's right to the 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

possession of a mining claim. Lockhart v. Wills, 9 N. M. 354, 54 Pac. 336, Affirmed in part in 181 U. S. 516, 45 L. ed. 979, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665; Worthen v. Sidway, 72 Ark. 215, 79 S. W. 777; Eaton v. Norris, 131 Cal. 561, 63 Pac. 856; Becker v. Pugh, 9 Colo. 589, 13 Pac. 906; Zeckendorf v. Hutchison, 1 N. M. 476.

And so is compliance with such local regulations of the mining district as are not in conflict with statutory provisions. Gleeson v. Martin White Min. Co. 13 Nev. 442; Becker v. Pugh, supra.

A location according to law is a condition precedent to a grant from the government. Hauswirth v. Butcher, 4 Mont. 299, 1 Pac. 714; Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 309, 1 Pac. 713; Zeckendorf v. Hutchison, supra.

And to the right of possession of the claim. Garfield M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153; McKinstry v. Clark, 4 Mont. 370, 1 Pac. 759.

A person claiming ground not actually possessed and worked for mining purposes must show his right thereto by constructive possession; and he can show this only by physical marks or monuments, or by compliance with all the legal requirements of a valid location. Roberts v. Wilson, 1 Utah, 292; Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah, 410, 64 Pac. 1019; Jordan v. Duke, 4 Ariz. 278, 36 Pac. 896; Bulette v. Dodge, 2 Alaska, 427.

And a locator of a mining claim, who has failed to comply with the statute so as to make his constructive possession good as against any person holding adversely to him, cannot recover in an action brought to determine an adverse claim thereto with reference to the ground not in his actual possession, whether the adverse claimant has made a valid location on the ground or not. Hahn v. James, 29 Mont. 1, 73 Pac. 965.

And an instruction to find for the plaintiff in an action involving a right to mining ground, where the defendant has disclaimed possession of the claims claimed by the plaintiff, if it is found that the defendant claims the same ground as the plaintiff, is erroneous as ignoring the acts necessary to make a valid location. Darger v. Le Sieur, 8 Utah, 160, 30 Pac. 363.

A location cannot be considered valid unless upon proper development thereof a patent may be obtained for such portions of the surface ground included therein as embrace the evidences of the essential acts of location. Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 393.

While discovery is a prerequisite to a valid location, the discovery alone does not constitute a location. The discovery of ore vests in the discoverer no right or title to the property; it is but one step in acquiring title to a mining claim; and it must be followed by a location consisting of the marking of the claim by monuments so that its boundaries can be readily traced, the posting of notice thereon, and, where the state or district law requires it, the recording of such notice. Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488; Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, supra; Redden v. Harlan, 2

Alaska, 402; Bulette v. Dodge, 2 Alaska, 427; Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532.

And, where locators go upon a mining claim and remain there until after 12 o'clock midnight of the day of location, posting notices thereof and setting stakes at two of the corners of the claim, and then leave the ground and never return, they do not proceed far enough to acquire rights which can be lost by abandonment or otherwise, so as to bring the claim within the provisions of the law with reference to the relocation of abandoned claims. Paragon Min. & Development Co. v. Stevens County Exploration Co. (Wash.) 87 Pac. 1068.

Nor will performance of statutory requirements which are conditions precedent to the acquiring of a title to mineral claims be presumed. Zeckendorf v. Hutchison, supra.

And, under N. M. Rev. Stat. § 5, p. 728, providing that mining locations may be sold and transferred in the same manner as real estate, it will not be presumed, in case of such a sale, that all the requirements of the statute with reference to perfecting the location were complied with upon the part of the seller at the time of the sale. Ibid.

It devolves upon one whose claim of ownership and right to the possession of a mining claim are put in issue to show affirmatively that he has complied fully with all the requirements of the statutes, Federal and state, and of the local rules and regulations relative to the location of mining claims; that is, that he has made a valid location. Garfield M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, supra; Bryan v. McCaig, 10 Colo. 309, 15 Pac. 413.

And an averment that a grant was of vacant public land, and that a notice of location was posted thereon, is insufficient as an allegation of title to a mining claim. Hall v. Arnott, 80 Cal. 348, 22 Pac. 200.

Discovery of mineral, marking the boundaries, filing a declaratory statement with a proper description of the claim by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, possession and title to the time of discovery, performance of annual assessment work required by law, and that the locator is a citizen of the United States, or has declared his intention to become such, are all essential averments in a complaint, in an action brought to settle the question of the right to the possession of a mine. Ducie v. Ford, 8 Mont. 233, 19 Pac. 414.

And it is proper for the court to submit to the jury, to find as a question of fact from the evidence, whether an applicant had complied with such requirements. Bryan v. McCaig, supra.

Proof of a clearly defined surface claim, surveyed and marked by a United States surveyor in accordance with the law, including a quartz lode running with the claim, and work on the vein inside the surface claim and within the lines of the disputed ground, however, is sufficient to put an adverse claimant on proof of his right. Golden Fleece Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Cable Consol. Gold & S. Min. Co. 12 Nev. 312. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And evidence that, at the time of the location of a mining claim a notice was posted and subsequently recorded, and that the claim was marked on the ground by monuments so that the boundaries thereof could be readily traced, warrants a finding that the claim was located and the boundaries marked on the ground in accordance with the law. Risch v. Wiseman, 36 Or. 484, 78 Am. St. Rep. 783, 50 Pac. 1111.

So, one who discovers mineral signs or indications may assign or transfer his prospective discovery to another, who may follow it up and complete a valid location. Bay v. Oklahoma Southern Gas, Oil & Min. Co. 13 Okla. 425, 73 Pac. 936.

But where a man discovered a vein, and posted a notice, and erected a discovery monument thereon, claiming in his notice twenty days to complete and record his claim, and, after some delay, other persons arranged with him by which they were to complete his location for their mutual benefit; and notice was accordingly posted in their behalf, and monuments were erected, —the location by the co-owners does not relate back to the original notice, but is an original transaction, and does not take precedence over a location made by third persons in the meantime. Newbill v. Thurston, 65 Cal. 419, 4 Pac. 409. But see Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 17 C. C. A. 190, 44 U. S. App. 204, 70 Fed. 455, disapproving of this case so far as it holds that there was a new location, as distinguished from a completion of the old one.

As to the effect of a defect in a location of a mining claim by reason solely of non-compliance with a state law, the laws of the United States having been complied with, where the state law is afterwards repealed, see DWINNELL v. DYER.

Questions with reference to performance of particular steps going to constitute a location, as a prerequisite to possessory title, are considered in the previous subdivisions of this note relating to such steps.

b. The question of time of performance.

In the absence of any provision as to time of completion of a location of a mining claim, as is the case under the Federal statutes, the discoverer of a mineral vein is generally held to be entitled to a reasonable time after the discovery in which to complete his location embracing the same. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. 17 C. C. A. 190, 44 U. S. App. 204, 70 Fed. 455, Affirming 55 Fed. 11; Murley v. Ennis, 2 Colo. 300.

And his right of possession while he proceeds with the work is as absolute as after the development is completed. Murley v. Ennis, supra.

What would be a reasonable time after discovery for the completion of the location, within this rule, depends upon the circumstances affecting the ability of the locator properly to define his claim. Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. supra.

And these circumstances should be such as pertain to the ground to be located, its character, the means of properly marking the ground sought to be located, and the ability properly to ascertain the dimensions and course or strike of the vein, on account of which the location is made. Ibid.

And, where a vein is exposed about 400 feet in one place and about 40 feet in another, and it does not appear that the dip of the vein is exposed at any point, and 1,000 feet of the vein are covered, and there is a large amount of quartz on the side of the mountain where the vein is situated, twenty days is a reasonable time to allow for the completion of a location after discovery. Ibid.

The rule has been asserted, however, that one who discovers ore in lands, and subsequently locates such lands as a mining claim, acquires no right by such location, as against another who locates such lands after the discovery, but previous to his location. Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488.

And that, where two persons locate mining claims upon the same land, and there is no pretense of any actual possession of the whole claim, other than by compliance with the act of Congress with reference to the location of mining claims, the question for decision is, Which party has complied with the requirements of the law and is prior in time? not, Which, on the whole, has the better right? Funk v. Sterrett, 59 Cal. 613.

And under this rule, where a miner discovered a vein, and went upon the ground, and posted a notice, and erected a discovery monument, the notice stating that he claimed twenty days within which to mark the boundaries and record the claim, after which he was away for some time, a part of the time detained by illness and a part of the time engaged in posting notices elsewhere, a location made and completed by others upon the same land, though within the twenty days, was the prior one, and must prevail. Newbill v. Thurston, 65 Cal. 419, 4 Pac. 409.

So, upon the other hand, where the time of performance is prescribed by law, if a locator neglects to perform any necessary requirement within the time prescribed, his attempted location is of no avail as against an intervening location, peaceably and regularly made, covering the same ground, though he performs the neglected requirements after the inception of the second location. Copper Globe Min. Co. v. Allman, 23 Utah, 410, 64 Pac. 1019; Jordan v. Duke, 4 Ariz. 278, 36 Pac. 896.

But a person who first discovers a vein, and posts his discovery notices, is entitled to hold it as against a subsequent discoverer, who succeeds in first completing all the requisite acts of location, where he follows his discovery with the remaining acts necessary to a location within the prescribed period. Pelican & D. Min. Co. v. Snodgrass, 9 Colo. 339, 12 Pac. 206.

And the order in which the acts requisite to a location of a mining claim are done is immaterial, provided they are completed before the rights of others intervene. Perigo v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Erwin, 85 Fed. 904; Bulette v. Dodge, 2 Alaska, 427; Charlton v. Kelly, 2 Alaska, 532; DWINNELL v. DYER.

Nor can a subsequent locator of a mining claim object that all the steps necessary to a previous valid location of the claim were not performed at the time provided, where they were afterwards performed before other rights accrued. McGinnis v. Egbert, 8 Colo. 41, 5 Pac. 652; SHARKEY v. CANDIANI.

And failure of a locator to complete his location within the time required by law does not prejudice his rights, where he was prevented from completing it by the act of a trespasser who forcibly ejected him. Erhardt v. Boaro, 2 McCrary, 141, 8 Fed. 692; Miller v. Taylor, 6 Colo. 41.

But the locator of a mining claim, asserting adverse possession and ouster as an excuse for not perfecting his location, must show that he was in some way prevented thereby from perfecting his location. Lockhart v. Wills, 9 N. M. 354, 54 Pac. 336, Reversing on rehearing 9 N. M. 263, 50 Pac. 318.

And a locator of a mining claim who fails to perfect the same as required by law cannot set up as an excuse for such failure that, prior to the expiration of the time allowed by law to perfect his location, others took adverse possession of his claim, where he was not aware of it until after the forfeiture. Ibid.

So, where a mining location has been forfeited by failure to perform the statutory requirement for a valid location, the fact that such failure was the result of a conspiracy to defraud the locator, on the part of a colocator with other persons, who located after the forfeiture, is immaterial. Lockhart v. Wills, 9 N. M. 354, 54 Pac. 336, Affirmed in part in 181 U. S. 516, 45 L. ed. 979, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665.

Questions as to time of performance of particular steps going to constitute a location are considered in the previous subdivisions of this note relating to such steps.

c. Exceptions based on possession.

The acts of Congress with relation to the location of mining claims and the determination of the right thereto do not prevent the application to the subject of statutes of limitation, by which an actual, exclusive, and uninterrupted possession bars all claim, and vests a perfect title in the adverse holder. 420 Min. Co. v. Bullion Min. Co. 9 Nev. 240, 3 Sawy. 634, Fed. Cas. No. 4,989.

And adverse possession of a mining claim, the claimant holding and developing it by work and labor performed for a longer time than the period of limitation prescribed by statute, renders the claim valid as against everyone except the United States. Buffalo Zinc & Copper Co. v. Crump, 70 Ark. 525, 91 Am. St. Rep. 87, 69 S. W. 572.

And U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2332, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1433, authorizing miners to acquire a right to mining lands by holding and working the same for five years, in the absence of an adverse claim, makes possession continued for five years without adverse claim equivalent to a location under the laws of Congress; and it does not require both a valid location and five years possession, in the absence of such claim. Altoona Quicksilver Min. Co. v. Integral Quicksilver Min. Co. 114 Cal. 100, 45 Pac. 1047.

That act is to be construed in connection with the remaining Federal statutes, and the effect is simply to declare that possession for the statutory period is equivalent to a valid location. Upton v. Santa Rita Min. Co. (N. M.) 89 Pac. 275.

But evidence of possession of a mining claim for the period prescribed by the local statute of limitations is immaterial where the person offering such testimony claims under a location duly made pursuant to law, and there is no issue as to the original validity of such location, but simply one as to whether he had forfeited it by failure to do the annual assessment work for a given year. Ibid.

So, the rule has been asserted that two kinds of possession of mining ground are recognized: First, where the miner, by virtue of work and improvement upon a tract of mineral land and occupancy thereof, holds the same, independent of the location statutes, against one having no better right; and second, where, after discovering a vein, the miner undertakes to avail himself of the benefits of the location statutes. Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 581.

Under this rule, if a person claiming a mining right is unable to prove a valid location in accordance with the mining laws in force, he may still recover in ejectment if he shows actual possession under color of title at the time the defendant entered. Lebanon Min. Co. v. Consolidated Republican Min. Co. 6 Colo. 371.

And, as against a third person who has not complied with the statutes and local laws, a person doing work on a mining claim, or who has done work not abandoned, has an actual possession to the extent of the work done. Gregory v. Pershbaker, 73 Cal. 109, 14 Pac. 401.

And evidence that the plaintiff in an action of ejectment to recover possession of a mining claim knew that work had been done by another claimant on the claim, and that the plaintiff had examined the records and knew the defendant's title to the premises in question, is competent as tending to show title and possession in the defendant. Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816.

A loose, uncertain, scrambling, and mixed possession of a mining claim, however, is not sufficient to vest a title to it under the statute of limitations, where the possession of the opposing party is equally good. Hamilton v. Southern Nevada Gold & S. Min. Co. 13 Sawy. 113, 33 Fed. 562.

And evidence of the erection of a discovery stake at a shaft, and the posting of notices stating where the location work is being done, is insufficient to show such actual possession of a whole mining claim as will warrant its recovery against an adverse claimant. Armstrong v. Lower, supra.

And U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2325, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1429, with reference to patenting mining claims, is a statute of repose only so far as to bar the assertion of adverse mining claims not filed within the period of publication, and does not relieve the Land Department from the duty of ascertaining whether the land sought to be patented is mineral in character, and therefore subject to disposition under the land laws. Ferrell v. Hoge, 29 Land Dec. 12.

On this subject, see also Richmond Min. Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 576, 29 L. ed. 273, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1055, supra, X. d. 1.

XV. Conclusion.

Up to a recent date mining comprised a large part of the business of the precious metal-bearing states and territories and it is still extensively carried on. It suddenly sprang into activity upon the discovery of gold in the West, and necessarily clashed to a large extent with other interests which had been acquired in the public lands of the mining regions. In the location of a mining claim, which is the initial step to the business of mining, the brunt of this clash was largely borne; and, owing to the varied nature and great extent of these clashing interests, and the vast financial interests involved, and the ability with which the questions at issue have been contested, and the care with which they have been decided, the subject of location of mining claims covers a broad field of jurisprudence. So broad is the subject, and so minutely and extensively have the cases covered it, that an attempt to conclude this note with anything like a complete résumé of the principles of law involved would be impracticable owing to the proportions which it would necessarily assume. Indeed, the breadth and extent of the subject, and the numerous principles which have been invoked to meet its requirements, together with the extended and accurately minute consideration which it has received, have made it necessary to divide and subdivide this note to such an extent that perhaps the best method of summarizing its contents is to call the attention of the reader to the table of contents.

It may be well to add, however, that location can be made only upon unappropriated, unoccupied public lands of the United States; and lands patented, or subjected to entry for patent, to individuals or associations are private property, and not unappropriated. Nor are lands legally located, or held in the proper process of location, for mining purposes, unappropriated within these rules; though an attempt to locate lands which is totally invalid does not segregate them from the public domain. Nor are lands subject to location unless they are mineral lands, and the question whether or not they are mineral lands, when arising in a contest with a nonmineral claimant, turns upon whether or not they are more valuable for mining purposes than for the other purposes for which they are claimed; and, when arising between two mineral claimants, it turns upon whether or not sufficient mineral had been found to warrant an ordinarily prudent man in spending his time and money in the hope of realizing profit therefrom.

So, the right to locate mining claims is conferred upon citizens and those who have declared their intention to become such; and it is to citizens only that mining claims may be patented. But the modern rule is that a location by an alien is voidable only, and not void; and that it is subject to attack by the government only; and that by location he acquires a title which he can convey to a citizen, and which becomes good by relation, upon his subsequently declaring his intention to become a citizen. There are no restrictions upon location, based upon nonresidence, minority, or sex of the locator; and a location may be made through an agent.

As to the process of location, the would-be locator prospects upon the public domain for mineral, and a discovery of sufficient mineral to warrant an ordinarily prudent man in following it up and spending his time and money thereon gives him the right to post a notice at the point of discovery, claiming a mining claim. This is the initial step to the location; but it is not the whole location. He must now take steps to ascertain the strike of the vein or the position of the mineral discovered, with a view to the proper location of his surface claim. For this purpose he is entitled to a period of time, fixed upon the basis of reasonableness in some jurisdictions, and by statutes or miners' rules in others; and during this period he is protected against intrusion. When he has ascertained the strike of his vein, or the position of his mineral, he adjusts his surface claim accordingly; if it is a lode claim, he usually fixes it in the form of a parallelogram along the strike of the vein, and if it is a placer claim he usually fixes it to conform to a legal subdivision of the public survey. But a departure of a lode claim from a parallelogram in form does not invalidate the claim so long as parallelism of the end lines is maintained; if the vein deviates from a straight line it is proper for the location to deviate with it; and the only penalty attached to locating across the vein, instead of along its strike, is that the side lines become the end lines. Nor is a placer-mining claim confined absolutely to the form of a legal subdivision; practicability is the test, and the location may follow the deposit. So, in following a vein or deposit, and in maintaining the proper form, a locator is not precluded, in the absence of objection by the owner, from laying his claim so as to overlap or cross other claims, provided his discovery is not upon the conflicting area; though he cannot follow his vein when it passes out of his lines into a senior location.

Having ascertained the position of the mineral sought to be appropriated, and adjusted his surface claim thereto, the locator must now mark it upon the ground. This must be done in such a manner that the boundaries can be readily traced. But any marking which will accomplish this is sufficient under the requirements of the Federal mining laws. And it may be by physical objects or marks placed upon the ground, or by utilizing natural objects already there. Substantial compliance with additional requirements by state statutes and miners' rules and regulations, however, is necessary. These rules apply to placer as well as to lode claims; and the object of the requirements is to enable other prospectors to ascertain exactly what ground has been appropriated. And the marks establish the boundaries, and are controlling when they vary from courses and distances set out in notices and certificates; and the validity of the location is not affected by their subsequent removal or obliteration.

With the marking on the ground the location is completed, where no record is required. In most of the mining states and territories, however, a record is required, either by state statutes, or by regulations of miners; and, where it is so required, the Federal statute, which is substantially copied by most of the local enactments and regulations, provides that it shall contain the name or names of the locators, the date of location, and such a description of the claim located by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify the claim. This necessitates a record of such a nature that from it a prospector can locate the natural object or permanent monument referred to, and from it and them can locate the claim in question. The purpose of a record is to give public notice of the appropriation of the lands located, and to show compliance with the mining laws and customs, and both statutory provisions and mining rules as to preparation and contents must be substantially complied with; and, when properly prepared, it is evidence of all things which the statute requires it to contain, and which are therein sufficiently set forth.

This completes the location. It may be amended, however,—at least in a number of the states and territories in which amendment is provided for by statute,—either before or after completion, either for the purpose of correcting mistakes in the original location, or to take in new unappropriated or abandoned territory; though an amendment cannot give validity to a void original location. And, while full performance of all the various steps above enumerated is a prerequisite to a possessory title, the order of performance is not material where all are performed before the rights of others intervene. Nor does the failure to perform any particular act within the prescribed time furnish a ground for objection to a location when it was afterwards performed before rights of others accrued; and, though the necessary acts of location are never performed, the mining laws do not prevent statutes of limitation from vesting title in an adverse holder of a mining claim upon an session, exclusive, and uninterrupted possession for the statutory period, as against everyone except the United States.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

McDEARMOTT COMMISSION COMPANY et al., Appts.,
v.

CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE.

(77 C. C. A. 479, 146 Fed. 961.)

Board of trade—market quotations—publication.

A board of trade, which has a right of property in market quotations collected in its exchange, does not surrender or dedicate them to the public by permitting sub-

Headnote by VAN DEVANTER, Circuit Judge.

Case Note—Property rights in market quotations:—The latest leading case involving the right of a board of trade or stock exchange to control the distribution of its market quotations—that is, the prices offered and accepted in the course of transactions between its members on the floor of its exchange—is Board of Trade v. Christie Grain & Stock Co. 198 U. S. 230, 49 L. ed. 1031, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 637, Reversing 61 C. C. A. 11, 125 Fed. 161, and Affirming 69 L.R.A. 59, 64 C. C. A. 669, 130 Fed. 507. Upon the preliminary hearing of the Christie Case, 116 Fed. 944, where an injunction was granted to restrain the defendant grain and stock company from receiving or surreptitiously acquiring the complainant board's market quotations, and to prevent certain telegraph companies from giving such quotations to such company, it was held that the board of trade had at least a qualified property right the market quotations, resulting from transactions between its members, and in the distribution thereof; but the exact limitations of this property right were not decided nor was the full extent of the board's control over its quotations made clear. The court was of the opinion that the board possessed such a measure of ownership and control as to justify it in requiring telegraph companies with whom it had contracted for the transmission and distribution of its quotations to secure everyone desiring them a written consent that the same would not be used in the conduct of a bucket shop, but that they were for the private and internal use of the applicant therefor in business in which he was engaged. The court said: "The quotations are the result of transactions between the members of the board of trade upon the floor of an exchange hall owned by it and maintained scribers, to whom they are communicated upon condition that they shall not be made public, to post them upon blackboards in their places of business, where the posting is done for the advantage of the subscribers, and not of the public, and does not make knowledge of the quotations general, or make them accessible to the public as of right, or render them of no further value.

(July 9, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri enjoining the use by defendants of certain market quotations. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Van Devanter and Adams, Circuit Judges, and Philips, District Judge.

Messrs. Charles S. Cryslar and Clifford Histed, with Mr. James H. Harkless, for appellants.

Mr. Henry S. Robbins, with Mr. Martin H. Foss, for appellee.

at its own expense. They are gathered by its own employees. They possess a positive commercial value when instantaneously and continuously transmitted and distributed, . . . and are a source of substantial revenue to the complainant."

Upon the final hearing in 121 Fed. 608, a permanent injunction to the same effect was granted in accordance with the conclusion announced in the preliminary hearing, that the board had a property right in its quotations.

This judgment was reversed in Christie Grain & Stock Co. v. Board of Trade, 61 C. C. A. 11, 125 Fed. 161, where it was held that the Chicago Board of Trade was not entitled to invoke the aid of a court of equity in securing the pecuniary benefit derived from the communication and sale of quotations collected from the transactions of its members on the floor of its exchange, where it appeared that at least 85 per cent of such transactions were bucket-shop operations in violation of the statutes of the state as construed by its supreme court.

Upon the first hearing of Board of Trade v. L. A. Kinsey Co. 125 Fed. 72, the trial court arrived at the same conclusion as did the circuit court of appeals in the Christie Case, and refused to grant an injunction to restrain the defendants from receiving, using, selling, or distributing the quotations of prices of commodities dealt in on the floor of the complainant's exchange, upon the ground that 95 per cent of the board's transactions on the floor of the exchange were bucket-shop operations which were knowingly permitted by the board itself. The court was of the opinion that the proportion of these transactions which were illegal was so large as to taint them as a whole, and that whatever prop-

(N.S.)

Van Devanter, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an interlocutory order granting an injunction restraining the appellants from acquiring and using certain continuous market quotations without the appellee's consent.

Recognizing that these quotations, as collected by the appellee in its exchange, are its property; that, while they remain such, it has the right to control their acquisition and use by others; and that wrongful invasions of this right may be restrained in equity (Board of Trade v. Christie Grain & Stock Co. 198 U. S. 236, 49 L. ed. 1031, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 637; Board of Trade v. Cella Commission Co. 145 Fed. 28),—the appellants rest their opposition to the injunction upon the sole claim that they do not obtain the quotations until they have been given to the public with the appellee's knowledge and approval, and have ceased to be private property. In brief, the facts are these: Under an arrangement between the appellee and certain telegraph companies, which act as distributing agents, the quotations—that is, those wherein the price of any commodity is quoted oftener than at intervals of ten minutes—are communicated by telegraph to commercial exchanges, brokers, and others throughout the country upon the express condition that they shall be used only in the private and individual business of the receiver; that they shall not be sold, communicated, or otherwise given to news distributors or others; that no one shall be erty right the board might have in its quotations was so infected with illegality as to forbid the interference of a court of equity for its protection.

But this judgment was reversed in 69 L.R.A. 59, 64 C. C. A. 669, 130 Fed. 507, and it was held that the property right of the board of trade in the quotations gathered by it from the transactions of its members upon its floor was not destroyed by the mere fact that a large percentage of the business done under its auspices consisted of gambling transactions, or by the further fact that such quotations were susceptible of bad as well as good uses. The court was also of the opinion that, even if the board permitted gambling transactions within its exchange, it was not thereby deprived of the right to enjoin the wrongful dissemination of its market quotations, inasmuch as a court of equity cannot deny relief upon the sole ground of the immoral or illegal acts of a complainant, if the particular right asserted in the suit is not thereby affected.

Upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals in the Christie Case was reversed and in the Kinsey Case affirmed, and the injunctions prayed for by the board of trade were granted in both cases. This court held that the plaintiff board of trade's collection of quotations was entitled to the protection of the law. "It stands like a trade secret. The plaintiff has the right to keep the work which it has done, or paid for doing, to itself. The fact that others might do similar work, if they might, does not authorize them to steal the plaintiff's." The contention that prevailed in the circuit court of appeals in the Christie Case was also made here,—that the board of trade was not entitled to the protection of a court of equity when the greater part of the transactions of its members on its exchange were in fact bucket-shop operations forbidden by law. In reply to this, the court said that, if the board's collection of information was otherwise entitled to protection, it did not cease to be so, even if it were information concerning illegal acts. "The statistics of crime are property to the same extent as any other statistics, even if collected by a criminal who furnishes some of the data." It was therefore held that the use and distribution of the board's continuous quotations by those who had obtained them by breach of the confidential terms on which the board communicated them to its customers would be enjoined, though such quotations related to "pretended buying and selling" carried on in the board's exchange hall, within the meaning of the Illinois act prohibiting the keeping of places where such transactions were carried on.

So, in Cleveland Teleg. Co. v. Stone, 105 Fed. 794, it was held that the Chicago Board of Trade had a right of property in its market quotations until the same were made over to the public, and that such board had the further right to convey to the telegraph company its property right in said quotations, and that such grantee was entitled to protection in the enjoyment of the same before publication, and that their unauthorized publication or distribution by others would be enjoined. The court said that, if it was admitted that the board had a property right in these quotations, it could not be denied that it would be greatly damaged by the broadcast scattering thereof "by purloiners who, by reason of having to pay nothing for these quotations so stealthily obtained by them," could obviously render valueless the board's right of property.

To the same effect is National Teleg. News Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 60 L.R.A. 805, 56 C. C. A. 198, 119 Fed. 294, in which it was held that, while the market quotations and sporting news gathered by a telegraph company and delivered to its patrons by means of tickers were not, as so delivered, within the protection of the United States copyright laws, yet they were a species of property which would be protected by equity against appropriation by rival companies intending to furnish them to their patrons in competition with the first company to the injury or destruction of the service. The court deemed the print-owed to directly or indirectly take them in the office of the receiver, or to make wire connection with the instrument or wires over which they are received; and that failure to strictly comply with any of these requirements shall terminate the receiver's right to a continuance of the service.

By reason of a charge which is made in communicating the quotations in this case, their collection and distribution are a source of substantial profit or gain to the appellee. Many of those to whom they are communicated immediately post them on blackboards in their places of business as a convenient means of stimulating and facilitating trade. These places of business, including the commercial exchanges, are obtained by private owners for the transaction of private business, and members of the public enter, not as a matter of common right, but only by the license of the owners, and usually for purposes in connection with their business. The posting seems to be with the knowledge and approval of the appellee, but not with any assent that the quotations may be copied and taken away, or reproduced and used elsewhere. The appellants are brokers and commission merchants at Kansas City, Missouri. In some systematic way, not satisfactorily disclosed, but confessedly without the consent of the appellee, they obtain the quotations immediately upon their being posted by those who rightfully receive them. They then display them upon blackboards in their own offices, and use them in their entire proceeding from the ticker and conveying these quotations, to have acquired commercial value. "It is, when thus sold at, a distinct commercial product,—such so as any other output relating to news and brought about by the joint activity of capital and business ability." See Illinois Commission Co. v. Cleveland, 166 U. S. 56, 41 C. C. A. 205, 119 Fed. 301, where the court was "content, on the reasoning of" the foregoing case, to restrain the telephone company from obtaining, receiving, and selling the Chicago Board of Trade's market quotations.

In Board of Trade v. Consolidated Exchange, 121 Fed. 433, the court held that it was undoubtedly the law to dispute that the board of trade had a property right in original quotations of market prices for a limited period of time, but that it might also control the publication thereof, and that the unauthorized use of the board's continuous quotations was an infringement of such right; but a preliminary injunction was refused to restrain the defendant from the market quotations in question, because of the failure of proof that the defendants were using the quotations sought to be protected.

In Bradley v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 100 Fed. Reprint, 707, the court said that market quotations collected by a telegraph company were its own property, and an injunction was refused to restrain such company from discontinuing furnishing market quotations to the complainant.

In Kiernan v. Manhattan Quotation Co., 50 How. Pr. 104, it was held that the foreign financial news of a news-association was property, and that, as that property was not a literary publication, the unauthorized publication thereof would be enjoined.

In Exchange Teleg. Co. v. Gregory, 101 U. S. 147, it was held that, where a telegraph company and the committee of the London Stock Exchange entered into an agreement whereby information as to the prices of stocks and shares from time to time during the day was collected on the exchange and supplied to the telegraph company, the latter had a right of property at common law in the information, and was entitled to an injunction to restrain one who had obtained the same surreptitiously from infringing upon that right by continuing to publish the information. Lord Esher said: "This information—this collecting together of materials so as to give knowledge of all that has been done on the stock exchange—is something which can be sold. It is property, and, being sold to the plaintiffs, it was their property."

There are some cases where this property right is definitely recognized, though there is no specific holding to that effect, of which the most recent seems to be New York Cotton Exchange v. Hunt, 144 Fed. 511, in which a preliminary injunction was granted to restrain the defendant from receiving, using, or selling, directly or indirectly, the exchange's quotations, or permitting or maintaining any wire to his office over which the quotations should pass, or from distributing the quotations until he should have acquired the right to receive them, either by contract of purchase from the exchange, or, with its approval, from one of the telegraph companies authorized to distribute them. It appeared that the defendant had a contract with the telegraph company to furnish him the complainant's market quotations, to which contract the complainant was not a party; and that at the time this contract was made the telegraph company was exercising the privilege of distributing these quotations to whomsoever it pleased by permission of the cotton exchange. It further appeared that the telegraph company was about to cease furnishing the defendant with the quotations because of a contract entered into between the exchange and the telegraph company by the terms of which an application by the person desiring the quotations and an approval thereof by the exchange were prerequisites to the furnishing of these quotations to anyone, and that the defendant refused to make such application. Upon the authority of the Christie Case, supra, the property right therein of the party collecting such market quotations was recog-

own business in like manner as do their competitors, who pay for them. The time intervening after the quotations are posted by others and before they are displayed in the appellants' offices is sometimes five minutes, but generally is much less.

It is the contention of the appellants that in the circumstances described the posting of the quotations by those who rightfully receive them is a general publication, and instantly operates as a surrender or dedication to the public of the proprietary rights of the appellee. The circuit court held otherwise (143 Fed. 188), resting its decision largely upon the reasoning and conclusion of the Supreme Court in Board of Trade v. Christie Grain & Stock Co. supra, where it is said: "The plaintiff does not lose its rights by communicating the result to persons, even if many, in confidential relations to itself, under a contract not to make it public; and strangers to the trust will be restrained from getting at the knowledge by inducing a breach of trust, and using knowledge obtained by such a breach [citing cases]. The publications insisted on in some of the arguments were publications in breach of contract, and do not affect the plaintiff's rights. Time is of the essence in matters like this, and it fairly may be said that, if the contracts with the plaintiff are kept, the information will not become public property until the plaintiff has gained its reward. A priority of a few minutes probably is enough."

nized; also his right to control them. To that end, the owner was held to be able by contract to say who should distribute them, and to limit the distribution to such parties as it might choose and on such reasonable terms as it might impose. It followed, therefore, that the defendant would be enjoined from destroying partially or wholly the complainant's property right, by wrongfully obtaining the use and benefit of such property without the consent of the exchange, and in violation of the contract between the exchange and the telegraph company. It was also held that the exchange was in no way affected by the contract between the defendant and the telegraph company, and was not bound thereby, and that its existence in no way affected the right of the exchange to limit the distribution of its quotations.

A permanent injunction was afterwards granted by the same court, without opinion, and the order made on that occasion was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in Hunt v. New York Cotton Exchange. 205 U. S. 322, 51 L. ed. —, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529. The court here, following the Christie Case, proceeded upon the assumption that the quotations were property, and were entitled to the protection of the law, and that the exchange had the right to keep to itself the work which it had done, or paid for doing, and that such right would be violated by one who got the quotations from a person forbidden to communicate them, as well as by one who surreptitiously obtained them. This right must, of course, mean a property right, and that that is the assumption of the court clearly appears from its answer to the contention that there was not enough involved in the case to give the Federal courts jurisdiction. Upon this point, it was held that its value to the exchange, and not the rate paid to the telegraph company for furnishing the quotations, determined the jurisdiction; and that the evidence clearly showed that the value of the right to these quotations was much greater than the jurisdictional amount of $2,000.

C. C. A. 1, 123 Fed. 411, it was held that the Chicago Board of Trade and the telegraph companies with which it had contracted for the transmission of its market quotations had the right to make reasonable regulations for the conduct of the business, and that a rule requiring all customers, as a prerequisite to being furnished with the quotations, to sign an agreement that they would not use the same, in conducting a bucket shop, was reasonable and capable of being enforced.

And in Sullivan v. Chicago Bd. of Trade, 111 Ill. App. 492, it was held that, where one who had a contract with a telegraph company which entitled him to receive from it the continuous quotations of the board of trade, which contract he was not permitted to assign without consent of the company, the party to whom he sold out his business without such consent had no rights under such contract, and was not entitled to an injunction to restrain the telegraph company to remove the tickers by means of which he received such quotations.

And in Griffin v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 8 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 572, injunction was refused to prevent the telegraph company from removing its ticker from the complainant's office, and in this way depriving him of the market quotations of the Chicago Board of Trade, where such action was contemplated by the telegraph company because of an order from such board of trade forbidding it to furnish the quotations to bucket shops.

But this property right in market quotations cannot, in the absence of a copyright, extend beyond the moment that the quotations are given to the public. Therefore it sometimes becomes a very important question whether or not there has been such a dedication to the public as would make the quotations public property. And it seems clear that the rule to be gathered from McDEARMOTT COMMISSION CO. v. CHICAGO BD. OF TRADE and other authorities is that, if there has been such dedication

While that case in principle goes far toward sustaining the ruling of the circuit court, we think it must be conceded to the appellants that it does not determine the precise question now presented; that is, whether the posting of the quotations in the circumstances described is such a general publication as to make them public property. The question is not, however, altogether new. It was presented and determined adversely to the appellants' contention in Board of Trade v. Hadden-Krull Co. 109 Fed. 705, where it was said by Judge Seaman: "These market quotations are peculiar in their property use and value, and, without immediate transmission to the customer, so that he receives them simultaneously with other customers, and before their publication generally, they possess no purchase value. To make them available, it is essential to have the quotations written or printed in some form for the information of all entitled to their use; and it appears here that they were in some instances so furnished in the 'ticker,' and in others were placed on a blackboard in the office of the customer. No reason appears for finding a publication in the one method if not in the other, and I am of opinion that neither constitutes a dedication to the public while limited to the use and office of the customer."

Older and more frequent application of the principle underlying that decision is found in the cases defining the common-law rights of an author in his literary or dramatic composition. Thus a professor of a the public, the person collecting such quotations is, of course, not entitled to give their unauthorized use enjoined; but, on the other hand, unless there is sufficient evidence to establish such dedication to the public, the property right of the board of trade or stock exchange in its market quotations will be protected by equity, even though there was a limited publication of the quotations by their owner's customers.

Accordingly, it was held in Board of Trade v. C. B. Thomson Commission Co. 109 Fed. 902, that, while the board had an undoubted common-law right of property in its quotations as prepared by its officers and agents until the same were published, and was thereby entitled either to withhold them entirely from publication, or to make the first publication thereof, the common law afforded no protection against subsequent publications, and such protection could be obtained only through statutory copyright; and that, therefore, a preliminary injunction would be refused to restrain the use of the complainant's market quotations, where it was disputed whether there had been such prior publication as to make the quotations public property; although the court held that the giving out of the quotations to a limited number of persons for individual use would not be a publication as would defeat the complainant's property right.

In the final hearing of this case, in Board of Trade v. Hadden-Krull Co. 109 Fed. 705, complainant was held to be entitled to a decree enjoining the defendants from taking and using its market quotations without authority, where the evidence failed to show any act or conduct in respect to the quotations prior to their receipt by the defendants which would confer upon the general public a right to use them. Here it was said to be well established that the board of trade had a property right at common law in its market quotations, and this common-law right of property was preserved until voluntary publication; that, unless such publication intervened before the use of the reports by the defendants, either through the transactions of the telegraph companies or of their subscribers, the arrangement with the telegraph companies whereby they distributed the quotations to their customers did not deprive the complainant of its right to maintain its bill. The court went on to say that the difficulty in such cases was to ascertain the time when the fact of publication occurred. But, regardless of the question whether the placing of the quotations upon the blackboard of a customer of the board of trade would constitute such publication as would open their use to the general public; and disregarding, too, the further question whether the fact that a limitation was placed upon the nature of the use of the quotations delivered, would prevent their delivery from constituting a publication, if access by the public was open, and there was no restriction upon the extent or number of persons having such access or use,—it was held that, inasmuch as the testimony was undisputed that the quotations received by the defendants were wired to them by persons who obtained them by stealth and unfair means without the consent or knowledge of the owner, the quotations so derived would not be open to the defendants' use or benefit, unless they were equally open to the general public at the same moment.

And in Board of Trade v. Cella Commission Co. 76 C. C. A. 28, 145 Fed. 28, Reversing 121 Fed. 1012, it was held that the board's right of property in its continuous market quotations endured for a sufficient length of time to enable it to avail itself of the benefits thereof; and an injunction was accordingly granted to restrain the defendant commission company from using such quotations without the board's consent. The court did not think the contention well taken that, when the quotations were taken off the wires and posted on the commission company's blackboard and used in its business, they had been superseded by later ones, and had therefore become in a sense surrendered and dedicated to the public so that anyone might use them without let or hindrance;

And an author of a drama or play, who permits another to represent it upon the stage, does not surrender or dedicate it to the public, so as to entitle one who attends its representation, or another, to print and publish it, or to represent it upon the stage, without the author's permission. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 950; Macklin v. Richardson. 2 Ambl. 694, 7 English Ruling Cases, 66; Turner v. Robinson, 10 Ir. Ch. Rep. 121, 510; Roberts v. Myers, Brunner, Col. De Witt, 47 N. Y. 532, 7 Am. Rep. 480. In the last case it is said: "So far as is disclosed by the case, the drama remained in manuscript until printed by the defendant, and there is no claim that it has been published by the author or the plaintiff, or with their assent, except by its public performance on the stage; and if it has not, by that act, become publici juris, it for the reason that the commission company would hardly do business upon the basis of quotations which were known to have been superseded by later ones. "To do so would be betting upon the happening of an event that either had already transpired, or was to some extent at least foreshadowed by the later evidence of the trend of the market."

Some of the cases, while admitting that a board of trade or stock exchange has a property right in market quotations gathered by it, deny that, for that reason, such organization may do as it pleases with its own, and arbitrarily furnish the same to some persons and refuse them to others. These decisions apply the controlling principle of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, that private property being devoted by its owner to a public use ceases to be juris privati only, and is therefore subject to public regulation.

Thus, in New York & C. Grain & S. Exchange v. Board of Trade, 127 Ill. 153, 2 L.R.A. 411, 11 Am. St. Rep. 107, 19 N. E. 855, Reversing 27 Ill. App. 93, it was held that, while the market quotations of the board of trade were its private property, they had in course of time become clothed with a public interest; and such board, as long as it continued in the business of collecting and furnishing such quotations, must do so without unjust discrimination as to persons, and must furnish them upon the same terms to all who might desire to obtain them for lawful purposes. The reasoning of the court in arriving at this conclusion deserves to be quoted at length: "The contention of the board of trade is that it is strictly a private corporation, and that both the individual and aggregate business of its members is essentially private business, and that the market news and statistics collected and compiled at the expense of the association are the private property of the association, and that it has a legal right to control such market news and statistics, and determine what telegraphic despatches touching the same it will send directly from the floor of its exchange during business hours, and to whom they shall be sent, or whether it will send any such despatches whatever. The board of trade is a private corporation, and it was incorporated for the purpose of affording facilities to its members in doing business with each other. In their transactions upon the floors of the exchange they deal as principals with each other, but in respect to the outside world they are brokers and commission merchants for the producers, consumers, shippers, and merchants whom they represent. For many years the board has so used its franchises, and its members have so conducted their business, as that it has become of vast commercial influence, and fixes the market values of grain and agricultural products for a large territory, and the fluctuations in prices upon its floors powerfully affect the market prices of the necessities of life throughout the country and the world. The great power and influence which the board possesses in dictating market values are owing to the vast aggregation of products which are drawn to its portals for a market, and are bought and sold upon its floors, and which pay tribute and toll, in the shape of commissions, to its members. The great bulk of this business—though in form, and as between the members, the mere private and individual dealings of such members—is in reality the business of the numerous producers, consumers, merchants, and shippers for and on behalf of whom these members deal. A potential factor in attracting this accumulation of business to the halls of the exchange, and in vesting the board with this power to regulate and determine the market prices of grain and provisions, is the fact that many years ago the board admitted and invited the telegraph companies, which are quasi public corporations, to the floors of the exchange, and permitted and encouraged them to gather market quotations, showing the changes and fluctuations in the prices of the various products as they occurred, and send instantaneous information from the floors of the board, by means of telegraph lines and instruments, to all the principal towns and cities, and by means of ticker circuits to the places of till remains the private property of the author or his assignee, who alone have the exclusive right to it, and may prevent its publication. When a literary work is exhibited for a particular purpose, or to a limited number of persons, it will not be construed as a general gift or authority for any purpose of profit or publication by others. An author retains his right in his manuscript until he relinquishes it by contract, or some unequivocal act indicating an intent to dedicate it to the public. An unqualified publication by printing and offering for sale such a dedication. The rights of an author of a drama in his composition are twofold. He is entitled to the profit arising from its performance, and also from the sale of the manuscript, or the printing and publishing it. Lectures and plays are not, by their public delivery or performance, in the presence of all who choose to attend, so dedicated to the public that they can be printed and published without the author's permission. It does not give to the hearer any title to the manuscript or a copy of it, or a right to the use of a copy. The manuscript and the right of the author therein are still within the protection of the law, the same as if they had never been communicated to the public in any form. The permission to act a play at a public theater does not amount to an abandonment by the author of his title to it, or to a dedication of it to the public."

Without extending the reference to adjudged cases, we hold that the effect of the business of all persons desirous of such information, which information was furnished all persons and corporations, without discrimination, who were willing to receive and pay for the same. In this way the business of the country in buying and selling agricultural products has been brought under the control of the market values for such products as fixed and determined on the board of trade, and the business of dealing in such products has been brought to conform to the method of receiving instantaneous and continuous market reports, inaugurated, and for years persisted in, by the board of trade and the telegraph companies. This market news is a species of property, and, if the statistics with reference to the individual business of the members of the association, and the aggregateness of its members, had from the start been gathered and compiled at the expense of its members, and for their sole use, it would be it would have been strictly private property held in trust by the board for the benefit of such members, and wholly free from any public interest therein. But the board did not so exercise its franchises as to conduct its business, but admitted telegraph companies to the floor of its exchange, and permitted and encouraged them, from day to day and year after year, to publish these statistics of the dealings on the board, and telegraph them, immediately as they were made, throughout the land, to whomsoever would pay for such information. until the business of the country adapted itself to these means and applications, and the point was reached when the action upon the board were puissant enough to determine the market values of the products of the country; and all persons dealing in such products could not, without the knowledge and benefit of these immediate quotations, intelligently and safely so deal. The facts that the board of trade is a private corporation, and that the dealings between its members are private business, as is transacted between dry goods, grocery, and commission merchants, and the statistics of these dealings, collected as we have stated, are private property. (N.S.)

erty, are not conclusive that such statistics are not charged with a public interest, and that there is no duty due the public in respect thereto." The court then quoted from Munn v. Illinois, supra, to the effect that when one devoted his property to a use in which the public had an interest, he thereby granted to the public an interest in that use, and therefore must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created; and went on to say: "Assuming these market quotations are reports are property, and the private property of the board of trade, yet, if they have been so used by the board, and by the telegraph companies with the knowledge and consent of the board, as to become affected with a public interest, then they are subject to such public regulation by the legislature and the courts as is necessary to prevent injury to such public interest. The doctrine in question has application both to the property of individuals and of corporations, and it is therefore immaterial that any such corporation may be a mere private corporation. If the interest is public, then it is necessarily to all alike, common to all, and upon equal terms. The doctrine, as applied to the matter of these market quotations, would forbid that a monopoly should be made of them by furnishing them to some and refusing them to others who are equally willing to pay for them and be governed by all reasonable rules and regulations, and would prevent the board of trade or the telegraph companies from unjustly discriminating in respect to the parties who will be allowed to receive them. . . . The question is, Can the board so conduct its affairs for a long term of years as to create a standard market for agricultural products, and, acting in concert or combination with the telegraph companies, build up a great system for the instantaneous and continuous indication of that market and its fluctuations, until the public and all persons dealing in such products conform their business to this system, and until, by the usage and custom of mer-publication relied upon by the appellants is to be determined by inquiring whether it is so restricted in point of place, purpose, and persons as to be consistent with the retention by the appellee of its proprietary rights, or is so general or unqualified as to indicate an intent to surrender or dedicate them to the public at large. Tested in this way, the facts before recited admit of but one conclusion. The publication relied upon consists altogether in the posting of the quotations by those who subscribe for them. This is done in places which, by reason of their ownership and use, are private. Its controlling purpose is that of stimulating and facilitating trade with the subscriber, and not of conferring a benefit upon the public. It implies, of course, a permission that in dealing with the subscriber his patrons may use the information which the quotations contain, but not that they may be copied and taken away or reproduced and used elsewhere. It does not make knowledge of them general, or make them accessible to the public as of right, or render them of no further value. In short, it is so restricted as to be consistent with the retention by the appellee of its proprietary rights, and does not indicate an intent to surrender or dedicate them to the public.

We conclude, therefore, that the order granting the injunction was rightly made, and it is affirmed.

chants, thus advanced by the methods adopted by the board and telegraph companies, such instantaneous market quotations become necessary to the successful and safe transaction of business, and until such system has become impressed and affected with a public interest, and then be allowed to discriminate between persons and parties, and, where all alike are willing to conform to reasonable rules and requirements, and pay for the information desired, say that one shall and another shall not have such information. If the board has such right, and these corporations are lawfully permitted so to do, then they have the power to create monopolies, and dictate who shall deal in the agricultural products of the country, and at will impoverish or enrich merchants, shippers, and producers." The court added that it did not wish to be understood as holding that the board was legally bound to continue in the business of furnishing the quotations to the public, or that it might not voluntarily abandon such business; but it did hold that, as long as it carried on the same, it must do so without discriminations as to persons.

The fundamental principle of the foregoing case, that the property of a board of trade in its market quotations, being clothed with a public interest, is to that extent a right shared with the public, seems to be the basis of the conclusion reached in Christie Street Commission Co. v. Board of Trade, 92 Ill. App. 604, where injunction was denied to restrain a telegraph company from giving to one alleged to be conducting the business of a bucket shop, and the latter from receiving, the board's market quotations, because the evidence failed to disclose any such interference with the private rights or property interests of the board as would warrant the intervention of a court of equity.

And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 165 Ind. 492, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 153, 76 N. E. 100, the doctrine of Munn v. Illinois was again applied; and it was held that a quasi public corporation, as long as it continued in a business impressed with a public interest, must be subject to such regulations as might be found necessary to prevent injury to such public interest; and that therefore a telegraph company which had purchased the continuous market quotations of a board of trade, and had been supplying them at a fixed price to persons desiring them, for such a length of time that they became necessary to the successful conduct of the business carried on in the products covered by the quotations, could not, while continuing in the business of furnishing the quotations, refuse to supply them to anyone able and willing to pay for them, and to be governed by reasonable rules and regulations made by the company in reference thereto. The court, however, so far recognized the control of their owner over such quotations as to hold that a provision in the contract under which they were sold to the telegraph company, that they should not be supplied to a person conducting a bucket shop, was "a proper and reasonable regulation to which this court unhesitatingly gives its approval."

This proposition of attaching a public interest to the market quotations of a board of trade or stock exchange was repudiated by Judge Hook, of the Federal circuit court, in rendering his decision in favor of the complainant in Board of Trade v. Christie-Grain & Stock Co. 116 Fed. 944 (reviewed above), in the following language: "Courts cannot, by their decrees, assume the initiative in declaring private property to be impressed with a public use. There should first exist that condition of growth or expansion of a private business, or of its relation to the public service or public necessity, which justifies the assertion of a public interest therein, and the accompaniment of public control, followed by legislative recognition or declaration of such condition. The power to bring under governmental control the lawful business of individuals and private corporations not vested with the power of eminent domain, and who are not engaged in what, by common acceptance, is termed a public service, for the reason that such business, through the enterprise and prudent management of its conductors, has grown to be of great public interest and concern, is of the gravest and most momentous character. It is doubt-doctrine that, in the absence of legislative action, a suitor in a court of equity may be denied relief merely because the Chancellor is of the opinion that his business, originally private in its character, has grown to such magnitude that the public is entitled to an interest therein, and to a control thereof commensurate with that interest. When such a condition arises, the assurance of the public control is limited by the extent of the public interest, and the king of regulations pertaining thereto is legislative, not judicial, cognizance."

After the decision in the Munn Case, but before its principles had been applied by the Illinois supreme court to the market quotations of a board of trade, several decisions were rendered, principally by the Federal Circuit courts, that are entirely opposed to the application of the doctrine of the Munn Case, though that decision is not it specifically mentioned by the courts in rendering their opinions; but their language is to rebut any other presumption than that the doctrine in question was at least present in the minds of the judges.

Thus, in Metropolitan Grain & S. Exchange v. Board of Trade, 15 Fed. 847, an action was refused to restrain a telegraph company from breaking its connection with the complainant's office and thereby discontinuing the market quotations of board of trade, and to restrain the defendant from interfering with the sending of the telegraph company to complainant's reports of the prices of commodities and the transactions on the board's exchange. It appeared that the board of trade had notified the telegraph company that it gathered and distributed its quotations that it would not permit the latter's reporters and reporters to attend the daily sessions of the board and to send reports from to persons transacting business in certain way, among whom was the complainant; and the telegraph company notified the complainant of the action of the board, whereupon it filed its bill for relief. It was contended that the public had a right to the information afforded by these reports, and that, because the two defendants were corporations, the board was obliged to allow the reporters on its exchange and the telegraph company was obliged to transmit such reports to whoever demanded them and was willing to pay for them.

But the court held that the board had the right to exclude all persons but their members from their meetings, or to admit only such as they chose. To quote the opinion: "As the proof shows, the board, at great expense, secures for the use of its own members reports of the market in other parts of the world. The board of complainant, if allowed, would make these reports public property, and give to persons not members of the board, and perhaps, never could attain the position of membership of this body, all the advantages of membership. . . . It is absurd to say that information thus obtained by a private use becomes public property, . . . (N.S.) merely because it is collected and paid for through the agency of a private corporation. Transactions on the board are not public only so far as the board or its members see fit to make them so. Undoubtedly, the members of the board who act as agents, brokers, or factors for others, can be compelled by their principals to disclose prices to them, but not to the public. . . .

Members of this board can go 'on change' and deal with each other privately, and are not compelled to let the public know the prices at which they deal. The mere fact that they have been in the habit of informing the public of prices is no evidence that they are obliged to do so if they do not see fit to do it. In fact, we often see, as a matter of common knowledge and information, quotations made of large transactions between different dealers on the board in commodities at prices not made public, thereby showing clearly that they exercise their own option of withholding from the public information as to their prices."

So, in Bryant v. Western U. Tele. Co. 17 Fed. 825, in which injunction was refused to compel a telegraph company to furnish a bucket shop with the quotations of prices ruling upon the Chicago Board of Trade, contrary to a rule of the board, though the owners of the bucket shop were members of that board, it was held that the Chicago Board of Trade, being a private corporation, could make public its transactions, or refuse to do so, and could distribute the same through such agents or upon such conditions as seemed advisable to it; and that, since the reporting by the telegraph company of the daily markets upon this board was done by the permission of the board, it was not a right that the telegraph company possessed without such permission. The court deemed it "quite clear that a merchant, or a number of merchants and dealers organized into a corporation, can give to a reporter the terms of their private transactions to be transmitted to others upon any conditions they may choose to impose, even to the extent that these transactions shall not be transmitted to others dealing in the same goods or commodities. These transactions on the board of trade are private transactions in the sense that the general public are not entitled to them except by the permission of the board."

And in Marine Grain & S. Exchange v. Western U. Tele. Co. 22 Fed. 23, it was held that the Chicago Board of Trade had the right to decide to whom other than its own members the reports of its own dealings collected by its own employees should be distributed. The court also held that the board had control of its own floor, and could admit such persons there as it saw fit, and that it could make its transactions wholly secret and keep them within the knowledge of its own members, or make them public so far and only so far as it saw fit to do so. "Information as to the condition of the demand and prices for commodities dealt in on the board in other markets is collected and announced among the members of the board during the daily sessions of its members; and this information, together with reports of prices and dealings between the members at these sessions, if given as a matter of right to anyone demanding the same, would give to persons not members nearly if not quite all the advantages of membership, without the attendant expense and responsibility."

And these same principles were held to be controlling in Commercial Telegram Co. v. Smith, 47 Hun, 494, also decided before the supreme court of Illinois had ruled that the business of a board of trade or stock exchange in furnishing market quotations was one clothed with a public interest. In this case injunction was refused to restrain the New York Stock Exchange from excluding the plaintiff company from its premises, and from making an exclusive arrangement with another telegraph company to collect the market quotations of the exchange and to distribute the same among its customers. The court said: "The claim that the stock exchange has no right to exclude the Commercial Telegram Company from its floor upon the ground of public policy evidently proceeds upon an entirely erroneous theory. The exchange is a private association; it has the right to admit to its floor whom it pleases; it obtained nothing from the state except that protection which the law affords to every citizen; it has sought no special privilege and obtained no special powers. It is therefore just as much the master of its own business and of the method of conducting the same as any private individual within the state. It may make public the transactions which occur within its walls, or it may refuse all information in respect thereto. No matter which course is pursued, so long as it violates no law, it has a right to conduct its business as it pleases. . . . The New York Stock Exchange has asked nothing from the people of the state except that which is granted to every citizen; it has no special privileges under the law; it has no special rights; and the people, therefore, have no right to interfere in the transaction of its business to any greater extent than they have in that of any individual. It will hardly be claimed, we imagine, that because a man has carried on business in a certain way for a number of years that he has no right to change his methods."

And in Re Renville, 46 App. Div. 37, 61 N. Y. Supp. 549, the foregoing case was followed, and mandamus refused to compel a telegraph company to furnish the petitioner with the market quotations of the New York Stock Exchange, in the same manner and at the same price as they were furnished to others. In this case the New York supreme court attempts to answer the reasoning of the Illinois supreme court in arriving at the conclusion that the business of furnishing market quotations was one in which the public was interested, and, therefore, subject to public control. The court said that the stock exchange had the absolute right to give information as to the dealings of its members with each other to whom it pleased and upon such conditions as it saw fit to impose; and, therefore, it could give its market quotations to the telegraph companies to be delivered to certain specified persons upon condition that such information be given to no other persons. The court considered the information delivered to the telegraph company for transmission to be a communication which the stock exchange wished to transmit to certain persons and to no one else, and held that the stock exchange could not be required to furnish the petitioner with information relating solely to its own business upon its own property. As to the doctrine enunciated in New York & C. Grain & S. Exchange v. Board of Trade, 127 Ill. 153, 2 L.R.A. 411, 11 Am. St. Rep. 107, 19 N. E. 855, the court said: "The Chicago Board of Trade was a corporation, and the powers of a court of equity over a corporation are much more extensive than over private individuals; but we cannot agree with that decision so far as it appears to justify an interference by the public or the courts with a voluntary association in the transaction of its business because the public desire information as to its transactions. There is no doubt much information as to the method by which large corporations, associations, or firms transact their business, which would be quite valuable to their competitors and interesting to the public; but this would hardly be considered as justifying an interference by the courts. The basis of that decision is that, as the board had so conducted its affairs for a long term of years as to create a standard market in agricultural products, and, acting in concert or combination with the telegraph companies, had built up a great system for the instantaneous communication of intelligence concerning the market and its fluctuations, until the public and all persons dealing in such products conform their business to this system, that it could not be allowed to create a monopoly in the matter of the market quotations by furnishing them to some and refusing them to others. It is difficult to see why a voluntary association, because of the importance and character of its business and members, and of their transactions could be compelled to transmit to a particular individual information of its transactions. It was said in the case last cited: 'We do not wish to be understood as holding that the board of trade is bound by law to continue the business of collecting and furnishing to the public market quotations, or that it may not voluntarily abandon such business; but we hold that, so long as it continues to carry it on, either directly or indirectly, it must do so without unjust discrimination as to persons.' (p. 166.) Or, in other words, that, because it gives information to one person, it must give the same information to all, and the court will compel it to give such information to anyone asking therefor. But the question may well be asked, Where does the ourt get this power? No statute gives it. Nothing that these individuals have done, no obligations that they have assumed to the public, no privileges which they have received from the public, gives to the public the right to interfere with their private business or requires them to give information about it to those who desire such information. No franchise has been conferred upon this voluntary association by the public which justifies an interference by the public with its method of conducting its business, and to grant such an application would, it seems to me, be an interference with the liberty of the individual which is protected by the Constitution and the law. The doctrine established in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, and kindred cases, does not apply. No property of a stock exchange has been devoted to public use. The stock exchange excludes the public from its property; restricts the transactions therein to its own members; adds information of such transactions to those whom it designates as the persons at are to receive it. Information as to transactions upon the stock exchange is not such property as could be 'clothed with a public interest,' so that a 'grant to the public of an interest in that use' to be implied. Such information is not property in any sense, and the public or particular individual has no right to go to this voluntary association and insist that information of its transactions should be furnished."

To the same effect is Wilson v. Commercial Telegram Co. 18 N. Y. S. R. 78, 3 N. Supp. 633, in which it was held that New York Stock Exchange performed public service and was charged with no public duty, and that the business transactions on its floor, being exclusively those of its individual members, had the same immunity from public inspection as other mercantile transactions, and that the exchange might refuse to furnish information as to its transactions—that is to say, its market quotations—to such persons as it saw through for many years it had permitted persons not members to have access to its floor and to gather reports of its transactions to be distributed as news.

And the doctrine of the Illinois court is not to have met with approval in Reitt v. Philadelphia Local Teleg. Co. 18 Pa. 316, in which it was held that, where a telegraph company, incorporated as a transmitter of telegraphic despatches for the public, established in connection with its business a system of collecting and distributing information respecting the prices of stock, under a special contract with each customer, it did not thereby become bound to perform such favors for anybody, but might arbitrarily refuse any applications for the same, and might discontinue the service at pleasure when its contracts expired.

Each one of the foregoing lines of cases is correct in principle, the court, in Cain v. Eastern U. Teleg. Co. 10 Ohio Dec. Rept. (A.) (N.S.)

print, 72, refused to decide, though it held that, admitting the binding force of the principle, that the business of distributing market quotations was one affected with a public interest and therefore amenable to public control, the case at bar called for no application thereof.

Attention may be called to some Federal cases that, while admitting a property right on the part of a board of trade in market quotations gathered by it, have yet refused, at the suit of the board, to restrain the unauthorized use of such quotations by others; upon the ground that the greater part of the transactions on the board's exchange from which such quotations were collected, were bucket-shop deals in violation of law, and that the board knowingly permitted the use of its exchange by its members for such purpose, which deprived it of any standing in a court of equity. Board of Trade v. O'Dell Commission Co. 115 Fed. 574; Board of Trade v. Donovan Commission Co. 121 Fed. 1012; Board of Trade v. Ellis, 122 Fed. 319. But these cases must be deemed to be overruled by the Christie Case, supra.

Many of the authorities which hold that a board of trade has a property right in its market quotations were cited by the Massachusetts court in F. W. Dodge Co. v. Construction Information Co. 183 Mass. 62, 60 L.R.A. 810, 97 Am. St. Rep. 412, 66 N. E. 204, to support its conclusion that facts with reference to contemplated buildings or improvements, which have been ascertained promptly, by effort and expense, and compiled and put in form for the use of contractors, and which have a commercial value so long as they are not generally known, were also property entitled to protection as such. It was further held in this case that the furnishing to subscribers of such information under contract not to disclose it was not a publication which would deprive its owner of the right to protection against its unlawful use by another.

For a discussion of the right of a bucket shop to compel the furnishing to it of market quotations, see Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 153, and the note thereto.

In Cheesum v. State, 8 Blackf. 332, 44 Am. Dec. 771, it was held that a horse race Nuisance—gambling house.

(December 10, 1906.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Chancery Court for Pulaski County overruling a demurrer to the answer in a suit to enjoin the maintenance of a criminal nuisance. Affirmed.

The substance of the answer referred to in the opinion is sufficiently set out therein. The complaint was as follows:

"The plaintiffs, the state of Arkansas, by Robert L. Rogers, attorney general for said state, and Lewis Rhoton, prosecuting attorney for the sixth judicial circuit, and the city of Little Rock, by W. E. Lenon, mayor, and Ashley Cockrill, the city attorney of said city say: That the defendant Al Vaughan is the owner of lot 1 in block 10 in the city of Argenta, and has a two-story brick building thereon. That the east half of the ground floor of said building is rented and leased to the defendant Bob Furth, and perhaps to others associated with him, by the said Al Vaughan, for the purpose of conducting and operating therein what is commonly known as a 'gambling house or pool room;' and that defendant Bob Furth and others associated with him, in renting said premises from said Al Vaughan, do therein and thereat operate and conduct a gambling house or pool room where money or other things of value are paid, received, won, and lost on horse races, and where tickets for pool or chance on horse races run, or to be run, at the various race courses in the state of Arkansas and throughout is a game, within a statute enacting that "any person legally called to give evidence against another for gaming shall be deemed a competent witness to prove such gaming, although such person may have been concerned as a party;" and, therefore, it was not error, as against the defendant, for the trial court to compel the person with whom the defendant made the bet for which he was prosecuted to give evidence in the cause.

In Opinion of Justices, 73 N. H. 625, 63 Atl. 505, it was held that, within the statute which provides a punishment for any person who "shall gamble or bet on the sides or hands of such as are gambling or playing at any game;" and defines a gambler as "every person who plays at a game of chance or skill in a place which is resorted to for the purpose of gambling;" and also provides that, "if any person keeps any house, shop, or place resorted to for the purpose of gambling, . . . or suffers any person to gamble in any way in any such place, . . . he shall be fined,"—horse races are games, and the betting or wagering money thereon is gambling, and a place kept where betting, book making, or pool selling upon horse races is promoted or permitted would be a common gambling place.

In Miller v. United States, 6 App. D. C. 6, it was held that a horse race is a game of chance where a wager has been made upon the result, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the setting up or keeping any kind of "gambling device adapted, devised, and designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance for money or property."

In State v. Shaw, 39 Minn. 153, 39 N. W. 305, it was held that a horse race is not a gambling device, within the statute prohibiting gambling with "gambling devices," and "keeping gambling devices designed to be used in gambling."

was held that horse racing is not a gambling device, within a statute which punishes "betting at any gaming table, . . . or at any other gambling device whatever."

In Cheek v. Com. 100 Ky. 1, 37 S. W. 152, it was held that, while a horse race is not a game, betting on such a race is a hazard within a statute which reads: "If any person or persons shall engage in any hazard or game on which money or property is bet, won, or lost, such person or persons shall be subject to a fine."

In Com. v. Shelton, 8 Gratt. 592, it was held that betting on a horse race is not gaming, within the meaning of the statute which provides that "any free person who, at any ordinary race field, or public place, shall play at any game whatever, . . . or bet on the hands or sides of others who do play, shall be punished," etc.

In Cheek v. Com. 79 Ky. 359, it was held that betting on a horse race is not gaming, and is not, therefore, within the statute against inducing another to visit a place where "gaming" is carried on.

In Harless v. United States, Morris (Iowa) 169, the statute provided for the punishment of "every person who shall bet any money or property, or play at or upon any gaming table, bank, or device," etc. The court said that the whole scope and object of the statute seemed to be to prevent and punish the betting and staking of money upon games of chance,—games in which the result depended in a very considerable degree upon sheer hazard; and that horse racing was not included in that class.

In Thrower v. State, 117 Ga. 753, 45 S. E. 126, it was held that betting on a horse race is gaming, within a statute prohibiting the keeping of a gaming house.

In Swigart v. People, 154 Ill. 284, 40 N. E. 432, Affirming 50 Ill. App. 181, it was held that a room kept and used for the purpose the United States, are bought, sold, and cashed.

"Plaintiffs say that the defendant Al Vaughan has for several months past rented and leased said premises for the said purpose, and has for several months past suffered and permitted, and will, unless enjoined, continue to suffer and permit, the use of said premises for said unlawful purposes, and that, in consequence thereof, here is maintained in said house by the defendant a public gaming house and a public nuisance. Plaintiff says that said premises are located near the entrance to the public free bridge, between Little Rock and Argenta, across the Arkansas river, and upon the main thoroughfare leading there, and that the business portion of each of said cities is located immediately upon said river and at the respective entrances to said bridge, and that said Arkansas river is the only thing that separates the business parts of the two cities, and that said river also divides Pulaski county into two equal parts, and that Little Rock is the capital of the state of Arkansas and the county seat of Pulaski county, and that Little Rock is the market place for the people of said county, and that for these reasons thousands of people daily are crossing said bridge, and are forced to pass the said premises, and thus the citizens of the two cities and of the rural district in going and coming to market, and in visiting the said capital and the county seat of their state, are brought into contact with those that assemble and congregate around said gambling house and pool room.

"Plaintiffs state that the unlawful criminal business conducted by the defendants is so strategically located that it daily attracts to said place and to the vicinity thereof from Little Rock, from Argenta, and from the adjacent country and towns, a large number of criminals, gamblers, low and dissolute characters, sporting men, dissolute book making and selling of pools contingent upon the result of horse races was a common gaming house, within the meaning of a statute which prohibited the keeping "a common gaming house."

In People v. Weithoff, 51 Mich. 203, 47 N. Rep. 557, 16 N. W. 442, it was held that the use of a room for the purpose of selling pools on horse races makes it a gaming room, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the keeping or maintaining of a gaming room.

In State v. Ayers (Or.) 88 Pac. 653, it was held that the selling of pools on horse races is not an offense within the statute prohibiting the playing of games, etc., by gaming devices, for money, property, or any consideration thereof; since the chance upon which the wager is made is the competitive speed of a particular horse, and not manipulation of any device.

In Louisville v. Wehmhoff, 116 Ky. 845, 13 W. 876, 79 S. W. 201, it was held that betting by the buyers of pools on horse races is not a game, within the statute which fixes a penalty against "whoever shall engage in any game whatever at which money or property is bet, won, or lost, in any place, or on premises in his occupation."

Edwards v. State, 8 Lea, 411, it was held that, a pool being a bet, the sale of a pool on a horse race run in the state of New York was a violation of the statutes against gaming. The statutes are not set out.

When a question has arisen a number of times under statutes providing for the recovery of money or property bet and lost in games.

Thus, it has been held that betting on a horse race is gaming within the meaning of a statute which provides for the recovery of any money or property lost by betting at cards, dice, or any other games. Tatman v. Strader, 23 Ill. 493; A. (N.S.)

Garrison v. McGregor, 51 Ill. 473; Richardson v. Kelly, 85 Ill. 491.

In Ellis v. Beale, 18 Me. 337, 36 Am. Dec. 726, it was held that horse racing is a game, within a statute which permits the recovery of money lost by betting on certain enumerated games, and "any other game."

In Dyer v. Benson, 69 Ga. 609, it was held that betting on a horse race is gaming, within the statute which reads: "Gaming contracts are void. . . . Money paid, or property delivered up, upon such consideration, may be recovered back from the winner by the loser," etc.

In Wade v. Deming, 9 Ind. 35, it was held that betting on a horse race was betting on a game, within the meaning of a statute which enacted that money lost by betting on any game, etc., may, within six months next following, be recovered by suit, etc.

The question has also arisen under statutes making obligations void when given for money lost at gaming.

Thus, horse racing is held to be a game, within the meaning of a statute which provides "that all promises, notes, . . . made or entered into by any person, where the whole or any part of the consideration thereof shall be for money, etc., won by gaming or playing at cards, dice, or any game or games, shall be void and of no effect." Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 538, 31 Am. Rep. 189; Boynton v. Curle, 4 Mo. 599.

In Joseph v. Miller, 1 N. M. 621, it was held that a horse race, when adopted for the purpose of determining by chance which of the parties has won, and which has lost, a valuable stake, is a gambling device within the statute which provides that "all judgments, securities, bonds, bills, notes, or conveyances, when the consideration is money or property won at gambling, or at any game or gambling device, shall be void."

women, disorderly and idle persons without lawful means of support; and that said Bob Furth has publicly advertised extensively, and still continues to do so, in the city of Little Rock, said unlawful business, and now operates a bus by which free transportation is given or offered from the city of Little Rock across the bridge to said gambling house and return, and upon which bus is conspicuously displayed a sign to that effect; and the said Furth seeks and gets a large part of his patronage from the city of Little Rock; and while said city has desired to protect its people from the corrupting influence of such an establishment, and has done everything in its power, the defendants, by their collusion and artful connivance, have enabled the defendant Furth to run a gambling house at the very gate of the city, and to attract to this school of crime and debauchery its citizens, to which not only its criminal elements flow, but many of the unwary and inexperienced and morally weak are attracted, beguiled, corrupted, and impoverished, and many of the dependent, innocent, and helpless are left in want and driven to immorality and crime for a livelihood. In this way the moral well-being and public peace of Little Rock are demoralized, and its laws evaded, annulled, and defeated in its own territory; and that the presence of said persons in the city of Argenta and at the gate of the city of Little Rock and in the state of Arkansas has a demoralizing effect on the good order and moral well-being of each of said cities, of Pulaski county and of the state of Arkansas, constituting a public nuisance, and their presence a menace to the morality, progress, and advancement of the community.

"The plaintiffs state that a further fact which aggravates the character of the evil complained of herein is that a large number of gambling houses were recently running open, and attended by a large crowd of the criminal classes in each of the cities above mentioned; but that lately a crusade has been made against said gambling houses of said cities, and several of those recently closed were in the immediate vicinity of the pool room complained of herein; but there are now no known public gambling houses in either of said cities, and a large number of the vicious, idle, and criminals who frequented said places now flock to the pool room complained of herein.

"The plaintiffs state that the defendant Bob Furth is a saloon keeper, and has been for many years, and that, in connection with his saloon, he has operated for years a gambling house containing faro bank, roulette, crap tables, and many other gambling devices, and continued to operate it until forced to desist by repeated burning orders and raids by the officers; that thereafter he sought to get permission from the city of Little Rock to run a pool room in said city, at which bets could be made and money won and lost on horse races, such as he has now over in Argenta; but that the same was denied him and to all others, and the same prohibited as a criminal offense, because it would degrade and corrupt and debauch the citizens and visitors of the city, and attract to the community large numbers of criminals and evil characters, and generally injure the morals of the state; but, having failed in this, the said Bob Furth entered into a collusion and conspiracy with the defendant W. C. Faucette, who is mayor of the city of Argenta, and the defendant Gabe Pratt, who is chief of the police of said city, whereby, in consideration of certain sums of money paid to them regularly, he is granted the privilege of operating a gambling house commonly called a 'pool room,' and assured of the protection of said Faucette and Pratt, and for that purpose regular and periodic fines are collected of said Bob Furth.

"Plaintiffs further say that the maintenance of said nuisance, and the continuance thereof, will result in great and irreparable injury to them and to the people of the said cities and of the state of Arkansas; that an injunction against the injury complained of in this petition has never been asked for, nor refused, by this or any other court; and that it will be necessary, in order to obtain full and adequate relief, that an injunction issue restraining defendants from a continuance of the acts herein complained of.

"Wherefore plaintiffs pray that a temporary injunction issue, and that, upon final hearing, said temporary injunction be made permanent, and that defendant Bob Furth, his agents and employees, be perpetually enjoined and restrained from operating or continuing a pool room or gambling house at the place named herein; and that the defendant Al Vaughan be perpetually enjoined from renting said property to defendant Bob Furth or any other person for the purpose of operating a pool room therein; and that the defendants W. C. Faucette and Gabe Pratt be perpetually enjoined from aiding, encouraging, or abetting the said Bob Furth, or any other person, to operate or conduct a pool room or gambling house in said city of Argenta; and that Bob Furth and the other defendants be required to answer under oath what other parties are connected with or interested in the maintenance of said pool room, gaming house, and public nuisance, or in the proceeds thereof, and that, upon their discovery, an injunction be issued against them, and for all other proper relief."

circuit, and the mayor and city attorney of Little Rock brought a bill in chancery against Vaughan, Furth, Faucette, and others, in the name of the state of Arkansas and the city of Little Rock, seeking to enjoin Furth from operating a pool room at a place in the city of Argenta near the free bridge, which connects Argenta and Little Rock, and that the other defendants be enjoined from permitting or assisting, in the several ways alleged, said Furth in conducting said pool room. The defendants answered, denying many allegations of the bill, and to this answer the state and city demurred, and the case was determined on the demurrer, the court overruled it, and the state and city rested upon it and appealed. The review here is limited to the admissions and allegations in the answer and the undenied allegations of the complaint, as all other allegations were eliminated by trying the case on the sufficiency of the answer. The pleadings will be set out in the statement of facts. The material parts of the answer, aside from its denial of the allegations of the complaint, are as follows: "It is true that the defendant Bob Furth operated what is known as a 'turf exchange' or 'pool room,' where money is received, won, and lost on horse races, and where tickets for pools on horse races run, or to be run, at various and divers race courses in the state of Arkansas, and throughout the United States, are bought, sold, and cashed. That in point of fact there are not more than 15 or 30 people who visit said turf exchange daily, and that neither women nor children are permitted in said pool room, or turf exchange. And they state that said pool room, or turf exchange, is conducted as a quiet, orderly business, and that no persons visit the same, except those who desire to do so, and that disorderly or dissolute characters are not allowed or permitted to visit there, and are not in the habit of doing so. It is true that he has caused the said turf exchange to be advertised by a short notice in one of the Little Rock papers, and that he has at times operated a carriage from said city of Little Rock to said pool room. . . . That the business only attracts such as desire to purchase tickets or pools on horse races, and that disorderly or lewd women of the law-breaking class are not in the habit of attending said pool room, or turf exchange. And that no one is disturbed by the gathering of the people in or about said premises. They further state that the city of Little Rock has no corporate property whatever that is in any way affected by the alleged public nuisance as described in said complaint. They further state that the state of Arkansas has no property interest in the matters complained of, and that, if the said defendants are violating any law, the criminal courts of the state have ample power and authority to prosecute the defendants for such offenses, and that the charter of the city of Argenta authorizes said city to punish or abate a nuisance carried on as alleged in the complaint."

The first question under inquiry is whether betting on horse racing is gambling, within the meaning of the statutes against gaming. The general statute, the only one of them under which it could fall, defines the act therein made criminal to be "betting any money, or any valuable thing, on any game of hazard or skill." Kirby's Dig. § 1740. It contemplates that the game be "played," for the next section provides that it shall not be necessary for the indictment to allege with whom the game was played. § 1741. In construing these statutes in 1861, Chief Justice English, for this court, said: "But we do not think that the legislature intended to embrace horse racing by the words 'any game of hazard or skill' 'played,' etc., however vicious betting at such sports may be." State v. Rorie, 23 Ark. 726. In 1893 this court had before it betting on a game of baseball, and it was held to be criminal because on a game of skill, and the distinction that horse racing was not a game, but a sport, was approved. Mace v. State, 58 Ark. 79, 22 S. W. 1108. Some states sustain this distinction, and hold horse racing to be a sport, and not a game within the gaming statutes; but the weight of authority is to the contrary. 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 884; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 682. It will not do to overrule State v. Rorie merely because against the weight of authority; there is good reason to sustain the distinction therein made, and it has been acquiesced in by the state for forty-five years, when at any time it could have been changed by legislation. Therefore, it must be taken in this case that betting on horse racing is not a crime of itself. The quoted parts of the answer admit the maintenance by Furth of a turf exchange, or pool room, wherein money is received, won, and lost on horse races; where tickets for pools on horse races run or to be run in Arkansas and elsewhere are bought, sold, and cashed; that 15 to 30 persons daily visit the pool room, for the purpose of betting on the races, or buying, selling, or cashing pools on the races; that said business is advertised, and, at times, a vehicle to bring patrons to it has been furnished. What is the status of such a house, notwithstanding it is conducted in a quiet and orderly manner without unusual noise or disorderly conduct? At common law there were no statutes against gaming, yet the maintenance of a gaming house was a criminal nuisance, indictable and punishable as such. Mr. Justice Scott, for this court, said: "Independent of any statute, the keeping of a common gaming house is indictable at common law on account of its tendency to bring together disorderly persons, promote immorality, and lead to breaches of the peace. Such an establishment is thus a common nuisance." Vanderworker v. State, 13 Ark. 700. Chief Justice Watkins, for this court, said: "At the common law, gaming houses were indictable as a public nuisance (Vanderworker v. State, supra); but, unless restrained by some express statute, ordinary wagers or betting were tolerated as being for amusement or recreation." Norton v. State, 15 Ark. 71. In Thatcher v. State, 48 Ark. 60, 2 S. W. 343, the court went into the subject of gaming, hawdy and disorderly houses being common-law nuisances, and held that they were such not from the noise or disorder, but on account of the evil tendency of the business there conducted. Mr. Wharton says: "It is, at common law, not indictable for persons to engage in gaming in private, or to conduct a single game of chance in a public place. But when gaming is there publicly known to be carried on, however secluded the place may be, and when unwary and inexperienced persons are there enticed and fleeced, then the parties concerned are indictable for nuisance, irrespective of any particular statutes." 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1465. Mr. Bishop says a common gaming house is a nuisance, because those attracted to it, especially youths, are there lured to vice, and youths may be as effectually lured by a noiseless process as by any other. 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, §§ 1135, 1136. Therefore it follows that the fact that betting on horse racing is not within the gaming statutes does not prevent a house maintained for such betting being a criminal nuisance. As seen, the evil character of the business, and not the violation of the express statute, is what stamps it as a nuisance.

Turning more directly to the case in hand, Do pool rooms fall within the definition of common-law nuisances whether the games or sports bet upon are contrary to statute or not? Judge Cooley, speaking for the Michigan court, drew a vivid picture of the evils of betting, and showed that, even where individual wagers were tolerated by law, a house maintained to carry on a betting business was unlawful. People v. Weithoff, 51 Mich. 203, 47 Am. Rep. 557, 16 N. W. 442. The case of State v. Nease, 46 Or. 433, 80 Pac. 897, is much in point, as these excerpts will show: "The evidence shows that he [the defendant] was the eeper and proprietor of what is called a 'surf exchange' or pool room on one of the principal thoroughfares in the city, at which persons daily congregated for the purpose of betting upon horse races run in other states, and reported to him by telegraph.

. . . That such a house is a gaming or gambling house, and punishable as a nuisance at common law, whether betting on horse race is a crime or not, has so often and uniformly been held by the courts that it is no longer open to discussion. There is no dissent in the adjudged cases, and it is unnecessary to do more than cite the authorities," citing many cases. See also Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 893, 894, notes. The foregoing question must be answered affirmatively. The common law is put in force in this state, and the punishment for common-law offenses not covered by statute is fixed as fine not exceeding $100 and imprisonment not to exceed three months. Ryby's Dig. §§ 623, 624. These statutes have been held applicable to a gaming house as a common-law misdemeanor. Vanderwerker v. State; Norton v. State; and Catcher v. State,—supra; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 1137. Each period in which a nuisance continues is a separate offense. Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1419. In addition to providing by fine and imprisonment, the state may have a judgment abating the nuisance and execution therefor. Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1426; Bishop, Crim. Law, § 1179; Ryby's Dig. § 2464.

The court has gone fully into the question of the criminality of maintaining a pool room and the remedies therefor, in order to ascertain whether a chancery court, by injunction, can restrain a person or persons from carrying on such business. There are some courts of learning and ability holding that common-law nuisances, such as illegal tippling houses, disorderly houses, bad houses, and gaming houses, may be restrained by injunction. These cases go back to State ex rel. Vance v. Crawford, 28 N. 726, 42 Am. Rep. 182, in which it was held that an illegal drinking saloon (one in violation of a prohibition law of the state) could be closed by injunction, although in that particular case it was not done on account of the sufficiency of a statutory remedy reaching the evil. Mr. Justice Valentine thus stated and commented on the case: "This action was originally instituted in the district court of Shawnee county, by the county attorney of such county, in the name of the state, for the purpose of perpetually enjoining the further continuance of an illegal liquor saloon, which intoxicating liquors were illegally, and continuously, and persistently sold to be drunk on the premises as a beverage. R.A. (N.S.)

. . . It must be admitted that this is a novel proceeding,—so novel as to startle old and experienced practitioners, and yet, if it were ascertained, after a careful examination of all its elements, to be founded in reason and justice, and to come within the acknowledged principles of long-established equity jurisprudence, it should not be dismissed unceremoniously, or denied a respectful hearing, simply because of its unquestioned and admitted novelty." Then the learned justice plausibly contends that such a use of the injunction accords with the principle of equity jurisprudence. See State ex rel. Rhodes v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 18 L.R.A. 646, 25 Atl. 588, and Weakley v. Page, 102 Tenn. 178, 46 L.R.A. 553, 53 S. W. 551, where cases supporting this view are reviewed, and other cases along the same line may be found in appellant's brief. The same question came before the St. Louis court of appeals when Seymour D. Thompson was a member of that court, and that able jurist delivered an opinion completely answering the contention of the Kansas court in the Crawford Case. He showed by authority and reason that the jurisdiction in courts of equity to restrain public nuisances was limited to these three classes: (1) To restrain purpresture of public highways or navigations; (2) to restrain threatened nuisances dangerous to the health of a community; (3) to restrain ultra vires acts of corporations injurious to public right. The court proceeds: "Unquestionably, the exercise of equity jurisdiction in these three classes of cases is an exception to a very general, well-understood, and important rule. That rule is that a court of equity has no jurisdiction in matters of crime. In these three classes of cases, jurisdiction is, however, exercised for special reasons, although unquestionably the nuisance complained of is a misdemeanor and subject to prosecution by indictment." State ex rel. Circuit Attorney v. Uhrig, 14 Mo. App. 413. Chancellor Kent said: "If a charge be of a criminal nature, or an offense against the public, and does not touch the enjoyment of property, it ought not to be brought within the direct jurisdiction of this court [a chancery court], which was intended to deal only in matters of civil right, resting in equity, or where the remedy at law was not sufficiently adequate.

. . . I know that the court is in the practice of restraining private nuisances to property, and of quieting persons in the enjoyment of private right; but it is an extremely rare case, and may be considered, if it ever happened, as an anomaly, for a court of equity to interfere at all, and much less preliminarily by injunction, to put down a public nuisance which did not violate the rights of property, but only contravened the general policy." Atty. Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371.

The Illinois court said: "It is elementary law that the subject-matter of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery is civil property. . . . The court has no jurisdiction in matters merely criminal or merely immoral, which do not affect any right to property." Sheridan v. Colvin, 78 Ill. 237. Again, it is well said: "It is no part of the mission of equity to administer the criminal law of the state, or to enforce the principles of religion and morality, except so far as the same may be incidental to the enforcement of property rights, and perhaps other matters of equitable cognizance." Cope v. District Fair Asso. 99 Ill. 489, 39 Am. Rep. 30.

In People v. Condon, 102 Ill. App. 449, the subject of equity jurisdiction to enjoin a pooling and betting business was gone into fully, and the authorities reviewed and the result thus summed up: "(1) That a court of equity has no jurisdiction over matters merely criminal or merely immoral; (2) that a court of equity will sometimes enjoin a public nuisance; (3) that this will be done in no case where the state is the complainant, unless it be clearly shown that such nuisance affects public property, or public civil rights." A learned text writer, whose works are standard authorities, says: "Nuisances that arise from the acts of men, that for the time being make the property devoted to their purposes a nuisance, but which ceases to be so when the use is stopped, such as disorderly houses, gaming houses and cock pits that are malum in se and common nuisances purely, and only punishable by indictment." 1 Wood, Nuisances, § 14.

The Supreme Court of the United States considered the use of the injunction to restrain public nuisances and to preserve rights of the public in highways when the government secured an injunction against strikers interfering with interstate mail and traffic at Chicago in the railroad strike of 1894, and Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for an undivided court, said: "The difference between a public nuisance and a private nuisance is that one affects the people at large, and the other simply the individual. The quality of the wrong is the same, and the jurisdiction of the courts over them rests upon the same principles, and goes to the same extent. . . . Again, it is objected that it is outside of the jurisdiction of a court of equity to enjoin the commission of crimes. This, as a general proposition, is unquestioned. A chancellor has no criminal jurisdiction. Something more than the threatened commission of an offense against the laws of the land is necessary to call into exercise the injunctive powers of the court. There must be some interferences, actual or threatened, with property or rights of a pecuniary nature; but, when such interferences appear, the jurisdiction of a court of equity arises, and is not destroyed by the fact that they are accompanied by, or are themselves, violations of the criminal law." Re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 592, 593, 39 L. ed. 1092, 1105, 1106, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900, 909.

It is demonstrably true that it is a sound principle of equity jurisprudence that an injunction will not lie at the instance of the state to restrain a public nuisance, where the nuisance is one arising from the illegal, immoral, or pernicious acts of men, which, for the time being, make the property devoted to such use a nuisance, where such nuisance is indictable and punishable under the criminal law. On the other hand, if the public nuisance is one touching civil property rights or privileges of the public, or the public health is affected by a physical nuisance, or if any other ground of equity jurisdiction exists calling for an injunction, a chancery court will enjoin, notwithstanding the act enjoined may also be a crime. The criminality of the act will neither give nor oust jurisdiction in chancery. Applying these principles here, and it is seen that the admissions of the answer prove Furth to have been daily violating the criminal laws; but there is an absence of any showing that the acts constituting the crime reached to any of the grounds of equity jurisdiction. In some cases where the jurisdiction of equity is sought to restrain a criminal nuisance, there are allegations that the criminal processes are inadequate to afford relief from connivance of the officers, or other reasons. Happily, that unfortunate situation is not presented here. The prosecuting attorney joins in this complaint, and allegations involving the officers of Argenta in the maintenance of this pool room were denied in the answer, and the state elected to treat the answer as true. It is not only the right, but the sworn duty, of every prosecuting attorney to proceed by information in justice or circuit court to close these illegal places when they have information of them. It is not only the right, but the duty, of every grand jury to find the existence of such places if they exist, and to indict the keepers thereof. It is also the privilege of any citizen to proceed against them at any time by affidavit before a justice of the peace. There is no possible excuse under the law for a pool room—a place maintained for carrying on or facilitating betting on horse races, or any other sport, or game, or contest, or other event on which wagers are laid—to exist in Kansas for one minute. Its maintenance a crime, nothing more, nothing less. Persons charged with crime are entitled to a fair trial, and this right must not be taken from them under guise of an injunction against a nuisance.

The chancellor was right in refusing to entertain jurisdiction, and the judgment is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MICHAEL CAVANAUGH, Appt.,
v.

CENTERVILLE BLOCK COAL COMPANY.

servant—injury—proximate cause.

1. The defective condition of the track on which cars are run in a mine, by reason of which a car, loaded by a miner who is to be paid by the amount delivered at the pit mouth, gets off the track, is not the proximate cause of an injury due to his pinching his fingers between the car and an implement which has been employed in attempting to get the car back on the track, where he was at liberty to suit his own convenience and employ his own methods in replacing the car.

Master—pit boss—liability.

2. A mine owner is not liable for the negligent act of the pit boss in assisting a miner who was to be paid for the amount of coal delivered, in replacing a loaded car on the track, where the mine owner owed the injured person no duty with respect to such service.

Same—fellow servant.

3. The act of a pit boss in assisting a miner to run cars out of his room to be taken to the pit mouth is that of a fellow servant, and not of a vice principal.

(October 23, 1906.)

Case Note.—Negligence responsible for accident as proximate cause of personal injury received in performance of act or work rendered necessary by the accident:—Cases involving this question are not numerous, and there seems to be none which may be distinguished from the foregoing case as one or more important and essential features.

A case similar in some respects is Secombe v. Detroit Electric R. Co. 133 Mich. 3, 94 N. W. 747, where a worn rail caused street car to be derailed, and the car following, while backing to the barns to secure assistance, ran into the second following car, injuring the motorman upon the track. The court held that the worn rail was not the proximate cause of the injury, in that it was the remote cause. But it is to be observed that in this case the injuries were incurred by a third person, who was no wise responsible for restoring the car to the track; and the case is of comparatively little value in any event upon the question of proximate cause, as the opinion is mainly devoted to the question as to the negligence of the company in not promulgating an efficient set of rules for backing cars, and also in keeping in its employ a careless and inefficient servant.

In Page v. Bucksport, 64 Me. 51, 18 Am. D. 239, it was held that a defect in a bridge, for which a town was responsible, the consequence of which the plaintiff's horse fell through the bridge, was the proximate cause of injuries sustained by the plaintiff in being struck by the horse in its struggle to free itself as he was attempting to recede from it. The court, in support of its decision holding the town liable, said that it was the plaintiff's duty to the town to save the horse if possible, under the general rule that a person having sustained an injury through the fault of another should exercise all common care to render the injury as light as possible. In reply to the defendant's contention that, while such rule would have been applicable if the injury had happened to the horse, it did not apply where the accident happened to the driver, and not to the horse, the court said: "We do not perceive that there would be any difference upon principle whether the injury was to the plaintiff's person or to his property. The accident to the horse was an injury sustained by the owner of the horse. The plaintiff was attempting to relieve himself of an injury to his horse, and thereby of an injury to himself, when the horse in his struggles struck him with his head. . . . We think that all which took place at the time of the accident was, as between these parties, but a single happening or event. It was but one accident."

It will be noticed that in this case the decision was based upon the ground that the owner's obligation to the defendant town to rescue the horse connected his injury with the original accident so closely as to make it, in law, one event. In CAVANAUGH v. CENTERVILLE BLOCK COAL Co. it was held that, although the responsibility of rerailing the car rested upon the plaintiff, he was under no duty to the company to operate the car save the possibility of being discharged if he was not diligent in the pursuit of his work.

The case of Stickney v. Maidstone, 30 Vt. 738, which was cited and relied upon in Page v. Bucksport, is strikingly similar in both facts and decision. There it was contended that the injury did not result immediately from the defective condition of the bridge, but remotely; and that the plaintiff was under no legal obligation to attempt to save the horse, and, having volunteered, he must take the risk of any injury that might result therefrom. But the court said: "It was clearly the duty of the plaintiff, both mor-

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Appanoose County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by McClain, Ch. J.:

Action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of the negligence of defendant's employees. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the court sustained a motion to direct a verdict for the defendant and from the judgment on such directed verdict the plaintiff appeals.

ally and legally, to use all reasonable and proper means to save the horse. It was his duty to the town so to do, and, if he had neglected to make the effort, the town would have had reason to complain. But, whatever may have been his duty under the circumstance, he clearly had the right to make all such proper and judicious efforts as were required to immediately relieve himself and his property from the position into which he had been thrown by reason of the defect in the bridge, and while doing so he must be regarded as acting under the direct and immediate force of the first cause which made such efforts necessary; and, until that end is accomplished, the town must be responsible for such injuries as ensue."

And, in connection with these cases, it may be well to notice Duffy v. Cincinnati Street R. Co. 2 Ohio N. P. 294, although it is not strictly in point. Here a car of the defendant railroad company was being run at a rate of speed greater than allowed by law, and, in consequence thereof, the plaintiff, who was driving a dray, was unable to get out of the way of the car, and the dray was struck and a shaft broken. As a consequence of this, the horse ran away, and the plaintiff, in endeavoring to stop the horse, was struck by the broken shaft and injured. A demurrer was interposed to a complaint setting forth the above state of facts. The court held that the injury would be referred to the wrongful act of the defendant in running its car at the unlawful rate of speed. In the course of the opinion the court said: "A car running at a high rate of speed strikes a dray and breaks a shaft. Would not the natural results be that the horse would run away, that the driver would try to catch him, and that he would be injured by the broken shaft? Could not such results be anticipated?"

of which the gas escapes and enters an electric-light conduit, is not the proximate cause of an injury to a workman two or more months thereafter, who was overcome by gas in descending a manhole at least two blocks from the point in question in an attempt to rescue a fellow laborer. Murphy v. New York, 89 App. Div. 93, 85 N. Y. Supp. 445. The decision is upon the ground that, under the circumstances, the accident was one which could not have been anticipated by any reasonable foresight. Although in this case the decedent voluntarily risked his life to save his companion, the court apparently passed over any question which might have been raised as to contributory negligence, and based its decision solely upon the question of proximate cause.

This note is intended to be confined to cases where the effects of the original accident had been definitely interrupted, and had ceased at the time of the injury in question, such injury having been sustained in the performance of work necessary to remedy the effects of the accident. It has not been the intention to include in this note cases where the effects of the accident are continuing and efforts are made to prevent further damage, as, for instance, such a case as Leavenworth Coal Co. v. Ratchford, 5 Kan. App. 150, 48 Pac. 927, where the plaintiff, having discovered that a broken wire of the defendant company emitted a blaze of electric fire upon his roof, apparently endangering his property, thereupon attempted to remove the wires from his building to save it from burning, and was injured by an unexpected movement of the wire caused by its being thrown from his building.

And cases involving the voluntary incurrence of danger to save life or property have also been excluded. For an exhaustive note upon this latter subject see 49 L.R.A. 715.

McClain, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The ultimate facts which the evidence for plaintiff tended to establish, so far as they are material to the determination of the questions involved, are as follows: The plaintiff was, at the time of receiving the injury complained of, engaged as a miner in the coal mine of defendant, under the usual arrangement, by which he was allowed to work under the general direction of defendant's pit boss, and receive pay at a specified price per ton for coal mined by him and delivered at the mouth of the shaft. Miners such as plaintiff work in rooms which are extended back by them, in carrying on the operation of getting out the coal, from the main entry to the depth of 125 feet; and it is the business of the miner to pick or blast down the coal on the face of the vein as the room is extended back from the main entry, load the coal upon cars furnished by the company at the mouth of his room, and deliver these cars in the entry, where they are taken by the drivers, and hauled by mules to the shaft, to be elevated by machinery to the surface. As the thickness of the vein of coal which was being mined in this mine was only sufficient to allow the use of the small cars employed for transporting the coal from the place where it was mined to the entry, and would not permit the passage of the mules without some additional height being furnished in the entry, it was necessary to dig out the dirt below the coal vein and also above, so that the entries might be sufficient in height to allow the mules to pass through; and in such entries iron tracks were constructed on which the cars might turn. This work of preparing the entries, for the operation of the cars propelled by mules and laying the track for the cars to run upon was done by the company, employing for that purpose men paid by the day, and the company constructed for each room a slope from the entry up to the level of the floor of the room, and laid upon this slope iron switch rails, connected with the main track in the entry, and wooden rails connected with the iron switch rails, thus extending the track up into the opening of the room. The additional wooden rails necessary to carry the car back into the room to the face of the coal where the miner would load his cars were laid by the miner himself, as he had occasion to need them. It thus appears that the company was responsible for the condition of the track up the slope into the room in which the miner should work, and the miner was responsible for the condition of the track extending into the room itself. Plaintiff, having been assigned to the room in which he was working, loaded a car furnished him by the pit boss, and with the assistance of the boss was pushing it out of his room upon the switch furnished by the company, ready to be taken by the driver in the entry, when he should have occasion to attach it to a "trip" of cars being hauled to the shaft, when the car got off the track at the point where the first pair of wooden rails connected with the iron rails of the switch, and in putting the car back upon this track, with the assistance of, or in conjunction with, the efforts of the pit boss, plaintiff's fingers on one hand were injured by being pinched between the bottom of the car and a wooden prop which the pit boss had been using in "slewing" the front end of the car over onto the track, and which had been dropped by him; and as a result of this injury, which was not so severe as to prevent plaintiff from going to work the next day, but which was subsequently aggravated by blood poisoning, producing erysipelas, the plaintiff's arm had to be amputated; and his action is for the impairment of his earning capacity consequent on the loss of his arm.

There were various grounds urged in the motion for a directed verdict, but they are reducible to three propositions contended for in behalf of defendant, as follows: First, that the negligence, if any, of defendant in failing to keep the portion of the track leading to plaintiff's room in proper condition for use was not the proximate cause of plain-ff's injury; second, that plaintiff's own negligence contributed to his injury; and, third, that plaintiff assumed the risks incident to the defect in the track. In the view which we take of the case, it is only necessary to consider the question of proximate cause.

Conceding that the track at the place where the car which the plaintiff and the pit boss were pushing down to the entry was derailed was furnished by the company and was in its charge, and that it was negligent in allowing such track to be defective, the question is whether the injury to plaintiff was the proximate result of the derailment of the car. The situation was this: Plaintiff as a miner was engaged on his own responsibility in propelling this car to the entry. This was a part of the duty which he must perform to secure compensation for the mining of the coal, for he was paid only for the coal was delivered at the mouth of the mine. Plaintiff was not under any duty to the company to operate this car, save that he did not, with reasonable diligence, prosecute his business of getting out coal, he was subject to be discharged by the pit boss; that is, denied the further privilege of working in the mine. There was no emergency involved in the derailling of the car save the delay occasioned to the plaintiff in prosecuting his business. Plaintiff was not entitled to the assistance of the pit boss or anyone else connected with the operation of the mine in pushing his car to the entry, save as such assistance was, as it appears, ordered necessary and promised to him in consequence of the switch track not being in good order, and the further fact that the pit boss, desirous of having coal taken from the room to which plaintiff had been assigned, had promised assistance in getting plaintiff's cars until the track should be put in better condition. The general custom, as it appears, was for miners who had trouble in getting out their cars to call for assistance on their fellow miners, or anyone employed in the mine. On a previous day, while working in this same room, plaintiff had the assistance of the driver in getting one of his cars; but it was not the duty of the pit boss or any other employees of the mine to give assistance to the plaintiff save as such assistance had been promised in a particular case on account of the defective condition of the track. Therefore, when plaintiff's car was derailed, the responsibility of getting it back on the track, in order that he might push it onto the track, rested upon him. Assuming that the duty to the plaintiff was received while he was engaged with the assistance of the pit boss in replacing the car upon the track, we think that it was not the proximate result of the defect in the track which had caused the derailling of the car. It appears that cars become derailed from various causes. If the derailment had occurred on a portion of the track for the condition of which the plaintiff was responsible, the same kind of an accident in replacing the car on the track might, as well, have happened. The proximate result of the defect in the track had been completely reached when the car became derailed. What was subsequently done had no immediate causal relation with the defect which produced the derailment. If it had appeared that the derailment was due to the negligence of plaintiff, he would not have thereby been precluded from recovery if the company were chargeable with negligence in what subsequently took place. The defective track was not even the condition which led to the injury of the plaintiff. The condition immediately attending or preceding the injury was the derailed car, and the defect of the track was therefore nothing more than the cause of a condition.

In support of our conclusion, it would be idle to attempt any exhaustive citation of authorities, nor would it be practicable to state any rule which may be applied to all cases involving the question of proximate cause. A rule general enough to cover all cases would be too general for any practical purpose. Two illustrations will sufficiently serve to indicate the conclusion reached by this court in cases very similar to the one before us. In Watters v. Waterloo, 126 Iowa, 199, 101 N. W. 871, it is said that causal relation does not exist where the result proceeds from a source wholly independent of the cause insisted upon, and comes into proximate relation with such cause only by reason of being aided in some way by one or more of the results flowing from such original cause. That was a case where recovery was sought for injury by an accident consisting of a fall on an icy street, which it was claimed was the proximate result of a prior fall due to a defective sidewalk, causing the injured party to have occasional spells of dizziness, during one of which his fall on the icy street had subsequently occurred. That case is quite analogous, for the condition of dizziness accompanied or produced the fall on the icy street, while the previous fall on the defective sidewalk was merely a cause of such condition. In Parmenter v. Marion, 113 Iowa, 297, 85 N. W. 90, it was said that the act of the city in negligently allowing a platform to project over the sidewalk was not the proximate cause of an injury to a passer-by who was struck by a bale of hay falling from such platform; the platform being, as it was held, a mere condition, and not the proximate cause of the accident. The case of Andrews v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 129 Iowa, 162, 105 N. W. 404, is also very much in point.

The cases relied on by counsel for appellant are not in point. In Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228, 28 L. ed. 410, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369, the question was whether the wrongful failure of the defendant company to fence its track was the proximate cause of an accident to a boy who attempted, in response to a signal from another boy, to get upon a moving freight train. The court, in reversing a judgment on a directed verdict for the company, said (page 241 of 111 U. S., page 415 of 28 L. ed., and page 374 of 4 Sup. Ct. Rep.): "It is further argued that the direction of the court below was right, because the want of a fence could not reasonably be alleged as the cause of the injury. In the sense of an efficient cause, causa causans, this is, no doubt, strictly true; but that is not the sense in which the law uses the term in this connection. The question is, Was it causa sine qua non,—a cause which, if it had not existed, the injury would not have taken place; an occasional cause? and that is a question of fact, unless the causal connection is evidently not proximate." Whether the question is made any easier by speaking of the causa sine qua non rather than the causa causans, we need not consider, for the court found that the duty imposed on the company by ordinance to maintain a fence was imposed by way of precaution to lessen the danger of such accidents as that which actually happened, and there was, therefore, an immediate proximate connection between the neglect of duty and the resulting accident, which the performance of the duty might reasonably have tended to prevent.

In Aldrich v. Concord & M. R. Co. 67 N. H. 380, 36 Atl. 252, the defendant company was held liable for injury to an employee from the falling of logs from a freight car on which they were loaded, the supports intended to hold the logs in place having been weakened by the shock due to the previous derailment of the car. But evidently there was here no intervening responsible cause. In Knapp v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 91, 54 Am. Rep. 1, 21 N. W. 198, 71 Iowa, 41, 32 N. W. 18, it was held that, where the defendant's negligence in failing to keep its track in repair caused a locomotive engine in charge of the plaintiff to leave the track, and brought about the occasion for plaintiff to reverse the lever in order to arrest the movement of the engine and avert the dangers incident to such an accident, the negligence of the company was the proximate cause of an injury to the engineer, due to his effort in thus reversing the engine. Here 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) it is apparent the defective condition of the track brought about the very necessity to act under an emergency which was the cause of the injury. But in the case before us there was no emergency, no occasion to act in one way rather than in another. The derailling of the train in the Knapp Case necessitated one specific act on the part of the engineer,—that is, the throwing back of the lever to reverse the engine,—while in this case the derailling of the car necessitated no act whatever as an immediate consequence, and left the plaintiff free to do whatever he might see fit toward obviating the inconvenience resulting from the derailment. He could have unloaded his car and pulled it back upon the track, or he might have secured more assistance, so that it could be put on the track without using the prop as a pry, or he might have secured some other implement than the prop by means of which he and those helping him could have replaced the car upon the track. He might act promptly, or he might act with the greatest deliberation and foresight. There was no emergency and no necessary connection between the result of the defective track and the means to be employed for remedying the condition which had arisen by reason of such defect. In speaking of an adequate and independent intervening cause, as cutting off the connection between a negligent act and a subsequent injury, it is not proper to require that the intervening cause to be searched for be one involving negligence or wrong. When an adequate intervening cause is found, it is immaterial whether that cause is one involving liability or not. It is enough that it is an independent, responsible cause. 1 Thomp. Neg. § 54. Or, if we adopt the view which Judge Thompson prefers, that the proximate cause is the probable cause and the remote cause is the improbable cause (1 Thomp. Neg. § 50), we are still wholly without support for the position of counsel for appellant, for no result of a defective track could be more improbable or further beyond the anticipation of a reasonable man than that in attempting to replace a car derailed by reason of such defect the miner would have his fingers pinched between the end of the car and a prop which somebody should bring to assist in "slewing" the car onto the track, and which should thereafter be dropped where the car would drive the miner's hand against it. Of course it is not necessary, as said in many cases, that the proximate result be one which could be anticipated in detail, but how much further could anyone have foreseen or anticipated the course of events following a defective track than that a car should, by reason of the defect, run off the track, and perhaps cause injury to someone before the force its momentum could be fully checked? reach the conclusion, therefore, that there was no causal relation between the injury to plaintiff and the negligence of the defendant in allowing that portion of the track extending toward and into the room where plaintiff was at work, and for the maintenance of which it was responsible, to be out of repair.

But counsel further insist that there was negligence on the part of defendant represented by the pit boss as vice principal in connection with the replacing of the car upon the track, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover on account of such negligence. Without discussing in this connection the questions of contributory negligence or assumption of risk which are referred to in arguments of counsel, it is sufficient to say that the defendant company is chargeable with no duty in regard to placing this car upon the track. It did place plaintiff the duty of furnishing him a place to work at the place of the accident, and, if he had been injured by his running off the track, then, no doubt, the company would have been liable, barring, of course, contributory negligence or assumption of risk; but he was not injured by one of his cars running off the track, therefore the duty of furnishing him a place to work was not involved. There is no duty to furnish him tools and appliances which was broken, for the car was in any way defective, and, as to the effort of the prop to pry it back on the track, the use was entirely within the plaintiff's action. There seems to have been no duty on the company to furnish miners with all appliances for getting the cars upon the track after they should, for any reason, run off. Witnesses testified that under such circumstances, if the car is lightly loaded, the miner lifts it back himself; heavily loaded, he unloads it, or gets one to assist him, or in whatever way is available, and at his own discretion and risk, he accomplishes the replacement of the car.

It is further urged that the pit boss negligently directed the plaintiff to place himself in front of the car, and to lift, in order to place the car upon the track; but in respect the pit boss was certainly not negligent as vice principal. From the evidence, it would appear to be that the pit boss was anxious to have as much coal out as possible, and urged plaintiff to move cars in this room where he had usually been at work, and run them out, so induce him to do this over a track which required greater exertions than usual offered to furnish him assistance; but assistance thus furnished him was the A.(N.S.) assistance of a coemployee, and not of a vice principal. Such assistance was furnished on a previous day under somewhat similar circumstances by a driver, and on the day in question by the pit boss himself; but the fact that the pit boss was for some purposes a vice principal did not necessarily make him a vice principal in everything which he did. If he acted as an operative only, the liability of his master for his acts was not other or different from that which would result with reference to the acts of any other operative. Collingwood v. Illinois & I. Fuel Co. 125 Iowa, 537, 101 N. W. 283; McQueeney v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 120 Iowa, 522, 94 N. W. 1124; Fosburg v. Phillips Fuel Co. 93 Iowa, 54, 61 N. W. 400; Beresford v. American Coal Co. 124 Iowa, 34, 70 L.R.A. 256, 98 N. W. 902; Barnicle v. Connor, 110 Iowa, 238, 81 N. W. 452; Scott v. Chicago, G. W. R. Co. 113 Iowa, 381, 85 N. W. 631.

There was entire failure of plaintiff to make out any negligence on the part of defendant, proximately contributing to plaintiff's injury, and the judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

HUNT BROTHERS COMPANY et al,
Appts.,
v.

SAN LORENZO WATER COMPANY.

Water company—failure to furnish water—damages.

Breach of a contract to connect property with a water main and erect a hydrant for its protection from fire does not, where no time is fixed when delivery of the water shall commence, render the company liable for the value of the property in case it is destroyed by fire for want of water to extinguish it, since such injury cannot be reasonably supposed to have been in contemplation of the parties as the result of the breach.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alameda County

Note.—The above case, and the following one of FREEMAN v. MACON GASLIGHT & WATER Co., illustrate the rule suggested in the note to Mugge v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1171, that the liability in tort of a water company for injuries to a consumer on account of its breach of its public duty to furnish a water supply depends upon the right of the consumer to maintain the action because of his contract relation with the water company.

in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the value of property alleged to have been destroyed by fire through defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Van Ness & Redman for appellants.

Messrs. E. S. Pillsbury, Alfred Sutro, and Pillsbury, Madison, & Sutro for respondent.

Angellotti, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment given in favor of defendant; a demurrer to plaintiffs' amended complaint having been sustained, and plaintiffs having failed to amend.

The action was brought to recover $124,496.98, damages, resulting from the destruction of certain property, the injury to other property, and a loss of profits from an established business, all occasioned by a fire, which occurred on April 12, 1901, which fire occurred without any fault on the part of plaintiffs. The corporation, Hunt Brothers Company, which will hereafter be called the plaintiff, was the owner of all said property. The numerous other plaintiffs were insurance companies which had, at the time of the fire, policies in force covering, respectively, various portions of said property, insuring plaintiff against loss by fire, and which had paid plaintiff upon said policies, on account of said loss, amounts aggregating $91,221.42, and, having received assignments from plaintiff of its claim against defendant to the extent of the amount so paid by them, are here endeavoring to collect the amount paid by them, from defendant. The plaintiff was engaged in the business of fruit canning, packing, manufacturing cans, storage of fruits, canned goods, etc. The property injured and destroyed consisted of certain buildings used and occupied in the conduct of said business, machinery, and other implements used in such business, and the stock on hand, and 74 cottages occupied by employees of plaintiff. All this property was situated on certain premises occupied by plaintiff in Hayward, Alameda county, California. The allegations of the complaint upon which it is sought to hold defendant liable for the amount of this loss are substantially as follows: Defendant was a water company, engaged in the business of supplying water to the inhabitants of Hayward by means of mains laid in the streets of the town, and pipes running therefrom to the premises of its customers. Some time between September, 1900, and March, 1901, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement, whereby defendant agreed to lay a 6-inch main from one of its mains charged and supplied with water, to a point near one corner of plaintiff's premises, to connect said premises with this new main by a service pipe, and to thereupon supply plaintiff, by means thereof, with 100,000 cubic feet of water annually, at the rate of 25 cents per 100 cubic feet, and as much more as might be required at 20 cents per 100 cubic feet; plaintiff agreeing to consume annually 100,000 cubic feet, and pay for it at the 25-cent rate. Defendant further agreed that it would erect and install a fire hydrant near said premises, to be used by plaintiff in case the premises should take fire, and connect the same with said main, and supply plaintiff, by means thereof, with water for the purpose of extinguishing any fire which might occur on said premises, in consideration of the payment by plaintiff to defendant of $2.75 a month, which plaintiff agreed to pay. No time was specified for the commencement or completion of this work. Defendant laid the new main to a point near one corner of plaintiff's premises, as agreed, but failed to install the service pipe or the fire hydrant. On March 14, 1901, plaintiff remonstrated with defendant because of its failure to do these things, and defendant, on March 15, 1901, promised in writing that it would "immediately commence the work" of putting in the service pipe to connect the premises with the main, and also that it would "immediately commence the work" of erecting and installing said fire hydrant and connecting the same with the main. It failed to commence to do either of these things prior to the fire.

It is alleged that, if defendant had commenced the work of connecting said premises with the main, and the work of erecting, installing, and connecting the fire hydrant, as it had agreed to do, and had prosecuted said work to an end with ordinary diligence, said premises would have been so connected and said fire hydrant installed and connected and ready for use in March, 1901; and that, if said hydrant had been so installed and connected at the time of the fire, said fire could and would have been extinguished, by means of the water which would have thereby become available, before it had damaged the property to the extent of $5,000; and that therefore the additional loss and damage were wholly due to defendant's neglect and failure to comply with the terms of its agreement. We are satisfied that the damages alleged cannot be recovered as a consequence of the breach of contract alleged. In so saying we do not dispute the proposition, made by learned counsel for appellant, to the effect that a failure to furnish water, under contract requiring one to do so, may, under some circumstances, entitle the other to the contract to recover, as damages for such breach of contract, the value of such of his property destroyed by fire could have been saved by the water, had been furnished in accordance with the contract. We have examined the cases cited in other states by counsel upon this position, and find that with practical similarity they appear to support the conclusion that the circumstances may be such to make the person who agreed to furnish water for the extinguishment of fires liable for the failure to furnish it as it is, in the value of such property destroyed by fire as would have been saved by water, if it had been furnished. New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Meridian Water Co. 18 C. C. A. 519, 30 U. S. App. 2 Fed. 227; Middlesex Water Co. v. Mann Whiting Co. 64 N. J. L. 240, 49 572, 81 Am. St. Rep. 467, 45 Atl. Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Supply Co. 89 Ky. 340, 7 L.R.A. 77, 12 St. Rep. 536, 12 S. W. 554, 13 S. : Gorrell v. Greensboro Water Supply 124 N. C. 328, 46 L.R.A. 513, 70 Rep. 598, 32 S. E. 720; Planters' L. v. Monroe Waterworks & Light Co. 124 N. C. 243, 27 So. 684; Lenzen Braunfels, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 335, 35 441; Atkinson v. Newcastle & Glasgow Co. L. R. 6 Exch. 404. See Ukiah City v. Ukiah Water & Improv. Cal. 173, 179, 64 L.R.A. 231, 100 Rep. 107, 75 Pac. 773.

Cases cited are, however, all cases in which the contract had been executed to the installing and commencing the contracted service, and the respective parties to the contract were acting thereon. One purporting to supply water for a purpose designated by the contract, the extinguishment of fires, and receiving agreed consideration therefor, whether paying for such service, and upon the continued observance of the contract by the water company as a promise to prevent such fires as might occur on the premises. As to such a situation, it has been said, as was, in fact, said in the cases cited, that, in view of the fact that water may be supplied in such a manner as to usually extinguish fire before serious damage is done, it may be promptly and efficiently used, it may be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties that the result would be the probable result of complying with the contract at the time a fire occurred. It could only be a theory that one party would pay for the continuance of the service for fire purposes, and the other receive the sums so paid. And it is solely by reason of the fact that, in such cases, damage by fire may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties as a consequence of a breach of the contract to furnish water, that the liability for such damage may be held to attach; for it certainly cannot be held that any such liability would exist for the breach of a contract to simply furnish water for no particular designated purpose, or for designated purposes not including the extinguishment of fires, even although it might be that, if there had been no breach, the fire would have been extinguished in its incipiency by the water furnished, and such breach therefore would have been indirectly and remotely the cause of the loss. The law of damages does not concern itself with such remote causes. As said in Martin v. Deetz, 102 Cal. 55, 68, 41 Am. St. Rep. 151, 36 Pac. 368, 372: "Remote results, produced by intermediate sequences of causes, are beyond the reach of any just and practicable rule of damages." Field, in his work on Damages (§ 10), says: "To trace remote effects of causes would often be a difficult, if not an impossible, task. It would require an infinite mind. Each cause produces results that in turn, alone or by combination with other causes, produces other effects, and so ad infinitum. It is a subject too abstruse and complicated for the human mind. In the quaint language of Lord Bacon: 'It were infinite for the law to consider the cause of causes, and their impulsion one on another.'" No case cited goes to the extent of holding that one may be liable for a breach of contract to furnish water, in the value of property destroyed by a fire, unless the case was such that damage of this kind might reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties to the contract as a consequence of a breach thereof; and, in the case of Beck v. Kittanning Water Co. 8 Pa. 237, 11 Atl. 300, it was expressly declared that, as the plaintiff, who had a contract for water for general use, had no contract with the defendant for a supply of water for the extinguishment of fire, he had no cause of action on his contract for damages resulting from destruction of his property by fire.

It is the well-settled general rule of damages for any breach of contract that the damages that can be recovered for a breach are only such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract, as the probable result of a breach. Other damages are too remote. In this lies the distinction between damages for breach of contract and damages for tort; the rule as to tort being that the injured person may recover for all detriment proximately caused thereby, "whether it could have been anticipated or not." Section 3333, Civ. Code. Such, as we understand it, is the rule declared by § 3300 of the Civil Code, as that section has always been construed by this court; and it is the rule enunciated in the leading case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, which has been universally accepted and followed. See Mitchell v. Clarke, 71 Cal. 165, 60 Am. Rep. 529, 11 Pac. 882. As has often been suggested by writers upon this subject, the remote effects of slight causes are so beyond all possible conception of the parties to a contract, both in character and extent, that any other rule would practically preclude the making of contracts altogether, for no sane person could be expected to assume such uncertain and limitless liability. This rule does not mean that the parties should actually have contemplated the very consequence that occurred, but simply that the consequence for which compensation is sought must be such as the parties may be reasonably supposed, in the light of all the facts known, or which should have been known to them, to have considered as likely to follow in the ordinary course of things, from a breach, and therefore to have, in effect, stipulated against. The understanding and intention of the parties in this regard must, of course, be ascertained from the language of the contract, in the light of such facts. See Sutherland, Damages, § 45.

Where a contract calls for the continuance of an instituted water service for the purpose of extinguishing fires, loss by fire as the consequence of a breach, may, as already suggested, be reasonably supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties. This may also be true in the event of such a service contracted to be commenced at a certain definite time in the future, especially if the special circumstances are such as to make it essential that the particular protection from fire to be thereby afforded should commence at that time, and those circumstances were made known to the person or company contracting to furnish the service. As to this, however, it is not necessary here to decide. The contract here alleged was, in effect, first, to lay and install certain pipes through which water for general use might be supplied, and to install one fire hydrant, through which water for use in the event of fire might be supplied; and, second, such pipes and fire hydrant having been installed, thereupon to commence supplying water for those purposes, and to continue supplying it at certain prescribed rates. No time whatever was prescribed for the completion of the work essential to the furnishing of such water, or for the commencement of the water service, except that it was to commence upon the installation of the necessary pipes and hydrant. We attach no importance to the subsequent "promise" of March 15, 1901, on the part of defendant, that it would "immediately commence the work" essential to the installing of the service for the various purposes designated. Giving this additional promise full force as a part of the contract between the parties, there was therein no undertaking on the part of the defendant that the work so to be commenced would be completed and the water service instituted at any certain, definite time. There was no allegation whatever as to any special circumstances known to defendant, or, for that matter, to plaintiff, making it essential to the protection of the property from fire that the contemplated service should be commenced within any particular time. The case presented, then, is one where the parties simply agreed upon the installation and commencement of a water service for various purposes, including one hydrant to be used for the extinguishment of possible fires, upon the installation and commencement of which the plaintiff was to commence paying, at certain prescribed rates, for the water furnished; no definite time for the commencement of such service being fixed, and no special circumstance appearing, by reason of which it might be anticipated that it was essential to the protection of plaintiff's property from fire that the service should be commenced within any particular time, or, as plaintiff claims, within a reasonable time.

Under such circumstances, it appears very clear to us that damage by fire to plaintiff's property cannot reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties, as possible to be caused by a failure on the part of defendant to commence the water service agreed upon. The plaintiff not having stipulated for the limited protection against fire, to be furnished thereby, to commence at or within any particular time, and, under the terms of the contract, paying for such protection only from the time of the actual commencement thereof, could not, until the actual commencement of the service, be considered as relying on such protection, or on the commencement thereof at any particular time, in the slightest degree, and there was nothing to warrant even a supposition on the part of defendant that plaintiff did so rely. The utmost that can be reasonably contended to have been within the contemplation of the parties in this regard was that, when at some future indefinite time the hydrant had been installed, and the service actually commenced, water would thenceforth be available, by means of the hydrant, for the extinguishment of possible fires, and that failure to then have it so available, in event of a fire, might cause damage to plaintiff's property. This was the full effect of the contract of the parties, and the parties could not be understood as stipulating for such protection prior to the actual commencement of the service. This, so, whatever might be the proper measure of damage for a breach of contract failing to install the service within a reasonable time, loss of property by fire could not be an element thereof. Until the actual assumption of the duty of such protection, damage by fire could not be held to be within the contemplation of the parties as a possible consequence of a breach, and in no legal sense of the words such damage be held to have been caused by the breach alleged, although, if it had not been for such breach, water would have been available for the extinguishment of the fire. The case is not in principle from one where water was furnished by contract for other than fire purposes, and a fire occurs which could have been extinguished by such water if it had been available, but, owing to some failure of the person furnishing the water, no water was available, and the property is damaged.

As already stated, although in the case the breach is, in one sense of the word, a cause of the loss, there could be no recovery, for the water company has assumed the duty of protecting the property from fire, and loss by fire is, therefore, damage possible, within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, although water was ultimately not furnished for fire purposes, the defendant is not, under the terms of its contract, assumed the duty of so protecting plaintiff's property at the time of the of the opinion that the amended complaint did not show any damage for which recovery might be had, and that the case was therefore properly sustained. The judgment is affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

M. R. FREEMAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
MACON GAS LIGHT & WATER COMPANY.

Water company cutting off supply—damages.

When a private corporation, in the exercise of a franchise granted by a municipal corporation pursuant to a statute, which conferred upon it the right to use the streets of the city on condition that it will therein lay its main and furnish the municipality and its inhabitants with a supply of water at fixed tolls, engages in the business of supplying the general public with water, it becomes liable as a public-service corporation for its wrongful act in cutting off the supply of water which it is under a duty to furnish to one of its patrons as a member of the public at large. Unless the agents of the company knew of the illness of a member of the consumer's family, this fact cannot be relied on by him as an aggravating circumstance; nor can he recover damages on the mere allegation "that another member of his family was suffering from a painful illness."

E'ROR to the City Court of Macon to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's alleged wrongful act in cutting off a supply of water to plaintiff's property. Reversed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

A petition was filed by M. R. Freeman against the Macon Gas Light & Water Company, a corporation alleged to be engaged in the business of furnishing gas and water to the residents of the city of Macon, and having "a monopoly of such business in said city." The complaint of the plaintiff was that on May 26, 1905, the defendant company, without giving him any notice, and "without legal cause," cut off the supply of water from his premises, at a time when he was sick in bed, and another member of the family was suffering from a painful illness, subjecting him to great indignity, annoyance, and inconvenience, and imperiling the health and lives of the members of his household. By way of inducement the plaintiff alleged that on November 26, 1891, the company entered into a twenty-year contract with the city, whereby the company bound itself not to cut off the water supply from any customer or consumer except after five days' notice in writing, duly served on such consumer or customer, and this was one of the rules established by the company; that, prior to May 26, 1905, he had the water fixtures in his residence connected with the public water mains of the company, which are laid in the streets of the city, and used the water furnished by the company for all domestic purposes, this being the only water supply which the city authorities permitted householders to use; and that the defendant, by cutting off this supply, wilfully deprived petitioner's entire household of an absolute necessity which could be obtained nowhere else. The plaintiff characterized the action of the company as "illegal and oppressive," and alleged that he had been thereby damaged in the sum of $2,500. The defendant demurred to the petition, on the ground that no cause of action was set forth, and also upon the following special grounds: (1) The allegation that the company has a monopoly of the business is irrelevant and impertinent. (2) Plaintiff fails to show under what contract with the company he had the fixtures in his residence connected with its mains, or by what right, or what relation he bore to the company, or what duty it owed him. (3) The terms of the contract between the city and the company are not plainly and fully set forth, nor the rules referred to in the petition. (4) The plaintiff has no right to sue upon that contract there being no privity between him and the company, and he having no right to complain of any violation of the contract. (5) The allegation that the company cut off the plaintiff's water supply "without legal cause" is a mere conclusion, and he should allege "what cause there was and why the same was not legal," so that the court might determine whether the same was a legal cause. (6) That another member of the plaintiff's family was ill is irrelevant, he not having any right to recover any damages because of this fact; nor can he recover anything under the allegation that the company imperiled the health and lives of his entire household. (7) No facts are alleged showing special damage, and the plaintiff does not show in what manner he has suffered damage in the sum of $2,500. By way of amendment, the plaintiff attached to his petition a copy of the contract between the city and the defendant, which recited that it was entered into by virtue of the act approved September 29, 1891 (Acts 1891, § 14, p. 573), amending the charter of the city of Macon, and also a copy of the rules which he asserted had been promulgated by the company, and published as those under which it dealt with the city and its other patrons. He further alleged that this contract was designed in part for the protection of the private consumers in the city who were not permitted to have wells; that the company enjoyed a valuable franchise granted by the city on condition that it would furnish water to the city and its citizens in accordance with the terms of the contract, so that the company owed a public duty to every consumer to conduct its business according to the terms of its contract and the rules published by it; that the company utterly disregarded the public duty, which it owed to plaintiff as a citizen, head of a family, householder, and housekeeper, and as "a customer who had, with defendant's full consent, connected his water pipes with the pipes of defendant;" and that, at the time the company committed the grievous wrongs complained of, he did not owe the company any amount whatever as a consumer of water, and the cutting off of his water supply was "wantonly and wilfully done with full knowledge of the fact. By another amendment the plaintiff set up that the "defendant owed to petitioner a distinct duty not to do and commit the wrongs complained of," whereby he had been damaged in the sum originally named, as well as in the further sum of $1, which he had been forced to pay for labor in having supply turned on after it had been wrongfully cut off by the defendant. After the plaintiff had amended his pleadings, as above stated, the company pressed its demurrer, and the court passed an order, reciting that the general and special grounds of demurrer were sustained. To this order, exception is taken.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When a private corporation undertakes to supply water to a municipality and its inhabitants for toll, it enters upon a public service. 1 Farnham, Waters, § 162. The business and purpose for which a watersupply company is incorporated are of such a public character as to make it a quasi-public corporation. City Water Co. v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 259; Foster v. Fowler, 60 Pa. 27. In order to effectually carry out its purposes, valuable franchises in the use and occupation of the city's streets and alleys are granted, and the corporation assumes the obligation of giving adequate service to the public at large. These features of its business stamp its character as a public-service corporation, and it will be liable as such in the conduct of its undertaking, under a contract authorized by a stat-of the state, to supply the city and its inhabitants with water. In its general characteristics a water company which accepts a franchise conferring upon it the right to use the city's streets on condition that it shall serve the public by furnishing the necessary water supply may be likened to a street-way corporation to which has been granted a franchise to occupy the streets of the city, and engage in transporting passengers for hire. Each would owe certain duties to the public, and would become liable to an action for its failure to perform, to his injury, service which it was under a duty to render to him as a member of the general public. For a breach of its public duty the city could recover nominal damages, or, if circumstances so warranted, punitive damages, and also such special damages as might proximately flow from the breach and sustained by him. What we have just said in no way conflicts with the principle established in Fowler v. Athens City Water-works Co. 83 Ga. 219, 20 Am. St. Rep. 313, 5 S. 673. There the water company was held to be held liable to a private citizen for a failure to perform a duty owing to the municipality, under a contract which required it an adequate supply of water for fire protection. The city, in the exercise of its governmental functions, undertook to its citizens adequate fire protection,— —itself laying mains and maintaining a water-supply plant, but by hiring one Robinson to do so. No franchise of any kind was granted to Robinson, nor did he in any way obligate himself to serve the public at large, and it was not contended that the water company had any power under its charter by way of contract or otherwise, to impose upon him any public duty towards its citizens. Accordingly, the decision in this case was put upon the ground that there was no privity of contract between the city and the assignee of Robinson (the water company), and that, in the absence of any statutory provision, the contract between the city raised no public duty towards any of its inhabitants to furnish them an adequate supply of water for fire protection. In the present case, it affirmatively appears that the contract relied on by the plaintiff was made in pursuance of express authority conferred by the legislature upon the municipality to grant a franchise upon certain terms, one of which was that consumers should be furnished water at a price to be fixed by the city in the contract. See amendment to charter, Acts 1888, p. 573. The water company, by entering into the contract which the city lawfully authorized the city to make with the company, accepted the privilege of supplying the citizens of that city, as such, with water upon certain terms, and became a public-service corporation with an express statutory duty to perform. This duty the company owed to every private consumer of water, independently of any contract duty it owed to the municipality itself, considered as a municipal corporation engaged in the discharge of governmental functions. For a breach of this statutory duty, the company could be held liable in tort by the aggrieved member of the public, though he was no party to the contract between the city and the water company. A private person may not only sue a public-service corporation for a breach of duty owing to him, but he may by mandamus even enforce the performance by the corporation of its public duty as to matters in which he has a special interest. Savannah & O. Canal Co. v. Shuman, 91 Ga. 400, 44 Am. St. Rep. 43, 17 S. E. 937. The petition, as amended, set forth a cause of action sounding in tort, and the particular tort alleged was a wilful breach by the defendant company of a public duty which it owed to the plaintiff as a consumer of the water it undertook to supply to the inhabitants of the city. The suit is not based on the contract between the water company and the city; this contract is simply alleged by way of inducement, for the purpose of establishing the nature and scope of the duties and liabilities of the company relatively to the general public. It is clear, therefore, that the action should not have been dismissed on general demurrer.

The objection raised by special demurrer to the allegation that the water company had a monopoly in its business of supplying the public with water was without merit. The term "monopoly" was not used in an offensive sense, or with the purpose of insinuating that the company was not conducting a legitimate business, but with a view to setting forth the pertinent fact that the company had the exclusive privilege of supplying the city and its inhabitants with water, and for this reason the plaintiff was wholly dependent upon the company for his supply of water. The assertion that the company cut off his supply "without legal cause" was an allegation to the effect that the company, without any justification, wrongfully discontinued to serve him; it was not a mere conclusion of law, nor was the plaintiff under any obligation to elaborate his pleading as to this matter. In the absence of an averment that the defendant knew that another member of the plaintiff's family was ill at the time the water was cut off, this fact could not be relied on by the plaintiff as an aggravating circumstance connected with the wrong complained of; nor was it pertinent that the action of the company imperiled the health and lives of his entire household, the plaintiff having no right to damages for any injury or inconvenience the members of his family may have suffered, independently of that he sustained as a consumer in being deprived of his means of providing himself and his household with water for domestic uses. To this extent, the special demurrer was properly sustained. It was not, however, incumbent on the plaintiff, as the defendant urged by way of special demurrer, to specifically state the manner in which he computed his damage to be in the amount sued for. All a pleader is required to state are the facts upon which he relies for a recovery, when general damages are claimed; though, when special damages are averred, it is necessary for him to specify the particular items for which he sues. From the very nature of things, general damages are incapable of segregation into different items.

In his amendment the plaintiff did allege special damages in the sum of $1, the cost of restoring the water connection; and, in all other respects, the amended petition met the special objections pointed out in the demurrer, in so far as these objections were well taken.

Judgment reversed.

ELLA DANIELS, Admr., etc., of John Daniels, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

LOUISA A. CARNEY.

(— Ala. —, 42 So. 452.)

Steamboat — negligent operation — allegations of complaint.

1. A complaint in an action to hold the owner of a steamship liable for negligence in its operation so as to cause the capsizing of a small boat by the waves generated by it after knowledge of the peril of the small boat must allege not only that the small boat was actually seen by those in charge of the steamboat, it not being sufficient to allege that it was in plain sight of them, but also that the peril was known to them.

Same—duty to avoid injury.

2. Those in charge of a steamship creating waves which endanger the lives of the occupants of a small boat near it are bound to stop the normal operation of their boat until the small boat has passed out of the zone of danger.

Same—complaint—allegation of authority.

3. The complaint in an action to hold the owner of a steamship liable for injuries caused to the occupants of a small boat by its negligent management must allege that at the time of the accident those in charge of the boat were acting within the scope and line of their authority.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Mobile County sustaining demurrers to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fitts & Stout, for appellant:

The prior negligence of the small boat's crew in going into the place of danger is necessarily a remote cause.

When large steamers proceed up or down a river at a speed dangerous to small craft, Case Note.—Duty of steamer to avoid imperiling small boat by swells: — Steamers are generally held liable for injury caused to smaller craft by swells or waves created by navigating at a high rate of speed (The Tiger Lily, 11 Fed. 744; The Drew, 22 Fed. 852; The Monmouth, 44 Fed. 809; The Connecticut, 45 Fed. 374; The Havana, 100 Fed. 857; The Kaiser Wilhelm Der Grosse, 134 Fed. 1012. Reversed on other grounds in 76 C. C. A. 374. 145 Fed. 623; The Asbury Park, 138 Fed. 617. Affirmed in 71 C. C. A. 684. 142 Fed. 1037; The Asbury Park, 138 Fed. 925; The Asbury Park, 147 Fed. 194. Reversing 136 Fed. 269); or at full speed (The Columbia, 55 Fed. 766. Affirmed in 9 C. C. A. 455, 17 U. S. App. 508, 61 Fed. 220; The Rhode Island, 24 Fed. 295; Ross v. Central R. Co. 146 Fed. 608); or at an unnecessary rate of speed (The Southfield, 19 Fed. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 841); or faster than customary (The Majestic, 44 Fed. 813. Affirmed in 1 C. C. A. 78, 1 U. S. App. 16, 48 Fed. 730).

Especially is this true when it appears that, by reducing the steamer's speed to a reasonable degree, dangerous swells may be avoided. Ross v. Central R. Co. supra.

It is the steamer's duty to slow down when passing so near a small boat that the displacement waves may endanger its safety. De Lelle v. The Atalanta, 34 Fed. 918; The Columbia, 9 C. C. A. 455, 17 U. S. App. 508, 61 Fed. 220. Affirming 55 Fed. 766.

And she must use all reasonable precaution to avoid doing damage to the smaller boat (The Tiger Lily; The Drew; and The Southfield.—supra; The Rotherfield, 123 Fed. 460); or, as stated in some of the cases, she must use the customary and requisite precaution (The Monmouth and The Maand cause such swells that barges or other small craft are sunk, they are liable.

The fact that the steamer's displacement waves do not render the navigation of small boats more perilous than would a high wind does not relieve the steamer of her duty to slow down or stop her machinery, if necessary. The Monmouth, supra; The Majestic, 1 C. C. A. 78, 1 U. S. App. 16, 48 Fed. 730.

Where the danger from the swells to the smaller craft is seen, or should be seen, and it can be avoided only by stopping the propeller or paddle wheels, this then becomes the duty of the steamer. The New York, 34 Fed. 757; The St. Paul, 124 Fed. 103.

When the danger is signaled to the steamer, she is bound to use not merely one means, but all reasonable means, in her power that may be in fact necessary to avoid it. The Drew, supra.

But a large raft of boats in tow in broad daylight is not required to signal the steamer. The Monmouth and The Columbia, supra.

The steamer is bound to know the effect of her swell. The Rotherfield, supra; The Asbury Park, 138 Fed. 925.

She is also bound to know the extent of her swell, and to pass at a distance far enough off to prevent injury from it, when there is room for her to do so. The Drew, supra.

And she is bound to know the depth of water in a narrow channel where she overtakes and attempts to pass a tow of boats, and the amount of suction and swell she would create by passing in such water; if she cannot pass in that place without causing injury by her swell, she is bound to wait until beyond the narrow place. The C. H. Northam, 7 Ben. 249, Fed. Cas. No. 2,689, Affirmed in 13 Blatchf. 31, Fed. Cas. No. 2,690.

In The Daniel Drew, 13 Blatchf. 523, Fed. Cas. No. 3,565, it was held that, if an overtaking steamer in prudent navigation creates such swell and suction as are to be expected in the ordinary navigation of a rapid vessel, equipped and constructed in a suitable manner; and if the overtaking steamer has no reason to apprehend that she will do an injury, and a tow is injured thereby,—the overtaking steamer is not responsible.

In the preceding case it was said that there is no law which prescribes how much swell a steamer may cause; and that a large vessel is not, under all circumstances, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the steamboat could have prevented running over him and injuring him, it was their duty to do so.

absolutely liable for an injury caused by its swells to an inferior vessel.

The rule laid down in the preceding case was quoted in Bell v. New Jersey S. B. Co. 54 App. Div. 526, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1031, and the court held that, while it was proper to charge that it is the duty of a steam vessel passing near docks, or other mooring places, to pass at such a rate of speed that no danger will be likely to result from her swells, provided she has timely notice of the presence of other vessels at such docks as are likely to be damaged from the suction and swells, it was error to charge that, in navigating rivers where small boats are accustomed to ply and may be reasonably expected, a steamboat is bound to navigate with caution and at a rate of speed sufficiently slow to avoid danger from her attending swells.

The court, however, in The Asbury Park, 144 Fed. 553, refused to follow the doctrine of the Daniel Drew Case, and held the steamer liable for the damage done by her swells, although she reduced her speed.

In Fawcett v. The Natchez, 3 Woods, 16, Fed. Cas. No. 4,703, it was held that river steamers have the right to follow the usual channels, and that it is incumbent on those who have rafts, barges, or other water craft moored to the banks to foresee and provide against accidents liable to result from the swell of passing steamers.

But in The Morrisania, 13 Blatchf. 512, Fed. Cas. No. 9,838, it was held that, where the channel at the place of passing was over 1,000 feet wide, and open to the steamer's navigation to that width, and she passed so near and at such a rate of speed that the swell she created injured a bark securely fastened to a pier, she was liable for the damage.

In The Majestic, 1 C. C. A. 78, 1 U. S. App. 16, 48 Fed. 730, Reversing 44 Fed. 813, on this point, it was held that, where those in charge of an overtaken small boat saw and knew the threatening character of the approaching wave, and had time to turn stern to it, they were not in fault for failure so to turn.

In The Newcastle, 147 Fed. 534, it was held that, unless the damage done to the small boat can be directly traced to the improper conduct of the steamer, the latter cannot be held liable.

As to the relative duties of steamers and small craft propelled by oars on rivers and in narrow channels, see note in 5 L.R.A. (N. S.) 303.

The steamboat had no paramount and unrestricted right to navigate our water highways.

Dowdell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint as originally filed contained two counts, and was afterwards amended by the addition of the third count, which latter count was subsequently amended. The complaint was demurred to, both as originally filed and as amended, which demurrers being sustained by the court, the plaintiff declined to further plead, and thereupon judgment was rendered for the defendant, from which judgment the present appeal is prosecuted. The court's ruling on the demurrers constitutes the basis of the first four assignments of error; the fifth and last assignment being based on the final judgment rendered.

The suit is to recover damages for personal injury, resulting in the death of plaintiff's intestate by drowning, through the negligence of defendant's servants in the operation of defendant's steamboat, causing the small boat in which plaintiff's intestate was riding to be capsized in Mobile river. The theory of plaintiff's case is that the death of plaintiff's intestate was the proximate result of the failure of defendant's servants to exercise due care in the operation of defendant's steamboat after the discovery of the peril of said intestate. There is no pretense of any prior negligence in the operation of said steamboat whereby the accident resulted. On the contrary, it is averred that the steamboat was being operated in the usual and normal way. The theory, as well as the insistence in argument, of plaintiff's counsel, is that it was the duty of the servants, after the discovery of the peril, to cease the normal operation of the steamboat, by stopping the revolution of the propeller or paddle wheels of said boat, in order to prevent the creation of waves; which, it is alleged, caused the swamping or capsizing of the small boat in which said intestate was riding.

To charge one with subsequent negligence, there must exist a prior knowledge on the part of the defendant of the peril of the person injured. The first count of the complaint, in counting on the failure of the defendant's servant or servants to exercise due care by the stopping of the revolutions of the paddle wheels of the said steamboat to prevent the creation of a succession of large waves, was defective, and subject to demurrer, in not averring knowledge on the part of the servant of the peril of the deceased, which knowledge was necessary to impose the duty claimed under the facts and circumstances stated. The count avers that the small boat, with its occupants, in which the intestate was riding, was plainly visible to defendant's servants. This may all be true, and yet the small boat, with its occupants, may not, as a matter of fact, have been seen by defendant's servants. To say that an object was plainly visible is not the equivalent to saying that it was seen. Such an averment leaves the main fact, that of actually seeing, and hence a knowledge on the part of defendant's servants of the perilous situation of plaintiff's intestate, to rest merely in inference. Good pleading requires that the facts which constitute the cause of action relied on should be stated in the complaint, and not left to inference. Facts, when averred, may be established inferentially from other facts shown in evidence; but this is a rule of evidence, and not of pleading. In pleading, the facts themselves, whether they are to be established directly or inferentially, should be stated. The second count, while it avers that the small boat, with its occupants, was seen by the defendant's servants and in time to avoid the injury, does not aver that the peril of the deceased was an obvious one, or that it was known to defendant's servants. By the pleading this latter fact was left merely in inference, which rendered the count faulty. Both the first and second counts were, for the reasons above stated, subject to demurrer.

By the amendment of the third count the defects above pointed out were met and obviated by proper averments. The Mobile river is navigable water and a public highway, and, under the law, the right to navigate the same is equally guaranteed to everyone. Const. 1901, § 24; Code 1896, § 2515. The exercise and enjoyment of this right is as much guaranteed to the small craft as to the great steamer. Each one owes the other the duty of the observance of due care, so as to avoid inflicting wrong and injury upon the other. Injury resulting from the violation of this duty, whether intentional or through negligence, carries with it the legal responsibility of answering in damages. Foster v. Holly, 38 Ala. 76. The defendant's servants, in the operation of the steamboat, whereby large waves were created by its propeller or paddle wheels, sufficient to swamp or capsize a smaller boat in passing, thereby endangering the lives of the occupants of the small boat, owed to the latter the duty of avoiding the danger, by ceasing the normal operation of the steamer and stopping the revolution of its paddle wheels or propeller, until the smaller boat had passed without the zone of danger of waves from the larger boat. This principle seems to be settled both upon reason and authority. De Lelle v. The Atalanta, 34 Fed. 918; The New York, 34 Fed. 757; The Southfield, 19 Fed. 841; The Kaiser Wilhelm Der Grosse, 134 Fed. 1012. In Wright v. Brown, 4 Ind. 95, 58 Am. Dec. 622, where a small craft was caught by the swell of a passing steamer, the case was considered just as though there had been a collision, and the court said: "We shall consider this case as one of collision between the vessels; for it must be the same thing in principle whether the steamboat ran upon the flat boat or forced some other object upon it to produce the injury." In the case at bar, it cannot, as matter of law, be said that the plaintiff's intestate, on the facts stated in the complaint, was guilty of negligence that contributed proximately to his death. It appears from the complaint that the small boat or skiff in which he had taken passage to cross the river, laden as it was, was nevertheless safe in the absence of an unusual disturbance of the water, and that the water at the time and before the defendant's steamer approached was smooth. The plaintiff's intestate had the right to assume that the navigators of large crafts would observe their duty under the law toward the small boat in which he had taken passage in avoiding the infliction of injury.

The third count was, however, in another respect faulty for lack of proper averment, whereby it was rendered subject to the de-murrer interposed. The count fails to aver that the servant or servants who were operating the steamboat at the time of the alleged wrong and injury were acting within the scope and line of their authority. Non constat these servants were at the time and place acting in utter disregard of authority of the master, in which event no responsibility could attach to the master on account of their negligent operation of the steamboat. In the case of Lampkin v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 106 Ala. 287, 17 So. 448, the plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's train, and while a passenger was assaulted by a brakeman on said train. It was held in that case that the facts stated in the complaint were sufficient, without stating in terms that the employee by whom plaintiff was assaulted was acting within the scope of his duties. In Woodward Iron Co. v. Herndon, 114 Ala. 214, 21 So. 430, that suit was brought under the employers' liability statute, and the court ruled that, where the complaint averred that the engineer was in charge and control of an engine, which he was at the time running over a track of the company, this was prima facie sufficient to show that he was in the discharge of his duties under such employment. The facts in the case before us, we think, differentiate the case from the foregoing cases cited and relied on by the appellant. In the Lampkin Case the relationship of carrier and passenger is shown, with the duties and responsibilities attaching to such relation under the law; and the further fact is shown that the assaulting party was an employee and brakeman on defendant's train. In the Woodward Iron Co. Case, the suit being under the employers' liability statute, the court ruled that the averments in the complaint as to superintendence, etc., were within the terms of the statute. In the case before us no relationship existed between the plaintiff's intestate and the defendant, and the suit is for a common-law liability, and not under the statute. In Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Brantley, 107 Ala. 684, 18 So. 321, it is said: The test of liability in all cases depends upon the question whether the injury was committed by the authority of the master, expressly conferred or fairly inferred from the nature of the employment and the duties incident to it. In the plaintiff's complaint it is not charged that the defendant was guilty of negligence, but the negligence complained of was that of defendant's servant. We think it perfectly clear that the defendant could not be made liable for any acts of her servants, done by them without the scope of their employment, and not by her authority. If these servants undertook to operate her steamboat down the river without her authority, she could not be made liable for their wrongful acts. This being true, it follows, in order to fix a liability upon her for the negligent conduct of the servants, it should be averred and shown that they were acting with her authority or within the scope and line of their employment.

Finding no errors in the ruling of the court on the demurrers, the judgment appealed from will be affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

LANE & BODLEY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

F. G. TAYLOR.

(— Ark. —, 97 S. W. 441.)

Attorney and client—account stated.

A charge for services by an attorney, which is accepted by the client, becomes an account stated, and cannot be reopened except for fraud or mistake, although the account of collections in which it is embodied is disputed, so that it becomes a matter of litigation.

(October 22, 1906.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clay County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover funds which were alleged to have been collected by defendant for plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. B. Oliver for appellant.

Mr. J. F. Gantney for appellee.

Case Note.—Effect of dispute as to certain items of an account upon assent to other items: —The mere fact that one item in an account is disputed does not, as a general rule, prevent the account from becoming an account stated as to all the items admitted to be correct. Mulford v. Caesar, 53 Mo. App. 263.

And an objection to particular items of an account rendered a debtor is an admission of the correctness of the rest of the items, and the account becomes stated as to those items. Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 271; Joseph v. Southwark Foundry & Mach. Co. 99 Ala. 47, 10 So. 327; Tuggle v. Minor, 76 Cal. 96, 18 Pac. 131; Wiggins v. Burkham, 10 Wall. 129, 19 L. ed. 884.

But in State, Weigel, Prosecutor, v. Hartman Steel Co. 51 N. J. L. 446, 20 Atl. 67, the court said: "The notion that there can be an account stated of certain items of the account, while other items of the same account are questioned and left open for further adjustment or litigation, . . . cannot be supported upon any rational view of the nature of an account stated. It confounds every admission with an account stated."

Hill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is a contest between an attorney and his client. The client was not satisfied with the statement of money collected and expenditures made, and refused to accept the check sent to it, and this suit resulted. The amount of collections was admitted, and the difference grew out of the amount that should be allowed as credits.

Passing all other questions, and going to the heart of the case, it is found that on January 27, 1903, the appellee, Taylor the attorney, submitted to his client a statement, and transmitted a draft for $342.10 as the balance due the client after paying various items and his fee, which were set forth in the statement. The fee charged was $200, and in regard to that the appellant said in his letter: "You will remember that there were four trials in the case,—two in the circuit court and two in the Supreme Court,—and, while the fee of $200 seems large, it is not, when the work done is taken into consideration. This does not include the two other trials,—one in the circuit court at the outset of the litigation and one some time after in the chancery court,—making in all six trials. Hoping this will be satisfactory," etc. In reply to this, the client, who was represented by home counsel, who conducted the correspondence, wrote refusing to accept the check for $342.10, and calling attention to matters that had been overlooked, which are not material here, and asked that the account be recast, and, in regard to the fee, said: "We do not object to your fee, except that we think we are entitled to one third of it. Please send us corrected statement," etc. On February 13th the appellee not be supported upon any rational view of the nature of an account stated. It confounds every admission with an account stated."

An instruction to the jury that, if an itemized statement of account was presented to defendant, and he agreed to pay a portion thereof, such portion became an account stated which plaintiff is entitled to recover, was held, in King v. Machesney, 88 Ill. App. 341, to be an erroneous statement of the law. The court said it is not enough to constitute an account stated that it may contain some items conceded to be correct, when at the same time the account as a whole is in dispute; for an account stated is an agreement between the parties that all items of the account are true and the balance as struck correct, together with a promise, express or implied, for payment of such balance.

As to what constitutes an account stated, see exhaustive note in 27 L.R.A. 811.

wrote them, stating that he would look into some matters referred to in the letter not material to this issue, and said nothing in regard to the fee. On February 26th he again wrote, remitting $393.50, having added $50.40 to his previous remittance for matters explained in the letter, and added: "There are some costs that I find that I paid, but I will let that go, and count the matter even. All costs are paid." On March 7, 1903, upon learning that his check had been returned, and the claim against him placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, he wrote a full history of the litigation which he had conducted, with circumstantiality and detail, which is apparently a correct and truthful history of the case. The gist of the letter was an insistence upon the correctness of the charge that he had made. To this the appellant's attorneys replied on March 11th, in which they said: "We are in receipt of your favor of the 7th instant, and in answer beg to say that it is not a question of fees at all that compelled us to put the matter of Lane & Bodley Company v. J. W. Leonard in the hands of Mr. Oliver. On that point we refer you to our letter of January 29, 1903, but solely for the reason that you failed to send us money that you had collected, and when you did send check you did not send the correct amount," etc. On March 25, 1903, the appellee wrote further in regard to costs and other matters, and concluded as follows: "I certainly think I ought to have every cent of the fees that I have charged, and that you should take your charges out of the amount that I sent you, and then I will not have enough to pay my personal expenses in looking after the litigation; and besides, I paid $150 of that to associate counsel." Subsequent correspondence between the parties followed. No dispute or difference developed as to the fee, but the matter was not adjusted, and suit was brought. In said suit the defendant answered, admitting the collection of the three items, to wit, $129.60, $100, and $553.50, which were charged in the complaint to have been collected by him, and said that the same had been paid, and, by way of cross-complaint, he alleged that the appellant was indebted to him in the sum of $155 as attorneys' fees and expenses in collecting said sums of money and the litigations concerning the matter. On trial before a jury a verdict resulted in the sum of $5 in favor of appellee, and the appellants brought the case here.

The court sent the case to the jury upon instructions directing them to charge the appellee with the three items collected by him, with interest, less a remittance of $79.60, and then credit him with the court costs paid by him, and also credit him with whatever fee he was entitled to for his services, under the evidence, including expenses, and return a verdict for the party for the difference between the charges in whatsoever side the difference stood. Various other instructions were given, principally upon the question of the amount of fee to be allowed the appellee, and upon that point the testimony of attorneys had been taken, which presented a wide conflict as to the proper amount to be charged.

It was error to submit to the jury this question of the amount of fee to be found to be due upon a quantum meruit, because the correspondence which has been just detailed shows that that was a closed incident. It had become an account stated between appellant and appellee, and the appellee was only entitled to recover the $200 which he had charged, and which was agreed to by the attorneys conducting the correspondence on behalf of the appellant. They expressly disclaimed any difference with him over the amount of fee, and said that the reason they would not accept his check for $393.50 was on account of other items, and not on account of the fee which he had charged. After making this charge and remitting $393.50, which was not accepted, but returned to the appellee, he then made a charge in this litigation for his services and expenses which would more than absorb the collections made, and leave due him $155, and sustained that charge by some evidence that the same would be reasonable for the services performed. But he was not at liberty to reopen this question, and recover upon the quantum meruit. When an attorney makes a charge for services, and the same is accepted by the client, it becomes an account stated between them, and may be sued upon as such by him. Wilcox v. Boothe, 19 Ark. 684; Pulliam v. Booth, 21 Ark. 421. Necessarily the converse is true, and the client's rights likewise fixed. The rendition of an account is not of itself sufficient to make it an account stated, but, where the other party goes over the account and assents to its correctness, then it becomes a settled matter. See this subject fully discussed in 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 370-372. When it is thus settled, it can then only be reopened for fraud or mistake. Roberts v. Totten, 13 Ark. 609; Lawrence v. Ellsworth, 41 Ark. 502; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Camden Bank, 47 Ark. 541, 1 S. W. 704; Weed v. Dyer, 53 Ark. 155, 13 S. W. 592; Glascock v. Rosengrant, 55 Ark. 376, 18 S. W. 379. The only uncertain element in this account was the fee. The other matters were mere ascertainment of the correct expenditures and costs to be charged against the collection, and were not matters open for contract or adjustment like the fee matter then stood. But, even aside from the rules governing an account stated, growing out of its rendition and acquiescence, and considering this, not as an account, but as a negotiation between the parties, it is evident that a contract was consummated. Taylor offered, upon his part, to accept $200, which he then retained, in full for legal services growing out of the numerous lawsuits involved in the collection of the claim, and his client accepted that proposition. This ended the matter, so far as the fee was concerned, as both parties were capable of contracting in regard to the subject-matter, and did contract in regard to it, and there is no evidence authorizing the reopening of that contract upon the ground of fraud, undue advantage, mutual mistake, or any other ground which sets aside a contract.

The court gave the jury the following instruction: "(2) If you find from the evidence that the defendant rendered a statement in which he charged a less sum for his services than he now asks, that does not prevent him from recovering whatever amount his services were worth. Or, if you find that the defendant rendered his statement for services through mistake caused by reason of his books and papers being misplaced, and he could not find them, and did not remember about the cases sufficiently to fix the proper amount, then he is not necessarily bound by the statement that he made." This instruction was improper, as it does not correctly state the law, and, even if it did, there was no evidence to justify the issue being presented to the jury. The correspondence at the time the fee was fixed and while the negotiation was pending about it showed an intimate knowledge of the services performed, and a recitation of those services to the client to satisfy him that the fee was reasonable. The testimony of Mr. Taylor does not state the extent and nature of his services any more definitely than his letters did at the time he was fixing this fee; merely gives more detail. It is true that he testifies that it was some two years from the time he got the money until he made this settlement, and that he had misplaced his docket and letters, and could not get the data necessary to make a statement, and says that he had forgotten about paying his associate counsel $150. One month after making the second remittance, and as a reason for assuring his client that the charge of the transmitting attorneys should not come out of the amount retained by him, he says that he would not have enough to pay his personal expenses in looking after the litigation, and besides, that he had paid $150 to associate counsel. At this time he did not ask that the matter be reopened on account of this oversight, and merely insists 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) that for these reasons the charge that he had made was a proper one. Doubtless, there were other matters, as shown in his testimony, that he was deprived of having the benefit of in his settlement by reason of his lost docket and correspondence and failing to remember details, but those matters did not go to the only matter subject to negotiation,—the fees,—they were matters that went merely to a proper accounting for the money received and proper credits in his own behalf, and they were subject to adjustment upon the ascertainment of those amounts at any time.

Other questions were discussed in the case in regard to the instructions, but it is not necessary to notice them. The view the court takes of fees renders the other unimportant.

Objection was made to the bill of exceptions not showing all the testimony, but, since those objections were made, the bill of exceptions has been amended by the trial court, and the omitted matters have been inserted.

For the error in submitting to the jury the question of the fee, the cause is reversed and remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
E. N. CHAMBERS.

(126 Ga. 404, 55 S. E. 37.)

Injury to business—liability.

1. Malicious injury to the business of another will give a right of action to the injured party.

Same—liability of employer.

2. A licensed drayman had contracts with merchants to haul their freight from the depot of a railway company to their places of business. The depot agent of the railway company at the place in which the drayman was licensed to do business, knowing of the existence of such contracts, willfully and maliciously refused to deliver to the drayman goods of such merchants, notwithstanding orders, oral and written, to that effect were communicated to the agent. As a consequence of this wrongful conduct of the agent, the drayman was damaged in his business, and his business practically destroyed. Held, that the railway company Instruction—absence of evidence.

6. When there is no evidence as to the worldly circumstances of the parties, it is erroneous in any case to charge upon the subject. Where there are two counts in a petition, and an instruction on worldly circumstances of the parties is appropriate as to one, and not appropriate as to the other, the instructions of the judge should be such as to inform the jury that the worldly circumstances are to be considered as to one, and not as to the other.

ERROR to the City Court of Carrollton to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged injury to his business. Reversed.

Statement by Cobb, P. J.:

Chambers sued the Southern Railway Company for damages. Objection was made to the petition as originally filed upon the ground that it set forth two separate and distinct causes of action and that each was not set forth in a separate count. This defect was remedied by an amendment, and the petition as amended contained two counts. The first count alleged that plaintiff was a licensed drayman of the town of Villa Rica, and had purchased the necessary outfit for that business; that the most profitable part of his business consisted of hauling the freight of merchants shipped over the line of defendant; that he had contracts with a majority of the merchants to haul their freight from the depot to their places of business; that the defendant, through its depot agent at Villa Rica, refused to deliver him freight to be hauled to the merchants, although such agent knew he was authorized to receive and haul such goods, petitioner presenting written and verbal orders for the same; that "defendant's agent, G. A. Scarborough, would go around to petitioner's customers and beg and persuade them to allow other parties than petitioner to receive and haul said goods, to the injury and damage of your petitioner; . . . that the conduct on the part of the defendant was wilful, malicious, and done for the sole purpose of injuring and damaging your petitioner, and and did injure him and damage him" in a sum stated; and that the conduct on the part of the defendant had destroyed the business of the plaintiff. The second count alleged that on a named day the agent of the defendant, while acting in the discharge of his duty as such agent, and being at the time in the depot of the defendant, in the presence and hearing of certain named citizens, used to and of the plaintiff certain "abusive and malicious words," which are set forth in the petition, for the sole purpose of injuring and harassing him, and did cause him great mental pain and suffering; and that on another occasion, at the store of a merchant, such agent, while in the discharge of his duty as agent, used of and concerning petitioner certain other lan-

what analogous. The court there held that a railroad company was not liable for the wanton act of a station agent who had charge of the freight and express business at its station, in shooting one who called at the station to inquire of the agent as to whether any demurrage would be charged on account of a failure to unload a car of coal that day. Upon being answered in the negative, deceased turned to walk out of the room when the agent called him back, saying there was a package for him, it not appearing whether the package had been received by freight or by express, and, while he was signing a receipt for it, the agent picked up a pistol and, without a word, shot the party to death. The court said that, if the package had come by express, then there could be no claim that the package pertained to the business of the railroad company; but the court also said, that it is equally certain that the act of the agent in committing the assault was not within the scope of his employment as freight agent, and to hold otherwise would make every employer an absolute insurer of the safety of every person against the wilful and malicious conduct of his servant, and against every injury resulting from a fit of insanity or personal revenge.

guage, which, in effect, charged petitioner with a crime punishable by law. The defendant filed a demurrer, in which it was alleged that no cause of action was set out, and that the petition was defective for the reason that the acts of the agent were entirely outside of the scope and province of his duties, and without sanction or authority of the defendant. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted pendente lite. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled. The bill of exceptions assigns error upon the exceptions pendente lite, and the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

Messrs. Coles & McPherson, Hugh M. Dorsey, and Arthur Heyman for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. O. Newell and Beals & Adamson for defendant in error.

Cobb, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1-3. When the first count in the petition is taken in its entirety, it is manifest that it was the intention of the pleader to lay a cause of action for damages flowing from the destruction of the business of the plaintiff by the wrongful conduct of the defendant as alleged in the petition. The refusal to deliver freight to the plaintiff, notwithstanding he was clothed with authority from the consignees to receive it, is not alleged for the purpose of recovering damages that might result from the refusal to deliver in any particular case; but this constant and continuous refusal is alleged for the purpose of showing the effect upon the plaintiff's business as a drayman. The count alleged that the plaintiff's business was entirely destroyed. This resulted from two causes: First, the refusal of the agent to deliver freight which the plaintiff was authorized by the consignees to receive; and, second, the conduct of the agent in going to the merchants of Villa Rica and persuading them to discontinue their contracts with the plaintiff. It is alleged that this was done maliciously. In other words, the count when taken in its full effect, charges that the business of the plaintiff was maliciously destroyed by the wrongful conduct of the defendant. Malicious injury to the business of another has long been held to give a right of action to the injured party. Barr v. Essex Trades Council, 53 N. J. Eq. 115, 30 Atl. 881. See also, in this connection, Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 217; Ryan v. Burger & H. Brewing Co. 37 N. Y. S. R. 287, 13 N. Y. Supp. 600; Delz v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400, 26 Am. St. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Rep. 755, 16 S. W. 111; Jackson v. Stanfield, 137 Ind. 592, 23 L.R.A. 588, 36 N. E. 345, 37 N. E. 14; Lucke v. Clothing Cutters' & T. Assembly No. 7507, K. of L. 77 Md. 396, 19 L.R.A. 408, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421, 26 Atl. 505. Our Code declares: "When the law requires one to do an act for the benefit of another, or to forbear the doing of that which may injure another, though no action be given in express terms, upon the accrual of damage the party may recover." Civil Code 1895, § 3809. The petition alleged that the plaintiff had contracts with the merchants of Villa Rica to deliver their freight for them, and that the defendant, through its agent, maliciously procured the merchants not only to abandon their contracts, but to violate them while they continued. It has been held that the malicious procurement of a breach of a contract of employment resulting in damages, where the procurement is during the subsistence of the contract, is an actionable wrong. Employing Printers' Club v. Dr. Blosser Co. 122 Ga. 509, 69 L.R.A. 90, 106 Am. St. Rep. 137, 50 S. E. 353.

If this suit had been against Scarborough in his individual capacity, there would be little question about the fact that a cause of action was set forth, not only as regards the refusal to deliver freight, but also as regards his conduct in persuading the merchants of Villa Rica to abandon their contracts with the plaintiff. But is the railway company responsible for the conduct of Scarborough? Is the malice of Scarborough the malice of the company? It is not alleged that the railway company expressly authorized that to be done which is charged against Scarborough. It appointed Scarborough its agent. It placed him in a position where it was his duty to deliver freight to consignees or their authorized agents. Those things which were done in connection with this duty were within the scope of his agency. The railway company would be responsible for the wrongful conduct of Scarborough in dealing with the consignees or their authorized agents in delivering freight to them. If he refused to deliver freight when he ought to have delivered it, his act was the act of the railway company. If he maliciously refused to deliver, and the consequence of this malice was damage to him who had a right to receive, the malice of Scarborough became the malice of the railway company. So far as the cause of action rests upon the malicious act of Scarborough in refusing to deliver freight to the plaintiff upon orders, verbal and written, from the consignees, the action is well laid. But was the action well laid so far as it relates to the conduct of Scarborough in going to the merchants of Villa Rica and procuring them to abandon their contracts with the plaintiff? It is alleged that he is the agent of the railway company. It is alleged that as such he went to the merchants of the town of Villa Rica, and interfered with the plaintiff's business by begging and persuading his customers to allow other parties to haul their goods which came over the line of road represented by him. What he did in this respect was his individual act. It was beyond the scope and authority of his agency, and the company would not be responsible, unless it appeared that it was done by its direction and authority, or that it ratified his acts in reference thereto. If the plaintiff seeks to hold the company responsible for the acts of the agent under such circumstances, it must distinctly appear from his petition that the company authorized the acts, or that they were within the scope of his employment, or, if beyond the scope of his employment, they were approved and ratified by the company after a full knowledge of his conduct. So far as that portion of the first count relates to the conduct of the agent in persuading the merchants to discontinue business with the plaintiff, nothing appears in the petition bringing the case within this rule. The count was to this extent defective.

4. A corporation is not liable for damages resulting from speaking false, malicious, and defamatory words by one of its agents, even where, in uttering such words, the speaker was acting for the benefit of the corporation and within the scope of his agency, unless it affirmatively appears that the agent was directed or authorized by the corporation to speak the words in question. Behre v. National Cash Register Co. 100 Ga. 213, 62 Am. St. Rep. 320, 27 S. E. 986. See also Osborn v. Woolworth, 106 Ga. 460, 32 S. E. 581. If the second count of the declaration be construed as an action for slander, it set forth no cause of action. While certain portions of the count might be so construed, when the count is taken as a whole it is apparent that damages were also claimed as resulting from an insult to the plaintiff, growing out of the abusive and defamatory language used to him while he was engaged in conversation with the agent of the defendant, in a matter relating to the business of the company. The Code declares that a railway company is liable for any damage done by any person in its employment or service, unless the agents of the company have exercised all reasonable care and diligence. Civil Code 1895, § 2321. This section has been construed to create a cause of action in favor of a widow whose husband was slain by a depot agent while as a customer he was lawfully at the depot on business pertaining to the agency. Christian v. Columbus & R. R. Co. 79 Ga. 460, 7 S. E. 216, 97 Ga. 56, 25 S. E. 411. It has also been held that a railway company was liable for an assault and battery committed by an agent upon a person who was at the depot of the company transacting business with the agent in connection with the agency. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Richmond, 98 Ga. 495, 25 S. E. 565. It has also been held that a railway company was liable to a passenger for damages resulting from the conduct of the conductor in using to the passenger opprobrious words and abusive language tending to cause a breach of the peace and humiliate the passenger and subject him to mortification. Cole v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. 102 Ga. 474, 31 S. E. 107. That portion of the second count which alleges that the agent of the railway company at the depot used to the plaintiff abusive and insulting language, when the plaintiff was upon the premises of the defendant, in conversation with the agent upon business connected with his agency, set forth a cause of action against the company. In the case where the railroad was held liable for the homicide committed by the agent, the agent was at his place of business. In the case where the railroad company was held liable for an assault, the assault was committed upon the premises of the company at the place where it had placed its agent upon duty. In the case where the railroad company was held liable for the insult by the conductor, the insult was upon the train where the company had placed the conductor upon duty. None of the cases, so far as our attention has been called to them, has gone to the extent of holding that the company would be liable for the tort of the agent at other places than where the agent was placed by the company for the discharge of the duties of his agency. If the agent insulted the plaintiff upon the streets of Villa Rica, or at any place of business of the merchants or others of the town of Villa Rica, the act would be the individual act of the agent, and the company would not be liable for such insult, even though at the time of the insult the agent was transacting the business of the company. When one goes to the agency of a corporation, the corporation owes him a duty to protect him from the wrongful acts of the agent in charge of the agency. But, when one who is an agent of the corporation commits a tort at places other than the place of agency, the company is not liable for the tort, unless it appears that it authorized the act or ratified it after its commission.

The first ground of the demurrer simply alleged that the petition set forth no cause of action. The second ground related to the matter of paragraphing and the division of the petition into counts, which, as has been said, was cured by amendment. The only remaining ground of the demurrer was in the following language: "Defendant prays that the petition of plaintiff be dismissed, because it affirmatively appears that, if the acts attributed to the agent were by him committed, they were entirely outside the scope and province of the duties for which he was employed, and entirely without the sanction or authority of the defendant. Wherefore defendant prays that said case be dismissed." If this ground of the demurrer can be properly construed to be a special demurrer objecting to certain specific paragraphs in the petition, it should have been sustained; for, as has been shown, there was in the first count a paragraph which should have been stricken, and also in the second count, which really embraced two causes of action, a cause of action which should have been stricken. But this ground of the demurrer cannot be properly construed as a special demurrer. It attacked the whole petition. It pointed to no particular part of it. It covered the whole pleading. It was simply an amplification of the general demurrer. As against a general demurrer, the petition in both counts sets forth a cause of action, and the judgment overruling the demurrer will not be reversed.

5. There was no error in refusing to require the plaintiff to elect upon which count he would proceed. The law allows a plaintiff to embrace in one petition as many causes of action as he sees proper, provided that they are all of the same character; that is, all sound in tort or all sound in contract. He may proceed upon the petition with all the counts, and recover upon one or all, as the law and facts may authorize.

6. The judge charged the jury: "The worldly circumstances of the parties, the amount of bad faith in the transaction, and all the attendant facts should be weighed." This charge was assigned as error for the reason that there was no evidence to authorize it. We find no evidence to authorize an instruction upon the subject of the worldly circumstances of the parties. The charge was erroneous, and prejudicial to the defendant, and requires the granting of a new trial. Georgia R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, 125 Ga. 562, 54 S. E. 639. If upon another trial there should be evidence as to the worldly circumstances of the parties, the charge would be appropriate so far as the cause of action in the second count is concerned; for that count seeks to recover damages for wounded feelings and humiliation only. The judge should, however, distinctly instruct the jury that the worldly circumstances of the parties are to be considered only in reference to the cause of action set forth in the second count, and should not be considered in reference to the cause of action set forth in the first count.

The evidence as to the conduct of the agent of the defendant, when acting as agent for the express company in reference to packages which the plaintiff had authority to receive, was irrelevant, and should not have been admitted. The case involved the acts of the defendant as agent of the railway company, and therefore evidence as to his conduct in reference to a package of freight, when it did not distinctly appear from the testimony whether it was in his custody as agent of the railway company or as agent of the express company, should have been excluded. Except as above indicated, no material error seems to have been committed in any of the instructions complained of in the motion for a new trial. Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except Fish, Ch. J., absent.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN BECK

v.

MINNESOTA & WESTERN GRAIN COMPANY, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 107 N. W. 1032.)

Lease—want of possession—effect.

1. Possession by the lessor is not essential to the validity of a lease, under statutes permitting the assignment of choses in action and the sale of an interest in land which is in adverse possession of another.

Landlord and tenant—right to question landlord's title.

2. The title of the lessor cannot be questioned by the lessee before the expiration of the lease, while he is in possession

Case Note.—Estoppel of subtenant to question original landlord's title: — It seems to be an established rule of law that one to whom a tenant leases acquires no rights which the tenant could not have acquired, and is as fully estopped to question the original landlord's title as the tenant himself. All the authorities are in accord with BECK v. MINNESOTA & W. GRAIN CO. upon that proposition, an extensive search having failed to reveal a single case that casts any doubt upon it. Indeed, this principle seems to be so undoubted that no discussion of it can be found, all the courts under it, unless based upon some distinct and independent claim to the land.

Same—sublease—possession.

3. A tenant need not be in possession in order to sublet.

Same—right of sublessee to question title.

4. One to whom a tenant leases the premises is as fully estopped to question the landlord's title as is the tenant himself.

Same—purchase of crops—lien.

5. One purchasing crops from the sublessee of a farm takes them subject to the statutory lien for rent.

Agent—authority.

6. One authorized to collect the rent due on a farm has authority to make a demand upon persons who have purchased crops gathered upon it, for the value thereof.

Landlord—lien—termination.

7. A statute preserving a landlord's lien for one year after the year's rent falls due operates to bind crops of a sublessee for one year from the time the rent falls due upon the principal lease, and is not controlled by the terms of the contract between the tenant and sublessee.

(June 12, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lyon County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the value of crops purchased by defendant from a sublessee of plaintiff's farm. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. J. Miller, for appellee.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff leased to N. A. Walquist in writing, 160 acres of land for the term of one year, beginning March 1, 1903, at the agreed rental of $525, to be paid October 1st, of that year. Thereafter Walquist sublet the premises to one Kreston, who raised 974 bushels of oats thereon, and sold them to the defendant for $265.85; this being the market price. Walquist failed to pay the rent, and in this action recovery of the value of the oats is sought by the landlord. The appellant contends: (1) That, as plaintiff did not prove title to the land in himself, the court erred in holding that he had a landlord's lien on the crop; (2) that in any event, no demand for the property or its value was proved; and (3) that the lien had expired before the action was begun.

L. 353; Blake v. Howe, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 306, 15 Am. Dec. 681.

Whether or not the rule applies to an assignee of a tenant, or to one who, by collusion with the tenant, has obtained possession, or to whom the tenant has attorned, presents questions not within the scope of this note. The question as to the particular facts and circumstances necessary to call for an application of the rule to subtenants is likewise beyond the scope of the note, for the reason that it depends upon the same principles that would apply as between the landlord and the original tenant.

1. The land had no buildings or other improvements thereon. No evidence tending to prove plaintiff's title, save a contract of purchase from one Converse, was introduced; nor was it made to appear who was in the actual or constructive possession prior to the execution of the lease. In these circumstances, a demise to a tenant at common law might not have been valid. Taylor, Land. & T. §§ 84 et seq. The reason for the rule was that, as a chose in action could not be assigned, the lease of land in the possession of another was void. But, under the statutes of this state, authorizing the assignment of choses in action and the sale of an interest in land, though in the adverse possession of another, possession is not essential to the validity of a lease. Section 2916, Code; Foster v. Young, 35 Iowa, 27, 40. The relation of landlord and tenant is created by contract, either expressed or implied, by the terms of which one person designated "tenant" enters into possession of the land under another known as "landlord." 1 Taylor, Land. & T. § 14. The landlord may not have any interest in the title to the demised premises, but whether he has or not cannot be questioned by the tenant before the expiration of his lease, and whilst in possession under it, unless based upon some distinct and independent claim to the land. Bowditch v. Dubuque, 38 Iowa, 341. Possibly a want of consideration might be pleaded in such a case to defeat the claim for rent, but, under the law of this state, a consideration is implied from the fact that the lease was in writing. Nor is it essential that the tenant should have been in possession in order to sublet. The lessee, having an interesse termini, may make a good lease, without entering into possession. Section 85 of the above work. The rule by which the tenant is estopped from denying his landlord's title is also applicable against all persons entering into possession through or under the tenant; and therefore one to whom the tenant leases the premises is as fully estopped from questioning the landlord's title to the land as the tenant himself. Bonds v. Smith, 106 N. C. 553, 11 S. E. 322; Merchants' Bank v. Clavin, 60 Mo. 559; Ellsworth v. Hale, 33 Ark. 633; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 417. See also Hardin v. Jones, 86 Ill. 313; Bertram v. Cook, 44 Mich. 396, 6 N. W. 868; Stewart v. Roderick, 4 Watts & S. 188, 39 Am. Dec. 71. As between the plaintiff and Walquist, the relation of landlord and tenant existed, and, with reference to the rent, § 2992 of the Code provides that "a landlord shall have a lien for his rent upon all crops grown upon the leased premises, and upon any other personal property of the tenant, which has been used or kept thereon during the term, and not exempt from execution, for the period of one year after a year's rent, or the rent of a shorter period, falls due. But such lien shall not in any case continue more than six months after the expiration of the term." The oats were grown "on the demised premises," and plaintiff had a lien thereon for the payment of his rent. Houghton v. Bauer, 70 Iowa, 314, 30 N. W. 577; Evans v. Collins, 94 Iowa, 432, 62 N. W. 810; Church v. Bloom, 111 Iowa, 319, 82 N. W. 794; Richardson Bros. v. Petersen, 58 Iowa, 724, 13 N. W. 63. When, if at all, was this lien terminated? The defendant purchased the oats from the subtenant. It acquired the title which the seller then had. That title was subject to the plaintiff's lien. The defendant acquired nothing more, and in appropriating the property became liable to the plaintiff for the value of the encumbrance.

2. It is argued that, as defendant merely acquired the title Kresten had (Nickelson v. Negley, 71 Iowa, 546, 32 N. W. 487), a demand was essential as a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action for conversion. Conceding without deciding this, we think a proper demand was made. One McDowell testified that, prior to the commencement of the suit in 1905, he demanded the value of the oats raised upon the leased premises of defendant's agent, who responded that he had no authority to pay therefor.

Upon cross-examination McDowell testified:

Q. You met Mr. Kruger (the agent) and took a little walk with him, did you?

A. Walked to the office with him, yes.

Q. Didn't you say "there is a little bill, and I presume you don't want to pay it, do you?" Isn't that the language you used?

A. Well, I would not say.

Q. And he laughed and said, "Not by a damn sight." Wasn't that his reply?

A. I presume so.

Q. And that was all that occurred in relation to the presenting of the claim that you are testifying about?

A. Similar to that, yes.

Q. That is what you mean when you say you made a demand upon him?

A. Yes, sir.

On redirect:

I think he understood what I was making a demand for. I don't know as I told him I was acting for Mr. Beck. I was not acting for Mr. Beck. Well, I had been instructed by Mr. Beck before that time to collect the rent.

It is apparent from this evidence that the witness intended to say that, though he had not been specially authorized to make the demand, he had been instructed by plaintiff to collect the rent. This necessarily included the making of the demand, and was sufficient authority for so doing. The demand was fully proved. The defendant's agent must have understood from what was said that McDowell was asking for the payment of the oats. The language employed might not have been as explicit as would have been employed between persons less intimate, but clearly indicates what both had in mind, and was fully understood in that a demand for payment was being made and refused.

3. The subtenant was a mere cropper, and had not entered upon the land after September 15, 1903. The action was commenced August 29, 1904, more than a year after the subtenant's rent became due; but within a year from the time the rent of the tenant should have been paid, and within six months of the termination of his lease. The appellant argues the case on the theory that the period within which suit must be begun under the statute, to enforce the lien, should be computed from the time the subtenant agreed to pay the tenant rent; but this is not so. There was neither privity of estate nor privity of contract between the lessor and the sublessee, and therefore the lessor could not sue the subtenant upon the tenant's covenant to pay rent. McFarlan v. Watson, 3 N. Y. 286; Harvey v. McGrew, 44 Tex. 412; note to Fulton v. Stuart, 15 Am. Dec. 542. The action was necessarily based upon the contract with the tenant, and its purpose was to enforce a lien created by statute on "all crops grown upon the demised premises," and it is immaterial whether these crops were raised by tenant or subtenant. Houghton v. Bauer, supra; Foster v. Reid, 78 Iowa, 205, 16 Am. St. Rep. 437, and note, 42 N. W. 649.

The lien was by virtue of the lease from plaintiff to Walquist, and it is not important under what arrangement the subtenant, Kresten, raised the crop; for the lien of the landlord cannot be affected by any agreement between a lessor and a sublessee. Forrest v. Durnell, 86 Tex. 647, 26 S. W. 481; Rutlege v. Walton, 4 Yerg. 458. As the action was begun within a year from the maturity of the rent sued for, and within six months of the termination of the lease upon which the action was based, it was in time. Some exceptions were taken to the rulings on the admissibility of evidence. Even though these should be conceded erroneous, enough was proved to justify the court in directing a verdict for plaintiff, and for this reason they are not considered.

Affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

SILAS S. EVANS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CITY OF CONCORDIA.

Municipal corporation—ice on sidewalk—injury—liability.

In an action against a city for injuries from a fall upon a sidewalk covered with ice and snow, where it appears from plaintiff's opening statement that the ice, which accumulated from natural causes, was less than an inch in thickness, and plaintiff knew when he went upon it that the ice was smooth and slippery, and he fell by reason of its smooth and slippery condition, and no other defect is claimed, a judgment for costs against plaintiff in favor of the city will be upheld.

Headnote by PORTER, J.

Case Note.—Liability of municipal corporation for injuries from smooth, level ice or snow accumulating from natural causes on a sidewalk not otherwise defective: — It is a trite saying that a municipality is not an insurer of the safety of its sidewalks and cross walks. It is required simply to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to keep the walks in a reasonably safe condition for public travel. Whether or not a city has complied with this duty of making its sidewalks reasonably safe must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each case,—the location of the walk, the uses to which it is put, the amount of travel over it, etc. While no general rule can be laid down as to the liability of a municipality where ice and snow have accumulated on its streets in ridges or uneven surfaces, or where an alleged defective condition of the sidewalk unites with the accumulations of snow and ice to cause an injury, it is well established that the mere slipperiness of a sidewalk, occasioned by the presence of glare ice or snow resulting from natural causes, is not sufficient to charge the municipality with liability for an injury resulting therefrom, where the walk itself is properly constructed and there is no such accumulation of ice and snow as to constitute an obstruction. 2 Dill. Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action for damages for injuries received in a fall upon an icy sidewalk, the trial court rendered judgment in favor of the city and against plaintiff in error for costs, upon the opening statement to the jury of the facts which plaintiff in error expected to prove. Error is predicted upon this ruling of the court.

In his statement plaintiff in error followed the averments of his petition, which were, in substance, that on the night of January 19, 1904, and on the following day, as the result of rain, sleet, and snow furries, the walks of the city became covered with a sleety ice to the depth of less than an inch and more than half an inch, which was then, and continued to be, smooth and slippery Chicago, 4 Biss. 486, Fed. Cas. No. 2,817; Forward v. Toronto, 15 Ont. Rep. 370; D'Estimoville v. Montreal, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 18 C. S. 470.

Some of the New York cases cited above seem to lay considerable stress on the fact that the ice was of very recent formation, though one case held that the city was justified in waiting for a thaw to remove the danger, although it had notice thereof.

In Hubbard v. Concord, 35 N. H. 52, 69 Am. Dec. 520, an instruction to the jury that the town was bound at all times to have its highways in a reasonably safe condition for the customary travel, and that it would constitute no answer to the claim of the traveler for damages, who should suffer an injury resulting from a defect in the highway without any fault on his part, that the defect was produced by the elements and the town had no notice of it or opportunity to repair, was held erroneous; and it was held that the jury should have been instructed that, if the injury resulted from the condition of the sidewalk produced by recent sudden action of the elements, the town was not chargeable, unless, under the circumstances, they ought to have repaired the defect before the accident happened, and had reasonable opportunity to do so. The court said that the rain falling may instantly become ice, and in a few minutes every part of every street in all the towns and cities, for a circuit of miles, become coated with ice, and the traveler who is passing along the highand difficult and dangerous to walk upon; that the walks were permitted by the city to remain in this condition until on the evening of the 25th of January, when plaintiff, who was walking with due care because he knew that the sidewalk was icy, slipped and fell by reason of the icy, slippery condition of the sidewalk in that particular place. When ice and snow accumulate from natural causes upon the sidewalks of a city, and a person is injured by a fall occasioned by its smooth and slippery condition, is the city liable in an action for damages? This is the sole question in the case. No other defect in the sidewalk is claimed. The same question has frequently been before the courts, and with almost entire unanimity it has been held that, where the injuries were caused wholly by reason of the smooth and slippery condition of the ice and snow, there was no liability for negligence on the part of the city. A distinction has been observed in many cases where the ice or snow has been allowed to form in ridges or uneven places in the walk amounting to an obstruction; but smoothness and slipperiness, being natural conditions, have almost universally been held not sufficient to cast responsibility upon the city. The reasons for the distinction are well stated in Smyth v. Bangor, 72 Me. 249, as follows: "In this cold climate, where ice and snow cover the whole face of the earth for a considerable portion of the year, such an inconvenience ought not, and rightfully cannot, be regarded as a defect. No amount of diligence can keep our streets and sidewalks at all times free from ice and snow, and the latter, when trodden smooth and way when the process commences and while it is going on may necessarily be compelled to travel on at the risk of broken limbs; and that it could not have been intended by the enactment of a statute requiring highways to be kept in good repair, thus to make towns insurers against damages arising from causes which no human foresight could anticipate, no human power could avert, and no human means, without time and opportunity, could remedy.

The leading case on this subject is Stanton v. Springfield, supra, which was decided under a statute requiring the streets to be kept "safe and convenient for travelers;" but in 1896 a new statute was passed, providing that no city or town should be liable for any injury on a highway by reason or in consequence of snow or ice thereon, if the place at which the injury was received was, at the time of the accident, otherwise reasonably safe and convenient for travelers.

In the earlier case of Payne v. Lowell, 10 Allen, 147, decided a year previous to Stanton v. Springfield, the presence of ice on a walk, resulting from a fall of rain, followed by freezing, the night before the accident, seems to have been treated as a defect, although the sidewalks throughout the city were covered with ice formed during the preceding night. In this case the city was allowed to prove that, two hours before the accident, three wagons loaded with sand were sent through the principal streets of the city, and that one of the wagons reached the place of the accident, which was sanded a few minutes after the accident. This was held to be error, on the ground that, if the defect which caused the injury had existed for twenty-four hours, no proof of the attempts by the city to put the way in repair would affect its liability; and that, if the defect had not existed twenty-four hours, then the question was whether or not there had been a reasonable time to repair the defect before the accident took place, which was for the judge to determine; and that, if there was not reasonable time, then the fact that wagons were on the way with sand did not diminish the liability of the city.

The two principal reasons given for the doctrine that municipalities are not liable for injuries caused by smooth, level ice resulting from natural causes are the impracticability of keeping sidewalks entirely free of snow and ice, and the fact that, where the walks are in a slippery condition as the result of climatic conditions, persons using them are put upon notice of the danger, and are bound to look out for their own safety. Thus, the court, in Chase v. Cleveland, supra, says: "In all northern cities and towns storms of snow and sleet producing ice and resulting in slippery walks are of frequent and constant recurrence during the winter season, and accidents . . . are also frequent. Such dangers are apt to exist in many places at the same time, and at points widely separated from one another. They appear at many points to-day, disappear to-morrow, and like dangers appear at other places the next day. They are affected by changes of weather which are likely to occur at any time, and frequently many times within a few hours. . . . To effectually provide against dangers from this source would require a large special force, involving enormous expense; for, to make the protection effective, constant activity and vigilance would be required as well in the ascertainment of the dangers as in their removal upon being known. . . . Slipperiness may arise from a variety of causes. A thin film of mud on the walk will often produce it, and yet liability would hardly be claimed to arise from such a cause. It is not clear on principle that an exception should necessarily be made in regard to slipperiness from accumulations of ice. . . . The law exacts of municipalities only that which is practicable and reasonable in regard to keeping streets open, in repair, and free from nuisance."

The justice of this doctrine is recognized, and the reasons therefor clearly stated, al-hard, is nearly, and sometimes quite, as slippery as ice, and travelers will often slip and fall when no one is to blame. To hold towns and cities responsible for such accidents would practically make insurance companies of them. A block of ice may constitute a defect the same as a block of wood or stone. So, a ridge or hummock of ice or snow may constitute a defect the same as a pile of lime, or sand, or mortar, upon the sidewalk, would. But we regard it as now well settled that mere slipperiness of the surface of a highway or sidewalk, caused by either ice or snow, is not a defect for which towns and cities are liable." In Gilbert v. Roxbury, 100 Mass. 185, a case like the one at bar, the action of the trial court in directing a verdict was sustained. In Stone v. Hubbardston, 100 Mass. 49, it was held that mere slipperiness of surface of a highway properly constructed, and of no unusual slope, was not a defect which would render the municipality liable any more than moisture or mud upon a flagstone or sidewalk. It was said in this case: "But ice, which, by so, in Reedy v. St. Louis Brewing Co. 161 Mo. 523, 53 L.R.A. 805, 61 S. W. 859, where the court distinguishes between cases in which the ice results from natural causes and those in which it is the result of artificial causes, and holds that, where a sidewalk is rendered dangerous because of slippery ice formed from incidental or accidental discharge of water, such not being the prevalent condition of sidewalks at the time, it is the duty of the city to cause the danger to be removed within a reasonable time after it has notice thereof, or by the exercise of ordinary care would have discovered the condition.

So, in Huston v. Council Bluffs, 101 Iowa, 33, 36 L.R.A. 211, 69 N. W. 1130, the court instructed the jury that as a general rule the mere fact that snow or sleet has fallen upon a sidewalk from the clouds, and thereby rendered the sidewalk slippery and difficult to pass over, would not make the city liable therefor, even though such ice and snow so remained upon the walk for an unreasonable length of time after the officers of the city whose duty required them to look after such matters had notice of its existence, or after they, in the exercise of reasonable care in performing their duties, ought to have known of its existence; but that this rule relates only to the natural conditions resulting from rain or sleet falling and freezing upon the walk or snow accumulating upon the walk from natural causes. In this case it appeared that the ice was rough and uneven, and the liability of the city was sustained.

This distinction between a slippery condition resulting from natural causes and the same condition resulting from artificial causes is denied in many cases, and the city held not liable, although the condition of the walk may result from some artificial and local cause, such as a defective hydrant or a conductor discharging on the sidewalk, etc. In Henkes v. Minneapolis, 42 Minn. 530, 44 N. W. 1026, the court held that the fact that the ice was partially the result of artificial causes, and not wholly of natural causes, made no difference; that the liability of the city must rest upon some ground of fault or neglect on the part of its officers who have charge of the streets, and that such fault or neglect is no more involved in removing ice formed by water from houses than ice formed by rain from the clouds. But, on principle, it would seem that a distinction might reasonably be made between slipperiness resulting from natural causes and extending over the whole city and slipperiness resulting from some local cause which the city might easily remove and of which a pedestrian might very likely have no notice. Therefore, the cases in which the ice was the result of artificial causes have not been included here.

That there is some difference of opinion as to what may be regarded as a natural cause is shown by the decision in Kannenberg v. Alpena, 96 Mich. 53, 55 N. W. 614. In this case it was held that, where a street was paved so as to form a gutter outside of the sidewalk, and the catch basin in this gutter became filled up or stopped, so that the water did not run, and, the weather being warm, the water accumulated at that point and flowed upon the outer edge of the sidewalk, where it froze, and a pedestrian slipped and was injured, the city was not liable, on the ground that there was no fault in the construction of the catch basin, and that from natural causes, without fault upon the part of the city authorities, the ice had formed from the snow which fell in the highway.

The distinction generally made between smooth, level ice and ice which has accumulated in a rough or uneven surface is repudiated in Cloughessey v. Waterbury, 51 Conn. 405, 50 Am. Rep. 38. In inquiring into the reasons upon which the rule rests, the court says that it is obvious that it does not depend at all upon the fact that ice in ridges is dangerous, while smooth ice is not. And, as to the theory that expediency requires the making of such a rule, the court said it did not follow that, because the city might be held responsible under some circumstances for smooth ice on its sidewalks, it must logically be held responsible under all circumstances as well for "the freezing mist of a single night," which glares its entire territory, as for a patch of ice of only a few feet in extent, which has existed in the same condition for weeks. The court said that, where ice is found on the sidewalks to a limited extent in a dangerous condition, whether smooth or otherwise, and the city has ample notice of the fact and can with reasonable expenditure make the passage safe for travel, it ought to do it, and is responsible for reason of constant or repeated flowing of water, trampling of passengers, or any other cause, assumes such a shape as to be an obstacle to travel, may constitute such a defect." To the same effect, see Chamberlain v. Oshkosh, 84 Wis. 289, 19 L. R.A. 513, 36 Am. St. Rep. 928, 54 N. W. 618, and cases cited in note; Grossenbach v. Milwaukee, 65 Wis. 31, 56 Am. Rep. 614, 26 N. W. 182; Luther v. Worcester, 97 Mass. 268; Stanton v. Springfield, 12 Allen, 566; Mauch Chunk v. Kline, 100 Pa. 119, 45 Am. Rep. 364; Kinney v. Troy, 108 N. Y. 567, 15 N. E. 728; Harrington v. Buffalo, 121 N. Y. 147, 24 N. E. 186; Chase v. Cleveland, 44 Ohio St. 505, 58 Am. Rep. 843, 9 N. E. 225; Broburg v. Des Moines, 63 Iowa, 523, 50 Am. Rep. 756, 19 N. W. 340. Most of these cases are from the extreme northern and eastern states, where the conditions which usually obtain illustrate more forcibly the manifest propriety of the rule. It is urged by plaintiff in error that the mildness of the winters in Kansas requires a distinction to be made, which has been recognized by some courts, based upon cli-

the consequences if this duty is neglected; but that, if a sudden ice storm covers all the territory of a town, it would be impracticable to apply the remedy, and it should be considered and treated as would an extraordinary inundation of its streets by a flood. The court also said that the standard of duty would not necessarily be the same in cities as in sparsely settled towns; also that the same rule could not be applied to sidewalks as to highways. In this case it was therefore held that, where the place of injury was one of the principal business streets of the city, and the sidewalks on both sides were in good condition, except at the precise place of the accident, which was in a dangerous condition by reason of glare and smooth ice, and had existed in the same condition for a number of weeks prior to the accident, and no sand or other substance had been put upon the ice to make it more safe, as might easily have been done, but it had been permitted to remain during all this time in the same dangerous condition, and the plaintiff, while in the exercise of ordinary care, slipped and fell upon the ice and was injured, the city was liable. But the court added that the decision must be understood to refer only to the particular circumstances found by the court. The court also denied that the decisions in the cases of Dooley v. Meriden, 44 Conn. 117, 26 Am. Rep. 433, and Congdon v. Norwich, 37 Conn. 414, holding the city liable, must be regarded as based on the fact that in those cases the ice was described as uneven and irregular; saying that the court, in those cases, evidently treated the distinction between smooth and rough ice as immaterial, and relied upon the controlling fact that the ice was slippery and dangerous, and had so remained for a considerable time in both cases.

In the earlier Connecticut case of Landolt v. Norwich, 37 Conn. 615, the liability of the city was denied where plaintiff was injured by falling on a street of considerable public travel, because of the presence of ice thereon, resulting from water which ran down from adjoining premises because of a recent rain, the ice being covered by a light fall of snow, although the ice was of very limited extent only. The court said it could not be the rule of duty that all the sidewalks in a city should at all times be kept absolutely free from ice; 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) that such a rule would involve expense disproportionate to the object to be accomplished, and that the course adopted by the street commissioner, who testified that he first attended to the front of public buildings and to public squares and places, then to the front of vacant lots, trusting that, by force of a city ordinance to that effect, individual citizens would promptly attend to the pavements adjacent to their premises, but that he exercised a general oversight, applying the remedy in case of an occupant's neglect, was correct and reasonable, and seemed to have been faithfully executed.

The distinction between smooth and rough ice is also repudiated in Magaha v. Hagerstown, 95 Md. 62, 51 Atl. 832, where the court said: "Primarily the ground for holding a municipality liable for injuries sustained by ice on a highway is that it has been negligent in not preventing or not removing it; and, if it has used reasonable care and diligence in those respects, it is not liable. But, if it has been so negligent, and if the ice is dangerous because it is smooth and slippery, why should it not be held liable as well as if the ice be in ridges or mounds? Smooth, even ice is likely to cause more people to fall than when it is rough and uneven. The latter is more easily observed, and a very little snow on the former may entirely conceal it from the observation of a careful pedestrian, and it oftentimes results in dangerous falls." But in this case the ice was in the road, and not on the sidewalk, and was caused by artificial means; and the court also said that, if injury is sustained by reason of the slippery condition of the streets, caused by a recent fall of sleet or snow so extensive as to make it impracticable to remove it by the use of reasonable means, there can ordinarily be no recovery, since municipal corporations are not required to prevent ice and snow from getting on the streets in cold weather, or to do other impossible things.

For the general question of liability of municipal corporations for ice on streets or sidewalks, see note in 21 L.R.A. 263.

As to liability where water accumulates on sidewalk by reason of some unusual condition, to the injury of travelers, see note in 58 L.R.A. 321.

matic conditions; that where the winters are so mild that ice and snow are comparatively infrequent, the municipality should be held to a higher degree of diligence. Thus, it was said, in Scoville v. Salt Lake City, 11 Utah, 60, 39 Pac. 481, cited by plaintiff in error: "Differences of climate and locality are to be considered in determining the liability of municipalities for their failure to exercise care in removing ice and snow from their walks. Each case must be considered with reference to the climate of the place. In Minnesota, where snow and ice exist almost constantly through the winter season, to require municipalities to keep their walks absolutely free of ice and snow would be highly unreasonable. But in other localities, and in a warmer climate, like Utah, where snow and ice, although not unusual, are by no means continuous, to require the municipalities to keep their walks free of ice and snow, especially in particular localities, is by no means unreasonable."

An examination of this case discloses, however, that the decision is not placed upon the reasons stated in the excerpt. It appeared that the ice in question was not formed by natural causes, but by water discharged upon the sidewalk by means of a defective conductor, and that the city had permitted the ice to remain for an unreasonable length of time in a rounded and uneven condition, so the portion of the opinion relied upon seems not to have been necessary to the decision. On the other hand, the supreme court of Missouri, in Reedy v. St. Louis Brewing Asso. 161 Mo. 523, 53 L.R.A. 805, 61 S. W. 859, a recent and parallel case, arising in a locality not more subject to the natural accumulation of ice and snow than the city of Concordia, Kansas, if we may take notice of the weather reports, recognizes the force of the rule established in the northern and eastern states, although affirming a judgment against the city upon other grounds. It was held that smooth and slippery ice covering a sidewalk at one place, which formed from water running off the roof of an abutting building on account of a leak in a water pipe, is a dangerous obstacle which the city is bound to remove within a reasonable time after notice, where it was not shown that there was any other ice or snow in the city. The court refers to the well-established doctrine that a city is not liable for injuries caused by smooth and slippery ice, where it has formed generally upon the streets and walks, and where no special defect is shown, and mentions two well-founded reasons for it: First, it is not one of the law's reasonable requirements that a city should remove from the many miles of walks the natural accumulation of ice and snow because such a requirement is impracticable from the nature of things: second, because when these conditions exist generally they are obvious, and everyone who uses the sidewalks at such times is on his guard, warned by the surroundings and the danger of slipping at every step. These reasons meet with our approval. To hold otherwise would cast upon cities a burden for which they are not responsible and greater than their ability to provide for. This rule has reference to a general accumulation of ice or snow from natural causes, where no other defect in the walk is shown, except the natural slippery condition of the ice or snow.

The judgment will be affirmed.

v.

UNITED STATES ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION.

(— Mich. —, 109 N. W. 1042.)

Insurance—accident—indoor baseball.

One running to a base while playing indoor baseball does not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of an accident-insurance policy, by merely overrunning his base and relying on the wall of the building to stop him when he places his hands and feet against it.

(December 3, 1906.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on an accident-insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

Plaintiff, thirty-six years of age, was engaged in playing a game of indoor baseball in the gymnasium of the Young Men's Christian Association. The floor was smooth and slippery. The game is played with a soft ball. Plaintiff was batting, and, having ball. Plaintiff was abating, and, having struck the ball, ran to first base, 20 feet from the home plate. The side wall of the

so. seems to be the first case to decide the question whether playing ball constitutes an exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of an insurance policy. A discussion of the general question, What constitutes voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger? with a review of the various authorities in which the point has been decided, will be found in a subject note in 40 L.R.A. 432.

gymnasium was between 6 and 10 feet beyond the first base. The pitcher caught the ball, tossed it at plaintiff, and touched him, before he could reach the first base. He ran beyond the base, and put out his foot and hand against the wall, which he had been in the habit of doing, to stop himself. His ankle was broken. He had a policy in the defendant company. In his application plaintiff agreed that the benefits under the policy "shall not extend to or cover voluntary or unnecessary exposure to danger." The court directed a verdict for the defendant, holding that the accident was the result of an involuntary and unnecessary exposure to danger.

He based his direction upon the following testimony, given by plaintiff upon cross-examination:

Q. Now, you were running so hard that you could not stop yourself until you ran against the wall; that was the fact, was it?

A. Well, I would not say as to that.

Q. Why didn't you stop, if that was not a fact?

A. Oh, I was feeling good. I felt like running.

Q. Felt like running against a wall?

A. Not necessarily.

Q. Well, you saw the wall, didn't you?

A. Yes.

Q. You knew you were 35 feet away from it, where you stood?

A. Well, sir, in that neighborhood, I suppose.

Q. You were running so hard that you could not stop yourself until you ran into the wall?

A. Oh, I might, if I had tried.

Q. Why didn't you?

A. I don't know why I didn't. It wasn't necessary.

Q. What's that?

A. I don't know why I didn't. I didn't, though.

Q. You didn't think it was necessary to stop when you were running, to prevent your running against the wall, to prevent yourself running against the wall?

A. I was not running very hard.

Q. Why did you run into the wall, if you were not running very hard?

A. Oh, that was just the way I had of stopping.

Q. What?

A. That was just the way of stopping, was all.

Q. The wall stopped you?

A. Yes.

Q. You didn't stop at all? You didn't stop yourself at all? You ran right into the wall?

A. You might put it that way; yes.

Q. Well, that is the fact, isn't it?

A. I didn't stop until I struck the wall.

Contributory negligence has no place in the law of accident insurance.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

That negligence which would defeat a plaintiff in an action for damages on account of the negligence of a defendant finds no place as a defense in the law of insurance against accidents. Such contracts must be shorn of much of their value if ordinary contributory negligence could be interposed as a defense. Thoughtless and inconsiderate acts are some of the very things which these policies are designed to cover. One might easily ascertain whether his gun was loaded before he undertook to clean it. The hunter, in going through the brush, or getting over a fence, or rowing in his boat, should be careful to handle his gun so as to prevent accident. One climbing a ladder should see that the rounds were sound and securely fastened. Ordinary prudence would require these precautions, but hundreds of accidents happen because they are not taken. The term "voluntary exposure to danger" means a realization that an accident will in all probability result, and an injury follow, from the action about to be taken. The danger of injury must be obvious. That point has been decided in this court in Johnson v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 115 Mich. 86, 40 L.R.A. 440, 69 Am. St. Rep. 549, 72 N. W. 1115, where we said: "The term, 'voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger,' as used in an accident policy exempting the insurer from liability for injuries caused by such exposure, means a conscious or intentional exposure, involving gross or wanton negligence on the part of the insured." This is the well-established rule. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Sittig, 181 Ill. 111, 48 L.R.A. 359, 54 N. E. 903; United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Hubbell, 56 Ohio St. 516, 40 L.R.A. 453, 47 N. Railway Pass. Assur. Co.* 6 Lans. 71; Follis v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 94 Iowa, 435, 28 L. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

R.A. 78, 58 Am. St. Rep. 408, 62 N. W. 807; Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157.

Plaintiff did not anticipate injury from doing what he had done before, and what others have repeatedly done. There was no obvious danger of injury. Granting that he might have stopped, we cannot say that there would not have been as much danger in trying to stop upon a slippery floor as in running against the wall. A jury would be justified in finding that the plaintiff had no anticipation of an accident, and did not realize that there was any danger. Even if he were careless, and might have avoided running against the wall, but in doing so did not realize any danger, he was entitled to recover. The learned circuit judge was in error in directing a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

Headnotes by LEWIS, J.

Case Note.—Duty to relieve servant who, without master's fault, has been caught in a dangerous situation: — There is some conflict of opinion as to a master's duty to his servant who has fallen into a painful or perilous position without the former's fault. Some cases proceed on the theory that when an employee is placed in such a situation the master is under no positive legal duty to exercise all reasonable care and diligence to effect such employee's speedy release. Being in no way responsible for the unfortunate occurrence, the master, it is declared, cannot be said to be guilty of a tort for the reason that he does not promptly take active steps in coming to the rescue. The only duty arising under such circumstances is deemed to be one of humanity, and, for a breach thereof, the law does not impose any liability.

This doctrine finds support in the case of Allen v. Hixson, 111 Ga. 460, 36 S. E. 810, which is set out at length by the court in its opinion in RAASCH v. ELITE LAUNDRY Co. The Allen Case is, however, distin-jury. Held, the master, after notice of the situation, was required to exercise ordinary care to release employee and alleviate her suffering, and whether he did so under the circumstances was a question for the jury.

Same—contributory negligence.

2. The fact that the employee contributed to the injury by her own negligence in assuming the risks of operating the machine, and that the master was not responsible for the injury occasioned in the first instance, does not change the application of the rule.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County denying a motion for verdict non obstante veredicto and granting a new trial because of excessive damages after verdict in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. W. Lawler and Frank M. Nye, for appellants:

Defendants owed no duty of rescue to the plaintiff.

Allen v. Hixson, 111 Ga. 460, 36 S. E. 810; Stager v. Troy Laundry Co. 38 Or. 480, 53 L.R.A. 459, 63 Pac. 645; Jones v. Granite Mills Co. 126 Mass. 84, 30 Am. Rep. 661.

In the absence of an obligation to rescue plaintiff, there are in this case no grounds upon which the defendant Elite Laundry Company can be held liable.

guishable from RAASCH v. ELITE LAUNDRY Co. for the reason that the injury suffered in that instance occurred while the servant was acting the part of a mere volunteer, endeavoring to accomplish something entirely outside of her employment, so that the relation between the parties at the time of the injury was really that existing between strangers; and the proof shows that the injury would not have occurred if the servant had confined herself to the performance of duties pertaining to the service for which she was employed.

A more humane doctrine is asserted in the case of Stager v. Troy Laundry Co. 38 Or. 480, 53 L.R.A. 459, 63 Pac. 645, which is also discussed at length in the opinion in RAASCH v. ELITE LAUNDRY Co.

St. Rep. 17, 25 So. 793, in which the court held that the failure of a superintendent of a coal mine to adopt reasonable and proper measures to save the lives of miners caught in the mine in which a fire had accidentally broken out rendered the employer liable for their death. The court said it was the duty of the superintendent to do all that an ordinarily prudent and careful man would do under the circumstances, and the employer was liable if he failed to do this and injury resulted to an employee. The court further stated that, to excuse the employer from liability for a neglect of this duty because of the supersensitiveness of the superintendent's nervous system would be to allow employers generally to escape the burden the statute puts upon them, by employing superintendents who are especially excitable and given to losing their heads on important occasions.

Northern R. Co. 76 Minn. 306, 79 N. W. 168; Rawitzer v. St. Paul City R. Co. 93 Minn. 84, 100 N. W. 664.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant had in use in its laundry an ironing mangle of ordinary pattern, which was heated and operated by steam, and consisted of a steel cylinder about 4 feet in diameter, and a series of felt rolls about 6 inches in diameter, with a number of other rolls, pulleys, aprons, etc. Close to the cylinder was located a small roller, called the "whipper," and its purpose was to separate the articles and fabrics from the surface of the cylinder and cause them to pass, by means of aprons and other appliances, to a delivery platform on the other side of the mangle. It was respondent's duty to feed articles into the machine, and she was assisted by Leone Waldoock, who stood upon the platform to the left of the feeder, and operated the lever under respondent's direction, and applied the power and stopped it upon signals by her. It sometimes happened, while feeding fabrics into the mangle, that they would wind around the whipper, and on the occasion of this accident a couple of sheets wound around it. The machine was stopped by Leone for the purpose of unwinding the articles, and, while respondent was in the act of doing so, Leone, without the usual signal, started the machine, thereby catching the tips of the fingers of respondent's right hand between the cylinder and whipper. Respondent cried out, and the machine was immediately stopped, but she could not extricate her fingers, and Mr. Carter, president and manager of appellant company, was notified and came over to respondent, and for some reason took hold of the lever and started the mangle sufficiently to draw respondent's hand at least 4 or 5 inches farther between the rollers and bring it in contact with the heated cylinder. Respondent again cried out, and the machine was stopped, but before her hand was released serious damage resulted, and this action was based upon the following acts of negligence: That the machine was of a complex construction, difficult of operation, and inherently defective; that necessary tools were not provided for its adjustment; incompetency of assistant, and failure to properly instruct her; and also that, after being notified that respondent's hand was caught between the rollers, appellants negligently started the machine in motion, thereby drawing respondent's hand in still farther between the rollers and causing additional injury. The trial resulted in a verdict of $8,500 for respondent, whereupon appellants made an alternative motion for judgment in its favor notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial. The motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict was denied, and a new trial granted, upon the ground that the verdict was excessive and not justified by the evidence, and upon the further ground that the court had committed error in not giving certain requests in respect to appellants' negligence in starting the machine.

The trial court was of opinion that there was no evidence indicating negligence on the part of appellants, except the act of Mr. Carter in starting the mangle after he had been notified that respondent's fingers were caught, and submitted to the jury for their determination whether appellants were in the exercise of ordinary care when Mr. Carter so manipulated the machine as to increase her injuries. The evidence tends to support respondent's claim that after Mr. Carter was notified her fingers were caught in the mangle he came over, took hold of the lever, and started the machine, but there is no evidence to support the suggestion that it was done with any wilful purpose to injure her. It is evident that, if he had not touched the lever and started the mangle, but had resorted to means at his command for loosening the whipper, respondent's hand might have been released with comparatively slight injury. The act of starting the mangle without pausing to investigate the extent to which respondent's hand was caught, and without endeavoring to release it by unfastening the set screw, or by some other method, is difficult of comprehension. Mr. Carter denied that he did move the lever, but the evidence to the contrary is strong, and at least that question was for the jury; but he says that, if he did take hold of the lever and move the machine, it was for the purpose of testing it to see if the motive power was entirely turned off, and, if injury resulted, it was because of mistake in judgment on his part. We are asked by appellants to rule that, under the circumstances presented by this case, it appears, as a matter of law, that Mr. Carter was placed in an emergency, and, there being no evidence to indicate that he was actuated by any wilful purpose against respondent, appellants must be exonerated. In our judgment, the record does not conclusively show that the act of Mr. Carter in starting the machine is to be accounted for solely upon the ground of mistake of judgment. His explanation of why he started the mangle, if he did so, indicates lamentable ignorance on his part of the possible consequences, or extraordinary recklessness, unless he was greatly excited and made a mistake. Mr. Carter was required to use ordinary care to prevent further injury to respondent after discovering that her hand was caught in the mangle, and whether he did use ordinary care depended upon his knowledge and means of acquiring knowledge of the details of the business. This involved the mechanism of the machine, the different ways in which respondent's hand might have been released, the fact that it had been customary to keep tools in the near vicinity for the very purpose of adjusting the machine, the fact that the safe way to unwind a wrapper was to loosen the set screw and so release it, and the fact that, at the time Mr. Carter was called, the mangle was at rest; all of which have a bearing upon his conduct, and if, in the opinion of the jury, he failed to exercise the care which an ordinarily prudent superintendent would have done, then he and the company were responsible for his act. On the contrary, if the jury were of opinion that, in view of all the facts, Mr. Carter did what he believed to be the proper thing, and that the accident occurred as a result of a mistake, or error in judgment such as ordinary prudence could not have foreseen, then no responsibility followed.

In the case of Allen v. Hixson, 111 Ga. 460, 36 S. E. 810, a young woman operating a laundry mangle discovered that the rollers were out of adjustment and notified the superintendent thereof, and, in order to show him the real condition, took hold of the unwrapped end of the cloth to raise it and allow an inspection of the rollers, and, by reason of some hidden defect in some part of the machine, a sudden and violent jolt caused a revolution of the rollers instantly drawing her hand between them. As one of the grounds for damages in an action by her against the company, it was claimed that the agents of the company unnecessarily and negligently delayed releasing plaintiff's hand, and that by reason thereof she received additional injuries, with reference to which the court said: "When an employee, without fault on the master's part, becomes placed in a dangerous or painful situation, the master is under no positive legal duty of exercising all reasonable care and diligence to effect such employee's speedy release. Being in no way responsible for the unfortunate occurrence, the master cannot be said to be guilty of a tort if he does not promptly take active steps in coming to the rescue. The only duty arising under such circumstances is one of humanity, and for a breach thereof the law does not, so far as we are informed, impose any liability." This case is relied upon as authority for the proposition that, if appellants were not guilty of any of the acts charged prior to starting the machine, then no new legal duty arose, and Mr. Carter was a mere stranger in what he did, and the company was not bound by his act. We consider this case unsound in principle and contrary to the great weight of authority.

A similar case, also relied upon by appellants, is that of Stager v. Troy Laundry Co. 38 Or. 480, 53 L.R.A. 459, 63 Pac. 645. There a new trial was ordered by the appellate court upon the ground that the trial court had given an erroneous instruction to the effect that, even if plaintiff was at fault and brought the mischief upon herself, she was nevertheless entitled to recover if defendant failed to do any act which would minimize her injury. The court was of opinion that, under the facts, it appeared that defendant did all it reasonably could to extricate plaintiff as quickly as possible, and could not be held for damages upon that ground. In that instance, the machine was a new one and had been in operation only twelve days before the accident, and the only knowledge defendant's manager had obtained was from seeing it set up by the agent, and from seeing one of the same make operated for a short time in another city. Upon the trial it was admitted by the manager that, if he had better understood the machine, and had known how to quickly unloosen the roller, the injury need not have been so great, and because of their ignorance they had to get a crowbar and pry the roller up before she could be released. The court were undoubtedly correct in ordering a new trial on the ground that the instruction was erroneous; but we cannot agree that the facts stated warranted the court in concluding, as a matter of law, that the company's representatives had done all they reasonably could, and that it conclusively appeared from those facts that they were not liable by reason of the delay. We cannot accept as sound the proposition that a master may set up a dangerous machine, put untrained and ignorant employees at work upon it without giving them proper instructions, and when injury occurs, even on account of their own negligence, be excused upon the ground that he did not understand the machine and did not know how to effect a release of the injured one in the quickest possible manner. We believe the true rule to be that the master is required to take reasonable measures to understand his machinery, know how it operates, and to anticipate possible injury to his employees, and provide the necessary means for controlling and taking it apart in cases of emergency; and in the Oregon case, the fact that no such knowledge was ascertained, that no reasonable precautions had been taken, nor necessary tools provided, were proper elements to be taken into account in determining whether, under the circumstances, after discovery of injury, the master used ordinary care in effecting a release.

We are referred by appellants to Union P. R. Co. v. Cappier, 69 L.R.A. 513, and to the note of the editor, where it is claimed the proper rule applicable to such cases is stated: "Feelings of kindness and sympathy may move the good Samaritan to minister to the needs of the sick and wounded at the roadside; but the law imposes no such obligation, and suffering humanity has no legal complaint. . . . Unless, therefore, the relation existing between the sick, helpless, or injured, and those who witness their distress, is such that the law imposes the duty of providing the necessary relief, there is neither obligation to minister on the one hand, nor cause for legal complaint on the other." In that case a trespasser upon the railway tracks was struck down by a moving freight car pushed by an engine, without any fault on the part of the company, and it was held that the failure of the railway employees operating the car and the engine to take charge of the wounded man and give him care and attention was not a violation of the legal duty for which the company was liable, and that the case was distinguished from those where the servants of the railroad company were at fault, and also from those where the injury was occasioned without fault, and the negligent acts or omissions occurred after the company had taken the injured person in charge. The company was charged with negligence in failing to take proper care of the injured person, on account of which he bled to death. In the opinion an attempt was made to distinguish the case from Northern C. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 420, 96 Am. Dec. 545, and to justify the latter decision upon the ground that, in that case, the railroad company's employees actually took possession of the injured man and locked him up in a warehouse, and that, having interfered and taken him in charge, the law raised an obligation on their part to see to it that he was properly cared for. This is untenable, and, as we understand the note to the decision, is not approved of by the editor, which seems apparent from the consideration of the cases given under the fifth division, at page 533 of 69 L.R.A., where the authorities are collected and reviewed.

The true doctrine in respect to such cases is applied in Northern C. R. Co. v. State, supra, where the deceased was run over and injured by a train. After the train was stopped the injured man was found on the pilot of the engine in a helpless and apparently lifeless condition, and was removed and locked up in a warehouse at night by the employees of the railroad, and upon opening the warehouse in the morning the man was found to have regained consciousness during the night and to have afterwards died from hemorrhage of an artery severed by the collision. It was held that, from whatever cause the collision occurred, it at once became the duty of the railway company's agents in charge of the train to remove the injured person with a proper regard to his safety and the laws of humanity; and if, in removing and locking him up, although he was apparently dead, negligence was committed whereby his death was caused, there was no principle of reason or of justice upon which the railroad company could be exonerated from responsibility. Weitzman v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 33 App. Div. 585, 53 N. Y. Supp. 905, is a similar case, where a child was struck by an electric car and thrown into the fender and carried a considerable distance, and rolled off and was killed by being crushed under the wheels. It was held that, irrespective of whether the child was guilty of contributory negligence in the first instance, when he was thrown into the fender, of which the employees of the company had knowledge, the company became liable for any further injury which could have been prevented by the exercise of "reasonable care." The Alabama court has applied the same principle in Pannell v. Nashville, F. & S. R. Co. 97 Ala. 298, 12 So. 236, where it was held that, although the injured person was guilty of negligence in attempting to pass between two cars, the company were required to use reasonable care to release him and not cause further injury after discovering his peril, stating the rule as follows: "It is a well-settled principle that, when one person, whether natural or artificial, is about to be the means or instrument of doing an injury to another, that other's negligence contributing proximately to it, does not, per se, exonerate the actor from all further effort; does not, per se, relieve him or it from all responsibility for the consequences. Supine inaction, or stolid indifference to consequences, the law does not tolerate. The actor, no matter how free from fault, and no matter how negligent the one in peril may have been, must resort to every reasonable means and employ every reasonable agency to avert the catastrophe."

We perceive no vital distinction between cases where the master or his servant make no attempt to relieve the sufferings of an injured person, as in Union P. R. Co. v. Cappier, supra, and cases where such attempt is made but negligently performed, as in Northern C. R. Co. v. State, supra; and if there is any distinction between those cases where the master is in no way at fault prior to the accident and those where he was originally negligent, a stricter rule as to subsequent conduct should apply in the latter class, although we do not place our decision on this distinction. Those who employ methods or instrumentalities which are naturally dangerous, and are liable to be the means of causing injury to the ignorant and unfortunate, should be required to take reasonable means to alleviate the suffering occasioned by an accident, although up to that time the master is under no legal duty to respond in damages. In this case the evidence tends to indicate that appellants were culpably negligent in failing to instruct respondent and her assistant how to properly loosen the whipper, and in failing to keep on hand a set of tools for that purpose; and, although there is evidence tending to show that respondent assumed the risk of working with her assistant under those conditions, thereby relieving appellants from the consequences of their negligence, yet the duty remained with them to use all reasonable means to provide their employees with reasonably safe surroundings and means of accomplishing their work, and take all reasonable means to prevent further injury, and alleviate the suffering of an injured employee in case of an accident.

The trial court, in laying down the test by which appellants were to be judged, stated that it was the duty of appellants, upon discovering that respondent's hand was caught in the rollers, to exercise reasonable care to release it,—such care as men of ordinary prudence exercise under similar circumstances. And, further, in determining that question, the jury should consider the excitement, if any, attendant upon the situation, and of the circumstances in the case, and decide whether or not Mr. Carter was exercising reasonable care in releasing respondent's hand. As bearing upon the question of the degree of care, appellants requested the court to give the following instruction: "If you find that the defendant Carter by mistake started the machine, and you believe that was a mistake which a person of ordinary care and caution would, under the circumstances of excitement attending the occasion, have done, or have been likely to do, then you should find it was not a failure on his part to exercise ordinary care, and no recovery on that account can be had." The court was of opinion, in granting the motion for a new trial, that this request should have been given. In order to avoid possible confusion hereafter, we may say that the request was proper as bearing upon the principal question, whether or not Mr. Carter was exercising that degree of care which prudent men would exercise under like circumstances. It necessarily follows that, if the act which he performed was such an act as would have been performed by a person of ordinary care and caution under such circumstances, then it meets the test of ordinary care. A person is not liable for a mistake in judgment actuated by an emergency and under excitement; but whether or not that be the real explanation is only ascertained by the application of the usual test, viz., What would a prudent man do under similar circumstances? Bittner v. Cross-town Street R. Co. 153 N. Y. 76, 60 Am. St. Rep. 588, 46 N. E. 1044.

Order affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

LOTTIE G. NORTON, Appt.,

v.

JAY H. BRINK.

(— Neb. —, 110 N. W. 669.)

Partnership—agreement to contribute.

1. A parol agreement between two persons to purchase a single tract of land together, or "in partnership," where the purchase is finally made by one of them, who pays the whole of the purchase price and takes the title to himself, the other simply agreeing to pay him one half thereof on demand, does not create a partnership between such persons.

Same—statute of frauds.

2. Such a contract is within the inhibition of § 3 of chapter 32 of the Compiled Statutes of 1905 (Cobbey's Anno. Stat. 1903, § 5952), commonly called the "statute of frauds," and is void.

Resulting trust—partnership in real estate.

3. In such a case no resulting trust arises in favor of one who contributes nothing to the payment of the purchase price.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Buffalo County in defendant's favor in an action brought to secure a share of the profits of an alleged partnership in real estate. Affirmed.

A decision was reached and an opinion handed down in this case on January 18, 1906, reversing the judgment of the court below, but a rehearing was granted, and, upon further consideration, the court reached the opposite conclusion, and affirmed the judgment of the trial court, thereby making immaterial the former opinion.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. H. M. Sinclair also for appellee.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This case was originally submitted to department No. 2 of the commission, and an opinion was written, filed, and announced reversing the judgment below. See Norton v. Brink, 106 N. W. 668. A rehearing has been allowed, and the case has been reargued and submitted to the court, and the question now is, Shall we adhere to our former decision? In order to determine that question it is proper to set forth the contract sued on, which the appellant claims has been established by the evidence.

The action was commenced by the appellant against J. H. Brink, the son, and only heir at law, of one C. D. Brink, deceased, and the petition recites, in substance, that the said plaintiff and said Brink, the deceased, entered into a verbal contract, wherein and whereby it was mutually agreed that the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 30, township 10, range 15 W., in Buffalo county, should be purchased in partnership, each party to pay one half of the purchase money, expense of operating the same, and upon sale divide the profits or loss, as the case might be; that it was further agreed that said Brink should advance the entire purchase money, take the legal title in his name; and that plaintiff should, upon demand, reimburse the said Brink for half of the purchase price so advanced, with interest at 6 per cent per annum. The petition further alleges that said premises were purchased for the sum of \$4,000, said Brink paying the entire purchase price, the legal title being vested in the said Charles D. Brink, as aforesaid; that, on the 30th day of November, 1902, and before any demand had been made for the repayment of the purchase money, and before any settlement had been had between the plaintiff and the said C. D. Brink, in respect to said partnership, as aforesaid, the said C. D. Brink, departed this life, leaving his son his sole heir at law, the defendant herein; that, since the death of the said C. D. Brink, the plaintiff has at all times been ready and willing to pay her share of the said purchase money, and interest upon the same, but that the defendant refuses and continues to refuse to accept the same; that, on or about the 15th day of May, 1903, said defendant sold said premises for the sum of \$6,400, and refused to recognize said partnership agreement, and refuses to pay the plaintiff any portion of the profits realized upon the said land as aforesaid. The petition concludes with a prayer for an accounting of the purchase money, for the rents and profits, and that the defendant be required to pay her the sum of \$1,200 with interest from May 15, 1903, as her share of the profits realized from the sale of said lands. Upon the contract thus set forth the right of the appellant to maintain this action must stand or fall.

Her first contention briefly stated, is that the contract established a partnership between herself and the deceased, and comes 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

within the rule announced in Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare, 369; Richards v. Grinnell, 63 Iowa, 44, 50 Am. Rep. 727, 18 N. W. 668; Pennybacker v. Leary, 65 Iowa, 220, 21 N. W. 575, and other cases, which hold that a contract entered into for the purpose of speculating in lands is not within the statute of frauds, and need not be in writing; that, where the parties have contracted to engage in the venture of buying lands which are to be held in trust for both of them, and they are to have equal interests and shares in the common speculation, such agreement constitutes a partnership, and an action by one partner against the other for an accounting as to the partnership transactions may be maintained, although the partnership funds may be invested in land. While the authorities are divided on this question, we deem it unnecessary to express any opinion as to the soundness of this rule, because it seems clear to us that the agreement here in question is not embraced therein. It will be observed that nothing is said in this contract about entering into a general or special partnership, or that the purpose thereof was to sell the land for profit. Its language is: "It was mutually agreed that said land should be purchased in partnership." Buying land together does not make the purchasers partners, nor does the transaction constitute a partnership with its rights, duties, and obligations as defined by law. "A partnership is the contract relation subsisting between persons who have combined their property, labor, or skill in an enterprise or business as principals, for the purpose of joint profit." Bates, Partn. § 1. To constitute a partnership there must be a mutual agency, and a communion of profit and loss, and the parties must assume the partnership relation. It seems clear to us that the contract to purchase the land in question "as partners," conceding for the purpose of this opinion that such contract was established by the evidence, together with the purchase of the land by Brink, the deceased, and payment therefor with his own money, did not establish a partnership between the appellant and the deceased. Again, the appellant did nothing upon her part; contributed nothing, risked nothing, and there was no consideration to support the contract.

It will be observed that, under the agreement, a sale of the land was not obligatory upon anyone. In short there is nothing in the contract that distinguishes it from the ordinary agreement of two or more persons to purchase land together, not for the profits of speculation on resale, but for the profits arising out of the ownership of the land itself; and this must be held to be the true meaning of the contract. But, however this may be, there was no sale of the land by the alleged partnership; neither was there any sale of it by the deceased, who, it is claimed, was one of the partners, and by his death the partnership, if one ever existed, was terminated. The petition discloses that Brink died on the 30th day of November, 1902, and within five months after he purchased the land in question. After his death the partnership could not sell the land, because, if there ever was a partnership, it had then ceased to exist. The appellant could not sell the land as a surviving partner, because, according to the theory advanced by counsel to support her case, she had no interest or estate therein. At any rate she had no title to convey. Again, counsel has not pointed out to us any rule of law or equity that authorizes the appellant to maintain a suit for an accounting against the heir of her alleged deceased partner. It seems to us that this case falls within the rule of Bates on Partnerships, § 302, where it is said: "A parol agreement by the buyer of lands to admit another into partnership with him is void under the statute of frauds, as not different from the contract of buyer and seller." There is a clear distinction between the case at bar and those cases where a partnership was formed to deal or speculate in lands, and lands are bought with partnership funds in pursuance of such an agreement. In Levy v. Brush, 45 N. Y. 589, it was said: A verbal contract between two parties by which one is to purchase land on joint account of both, and each to contribute a moiety of the purchase money, the title to be made to both, is void under the statute of frauds. In that case the defendant bid off the land in his own name, and took a contract therefor, but refused to convey one half of the contract to the plaintiff, and it was held that no action would lie to compel the execution of the agreement because such an arrangement did not constitute a partnership between them; that the defendant had made no valid contract, and had a perfect right, both in law and equity, to refuse performance. In our former opinion it was said, on the authority of Smith v. Putnam, 107 Wis. 155, 82 N. W. 1077, 83 N. W. 288, "that, in cases of this character, where the agreement relating to the land has been fully completed and nothing remains to be done but to distribute the profits of a sale made, then the partnership relation may be established by parol;" and the judgment of the trial court was reversed mainly upon that authority. It would seem that the learned commissioner who wrote the opinion overlooked the allegations in appellant's petition charging the defendant with refusing to recognize her rights, and with repudiating the alleged contract of partnership. Again, an examination of Smith v. Putnam, supra, discloses the fact that the contract there was an oral agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants that plaintiff should investigate desirable timbered lands and on defendants' approval they would purchase and either sell or log them. The agreement was that the plaintiff should take charge of the driving of the logs, which contemplated his rendering material and valuable services as his contribution to the partnership funds. They entered upon the agreement, and the plaintiff did render services of value to the partnership. It was held that this agreement constituted a partnership; and, where the contract had been fully completed and executed, and nothing remained but to divide the profits, an action for an accounting and to recover such profits would lie. If the rule there announced could be applied in the case at bar, it could be applied to any case of oral contract to purchase land on joint account. If the transaction would otherwise be within the statute of frauds, it would only be necessary for the parties to stipulate that it should be a partnership, and the statute would be avoided. So we are constrained to hold that the contract here in question did not create or constitute a partnership.

2. Appellant next contends that, while the contract does not create an interest in the land in question, and therefore is not within the statute of frauds, yet, by the agreement, and the facts relating to the purchase, a resulting trust was created in her favor; that, by reason of such trust relation, she acquired a half interest in the land, and is entitled to recover one half of the profits arising from the sale thereof, from the defendant, who took the title to the land by inheritance. It would seem that her position is not maintainable. The fact that the appellant paid or contributed nothing towards the purchase price of the land is fatal to her contention. The rule is that, in order to establish a resulting trust of this class, it is necessary that the person paying the purchase money should have actually paid it as his own, as a part of the original transaction, at or before the time of the conveyance. The whole foundation of resulting trusts of this class is the ownership and payment of the purchase money by one when the title is taken in the name of another. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 8; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. § 1037. And we are not aware that the soundness of this rule has ever been seriously questioned.

In Brooks v. Fowle, 14 N. H. 249, it was said: "A purchase of real estate completed on the credit of two, and afterwards paid for wholly by one of them, does not of itself give rise to a resulting trust." In Hackney v. Butts, 41 Ark. 393, it was held that, where no money is advanced, and there is nothing more in the transaction than is implied from the violation of a parol agreement, equity will not decree the purchaser a trustee. The rule of equity is that a resulting trust must have arisen at the time the purchase was made, and the money or consideration must have been paid, or secured to be paid, by such third party at or before the purchase. McElroy v. Swope (C. C.) 47 Fed. 380. The same rule has prevailed in this court since the decision of Hoehne v. Breitreitz, 5 Neb. 110, to the present time. In Cameron v. Nelson, 57 Neb. 381, 77 N. W. 771, Commissioner Irvine said: "Next, there are cases where two men join in the purchase of land, taking title in one who is to resell and divide profits. Such contracts are usually enforced, although not in writing; but it will be seen there is, in such cases, a resulting trust from contributing to the purchase money." It is urged that the case of Johnson v. Hayward (Neb.) 103 N. W. 1058, sustains our former opinion. An examination of that case discloses that it was one where a person employed an agent to negotiate the purchase of certain real estate for him; that the agent, while acting as such, became himself the purchaser, and it was held that he should not be permitted, without his principal's knowledge and consent, to become the purchaser of the same property for himself; and, if he makes such purchase, he will be considered as holding the property in trust for his principal. So it seems clear that the rule there announced has no application to the facts in the case at bar. We are, therefore, of opinion that the contract, the purchase of the land, and the facts surrounding the transaction were insufficient to create a resulting trust in favor of the appellant.

Counsel for the appellee insists that the appellant's right to recover has been adjudicated by the county court of Buffalo county in the matter of the claim filed by her against the administrator of the estate of C. D. Brink, on account of the purchase of the land in question, adversely to such right; that the judgment in that case is a bar to her right to recover in this action. We deem it unnecessary to determine that question, because we are constrained to hold: First, that no partnership was created by the transaction in question between the appellant and the deceased, C. D. Brink; 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the contract relied on by the appellant is within the inhibition of § 3 of chapter 32 of the Compiled Statutes of 1905, commonly called the "statute of frauds." Second, that no resulting trust in favor of the appellant was created thereby. It also seems clear that, in order to maintain this action against the heir of the deceased, appellant must have had an interest in the land in question which she could follow into his hands, and either compel him to convey to her, her interest therein, or account to her for the profits arising from the sale thereof. For the want of such interest, as well as for the other reasons above stated, she cannot maintain this action.

Our former judgment is therefore vacated, and the judgment of the District Court dismissing the appellant's cause of action is affirmed.

Letton, J., concurring:

I concur in the conclusion reached. I think the action cannot be maintained for two reasons:

1. Granting that the relation between the plaintiff and the deceased was a partnership relation, the plaintiff's interest was not in the land itself, but in the profits derived from the transaction. This was a personal liability of the deceased, and consequently a liability of his estate for which the administrator was answerable out of the estate. To hold that the plaintiff could follow the land itself would be to say that the alleged oral contract gave her an interest in the land, which would be obnoxious to the statute of frauds. If the alleged partnership had been to deal in live stock or merchandise, the title to which was taken in the name of the deceased, his estate would be liable on account to the other partner. The fact that the property which is alleged to have been the subject of the partnership was real estate does not change the rule. It is not the property itself, but her interest in the profits derived from the same, which the plaintiff is seeking to recover; and this, in my view, is the only theory upon which she may maintain such an action. Everhart's Appeal, 106 Pa. 349; Bunell v. Taintor, 4 Conn. 572; McElroy v. Swope (C. C.) 47 Fed. 386.

2. The plaintiff properly filed her claim in the county court of Buffalo county against the estate for her share of the profits. A demurrer to this claim was filed, was sustained by the county judge, and her action dismissed. No appeal was taken, and this judgment stands in full force and effect. The county judge testified, in substance, that the attorney for plaintiff said he would withdraw it or it could be dismissed, but that, a demurrer or objection having been filed, he thought he would make some order upon it, and he made the order dismissing or disallowing the claim; that there never was any hearing upon the merits. This testimony is not sufficient to vacate, set aside, or annul the adjudication of the claim, as shown upon the records. If the judgment was inadvertently rendered or made by mistake, the plaintiff's remedy was to have it set aside by the means provided by law for that purpose. Until this is done it stands as an adjudication, and cannot be obliterated by parol testimony either of the judge who rendered it, or of any other individual. As it now stands, it finally adjudicates the plaintiff's claim against her, and she cannot maintain another action upon the same cause.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN VASSOR, Appt.,

v.

[142 N. C. 68, 54 S. E. 849.]

Railroad conductor—authority.

1. The conductor of a freight train has no implied authority to engage the services of a person to assist in handling freight for which he is to receive passage on the train, so as to entitle such person, in case of his injury, to hold the carrier liable as an employer.

Same—burden of proof.

2. The burden of showing authority on the part of a conductor of a freight train to employ an assistant is upon one asserting such authority, and the railroad company has not the burden of disproving it.

Carrier—injury to one on train—liability.

3. One injured while riding on a freight train is not entitled to have his action for damages go to the jury on the theory that the carrier owed him the measure of duty prescribed for either a passenger or an employee, in the absence of any evidence showing the existence of either relation.

Note.—The subject of the liability of a railroad company for injury to one wrongfully on a train by collusion with an employee is covered in a case note in 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1025.

In the case of O'Donnell v. Kansas City, St. L. & C. R. Co. 197 Mo. 110, 95 S. W. 196, reported after that note was prepared, the court held, in accordance with the doctrine of the cases in that note, that one who gained passage on a freight train by an agreement with a brakeman to assist in loading and unloading freight at stations 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Conductor—employment of assistant—ratification—evidence.

4. Evidence that, several months after the injury to one riding on a freight train, the railroad company issued to him a pass describing him as an injured employee, is not admissible as tending to show ratification of the conductor's act in permitting him to ride in consideration of services to be rendered in handling freight.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Northampton County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

Action for personal injury sustained by plaintiff while on defendant's freight train. The plaintiff testified that on the 26th day of May, 1902, he boarded defendant's local freight, running from Rocky Mount to Richmond, at Garysburg, North Carolina. He then described the circumstances under which he went upon the train: "As I was going to Richmond I asked the conductor on the train if I could come back with him the next day on his train. Capt. Moody had charge of the train going to Richmond. He said 'Yes.' I was to help unload freight and load freight. I went to Richmond to take another man's run. He told me he would give me his place for ten days. He was a brakeman. I was expecting to get his place that night and come back next day. Did not get it, as he decided not to give it to me. I got on train between Richmond and Manchester after it started. I did not see conductor that day. Could not say he was on that day. It was the same train that I went to Richmond on, known as 'No. 90.' Capt. Moody was conductor on train that blew me up. The train stopped in Manchester yards, when I got on. William Savage was there. I got on flat car not loaded, next to car along the route was a trespasser on the train, and that the agreement of the brakeman was a fraud on the railroad company and beyond the scope of his employment; and the former cannot recover for personal injuries suffered in a collision. And the facts that the conductor knew the plaintiff was riding on the freight train, saw him at work, and directed him where to put the freight, did not make the plaintiff a passenger, or give him any of the rights of a passenger.

loaded with barrels. Box car behind us. The conductor did not know whether I was on train or not. I saw engineer, fireman, and first brakeman when I got on train day I was hurt, but did not speak to anyone except Savage. The train was local freight, passed Garysburg every day coming and going. I could see it. Same train Mr. Gwaltney was engineer on. He saw me on the train. Two of the brakemen saw me, but did not speak to but one of them. He told me to get on and help unload barrels at next station, Clopton. The brakemen unloaded the car. The engine exploded not more than ten minutes after I got on the car." There was testimony in regard to the extent of injury and value of services. Plaintiff offered to introduce pass issued by defendant September 16, 1902, to plaintiff as an "injured employee" from Richmond to Garysburg. Upon defendant's objection it was excluded. Plaintiff excepted. Upon the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit. Motion allowed, and plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. Peebles & Harris for appellant.

Messrs. Day & Bell, T. W. Mason, and Murray Allen for appellee.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The correctness of his Honor's ruling depends upon whether the defendant sustained any contractual relation to the plaintiff from which a duty arose to him. The testimony presents no question of public duty or duty to the public as discussed in McNeill v. Durham & C. R. Co. 135 N. C. 682, 67 L. R.A. 227, 47 S. E. 765, and other cases in which persons were permitted to go upon passenger trains or mixed trains on which passengers were taken. It is too well settled to call for the citation of authority that a railroad company has the right to classify its trains and assign to them such service as is reasonable. That in the exercise of this right it may operate trains exclusively for carrying freight, and that, when it has done so, no person has a right to demand that he be carried upon such trains as a passenger. It is equally well settled that, before a person can enter upon such a train and acquire the rights of a passenger, he must show some contract made with some servant or agent of the corporation authorized to make such contract. Such authority may be shown either by express grant or necessary implication growing out of the nature or character of the employment. In view of these general and well-settled principles, the question arises whether the conductor, Moody, in charge of the freight train upon which plaintiff was injured, had any authority to establish any contractual relation between plaintiff and the defendant corporation, either as passenger or servant, and impose any duty upon defendant the breach of which, followed by injury, gave a cause of action. The plaintiff insists that by the permission granted him to go upon the train to Richmond and return he became a passenger, or, if he is in error in this, he was, by the agreement with the conductor, made the employee or servant of the corporation. For the purpose of disposing of this appeal, it is not important, or even necessary, to discuss the question whether he became a passenger or an employee, because if he was, at the time of the injury, either, his right to go to the jury on the question of negligence would be the same. We are of the opinion that he was neither a passenger nor an employee.

Assuming, for the purpose of the discussion, that the conductor undertook to employ plaintiff, and that such employment extended to the return trip, the question of power is presented. Elliott, in his work on Railroads, says: "The authority of the conductor ordinarily extends to the control of the movements of his train and to the immediate direction of the movements of the employees engaged in operating the train. . . . His authority does not, ordinarily, extend to making contracts on behalf of the company, but there may be cases of urgent emergency where he may make a contract for the company. He is to administer the rules of the company rather than make contracts for it. . . . The conductor has no general authority to make contracts on behalf of the company, but he may in rare cases of necessity, when circumstances demand it, bind the company by such contracts as are clearly necessary to enable him to carry out his prescribed duties." Elliott, Railroads, § 302. In Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 382, 15 Am. Rep. 513, it is said: "It is a fallacy to argue that a conductor is a general agent for this purpose, assuming that his power would, as a rule, place him under the class of general agents; he only holds that position for the management of a freight train. The fact that the same word, 'conductor,' is used to designate servants in two kinds of business, which the defendant has made perfectly distinct, tends to confusion. There is no real analogy between the duties of a conductor of a passenger train and those of the manager of a strict freight train. A different class of men would naturally be employed in the two cases. The defendant has a right to assign specific duties to the one distinct from those performed by the other. It is a familiar rule in such a case that an agent cannot increase his powers by his own acts;

they must always be included in the acts or conduct of the principal. . . . No act of a conductor of a freight train will bind the company as to carrying passengers, unless the principal in some way assents to it." In the same case it is said: "The employment of brakemen is no part of the ordinary duty of a conductor. The company gave him no power to make any arrangement of the kind. . . . It is not one of those cases where he has an apparent authority, including the act in question, but, owing to a secret fact, does not have it in the particular case." In Baldwin on American Railroad Law, page 248, it is said: "While he may at times have occasion to make or construe, or even vary, contracts of the company, that is not his chief office. He holds, however, a somewhat analogous position to that of a ship master. The owners of the railroad have put him in charge of the persons and property on board of his cars. In case of an emergency, when prompt action, if any, must be taken to protect the interests confided to his care, his ordinary powers may become greatly enlarged." In Files v. Boston & A. R. Co. 149 Mass. 204, 14 Am. St. Rep. 411, 21 N. E. 311, it is said: "In the case at bar, the conductor had no general authority, so far as shown, to take passengers on the locomotive engine, or any special authority to take the plaintiff. The conductor was not only in charge of a freight train, but on a road intended solely for the transportation of freight. The locomotive engine was obviously not intended for passengers, and he had in his charge no vehicle, nor any part of a vehicle, in any way adapted for passengers. In riding for his own convenience in a place where it was not safe or prudent to ride, the plaintiff took on himself the risks of so doing, whether he did so by the license or on the invitation of the conductor. It was not within the apparent scope of the freight conductor's authority to permit persons to ride on his freight train, far less on the locomotive engine thereof; nor can the fact that he had allowed the plaintiff to do so at a previous time, and also that the local freight agent and a conductor were known by the plaintiff to have ridden on the locomotive engine, make the defendant responsible for accidents which occurred thereby." To the same effect are Smith v. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. 124 Ind. 395, 24 N. E. 753; Gardner v. New Haven & N. Co. 51 Conn. 143, 50 Am. Rep. 12. In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Black, 87 Tex. 160, 27 S. W. 118, the question was discussed at length, and it was said: "If the conductor of a freight train, made up of cars suitable alone to carry freight, can, without authority of the railway company, expressly or tacitly given, receive passengers upon such train and bind the railway for the risk of transportation, a conductor of a passenger train may with equal propriety load the coaches of his train with cotton or grain, and make the company liable as a common carrier of freight." The distinction between the powers and rights of the conductor of a freight train and of a passenger train are clearly pointed out in the opinion in this case. It is, however, suggested that the burden would be upon the defendant to show that the conductor had no authority to make the contract of service.

The authorities are to the contrary. In Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. supra, it is said: "There is nothing in the business of a conductor which could lead to the conclusion that he had authority to make contracts with persons to act as brakemen. His apparent duties are to carry forward a train after it is organized. The business of organizing it is, in its nature, wholly distinct. It is, in fact, committed to a 'train despatcher.' Under such circumstances there is no act on the part of the defendant by which he can be estopped from showing the conductor's real authority any more than a commercial house would be if one of its travelers, in the course of a journey, assumed to hire a clerk to do business for his employers at home." In Purple v. Union P. R. Co. 57 L.R.A. 700, 51 C. C. A. 564, 114 Fed. 123. Sanborn, Ch. J., says: "In the absence of any rule or practice permitting freight trains to carry passengers, the presumption is that one riding for his own convenience on a freight train, an engine, a hand car, or any other carriage of a common carrier, that is evidently not designed for the transportation of passengers, is unlawfully there, and is a trespasser." In Cooper v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 136 Ind. 366, 36 N. E. 272, Howard, Ch. J., said: "While the conductor and brakeman were in charge of the train, it does not appear that they had any authority to employ assistance in its management. No emergency is shown for the employment of appellant. . . . No custom, rule, or regulation of the appellee company is shown by which appellant might pay his way by working on the train, assisting the brakeman or other employee. . . . At most, the appellant was upon the train by the sufferance of the conductor and brakeman, who were themselves without authority to so receive him. Any dangers to which he thus became exposed were wholly at his own risk. The company could become liable only for wilful injury to him." In Powers v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 188, 26 N. E. 446, in an opinion of Mr. Justice Devens, it is said: "It was held in Wilton v. Middlesex R. Co. 107 Mass. 108, 9 Am. Rep. 11, that the invitation there given by the defendant's servant to the plaintiff to ride on the horse car which the servant was driving was within the general scope of his employment, and, even if it was contrary to the instructions of the driver, she was not a trespasser. In the case at bar, the plaintiff was not on a passenger train, and he was riding in the caboose of a freight train, in a place which he could not have failed to know was not intended or adapted for the use of passengers, but solely for the accommodation of the defendant's employees engaged in managing the train. Even if, therefore, the plaintiff had an invitation from the conductor of the freight train, he could not have supposed that the conductor was acting within the general scope of his employment, or that, independently of any rules of the corporation, the conductor had any authority to extend such an invitation. The ordinary business of conducting and managing a freight train does not involve any right to invite persons to ride upon such trains, or to accept them as passengers." In Eaton's Case, supra, Dwight, Ch. J., speaking of a contention similar to that of plaintiff's says "The contention of the plaintiff must go to the length of maintaining that the company was bound by the act of the conductor to take the plaintiff into its service. . . . The conductor's authority to carry can only be incidental to his power to make a valid engagement for the plaintiff's service. The admission of such a doctrine would subvert familiar rules of the law of agency." We have been unable to discover any authority in which it is held that a conductor of a freight train has any power, save in case of an emergency, to employ servants to assist him in operating his train.

We do not deem it necessary to consider the liability of the defendant if there had been wanton or wilful injury; there being no evidence of either. It is said that the case should have gone to the jury. This suggestion is based upon the theory that there was evidence of a contractual liability imposing upon the defendant the measure of duty prescribed for either a passenger or employee. As we have seen, neither relation existed. There was therefore no question to be submitted to the jury. The plaintiff having failed to lay the basis upon which any such duty arose, there was no inference to be drawn from the testimony by the jury. The effect of the agreement made between plaintiff and conductor was for the court. There is no uncertainty as to its terms or legal signification. As was said in Eaton's Case, supra: "The solution of the questions at issue is not to be sought in the rules of law appertaining to common carriers. It must be obtained from the principles of the law of agency. The true inquiry is whether the conductor, as an agent of the defendant, had the power to take the plaintiff upon the train in such a way as to bind the defendant as a carrier to him as a passenger,"—and, we may add, "or an employee." The answer to this question being in the negative, and there being no evidence of wanton or wilful injury, his honor correctly directed judgment of nonsuit.

We find no error in the ruling of his Honor excluding the pass. The fact that, several months after the injury, the defendant issued to the plaintiff a pass from Richmond to Garysburg, describing him as an injured employee, does not tend to show any ratification of the attempted employment by the conductor. The exception cannot be sustained.

No error.

Hoke, J., concurring:

I concur in the disposition made of this case for the reason that it affirmatively appears from the testimony that the plaintiff, at the time he was injured, was neither a passenger nor employee of the company, and the facts disclose no breach of duty on the part of the defendant. I do not assent to the position maintained in the principal opinion, as I understand it, that when a conductor of a freight train employs an ordinary hand to assist him in its operation, and the hand, while so engaged in the company's work, is injured by the company's negligence, that a presumption exists that the employment is without authority, and the burden is on the injured employee to show the contrary. A conductor of a freight train is necessarily given very extended authority over a train under his control while being operated on the road away from the general offices of the company, and frequently without present means of communication with them. He has under such circumstances the general right to employ a hand whenever it becomes necessary in the proper management of his train, and he must from the nature of the case be given very large discretion in determining when such necessity exists. There are so many and various cases where the power may arise that I think, when a conductor does employ a hand who engages in the company's work, there should be a presumption that he is acting within the scope of his authority till the contrary is made to appear, and at times such authority will be implied as a matter of law. The decisions cited in the principal opinion are chiefly cases where the question was on the authority existing in the conductor of a freight train to confer on an injured party the position of passenger on his train; and the power of such conductor to employ help in the operation of his own train was in no way involved. While not directly in point, I think the position here contended for finds support in two well-considered decisions: Sloan v. Central Iowa R. Co. 62 Iowa, 736, 16 N. W. 331; Georgia P. R. Co. v. Propst, 83 Ala. 525, 3 So. 764. In the first case, and on this question, Seever, J., for the court, says: "It is said that the plaintiff was not an employee of the receiver, but an intermeddler, and therefore he cannot recover. The undisputed facts are that one Voorhees was a brakeman in the employ of the receiver, and he desired to have a rest for a week or more, and the plaintiff took his place on the train with the knowledge and consent of the conductor on the 1st day of July, and continued to perform the duties of brakeman until the 6th day of said month, when he was ordered by the conductor to perform the duty in discharging which he was injured. The conductor testified that to properly manage the train two brakemen were required, and that there was but one other on the train besides the plaintiff. This evidence is not controverted. It does not clearly appear that the receiver, or any of his employees, other than those on the train, had knowledge that the plaintiff was acting as brakeman. An intermeddler is a person who officiously intrudes into a business to which he has no right. The distinction between an intermeddler and a trespasser is not in any case very great. Under the circumstances of this case, if the plaintiff was an intermeddler, he was a trespasser. But, as he was on the train and discharged the duties of brakeman for six days with the knowledge and consent of the conductor, he was not either. The train, when passing between stations and distant from any other officer, is in charge of the conductor, and he has authority to eject such persons therefrom. So far from so doing, the conductor availed himself of the services of the plaintiff, and required him to perform duties which were necessary and essential to the safe operation of the train. The regular brakeman was absent, and it is immaterial whether with or without cause. The conductor consented that the plaintiff should perform his duties. We think, when the regular brakeman is absent, and the proper and safe management of the train so required, the conductor has authority to supply the place of the absent brakeman, and for the time being such person is an employee of the conductor's principal. Of necessity, it seems to us, the conductor must have such authority." In the second case, Stone, Ch. J., for the court says: "The conductor testified that he had no authority from the superintendent, or from the defendant, to engage or utilize the services of the plaintiff in the capacity of brakeman. Express authority for this purpose was not necessary. The circumstances themselves, about which there is no conflict of testimony, gave him the authority. In such an emergency there must be discretion and authority somewhere to supply the place of disabled or missing servants, and no one could exercise this power so well or so prudently as the conductor in charge of the train. We will therefore treat the plaintiff as the lawfully employed servant of the company."

I am of opinion that, when the conductor of a freight train employs an ordinary hand to assist in the operation of his train, the presumption should be that his act is rightful till the contrary is made to appear. And in many instances such hiring, being within the scope of his apparent authority, will conclusively bind the company so far as third persons are concerned, who act without notice.

Clark, Ch. J., dissenting:

Stephen Vassor, the plaintiff's minor son, was injured by the explosion of the engine on defendant's train, whereby he "lost both feet; one leg being cut off below and the other above the knee, one of his legs being broken in three places, his arm cut, and two holes knocked in his head." These injuries being caused by an explosion, there is a presumption of negligence, which always arises when the injury is caused by a collision, derailment, or explosion. In such cases, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies. The only question, therefore, which arises on this motion to nonsuit is whether the relation of the injured party to the defendant was such that, taking the plaintiff's evidence to be true and in the aspect most favorable to him, the defendant was liable to plaintiff for the injury caused by its negligence, when it was not a wanton or wilful act. The evidence of the injured boy is that, with permission of the conductor of the freight train, he went to Richmond to take the place of a hand working for the defendant; that, not getting the place, he started home the next day on the same train. He testified: "The conductor said 'Yes' when I asked him if I could come back with him. I was to help unload freight and load freight. We had some barrels to unload at Clopton, and me and two brakemen got aboard second car so we could unload them quickly when train got there. The engine exploded not more than ten minutes after I got on the car. The engineer and fireman saw me after I got on the train. They were looking at me when I got on." This evidence must be taken to be true, with the most favorable inferences to be drawn from it. The injured boy was certainly not a trespasser. He was on the car by the express permission of the conductor, the supreme representative of the company on that train. He was there with the tacit consent of the engineer and fireman, and was there under an agreement that he was to help load and unload freight. It is immaterial whether he was passenger or employee. The defendant owed him the duty not only to refrain from wilfully and wantonly injuring him, as in the case of a trespasser, but not to injure him by its negligence. This was the ruling laid down in the rehearing of McNeill v. Durham & C. R. Co. 135 N. C. 718, 67 L.R.A. 227, 47 S. E. 765. The plaintiff's pass, it is there said, "had expired, if it had ever legally existed." The conductor permitted him to travel in violation of a statute, without any payment of fare or promise to pay. The injury was not caused by any wilful or wanton act, yet the defendant was held liable. Here the conductor also permitted the injured party to ride free, but not illegally nor without pay. The explosion occurred in Virginia, where it is not shown that free passage was prohibited; besides, the boy who was so badly injured by the defendant's negligence was not riding really free, but was either by agreement paying his way by loading and unloading freight, or was an employee receiving pay for his work by getting transportation. Besides, when the injured man was discharged from the hospital, the defendant's superintendent gave him a pass home, styling him "an injured employee." This was a declaration against interest, and was erroneously excluded. It should have been submitted to the jury together with the other evidence.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

JOSEPH STEFANOWSKI, by Guardian ad Litem, Appt.,
v.

CHAIN BELT COMPANY, Resp't.

(— Wis. —, 109 N. W. 532.)

Master and servant—injury—proximate cause.

The invention, by a thirteen-year-old boy, of a device to protect his fingers from the discomfort of handling links upon which he is employed to operate a drill, and which become heated and require handling because of defects in the drilling apparatus, which invention is unprecedented in experience, and the use of which results in the entangling of the boy's hand with the machinery to its injury, is such an intervening cause as to destroy the proximity of the defect in the drill as a cause for the injury, and to relieve the master from liability therefor.

(November 7, 1906.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Dodge, J.:

Plaintiff, when thirteen and one-half years of age, was employed in the factory of the defendant, which was engaged in making chain belts composed of U-shaped links joining the jaws of one to the base of another by a transverse bolt running through holes in the jaws of the one link and the straight base of the other. These links were about two inches long and two inches wide. They were roughly cast, with a transverse hole through each of the jaws and through the straight base, and plaintiff was set to work with a drill at reaming out these holes. The machine had a table on which the link was placed, and from above descended a vertical revolving shaft having at the lower end a sharpened drill, rapidly revolving, which penetrated these holes and smoothed them. Upon the table was a jig or bar of iron calculated to just fit within the jaws of the link, and to hold it rigid so that the descending drill would exactly strike and penetrate the holes. The drill was caused to descend by pulling upon a lever with the left hand of the operator. The link was placed upon the jig with the right hand of the operator, who, under most circumstances, was also required to squirt, from an ordinary oil can, water upon the drill to keep it from heating. Plaintiff's testimony tends to show that the jig on the machine in question had become somewhat worn so that it did not hold the link in perfect position, but needed the aid of his hands; also that the water can worked badly so that the process of drilling made the link too hot to be comfortably touched with bare fingers; also it is claimed that the drill supplied him had been worn so short that it would not reach the hole in the lower jaw of the link when in position, so that after drilling a hole in one jaw the link had to be withdrawn, turned over, and again pushed onto the jig in order to bore the hole in the other jaw. Plaintiff's fingers became sore from repeated contact with the hot links. He complained of the situation and of this trouble and asked to be put at other work, but was commanded to go back to this work or go home. He accordingly returned to the work, and at noon constructed a device of his own invention, consisting of a small wire one end of which he bent at right angles to constitute a hook to insert in the hole through the base of the link to pull it away from the machine. At the other end he bent the wire into a loop to fit round the two middle fingers so as to hang there during other operations with the right hand, thus avoiding delay of laying the hook down and picking it up each time. This wire, as it was attached to the fingers, was necessarily brought into close proximity to the vertical revolving drill in each operation of turning over the link and reinserting it on the jig. After about a half hour's use it caught thereon, and the wire was rapidly wound around the drill shaft, and plaintiff's two middle fingers pulled off. After trial and overruling motions for nonsuit and for direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant, the jury found a special verdict to the effect that plaintiff was not sufficiently instructed of danger, and had not sufficient knowledge to comprehend the risk of the wire hook used by him, and was not guilty of any want of ordinary care; that the drill press was defective and defendant charged with knowledge thereof, and, in answer to the seventh question, that the insufficient condition of the drill press was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Plaintiff's motion for judgment was denied, and defendant's motion to reverse the answer to the seventh question was granted, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

Mr. W. S. Frazier, with Messrs. Loyal H. McCarthy and Charles G. Woolcock, for appellant:

From the insufficient condition of the drill press, there is established a natural and continuous chain of events, without a missing link, leading directly up to the accident.

Dodge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole error assigned is that the court held, as matter of law, that the defective condition of the drill was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, against which holding appellant's counsel presents a forcible and plausible argument. While every act or event, without which some result would not have been reached, is, in colloquial sense, a cause thereof, not every such act or event is the legal cause of the injurious result in the law of torts. That legal proximate cause which, when it involves negligence of another, results in his liability, has been often defined and last carefully discussed in the two opinions in Winchel v. Goodyear, 126 Wis. 271, 105 N. W. 824. The proximate legal cause is that acting first and producing the injury, either immediately or by setting other events in motion, all constituting a natural and continuous chain of events, each having a close causal connection with its immediate predecessor, the final event in the chain immediately effecting the injury as a natural and probable result of the cause which first acted, under such circumstances that the person responsible for the first event should, as an ordinarily prudent and intelligent person, have reasonable ground to expect at the moment of his act or default that an injury to some person might probably result therefrom. The act of one creating a peril may none the less be the legal cause of an injury to another because of intervening events which might or might not take place, provided such events are natural and probable, and provided the probability of injury might be reasonably anticipated. In both the Winchel v. Goodyear and Yess v. Chicago Brass Co. (124 Wis. 406, 102 N. W. 932), cases the intervening event was a slipping of the person injured by reason of surrounding conditions, thus bringing himself within the peril which the defendant had created; and it was held that such events might, by a jury, be considered natural and probable under all the circumstances. A similar holding was made in Morey v. Lake Superior Terminal & Transfer Co. 125 Wis. 148, 103 N. W. 271, where the intervening event was a fainting or falling of the injured person caused by fright at the sudden apparition of an unnotified and negligently rapid railroad train. In the last-cited case, at page 155 of 125 Wis., and page 273 of 103 N. W., was adopted a carefully framed description of such an intervening event as will break the chain of legal proximity between an earlier negligent act and the injury. "Whenever a new cause intervenes which is not a consequence of the first wrongful cause, which is not under the control of the wrongdoer, which could not have been foreseen by the exercise of reasonable diligence by the wrongdoer, and except for which the final injurious consequences would not have happened, then such injurious consequences must be deemed too remote to constitute the basis of a cause of action."

The question here presented is whether the use by plaintiff of the wire hook could, by any reasonable mind, be deemed such a natural and probable event so that a chain of legal causation between the defective condition of defendant's drill and the injury to plaintiff's fingers was unbroken. Of course we are not advanced much towards an answer to this inquiry by the obvious fact that, but for the use of such wire, the injury would not have happened. It is equally true that but for the fainting or slipping in the cases just mentioned the injury would not have occurred, and yet it is doubtless essential to a holding that the use of the wire, instead of being one of a chain of natural and probable events, was, in fact, the legal cause of the injury, that we should discover that the injury would not have happened without it; therefore, it is proper to mention that entirely obvious fact. Another fact which is of some cogency, though not in all cases conclusive, is that there was no close causal connection between the defective drill and the use of the wire invented by the plaintiff and used upon his own volition. But causation of every act, circumstance, or condition which participates in the chain of events leading to the injurious result need not be by the event or act which is held the proximate cause, for in both the Yess and Winchel cases the slipping of the plaintiff was in no wise caused by the defect in the machine from which he suffered. Their efficacy was merely to bring about a condition subjecting plaintiff to the perils negligently created by the defendants in the respective cases, acting naturally and probably. It does, however, appear in the present case that in the operation of the drill in question there was no likelihood or danger of plaintiff's fingers being brought in contact therewith if he operated it in any matter within the knowledge or experience of any person; that the only way in which his fingers were in fact brought into that peril was by reason of the use of a device unique and unprecedented, and which cannot but be considered the result of very unusual ingenuity and invention by the plaintiff himself. So far as appears by the evidence, no one had ever thought of using a hook for pulling the links away from the machine; but that is not all of the peculiarity involved in plaintiff's device. A mere hook which was to be laid down pending the other operations with the right hand, and picked up again when used, would not have brought about the injury, but it would have been inconsistent with the rapidity with which the operations of the insertion, turning, and removal of the links needed to be performed. To obviate this latter difficulty plaintiff's invention went to the extent of devising a loop on one end to place over his fingers in such a position that the hook end would be out of the way while he was manipulating the links with his fingers, and yet not involve the delay of laying it down and picking it up again. But it was this very circumstance of the arrangement of the wire with this loop, so that in a certain position of his hand it was brought into close proximity to the vertical shaft of the drill, that enabled it to come in contact with that revolving shaft and thus tear away his fingers. Obviously here was such novelty of invention as would almost, if not quite, satisfy the most hypercritical patent examiner. Surely it cannot be that an event which never occurred before in years of human experience, and which could not happen without what amounts to a spasm of inventive genius in an inexperienced boy, is either probable or within reasonable anticipation. The contrast presented by Coolidge v. Hallauer, 126 Wis. 244, 105 N. W. 568, is instructive.

There, the intervening act or event which immediately rendered the defect in a lathe efficient to injure was the application of a file by the injured man, but that act was one known by the employer to be customary and frequent with operatives, and the file had been provided for that purpose. Further interesting instructive cases have been gathered by respondent's counsel. Nelson v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co. 26 R. I. 258, 67 L.R.A. 116, 106 Am. St. Rep. 711, 58 Atl. 802; Stephenson v. Corder, 71 Kan. 475, 69 L.R.A. 246, 80 Pac. 938; Fishburn v. Burlington & N. R. Co. 127 Iowa, 483, 103 N. W. 481; Conley v. American Exp. Co. 87 Me. 352, 32 Atl. 965; Pryor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 90 Ala. 32, 8 So. 55; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 93 Ga. 570, 20 S. E. 70; McFarlane v. Sullivan, 99 Wis. 361, 74 N. W. 559, 75 N. W. 71; Holdridge v. Mendenhall, 108 Wis. 1, 5, 81 Am. St. Rep. 871, 83 N. W. 1109.

We conclude that the trial court correctly decided that the evidence conclusively established that the act of the plaintiff in using the wire device was the efficient cause of the injury, and that it was neither probable nor within reasonable anticipation of an ordinarily prudent and intelligent person, and, as a result, that the defects in the drill were not proximately connected with the injury so as to make them the legal cause thereof.

Judgment affirmed.

CHARLES ALLEN, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ÆTNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY of Hartford, Connecticut.

(76 C. C. A. 265, 145 Fed. 881.)

Indemnity insurance—liability to injured person.

ployees, by which the insurer undertakes to defend proceedings against the insured, or settle the same, unless it elects to pay the provided indemnity to the assured, does not make the contract one guaranteeing payment of an obligation of the insured, rather than one of indemnity, where another clause of the policy provides that no action shall be brought against the insurer unless by the insured himself to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid, the former clause being merely an additional privilege for the protection of the insurer.

Same—garnishment.

2. Under a contract by which an insurer undertakes to indemnify an employer for loss paid because of injury to an employee, there is no obligation on the part of the insurer which can become the subject of garnishment in proceedings by an employee to enforce a judgment which he has secured against the insured.

Case Note.—Injured employee's right to reach fund under employer's liability policy:

—Attempts have been made in various ways by injured employees to reach an obligation of an insurance company to an insured on account of an injury to employees of the latter. In determining the liability of the insurer in such proceedings, the courts have adopted the rule that, if the policy is one which insures against loss or damage by reason of liability, or, in other words, is a contract of indemnity, the action cannot be maintained against the insurance company, on the theory that the amount of insurance does not become due and payable until the insured has paid the loss. But, if the policy is one which insures directly against liability, then the courts hold the view that the insurer is liable, on the theory that the amount of the policy up to the extent of the liability incurred by the employer on account of the accident becomes, immediately upon the happening of the event upon which the liability depends, an asset of the insured, which, in the absence of any provisions to the contrary in the policy, may be assigned by him or taken for his debt.

Supp. 652; Henderson v. Maryland Casualty Co. 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 398.

Lanning, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 13, 1902, the Ætina Life Insurance Company issued to Gilman & McNeil, a corporation, a policy of insurance, by which it agreed "to indemnify" that Garnishment proceedings were resorted to in the case of ALLEN v. ÆTNA L. INS. CO., and in Connolly v. Bolster, 187 Mass. 266, 72 N. E. 981, which is set out at length in the opinion in the former case; but the court held that these cases were governed by the first rule, and therefore the insurer was not liable as garnishee. The same decision was rendered in Finley v. United States Casualty Co. 113 Tenn. 592, 83 S. W. 2, in which the contract of indemnity involved contains practically the same agreements construed in ALLEN v. ÆTNA L. INS. CO.

The following cases fall within the second rule, and hold the insurer liable to garnishment: The policy involved in Hoven v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. (Hoven v. West Superior Iron & Steel Co.) 93 Wis. 201, 32 L.R.A. 388, 67 N. W. 46, recited that it was issued on an application for indemnity against claims for compensation for personal injuries, and provided that "the company shall not be sued upon this policy in any court after six years from the time that the injury occurred, upon or by reason of which the cause of action accrued, unless at the expiration of said time some suit brought by the injured employee be then pending against the employer, in which case an action may be brought within six months after the termination of such suit, and not later." This language the court construed as plainly indicating that payment of the injured employee's claim was not a condition precedent of the right to maintain an action against the insurer to enforce payment of the policy, given to indemnify the employer for sums for which he "shall become liable" to employees. And the fact that no way was provided by which the insurer could be relieved of his liability, under a condition of the policy by which it assumed entire charge and responsibility for the settlement of loss and of any legal proceedings, and for the payment of costs thereof, was considered to be inconsistent with any reasonable theory other than that the contract of insurance was one of indemnity against liability. Substantially the same kind of a 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

policy was under consideration in Anoka Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 63 Minn. 286, 30 L.R.A. 689, 65 N. W. 353. In this instance, the policy provided, first, that it insured against all liability on account of injury suffered by an employee; second, that the insurer would, at its own expense, take upon itself the settlement of any loss; and, "if legal proceedings have been taken against the insured to enforce a claim for damages, the insurer shall have entire charge of the case;" third, that the insured shall not settle any claim without the consent of the insurer; and fourth, that "no action shall lie against the company after the expiration of the period within which an action for damages on account of the given injuries, or death, might be brought . . . against the assured, unless, at the expiration of such period, there is a suit . . . pending against the assured." In construing these terms of the policy, the court said that it may be seen from the very terms of the instrument that it was not merely an agreement to indemnify the insured against any act of the employee; but that, in case of an accident whereby a cause of action arose in favor of the employee against the insured, the insurer would assume all responsibility.

The insurer's defense, that it did not consent to an assignment of any interests of the insured to an injured employee of the latter, required by the terms of the policy to be given in writing in order to be valid; and that the insured has not suffered any loss, and therefore cannot give to such employee any better right against the insurer than the insured would have,—was held, in Fritchie v. Miller's Pennsylvania Extract Co. 197 Pa. 401, 47 Atl. 351, not to be an answer to a judgment against the insured, recovered by such employee, after the insured has become insolvent and has ceased to do business; nor was it considered an obstruction to the issuance of an attachment proceeding, and the service of the same upon the insurer as garnishee, where the policy was issued against all liability for damages on account of fatal or nonfatal injuries suffered by any employee of the insured. The corporation, for one year from the date of the policy, subject to certain "general agreements" contained in the policy, "against loss from common law or statutory liability for damages on account of bodily injuries, fatal or nonfatal, accidentally suffered within the period of this policy by any employee or employees of the assured," etc. On February 27, 1903, within the term covered by the policy, Allen, the plaintiff in error, then employed by the Gilman & McNeil Company, the assured, received bodily injuries, for which he subsequently obtained judgment against the assured. After the date of his accident, and before commencing his suit, the assured was placed in the hands of a receiver, and, after obtaining his judgment, he caused an attachment execution to be issued against the assured, as defendant, and the insurer, as garnishee, which was returned nihil habet as to the defendant and "served" as to the garnishee. On this proceeding the circuit court gave judgment for the garnishee, and the writ of error brings that judgment before us for review. There is a general rule in garnishment proceedings that the plaintiff in the suit acquires no greater rights against the garnishee than the defendant himself possesses. A few exceptions to the court thus held, as in the two preceding cases, that the policy was one insuring directly against liability, and that the provision against an assignment did not make it one insuring to the benefit of the insured alone.

In other instances injured employees have sought, by suits in equity, to reach the fund under the employer's liability policy. In these cases the courts have applied the rule as stated at the beginning of the note. In Frye v. Bath Gas & Electric Co. 97 Me. 241, 59 L.R.A. 444, 94 Am. St. Rep. 500, 54 Atl. 395, the court held that a contract to indemnify an employer against loss by reason of liability for accidental injuries to employees does not inure to the benefit of the injured employee, so that he can maintain a bill in equity to enforce payment in case the employer becomes insolvent before the employee recovers judgment, so that the judgment cannot be enforced,—especially where the contract provides that no action shall arise against the insurer as respects any loss under the policy, unless it shall be brought by the insured himself, to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment after trial of the issue. Similar policies were construed, and the same decisions rendered, in Burke v. London Guarantee & Acci Co. 47 Misc. 171, 93 N. Y. Supp. 652; Beyer v. International Aluminum Co. 101 N. Y. Supp. 83; and Kinnan v. Fidelity & C. Co. 107 Ill. App. 406.

But, under a policy containing a similar provision as to when a right of action shall lie against the insurance company as respects any loss under the policy, the court, in Travellers' Ins. Co. v. Moses, 63 N. J. Eq. 260, 92 Am. St. Rep. 663, 49 Atl. 720, held that an injured employee could maintain a suit in equity against the insurer by way of cross bill, setting up the same facts stated by her employer's trustee in bankruptcy, who prayed that the sum due from the insurer be paid directly to the injured employee, to reach so much of the policy as represents her proportionate share in the bankrupt estate of her employer to which she is entitled under her judgment, on the ground that the transfer of the insolvent estate to a trustee under the bankruptcy 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

act operated to make the trustee in bankruptcy her trustee, to the extent of her share in the assets of the estate, and that this payment in property was a sufficient compliance with such terms of the policy.

A policy indemnifying an employer against a "loss actually sustained and paid in satisfaction of a judgment after the trial of an issue" was construed in Cushman v. Carbondale Fuel Co. 122 Iowa, 656, 98 N. W. 509, as not giving an injured employee a right to maintain a suit in equity to recover the amount of his judgment from the guaranty company, since there was no breach of the covenant, and no liability on the part of the insurer arose until the judgment against the employer had been actually paid.

And insurance against loss through liability for personal injuries was held, in Bain v. Atkins, 181 Mass. 240, 57 L.R.A. 791, 92 Am. St. Rep. 411, 63 N. E. 414, not to constitute a trust fund for the benefit of the injured person; and he cannot maintain a bill in equity against the insurer to reach such fund, although, by reason of the insolvency of the insured, the claim would be otherwise unenforceable,—especially where, before his claim against the insured is established, the insurer satisfies its obligation under the policy.

Insurance of an employer against loss of life or injury to person, either to employees or to other persons, caused by a peril insured against, making the insurance payable to him for the benefit of the injured person, or his legal representatives in case of death, and not contingent upon his legal liability, does not create any right in favor of an employee or his legal representatives to enforce payment by the insurer,—especially in case of one who was not employed when the insurance was taken. The court further held that only one recovery is permitted under the policy, and therefore a recovery against the employer precludes any right of action against the insurer under the policy. Embler v. Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Ins. Co. 158 N. Y. 431, 44 L.R.A. 512, 53 N. E. 212.

On the general subject of the garnishment of unliquidated claims, see exhaustive note in 59 L.R.A. 353.

rule exist, one of which is in a case where the defendant has fraudulently transferred property to the garnishee; but in the present case the general rule is applicable. The service of a garnishment order does not operate as an assignment, legal or equitable, of a debt due from the garnishee to the defendant, nor establish as between the plaintiff and the garnishee the relation of creditor and debtor. It simply gives to the plaintiff the statutory right to collect from the garnishee a debt due from the garnishee to the defendant, not in excess of the amount due from the defendant to the plaintiff, and, in default of voluntary payment by the garnishee, the right to have execution therefor. North Chicago Rolling Mill Co. v. St. Louis Ore & Steel Co. 152 U. S. 596, 619, 38 L. ed. 565, 573, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 710; Drake, Attachm. 6th ed. § 458; The Olivia A. Carri-gan, 7 Fed. 507. If, then, the assured, or its receiver, has no present right of action against the insurer, the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

The counsel for the insurer contend that the policy of insurance is a contract of pure indemnity against actual loss sustained by the assured, and that it is not a contract by which the insurer guaranteed the payment of any obligation or liability of the assured. The distinction between a contract to indemnify against loss and one to pay a liability has often been pointed out. Some of the cases on the subject are referred to in the opinion of the learned judge who tried this case in the circuit court. See 137 Fed. 136. But the counsel for the plaintiff in error, not denying the reasonableness of this distinction, contend that, in the present case, the policy of insurance is a contract to pay a liability, and not a mere contract of indemnity against loss. This contention is based on the language of the second and third clauses of the "general agreements" of the policy. The legal effect of these clauses can be understood only by reading them in connection with the first and seventh clauses. These four clauses are as follows:

"(1) The assured, upon the occurrence of an accident, shall give immediate written notice thereof, with the fullest information obtainable at the time, to the home office of the company at Hartford, Conn., or to its duly authorized local agent. He shall give like notice, with full particulars of any claim that may be made on account of such accident, and shall at all times render to the company all co-operation and assistance in his power.

"(2) If thereafter any suit is brought against the assured to enforce a claim for damages on account of an accident covered 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by this policy, the assured shall immediately forward to the company every summons or other process as soon as the same shall have been served on him, and the company will at its own cost defend against such proceedings in the name and on behalf of the assured, or settle the same, unless it shall elect to pay to the assured the indemnity provided for in clause A of special agreements as limited therein. [Clause A limits the indemnity to $5,000.]

"(3) The assured shall not settle any claim except at his or its own cost, nor incur any expense, nor interfere in any negotiation for settlement or in any legal proceeding, without the consent of the company, previously given in writing; but he may provide at the time of the accident such immediate surgical relief as is imperative. The assured when requested by the company shall aid in securing information, evidence, and the attendance of witnesses and in effecting settlements and in prosecuting appeals. . . ."

"(7) No action shall lie against the company as respects any loss under this policy, unless it shall be brought by the assured himself to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment within sixty days from the date of such judgment and after trial of the issue. No such action shall lie unless brought within the period within which a claimant might sue the assured for damages, unless at the expiry of such period there is such an action pending against the assured, in which case an action may be brought against the company by the assured within sixty days after final judgment has been rendered and satisfied as above. The company does not prejudice by this clause any defenses to such action which it may be entitled to make under this policy."

Sanders v. Frankfort Marine, Acci. & Plate Glass Ins. Co. 72 N. H. 485, 101 Am. St. Rep. 688, 57 Atl. 655, sustains the position of the plaintiff in error. In that case, which was one in equity, it appears that judgment in an action at law had been obtained by the plaintiff against the assured for personal injuries received while in the employment of the assured; that the insurer had issued a policy similar to the one before us, and had assumed the defense of the action at law until the rendition of the judgment, but took no writ of error and prosecuted no proceedings for review; that the property of the assured had been sold, under execution issued upon the judgment, for $1; and that nothing more had been recovered for the plaintiff. In the equity suit, the plaintiff contended that the policy was a contract, not to indemnify against loss, but to pay a liability; that, as the judgment exceeded the amount of the insurance, the insurer was indebted to the assured in the full amount of the insurance; and that a court of equity had the power to require the indebtedness of the insurer to the assured to be applied, pro tanto, to the satisfaction of the indebtedness of the assured to the plaintiff. The supreme court of New Hampshire held that, by the second clause of the "general agreements," the insurer agreed (1) to defend, (2) to settle, or (3) to pay the assured, and that the second and third of these engagements plainly provided for the performance of the contract of indemnity before the assured had suffered loss by actual payment of the judgment obtained against him. In holding that the obligation "to defend," which is the first of the above-mentioned engagements, was not performed merely by contesting the suit until the rendition of judgment, the court said: "In this case there has been execution, upon which the paper company's property has been sold. That the amount of the sale was nominal is immaterial. The fact discloses the abandonment of defense by the insurance company, their failure to settle the claim, and hence their liability to pay the insured the amount of the indemnity provided, unless it be established that the rendition of the judgment excuses the insurance company from further defense of the proceedings. Further evidence to the contrary is to be found in the provisions of the contract [see the third clause of 'general agreements'] that the assured shall not settle any claim except at his own cost, nor interfere in any negotiation for settlement or in any legal proceeding. The substance of these provisions is that, after notice of the suit to the insurer, unless the company pay him the indemnity, the assured's control over the matter ceases. He cannot settle the claim, nor can he conduct or direct the litigation. If the company settle or defeat the claim, the liability under which he labors is assumed and discharged by the insurer. In every possible event except the defeat of their effort to prevent judgment against the insured, the company agree to perform their contract without the previous payment of anything by the insured. If an exception were intended in this case, it seems probable that it would be plainly stated, or some good reason would be apparent for the different undertaking. None is perceived."

In considering the meaning of the eighth clause of the "general agreements" of the policy in that case (being the same as the seventh clause of the policy in the present case), the court said: "The purpose of clause 8 was, therefore, to provide for the cases, if any should arise, where the company contended the claim arose from an accident not covered by the policy. It was intended to limit the liability of the company to damages ascertained by due course of judicial procedure in cases where they could not conduct the defense without waiving their claim that they were not liable, and as to which, if not liable, they were under no obligation to incur any expense. Its purpose was to prevent collusion between the plaintiff and the assured."

We have given to the opinion from which we have made the above extracts the very careful consideration demanded by the high authority from which it came, but we cannot concur in it. It seems to us not to give due effect to the language of the policy that the insurer agreed "to indemnify" the assured "against loss from common-law or statutory liability for damages on account of bodily injuries," or to the seventh clause that "no action shall lie against the company as respects any loss under this policy unless it shall be brought by the assured himself to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment within sixty days from the date of such judgment and after trial of the issue." By compliance with the first clause of the "general agreements" the insured puts the insurer upon inquiry as to whether the accident is one covered by the policy. By the second clause the assured is required, immediately after the commencement of suit, to forward the summons to the insurer. If the insurer insists that the accident is one not covered by the policy, it is manifestly his duty to give to the assured prompt notice of that fact to the end that the assured may himself take charge of the defense. If no such notice be given, the assured may assume that the insurer, will, as required by the second clause, defend the suit, or settle the claim, or pay the indemnity to the assured. But the engagement to defend the suit does not mean that, when the insurer has undertaken the defense and judgment has been rendered against the assured, the insurer must either prosecute a writ of error or pay the judgment. It means what a defendant means when he files a plea saying he "comes and defends" the suit, or what is meant when counsel are retained to defend a suit. When an insurer undertakes to defend an action brought against the assured, the real object of the undertaking is not to defeat a judgment against the assured, which is only incidental to the real object, but to save himself from the obligation of the policy to reimburse the assured for loss actually sustained by him in paying the judgment. If the insurer deems the plaintiff's cause of action so well founded and the plaintiff's claim for damages so reasonable that it would be unbusinesslike to expend money in a defense, he may, under the provisions of the second clause, pay the claim of the plaintiff directly to him, or pay the amount of the indemnity to the assured. But if the insurer, for any reason, prefers to defend the suit, he has the right, under the second clause, to do so at his own cost; and in such event the assured is required by the third clause not to interfere. We think such a construction of the first, second, and third clauses is in accord with their fair meaning, and that it relieves us from the necessity of giving to the seventh clause the restricted construction adopted in Sanders v. Frankfort Marine, Acci. & Plate Glass Ins. Co.

We are confirmed in the construction thus given to the policy before us by the opinion in a similar case rendered by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Connolly v. Bolster, 187 Mass. 266, 72 N. E. 981. There the court said: "The object of this second clause is plain when taken in connection with the third,—it is plainly inserted as an additional obligation and privilege for the protection of the insurance company, on the assumption that it is for the pecuniary interest of the company to be given the conduct of and to defend the action which is to fix its liability and the amount to be paid when liable, rather than to leave that matter to be dealt with by the several persons insured, respectively. This does not result in the necessity of writing into clause 2 the qualifying words 'until final judgment,' as the plaintiff contends, for, when final judgment is rendered, ordinarily all defense is at an end. Nothing remains but a writ of review or a writ of error, and, if such a proceeding were necessary, it might well be held to be covered by the obligation to defend. But when the defense is ended, and, in spite of the defense, judgment is rendered against the insured, there is nothing to do but pay. Making payment of a judgment against the defendant is no part of a covenant to defend the action. Whether the insurance company is bound to pay the judgment depends upon the terms of its agreement to indemnify the assured against loss, and the eighth clause [the same as the seventh clause in the policy before us] in terms provides that no action shall lie for 'any loss under this policy,' unless brought by the assured 'to reimburse him for loss actually sustained, and paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment after trial of the issue.' In the case at bar Bell 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) has not paid the judgment recovered by the plaintiff, and therefore has no claim against the insurance company."

As thus construed, the seventh clause is not inconsistent with the second and third clauses. The insurance company had the right to defend the action brought against the Gilman & McNeil Company, and is not estopped by that mere fact to deny its liability. Until the judgment shall have been paid by the Gilman & McNeil Company,—or, possibly, by its receiver, concerning which no opinion is expressed,—there exists no valid claim against the insurance company. The garnishment proceedings are therefore founded on a false theory. There is nothing due from the insurer to the assured. Consequently, there is nothing that can be the subject of garnishment proceedings as against the insurer. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider whether the plaintiff in error is not restricted, in his remedy, to a presentation of his claim to the assured's receiver, and whether, in the event of payment of a percentage of the judgment by the receiver, the receiver himself would not be entitled to recover from the insurer the amount paid by him under the rule established in Travellers' Ins. Co. v. Moses, 63 N. J. Eq. 260, 92 Am. St. Rep. 663, 49 Atl. 720. Nor is it necessary to consider the point argued in the brief of the plaintiff in error concerning the power of a court of equity to compel payment of a debt by one who has assumed it, and thereby, in equity, become the principal debtor, since this is a suit at law, and not one in equity, and since, by our conclusion, the insurer has not assumed the indebtedness of the assured.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be affirmed, with costs.

Carroll, C., filed the following opinion:

The city of Somerset owns an electric-light plant, and rented or leased to Elmer Burton for compensation an electric globe with a brass socket, which was installed by it in a booth kept by him in the sale of confections. The globe was inside the booth, and so high that appellant, a boy seventeen years of age, who was employed by Burton, could only reach it by elevating his hands over his head. He testified, in substance, that, on the evening the injury occurred, it was rather cold and damp, had been raining, and there being no fire in the booth, he put his hand up to the globe for the purpose of warming it, when one of his fingers came in contact with the brass socket, injuring him quite severely. Children and other persons were in the habit of visiting the place for the purchase of candies and nuts, and the globe was so situated that it might have been reached by a man of ordinary size standing on the sidewalk of the city. An electrical engineer, introduced as a witness for appellant, said that the lamp and socket was not properly insulated or protected, and that the dampness of the atmosphere added to the danger incident to coming in contact with it; that, if it had been properly insulated, there would be no danger in handling or touching it; but that, if exposed to dampness as this light was, the socket would become charged with electricity, and dangerous to handle or touch. Upon the conclusion of the testimony for plaintiff, appellant here, the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for appellee, defendant below. It is argued for appellee that the condition of the lamp was unknown to the city, that it had received no request to repair it, nor had any notice that the dampness rendered it dangerous; and, further, that appellant was not required by his duty or business to handle or touch the lamp or socket, and in so doing was a trespasser, and the city owed him no duty, and therefore he could not recover. It was held by this court in McLaughlin v. Electric Light Co. 100 Ky. 173, 34 L.R.A. 812, 37 S. W. 851, to be the duty of electric lighting companies or persons operating such plants, at points where people have the right to go for work, or business, or pleasure, to have the insulation or protection perfect; and for failure in this respect they must respond in damages. This doctrine was followed and approved in Schweitzer v. Citizens' General Electric Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 608, 52 S. W. 830; Overall v. Louisville Electric Light Co. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 759, 47 S. W. 442; Owensboro v. York, 117 Ky. 294, 77 S. W. 1130; Lexington R. Co. v. Fain, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1443, 71 S. W. 628.

Applying the rule announced to the facts of this case, we are of the opinion that it was error to take the case from the jury. The electric globe or light by which appellant was injured was not perfectly insulated, or even properly protected. If it had been, the injury would not have occurred. Appellant was not a trespasser. He had the right to be where he was; but if he had been passing along the street, and had touched the globe with his hand as he might have done, the city would be equally liable, as it committed a breach of duty in failing to have and keep this electric globe, that was placed in a position where it might have been touched by persons walking along the streets, perfectly insulated. It is said by counsel that the evidence does not show that the city had any control of the globe, or that it was its duty to keep it in repair. The evidence, however, does establish that the globe was installed by the city and compensation was received by it from Burton, and this imposed upon the city the duty exacted of owners and operators of electric-light plants; and it cannot escape responsibility upon the plea that the evidence did not show whose duty it was to keep this globe properly insulated. Thomas v. Maysville Gas Co. 108 Ky. 224, 53 L. R.A. 147, 56 S. W. 153.

The judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial.

cover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank H. Noyes, for plaintiff:

By virtue of being landlords, the defendants were liable for a defect in a portion which they agreed to keep in repair, though found not to retain control.

Flynn v. Trask, 11 Allen, 550; Coupe v. Platt, 172 Mass. 458, 70 Am. St. Rep. 293, 52 N. E. 526; Cummings v. Ayer, 188 Mass. 292, 74 N. E. 336.

If the defendants retained control of the defective portion, they were liable.

If they undertook to repair, and the defect existed by reason of their neglect or want of due care and skill in making the repair, the defendants are liable.

Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, 7 Am. Rep. 548.

If the tenant took the house with a concealed defect then existing, of which neither she nor the plaintiff was notified, the plaintiff did not assume the risk of that defect, although continuing to occupy after subsequently discovering it.

The custom that the owner shall be bound to make all outside repairs must be taken to be a part of the contract of letting.

Messrs. Frank N. Nay and Leon M. Abbott, for defendants:

No obligation to repair can be inferred from the fact that the owner from time to time, to keep his tenant, sees fit to make repairs.

Defendant's duty to the plaintiff was no greater than their duty to Mrs. Tabor.

Roche v. Sawyer, 176 Mass. 71, 57 N. E. 216; Jordan v. Sullivan, 181 Mass. 348, 63 N. E. 909.

There is no implied duty on the landlord's part to make things better than they are.

O'Malley v. Twenty-Five Associates, 178 Mass. 558, 60 N. E. 387.

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, with her husband and mother, occupied a one-family dwelling house owned by the defendants and situated in Roxbury, the house being hired by her mother under an oral arrangement with the defendants' agent. Early in the evening of Sunday, December 8, 1901, while she was leaving the house by the front door, she slipped upon the top step, fell, and was injured. It had snowed shortly before, and the jury might have found that her fall was due to water having dripped during the day from a leak in a gutter overhead and frozen after sunset, leaving a thin skimming of ice upon the step. She contends that the defendants are liable for her injuries, on the ground that this leak in the gutter constituted a concealed defect existing at the time when the defendants let the house, of which they then knew, or should have known, but of which they gave no information either to the plaintiff or to her mother, the tenant; and also on the ground that on its discovery after occupancy had begun the defendants' agent was notified and requested to repair it, but neglected so to do, although bound to make such repairs by express contract and also by contract implied from a general custom, by which they were bound to keep the roof and gutter in repair; and also upon the ground that the roof and gutter did not pass by the contract of letting, but remained in the control of the defendants; and that, having undertaken to repair, the defendants repaired the roof and gutter in a negligent manner.

1. Assuming, without deciding, that there was a leak in the gutter which might have been found to be a hidden defect, there was absolutely no evidence that its existence was known, or ought to have been known, before the letting, to the defendants. But, to sustain the action upon this ground, it must appear that the defendants either knew, or ought to have known, of the existing danger. Martin v. Richards, 155 Mass. 381, 29 N. E. 591; Cutter v. Hamlen, 147 Mass. 471, 1 L.R.A. 429, 18 N. E. 397; Cowen v. Sunderland, 145 Mass. 363, 1 Am. St. Rep. 469, 14 N. E. 117; Bowe v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 381, 46 Am. Rep. 471; Minor v. Sharon, 112 Mass. 477, 17 Am. Rep. 122. Even if the landlord should discover such a defect after the beginning of the tenancy, he is under no obligation to communicate it to the tenant. Bertie v. Flagg, 161 Mass. 504, 37 N. E. 572. The action cannot be maintained upon this ground.

2. There was evidence from Mrs. Tabor that, after she had moved into the house, "when the roof leaked and run down through into the chambers, from the gutter on the front steps," she spoke to the defendants' agent about that, and he sent a man who put some new shingles, and she thought pieces of tin, on the roof, and cleaned out some of the gutter. The defendants' agent also testified that he had had repairs made on the roof and the gutter, and that the shingles of the roof had been repaired and the gutter cleaned out and put in order. The plaintiff's husband also testified that he saw a cleat which had been nailed to the thick outer edge of the gutter, but there was nothing to show whether this was or was not there before the beginning of the tenancy. The plaintiff's mother also testified that the defendants' agent promised, when she hired the house, to do "any repairing needed, anything within reason." The plaintiff also put in evidence, against the objection and exception of the defendants, that there was a known custom or usage in Boston by which, when houses are entirely let without any written lease to a single tenant at will, the owner does the outside repairs, such as the roof, and gutters, and conductors. We cannot say that this evidence was incompetent, or that such a usage, if the jury found its existence to be proved, would be a bad one. See Pickering v. Weld, 159 Mass. 522, 34 N. E. 1081; Hutchins v. Webster, 165 Mass. 439, 43 N. E. 186; A. J. Tower Co. v. Southern P. Co. 184 Mass. 472, 69 N. E. 348. Taking all the evidence together, we think that the jury might have found that the defendants had assumed the obligation to make repairs, at any rate such outside repairs as might be needed in the roof and gutters; that notice of the alleged leak in the gutter had been given to their agent, and that they, acting through their agent, undertook to repair this leak, but that, in spite of the repairs which were made, the leak continued as before. It is true that the plaintiff herself testified that no repairs were made upon the gutter; but the jury might have believed the testimony of the defendant's agent upon this question. In that event, the defendants' liability in this action would depend upon whether or not the repairs upon the gutter were made negligently. "The general rule in this commonwealth must be considered as settled that a tenant cannot recover against his landlord for personal injuries occasioned by the defective condition of the premises let, unless the landlord agrees to repair, makes the repairs, and is negligent in making them." Lathrop, J., in Galvin v. Beals, 187 Mass. 250, 252, 72 N. E. 969, and cases there cited. If these facts are established, the plaintiff's rights to maintain this action would be measured by those of her mother, the tenant. Jordan v. Sullivan, 181 Mass. 348, 63 N. E. 909; O'Malley v.

Twenty-Five Associates, 178 Mass. 555, 60 N. E. 387; Roche v. Sawyer, 176 Mass. 71, 57 N. E. 216.

The only evidence that these repairs, if made by the defendants' agent, were made negligently, was some testimony introduced by the plaintiff that, after they had been completed, the leak continued in the same manner and to the same extent as before. Doubtless the jury might have inferred from the testimony that no repairs were in fact made upon the gutter; but this was not the only possible inference. We are of opinion that, if the jury found that such repairs were made, they then might find that the work done was ineffectual to stop the leak at all; and, in view of the apparently simple character of what was needed to be done, might have inferred from this that the work was negligently done; that the carpenter who had been sent to make repairs upon the roof and gutter did his work so negligently as not to stop the leak, but to leave it as bad as before. They might have inferred, from the fact that the leak was as bad as before, that the work was improperly done. Accordingly, for the reason that the jury might have found for the plaintiff upon this ground, if, as we think they might have done, they found that she herself was in the exercise of due care, the plaintiff's exceptions must be sustained.

3. There was no evidence that the defendants retained control of the roof and gutter; but the plaintiff asked one witness whether, in houses which are let as this one was, "there is any known and established usage or custom in Boston as to who shall retain control of the outside, yard, roof of the houses;" and saved an exception to the exclusion of this question. The parties have treated the question as if a formal offer had been made to prove a custom by which, in such cases, the landlord retains control of the outside, including roof and gutters. But we think that the evidence was plainly inadmissible. It contradicts both the agreement of the parties and the rule of the law. Such a custom would be a bad one. Boisuzweski v. Middlesex Mut. Assur. Co. 186 Mass. 589, 72 N. E. 250; Menage v. Rosenthal, 175 Mass. 358, 56 N. E. 579; Benson v. Gray, 154 Mass. 391, 13 L.R.A. 262, 28 N. E. 275; Hedden v. Roberts, 134 Mass. 38, 45 Am. Rep. 276; Com. v. Cooper, 130 Mass. 285. Moreover, if it were shown that the defendants did retain control of the roof and gutter, yet they could not be held liable upon that ground alone in this action, for it does not appear but that the gutter remained in as good condition as when it was let. Moynihan v. Allyn, 162 Mass. 270, 38 N. E. 497; Quinn v. Perham, 151 Mass. 162, 23 N. E. 735.

As there must be a new trial, we have passed upon all the questions raised by the exceptions which seem likely hereafter to be material. Tully v. Fitchburg R. Co. 134 Mass. 499, 505.

Exceptions sustained.

R. CUNNINGHAM et al., Respts.,
v.

HARRY KRUTZ et al., Appts.

(41 Wash. 190, 83 Pac. 109.)

Homestead—patent—title—law governing.

1. The question, What title passes by a patent to a homestead settler on public land? must be solved by the law of the United States.

Same—right of wife.

2. A homestead settler who, after the death of his wife pending the homestead period, commutes the homestead entry, and, upon paying cash for the land at the government price, receives a patent therefor, acquires the absolute title free from any homestead interest under the laws of the state, which might pass by the will of the deceased wife.

Case Note.—Effect of the contracting or dissolution of marriage after the initiation, but before the consummation, of right under homestead entry: —Section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1390), relating to homesteads, reads as follows: "No certificate, however, shall be given, or patent issued, therefor, until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or, if he be dead, his widow, or, in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or, in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, proves by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have resided upon or cultivated the same for the term of five years immediately succeeding the time of filing the affidavit," etc.

As shown by the foregoing opinion, the interpretation of the above section of the Revised Statutes by the United States Supreme Court in the case of McCune v. Essig, 199 U. S. 382, 50 L. ed. 237, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 78, definitely determines the right of the widow of the homesteader where he dies pending the period of occupation required by the homestead law, or before the final proofs are filed. She succeeds to all the rights of the homesteader in the homestead to the exclusion of his heirs. From the Washington cases cited in CUNNINGHAM v. KRUTZ, it is apparent that the contrary rule formerly prevailed in that state. In A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to partition real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George Fowler, for appellants:

The question whether or not the plaintiffs have any interest in the premises in dispute depends entirely upon the interpretation to be placed on the Federal statutes.

McCune v. Essig, 118 Fed. 273, Affirmed in 122 Fed. 588; Bernier v. Bernier, 147 U. S. 242, 37 L. ed. 152, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244; other states, however, the courts, even in cases decided prior to the Federal case, took the same view. Crist v. Cosby, 11 Okla. 635, 69 Pac. 885; Chapman v. Price, 32 Kan. 446, 4 Pac. 807; Newkirk v. Marshall, 35 Kan. 77, 10 Pac. 571; Perry v. Ashby, 5 Neb. 291; Richard v. Moore, 110 La. 435, 34 So. 593; Jarvis v. Hoffman, 43 Cal. 314; Hayes v. Carroll, 74 Minn. 134, 76 N. W. 1017.

In Hayes v. Carroll, supra, where the homesteader died before the filing of the final proofs, the court held that his heirs, to whom the patent had been issued by mistake, held the land in trust for the widow, in whom was the equitable title; and a court of equity would enforce the trust.

As pointed out in CUNNINGHAM v. KRUTZ, the principle declared in the McCune Case seems broad enough to establish the proposition that the homesteader, in the event of the death of the wife before final proof, will take the title as his sole and separate property, unaffected by any rights that the heirs or devisees of the deceased wife would have therein according to the local law; although that specific point was not decided.

In Hall v. Hall, 41 Wash. 186, 83 Pac. 108, decided at the same term of court, and declaring the same principles as CUNNINGHAM v. KRUTZ, the wife of the homesteader secured a divorce from her husband during the period of occupation, and after the death of the husband, which occurred after the patent had been issued, attempted to secure a one-half interest in the homestead because of her relations with the homesteader at the time of the entry; but the court held that, as the marriage relation terminated before the patent issued, the wife would have no interest in the estate. After citing McCune v. Essig, the court said: "True, the homestead law provides that the patent shall issue to the widow in such cases; but it seems inconsistent to hold that the widow acquires the entire title on the death of the entry man, and that the entry man only acquires an undivided one-half interest on the death of the wife under identical circumstances. The manifest object of our community-property system is to place husband and wife on an equal footing as to their property rights; and perhaps the law should be so administered as to accord to each the same property rights on the death of the other. Furthermore, it is a well-known fact that our community system is utterly ignored in the administration of the Federal land laws." But the contrary view was taken in the earlier Washington case of Cox v. Tompkinson, 39 Wash. 70, 80 Pac. 1005, decided prior to McCune v. Essig.

When Federal statutes have been interpreted by the Federal courts, such interpretation will be adopted by this court.

The patent, if issued at the expiration of the homestead period, must have issued to Carlson, and must have vested the entire title in him.

Where the death of the wife of the homesteader did not occur until after five years of occupation had expired and final proofs had been made, it was held, in Brown v. Fry, 52 La. Ann. 58, 26 So. 748, that the homestead fell into the community. This case, however, is not necessarily in opposition to the principal case, as the court distinctly based its decision upon the fact that all of the rights of the homesteader and his wife were complete, and the only reason that the legal title had not passed to the community was the fact that the government had not yet issued the patent. The obligation resting upon the homesteader had been fulfilled, and therefore no act, or failure to act, on the part of another, could deprive the community of what it had earned. This exact situation does not appear in any of the other cases noticed.

The case of Crochet v. McCamant, 116 La. 1, 40 So. 474, which was decided before the McCune Case, appears to be in direct opposition to the principle as enunciated in that case and applied in CUNNINGHAM v. KRUTZ. In that case the court held that the acquisition of land by the homesteader, under the Federal homestead act, dated from the entry, and that the accomplishment of the mere conditions of occupation and making of final proof had a retroactive effect to the date of entry; and, consequently, the homestead became the joint property of the husband and wife at the time of the entry, even though the proofs were made and the certificate and patent issued after the dissolution of the community by the death of the wife. It appears from a reading of the opinion that the death of the wife occurred after the expiration of the five years, and this fact may distinguish this case from CUNNINGHAM v. KRUTZ; but in the opinion little weight appears to be attached to this fact, the decision turning mainly upon the fact that, immediately upon the entry, the homesteader had a conditional ownership of the land, and the accomplishment of the conditions under which he held it retroacted to the date of the entry, and consequently the land was acquired during, and fell into, the community.

Mr. H. E. Foster, for respondents:

Hadley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the partition of real estate. The plaintiffs allege that they are seised in fee simple of the undivided half interest in the land, and that the defendants Harry Krutz and Mary E. Foster are tenants in common with plaintiffs in the ownership of the land. The defendants Harry Krutz and wife, by their answer, deny that the plaintiffs have any interest whatever in the land, either as tenants in common with the defendants, or otherwise. They also deny that the defendant Mary E. Foster has any interest in the land, except that she holds a mortgage thereon for $500. It is affirmatively alleged in the answer that in December, 1887, one Carlson made entry upon a certain quarter section of land, which includes the land in question, the entry being made under the homestead laws of the United States; that he continued to reside thereon until April, 1890, when he commuted the homestead entry, made final proof, paid cash for the land at the government price, received his final receipt therefor, and that, in due course thereafter, a patent was issued to him by the United States; that in July, 1890, said Carlson borrowed of one Thomas S. Krutz the sum of $750, gave his note therefor, and to secure the same executed a mortgage upon said land, which was duly recorded. Allegations are made showing the due foreclosure of the mortgage by the assignee thereof against that part of the land here involved, a conveyance of the land under the foreclosure by the sheriff, and subsequent conveyances in direct line to the defendant Harry Krutz; that the defendant Hattie Krutz was, at the date of the conveyance to Harry Krutz, and still is, the wife of Harry Krutz; and that said land became, by said conveyance, the community property of the said two defendants. They ask that plaintiffs' complaint shall be dismissed. The answer of Mary E. Foster denies that the plaintiffs have any interest in the lands, and asks that their complaint be dismissed. The reply avers that the entry was made about December 21, 1887, and that from that time Carlson and wife were in possession of and resided upon the land; that in 1890 the wife of Carlson died testate, leaving a last will, which was duly admitted to probate; that said wife left three children as devisees under her will; that one of the children, an infant, has since died intestate and without issue; that, on the death of the wife and the probating of her will, the said children, her devisees, became the sole owners in fee simple of an undivided half interest in said land, and continued to hold the same until March, 1904, when, by deed, the two surviving children, together with their father, the surviving husband, conveyed said undivided half interest to one Shea; that thereafter said Shea and his wife conveyed to the plaintiffs. The cause was tried by the court, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiffs, declaring that they are the owners in fee simple of an undivided half interest in the land, and awarding partition thereof. The defendants have appealed.

From the foregoing it will be seen upon what the respective claims of title are based. The respondents contend that the deceased, Mrs. Carlson, had a devisable community interest in the land, and that they are the owners, by successive conveyances, of the interest so devised. Upon the other hand, appellants urge that, when the patent issued to the surviving husband, it conveyed to him the entire title as his separate property, and that through the foreclosure of a mortgage given by the patentee and successive conveyances thereunder the appellants Krutz and wife are the holders of the entire title. The trial court refused to receive and consider the offered evidence of appellants as to the giving and foreclosure of the mortgage, and as to the subsequent conveyances by which Krutz and wife claim title. It was the theory of the court that the land was the community property of Carlson and his deceased wife, and that, by the will of the latter, the undivided half passed to her children, through whom and their grantees it has come to respondents. Upon this theory, the court treated appellants' offered evidence as immaterial and incompetent. Respondents, however, conceded in their brief that, if the patent conveyed separate, and not community, property, they have no interest in the land. The entry was made as a homestead entry, and within less than three years thereafter the wife died. The husband did not continue to reside upon the land the required time to perfect the homestead, but commuted his homestead rights after the death of his wife, and made final proof and cash payment, in pursuance of which, in due course, a patent was issued to him. It therefore becomes necessary to determine whether the land was the separate property of Carlson, or whether it became the property of the community; and it is proper that we shall first refer to our own decisions bearing upon the question as to who obtains title from the United States through a homestead patent.

In Kromer v. Friday, 10 Wash. 621, 32 L.R.A. 671, 39 Pac. 229, Kromer made a homestead entry, and an Indian woman lived with him as his wife. The required time of residence expired, and final proof was made. After the making of final proof, a marriage ceremony was performed between Kromer and the woman, and soon afterwards a patent was issued to Kromer. It was held that the land became the community property of the two. The holding was, however, apparently based upon the theory that the fact that the two had been living together as man and wife, and that a marriage ceremony was subsequently performed, was not conclusive evidence that there was no previous marriage between them, and that the land therefore became community property, notwithstanding that final proof was made before the ceremony was performed. In Bolton v. La Camas Water Power Co. 10 Wash. 246, 38 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pac. 1043, it was held that, where the required time of residence upon a homestead had expired, and the wife afterwards died, but before final proof and issuance of patent to the husband, the community acquired only an equitable estate; the husband taking the full legal title, and, upon his conveyance to a grantee ignorant of the equities of the wife's heirs, both the legal and equitable titles passed. In Forker v. Henry, 21 Wash. 235, 57 Pac. 811, it was held that, where a woman had settled upon and improved a homestead before her marriage, and final proof was made and patent issued to her after marriage, the land became her separate property under our statute which defines as separate property of the wife all her property and pecuniary rights held by her at the time of her marriage. At the time of her marriage she had resided upon the land about four years, and, although she was not then entitled to the legal title, the court seems to have considered that, on account of her previous settlement and improvements, such equities attached as entitled her to the ultimate title as her separate property; the further fact appearing in that case that, as between the husband and wife, the land was deemed to be the wife's separate property. In Ahern v. Ahern, 31 Wash. 334, 96 Am. St. Rep. 912, 71 Pac. 1023, the husband and wife had resided upon the homestead more than six years, when the wife died. Final proof was made after her death, and the patent was issued to the husband. It was held that the land became community property. In Towner v. Rodegeb, 33 Wash. 153, 99 Am. St. Rep. 936, 74 Pac. 50, it was held that, where a settler upon unsurveyed public lands died, leaving no widow, and without heirs who were citizens of the United States, the land was again open to settlement, since the heirs could not succeed by right of inheritance, but by virtue only of a preference right given them by the laws of the United States if they had been duly qualified citizens. In James v. James, 35 Wash. 655, 77 Pac. 1082, the homesteader and his wife settled upon land, and three years afterwards the wife died. The husband completed the required residence and obtained a patent. It was said in that case that one who had been legally adopted by the husband and wife as a son was the lawful heir of the deceased wife, and had an interest in the land.

It is possible that some of the expressions in the above cases may be said to support respondents' contention here, and perhaps the conclusions upon the facts in some of them justify the contention that the decisions are decisive of this case in favor of respondents. Be that as it may, we shall now refer to recent Federal decisions. In McCune v. Essig, 118 Fed. 273, the following facts existed: McCune settled upon land in this state as a homestead, and made entry thereon. Within a year he died intestate; his only surviving heirs being his widow and a daughter, who continued to reside upon the land the required time for the widow to complete the homestead rights. Mrs. McCune, having become Mrs. Donahue by remarriage, then made final proof, and a patent was issued to her. About a year after the issuance of the patent she conveyed the land to the defendants in the case cited. Thereafter the daughter instituted the suit to procure a decree establishing that she was the owner of an undivided half of the land. Her contention was that, when the land was conveyed by the patent to her mother, it became the property of the community, composed of her father and mother; that she, as the surviving heir of the father, succeeded to his interest; and that the interest was not conveyed by the mother's deed to the defendants in the action. The suit was begun in the superior court of this state for Lincoln county, and was removed to the United States circuit court. That court retained the cause on the ground that the question in the case was one which must be resolved by the laws of the United States, and decided that the widow, upon the issuance of the patent to her, took the entire title as her separate property, and that there was no community interest to descend to the daughter. This ruling was affirmed by the United States circuit court of appeals, ninth circuit. McCune v. Essig, 59 C. C. A. 429, 122 Fed. 588. The same case, on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, was in all particulars affirmed by a recent decision, rendered November 29, 1905, the opinion being written by Mr. Justice McKenna, 199 U. S. 382, 50 L. ed. 237, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 78. From a copy of that opinion, which has been placed before us, we here quote: "The actions of the lower courts on the motion to remand and on the merits are attacked by appellant to a certain extent on the same ground, to wit, that the laws of Washington determine the title of the parties, not the laws of the United States. The interest in McCune, acquired by his entry, it is contended, was community property, and passed to appellant under the laws of the state. Sections 4488-4491 of the statutes of Washington provide that property and pecuniary rights owned by either husband or wife before marriage, or that acquired afterwards by gifts, bequests, devise, or descent, shall be separate property. Property not so acquired or owned shall be community property, and, in the absence of testamentary disposition by a deceased husband or wife, shall descend equally to the legitimate issue of his or their bodies. 1 Ballinger, Anno. Codes & Statutes. Relying on these provisions, the argument of appellant is, and we give it in the words of her counsel: 'When William McCune entered this land, he had not the legal title, but he had an immediate equitable interest and the exclusive right of possession until forfeited by failure to carry out the terms of his entry. United States v. Turner, 54 Fed. 228. The terms of his entry were carried out. The patent issued by reason of his entry. The state legislature had the right to direct to whom that equitable right and interest should pass. If the rights and interests under that entry had been forfeited, the state law would have no effect upon the title to the land. That equitable interest ripened, and was confirmed by the patent.' But this is begging the question. What interest arose in McCune by his entry, who could upon his death fulfil the conditions of settlement and proof, and to whom and for whom title would pass, depended upon the laws of the United States. Bernier v. Bernier, 147 U. S. 242, 37 L. ed. 152, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244. The motion to remand was rightly overruled." After quoting the Federal statutes relating to the conditions of homestead entries and settlement (§§ 2291, 2292, U. S. Rev. Stat., U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 1390, 1394), the opinion further says: "It requires an exercise of ingenuity to establish uncertainty in these provisions. They say who shall enter and what he shall do to complete title to the right thus acquired. He may reside upon and cultivate the land, and by doing so is entitled to a patent. If he die, his widow is given the right of residence and cultivation, and 'shall be entitled to a patent as in other cases.' He can make no devolution of the land against her. The statute which gives him a right gives her a right. She is as much a beneficiary of the statute as he. The words of the statute are clear, and express who, in turn, shall be its beneficiaries. The contention of appellant reverses the order of the statute and gives the children an interest paramount to that of the widow through the laws of the state. The law of the state is not competent to do this. As was observed by Circuit Judge Gilbert: 'The law of the state of Washington governs the de-scient of land lying within the state, but the question here is whether there had been any descent of land.' And, against application of the state law, the learned judge cited Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 498, 517, 10 L. ed. 264, 273, and Bernier v. Bernier, supra. In the former it was said that, whenever the question is whether title to land which had been the property of the United States has passed, that question must be resolved by the laws of the United States; but that whenever, according to those laws, the title shall have passed, then, like all other property in the state, it is subject to state legislation. In Bernier v. Bernier it was said that the object of §§ 2291 and 2292 was 'to provide the method of completing the homestead claim and obtaining a patent therefor, and not to establish a line of descent or rules of distribution of the deceased entry man's estate.' See Hall v. Russell, 101 U. S. 503, 25 L. ed. 829. And hence it was decided that Mrs. Donahue took the title, free from any interest or right in the appellant under the laws of the state. Against the effect of the patent conveying title to Mrs. Donahue, appellant invokes the doctrine of relation. It is admitted 'that the title to the real estate in the case at bar passed and vested according to the laws of the United States by patent.' But it is contended that, a beneficial interest having been created by the state law in McCune when the title passed out of the United States by the patent, it 'instantly dropped back in time to the inception or initiation of the equitable right of William McCune; and that the laws of the state intercepted and prevented the widow from having a complete title without first complying with the probate laws of the state. This, however, is but another way of asserting the law of the state against the law of the United States, and imposing a limitation upon the title of the widow which § 2291 of the Revised Statutes does not impose. It may be that appellant's contention has support in some expressions of the state decisions. If, however, they may be construed as going to the extent contended for, we are unable to accept them as controlling."

There is no necessity for further reviewing the arguments of our own or of the Federal decisions. The above decision is final and conclusive that the question as to what title passed to Carlson must be resolved by the laws of the United States. Without regard to the community laws of this state, it follows from the decision that, when one makes a homestead entry and dies before completing the full residence period necessary under the homestead law, and leaving a widow who completes the period of residence, makes proof, and procures a patent, the land becomes the absolute separate property of such widow. In so far as our own previous decisions may be in conflict with the above, when applied to a similar state of facts, they must now be treated as overruled. The facts in the case at bar are very similar to those in McCune v. Essig. In the other case the husband died and the widow completed the homestead title; while in this one, the wife died within the third year of residence, and the husband commuted the homestead rights and made final proof, paying cash, and procuring patent to himself. If Carlson's title had been perfected as a homestead title, we should see no difference in principle by which to distinguish it from the McCune Case. Our views upon this point were expressed in the case of Hall v. Hall, 41 Wash. 186, 83 Pac. 108, as follows: "True the homestead law provides that the patent shall issue to the widow in such cases; but it seems inconsistent to hold that the widow acquires the entire title on the death of the entry man, and that the entry man only acquires an undivided one-half interest on the death of the wife, under identical circumstances. The manifest object of our community-property system is to place the husband and wife on an equal footing as to their property rights, and perhaps the law should be so administered as to accord to each the same property rights on the death of the other." The additional fact in this case, that Carlson commuted the homestead entry and paid cash for the land, strengthens appellants' position. By the consent and concurrence of the United States, he relinquished the homestead entry, and availed himself of the benefits of the law granting pre-emption rights. The title conveyed to him was based upon a new consideration passing from him to the United States, a consideration entirely different from the conditions which inhered in the homestead entry. We see no escape from the conclusion that Carlson took the title as his sole and separate property. It follows that respondents have no title in the lands in question and no cause of action.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment dismissing the action.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

LULU L. SHERIDAN, by Guardian, Respt.,
v.
MODERN WOODMEN OF AMERICA, Appt.

Benefit certificate—insanity of holder—promise of notice.

1. A single act of the clerk of a local camp of a mutual benefit society in attempting to contract notwithstanding a provision of the laws of the order that no act on his part shall have the effect of creating a liability on the part of the society, or of waiving any right belonging to it; which act consists of promising the representatives of an insane member to notify them of assessments,—will not bind the society so as to prevent its claiming a forfeiture of the certificate for nonpayment of dues, notice of which is regularly mailed to the member, although no notice is given to the representatives according to the promise.

Same—excuse for nonpayment.

2. Insanity of a member of a mutual benefit society is no excuse for noncompliance with his contract as to payment of dues.

Same—irregular forfeiture—acquiescence.

3. Failure for more than two years to make an attempt to secure relief from what is alleged to be an irregular forfeiture of a mutual benefit certificate, or to tender dues and assessments thereon, will be regarded as an acquiescence in the forfeiture.

(October 27, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Snohomish County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a mutual-benefit certificate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Emery, Rourke, & Denney and Ben D. Smith for appellant.

Messrs. Bostwick & Mulvihill, for respondent:

The clerk of the local camp is the agent of the head camp, notwithstanding the by-laws provide to the contrary.

Notice of the insanity of the member, given to the clerk, is notice to the defendant company, whether communicated to it and received by it or not.

Note.—The general question as to waiver by officers of subordinate lodge of forfeiture for nonpayment of assessments is treated in a case note in 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 421. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

When the offer to pay the assessments was made in advance, good faith required that the ones making it have an opportunity to preserve their rights, not against the voluntary act of the member, but as against the neglect caused by his inability to act.

Crow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action by the plaintiff, Lulu L. Sheridan, by Tillie Hewitt, her guardian, upon a benefit certificate issued by the defendant to one Hiram D. Sheridan, now deceased. The certificate, which was issued April 19, 1900, named as beneficiary the plaintiff, Lulu L. Sheridan, minor daughter of Hiram D. Sheridan and Tillie Hewitt. At the date of the certificate Lulu's father and mother had been divorced, and her mother had subsequently married. The plaintiff contends that, during the month of December, 1901, while Hiram D. Sheridan was in good standing, he became insane; that in March, 1902, he was committed to an asylum, where he remained until his death in June, 1904; that in December, 1901, on discovering such insanity, Tillie Hewitt, the plaintiff's mother, gave notice thereof by letter to the clerk of the defendant's local camp at Libby, Montana, advising him that, if Mr. Sheridan failed to pay his assessments, she wished to be notified, so that she might pay for the benefit of her daughter; that, in response, the clerk wrote Mrs. Hewitt that Mr. Sheridan's assessments were then paid in advance; that, when further assessments became due, he would notify her; and that he regretted to learn of the insanity of Mr. Sheridan; that the clerk afterwards failed to notify Mrs. Hewitt of assessment No. 1 for January, 1902; that Sheridan was suspended for its nonpayment; that, by reason of the failure of the clerk to notify Mrs. Hewitt, such suspension was void; that no subsequent notice was given Mrs. Hewitt; and that the certificate, therefore, remained in full force at the date of Sheridan's death. The defendant claims that due notice of assessment No. 1 for January, 1902, was given to the assured by the clerk of the head camp in the manner provided by the contract; that he failed to pay the same and became ipso facto suspended on February 2, 1902; that he was never reinstated; that no notice was given the defendant of the insanity of the insured prior to his suspension; that insanity is no excuse for nonpayment of assessments; and that the alleged notice of insanity and the clerk's alleged promise to inform Mrs. Hewitt of nonpayment conferred no rights upon the plaintiff, nor did they impose any duty upon the defendant. Prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant all dues and assessments which had matured between January 1, 1902, and January 1, 1904, amounting to $27.30. This tender was refused, the defendant denying liability on the certificate. On trial the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,972.70, and from the judgment entered thereon, this appeal has been taken.

The appellant, with other assignments of error, contends that the trial court erred (1) in denying its motion for a nonsuit, and (2) in denying its motion for a directed verdict. The pleadings and evidence show that the appellant is a fraternal mutual benefit association, organized under the laws of Illinois, with its head camp at Rock Island, and with numerous local camps throughout Illinois and other states; that it is organized on the lodge plan, having a ritualistic form of work, and also certain fraternal, social, and indemnity features. Hiram D. Sheridan was a member of the local camp at Libby, Montana. By the terms of his certificate, the appellant agreed, in case of his death, to pay to the respondent as beneficiary the sum of $2,000, subject to certain conditions therein stated; one of which was that, if assessments against the assured should not be paid to the clerk of the local camp on or before the first of the month following the date of notice of the same, then the certificate should be null and void. The by-laws provided that every beneficial member who, after notice, should fail to pay any assessment on or before the first of the following month, or who should fail to pay dues in advance on or before the 1st day of April, July, October, or January, should ipso facto become suspended; that during such suspension his benefit certificate should be absolutely null and void; that a suspended member might be reinstated within sixty days upon payment of all arrearages, together with all fines, dues, and assessments maturing subsequent to default, provided that he was then in good health and furnished the clerk of the local camp a written warranty to such effect signed by himself; that a beneficiary member in suspension for more than sixty days but less than six months, if in good health, might be reinstated upon furnishing a certificate of good health from the camp physician after medical examination duly approved by the head physician, and upon payment of all arrearages; that no officer of any local camp was authorized or permitted to waive any of the provisions of the laws of the society relating to the contract for the payment of benefits; that no officer of any local camp should have the right or power to waive any of the provisions of the by-laws of the society; that the clerk of the local camp was declared to be the agent of such camp, and not the agent of the head camp; that no act or omission on his part should have the effect of creating a liability on the part of the society or of waiving any right or immunity belonging to it, and that he should not collect or receive assessments or dues from a beneficiary member who has been suspended, except upon reinstatement in the manner above mentioned. All by-laws of the society were, by the express terms of the certificate, made a part thereof. No payment of any assessments or dues maturing after December 1, 1901, was made by Sheridan or any other person at any time prior to his death in June, 1904, nor were any tendered except on the one occasion hereinafter mentioned. The respondent's witnesses testified that, in December, 1901, Mrs. Hewitt wrote a letter to the clerk of the local camp, advising him of the insanity of Sheridan, and requesting him to notify her so that she might pay the assessments in the event of the failure of Sheridan to do so; that the clerk, answering this letter, stated the assessments were then paid in advance, and that he would keep her notified; that, by reason of the failure of the clerk to give her any further notice, she failed to pay the assessment levied in January, 1902, not knowing that it had been levied; that in February, 1902, the clerk by letter advised her of the suspension of Sheridan for nonpayment of the January assessment, and sent her a blank certificate of health to be signed by him as a condition precedent to his reinstatement; that in response to this letter, she, on March 8, 1902, wrote the clerk in part as follows: "I have been away a little while and was not here when Lulu, my daughter, got your letter or would have seen to it at once as Sheridan was here then, but he is not here now and the last time I saw him, about three weeks ago, he was well and walking down the street, but as he has left town I cannot get him to sign the paper, but will inclose $3.60 to pay the dues to May 1st, and, if it is not all right, you can return the money order to me. . . . The reason I wish to keep up these dues is, he is a very reckless man now in some ways, and as I wrote you a year ago that I would keep up these dues if you would inform me when he failed to pay. . . . Now, . . . I hope you will look on my letter with some favor and make this all right; that is, if his insurance still runs to Lulu, his daughter." The original of the last-mentioned letter was produced at the trial, but none of the others mentioned by respondent's witnesses could be found. No further attempt of payment of either assessments or dues was made by the respondent or her mother, nor is it claimed that any further correspondence took place. The $3.60 remitted by Mrs. Hewitt was returned by the clerk, he refusing to receive the same without the health certificate. The clerk denies receiving any letter from Mrs. Hewitt in December, 1901, and also denies that he wrote her the letter which she says she received from him during the same month, in which he promised to notify her of the assessments when levied. As the jury found a verdict in favor of the respondent, they necessarily believed the statements of her witnesses, and we must accept the same as true.

The contention of the respondent is that the appellant had no right to suspend Sheridan for nonpayment of dues or assessments, he being to appellant's knowledge insane and unfit for business; that appellant's agent, the clerk of the local camp, failed to notify the respondent of the levy of assessments as agreed, and that, by reason of such failure, the attempted suspension was void. It is not disputed but that notice of the January, 1902, assessment was given to Sheridan by the head clerk, in the manner required by the by-laws, and the appellant now insists that nonpayment after such notice ipso facto worked a forfeiture of the certificate; and that, even though the clerk of the local camp did agree to notify the respondent's mother of the assessments when levied, such agreement was not binding upon the appellant by reason of the restrictions upon his authority contained in its by-laws. We think these contentions should be sustained upon the authority of Modern Woodmen v. Tevis, 54 C. C. A. 293, 117 Fed. 369, and cases therein cited. In the Tevis Case, the United States circuit court of appeals construed and passed upon the legal effect of the identical by-laws now before us, and we fully indorse and adopt its reasoning as controlling in this case; this being the sole instance in which it is shown that the clerk, in his course of dealing with members or beneficiaries, violated any by-law of the society, and it not appearing that his action was the result of any customary course of procedure adopted by him towards members or beneficiaries. A single act of transgression cannot arise to the dignity of a custom so as to be impliedly ratified by the appellant. Had it been pleaded and shown that the clerk habitually violated appellant's by-laws in this or kindred matters, a different rule might possibly be applied in determining the relative rights of the parties; but that question is not now before us, as no showing of any such state of facts has been made.

The appellant further contends that the insanity of the assured is no excuse for nonpayment under the contract; and, in support of such contention cites with others the following authorities, which we think are in point: Pitts v. Hartford Life & Annuity Ins. Co. 66 Conn. 376, 50 Am. St. Rep. 96, 34 Atl. 95; Wheeler v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 543, 37 Am. Rep. 594; Carpenter v. Centennial Mut. Life Asso. 68 Iowa, 453, 56 Am. Rep. 855, 27 N. W. 456. In following these cases we are not unmindful of the case of Buchanan v. Supreme Conclave, I. O. of H. 178 Pa. 465, 34 L.R.A. 436, 56 Am. St. Rep. 774, 35 Atl. 873, cited by respondent and which we regard as being against the weight of authority. The respondent most vigorously contends that, as she was misled by the act of the clerk of the local camp, the appellant had no right to forfeit the certificate, and that it should be estopped from pleading such forfeiture. Were we to concede that the clerk had power to bind the appellant when he agreed to notify respondent's mother of assessments as levied, and should we also hold that the beneficiary was entitled by reason of the insanity of the insured, of which appellant was advised, still we think no recovery can be permitted herein as the respondent and her mother, who was acting in her behalf, must be held by their subsequent conduct, covering a period of more than two years, to have acquiesced in such alleged irregular forfeiture of the certificate. At all times after March 8, 1902, they failed to make any further tender of dues or assessments, nor did they take any steps to secure relief from such suspension and forfeiture.

In Lavin v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 104 Mo. App. 1, 78 S. W. 325, cited by respondent, it was contended that the wife of the beneficiary had twice tendered payment of assessments which were due, but that the clerk of the local lodge had declined to accept the same for the reason that, as he alleged, the tender was insufficient in amount. No further payments were made or tendered during the life of the assured, who died some six months later. On trial judgment was entered in favor of the beneficiary, which the appellate court reversed, ordering a new trial. Upon investigation we find that on the second trial the beneficiary again recovered judgment, and that the case again came to the court of appeals, being reported in 112 Mo. App. at page 1, 86 S. W. 600. On this last hearing the appellate court enters into a very elaborate and able discussion of the rights and duties of an assured when a certificate issued by a fraternal society has been forfeited without just cause, and announces the doctrine that it is essential for the preservation of the rights of the beneficiary under the certificate that, notwithstanding such forfeiture, the assured or his representative should offer to fully perform the contract upon his part. The court, reviewing numerous authorities, points out a clear distinction between the principles applicable to old-line life insurance companies which carry on business for profit, and those which are applicable to fraternal societies. Under appellant's by-laws and the terms of the certificate, Sheridan was required to pay quarterly dues in advance, without notice of the same. There is no showing that either he or any other person ever offered to make such payments within the two years and a half the assured lived after January, 1902. Yet the respondent and her mother, who had the certificate in her possession, must have known that nonpayment of these dues would ipso facto forfeit the rights of the assured, without regard to the assessments. There is no showing that, after the tender made in March, 1902, was returned by the clerk, the assured, the respondent, or her mother ever attempted to take any steps, either in the order or in any court of justice, to compel a reinstatement of the policy, or to have the alleged forfeiture declared to be void. The appellant contends that, under the by-laws of the society, the respondent should have appealed from the action of the clerk, and that, having failed to do so, she is now estopped from claiming under the certificate.

Respondent, however, calls attention to the fact that the by-laws, by their express terms, give the right of appeal to members only. This is true. Yet were we to hold that the respondent, by reason of her father's insanity, was, prior to his death, entitled to any vested right in the certificate, as against the appellant, she certainly should have taken some action to protect herself from the loss which would necessarily result from the forfeiture alleged to be void, and should have done so without unreasonable delay. Accepting her theory of this case, we are unable to escape the conclusion that a duty was imposed upon her to at least direct the attention of the local camp to the action of its clerk, so that it might be afforded an opportunity for correcting his mistake in refusing the tender, either by taking action itself, or by causing the head camp to act. If the respondent and her representatives could be permitted to remain quiet and allow the suspension of Sheridan and the forfeiture of the certificate to continue unquestioned for the period of more than two years, without even tendering any payment of dues which necessarily matured, and could then successfully prosecute this claim against appellant, there is no reason why they could not have continued such inactivity for a period of ten years or even longer. Such a construction of the certificate would be absurd, to say nothing of its being unjust. We think the respondent acquiesced in the decision and action of the clerk, that she is now bound thereby, and is not entitled to recover.

The motion for a directed verdict in favor of the appellant should have been granted, and the trial court erred in denying the same. It is ordered that the judgment of the Superior Court be reversed, and that the cause be remanded, with instructions to dismiss the action.

The courts have found occasion to hold that an absolute or conditional refusal to sell goods is not in itself unlawful. Wills v. Central Ice & Cold Storage Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 88 S. W. 265. See also Whitwell v. Continental Tobacco Co. 64 L.R.A. 689, 60 C. C. A. 290, 125 Fed. 454, which holds that the refusal of a manufacturer to sell, except at exorbitant prices, to a dealer who will not agree to refrain from handling the goods of competitors, is not actionable, although the dealer's business is injured thereby; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Platt, 142 Fed. 606, which holds that the manufacturers of medicines made under trade secrets may withhold them entirely from sale, may sell them on such terms as they please, may withhold them from one person while selling them to others, and may fix the price at which the medicines may be resold.

And, though a number may agree to do what one may lawfully do, without becoming liable to a person injured thereby (see Brewster v. C. Miller's Sons Co. 101 Ky. 368, 38 L.R.A. 505, 41 S. W. 301, which holds that an action for damages cannot be maintained against members of an undertakers' association for refusal to furnish materials or render services at a funeral, for one who has refused or failed to pay for such services previously rendered by some member of the association), yet the same act, when done in pursuance of an unlawful purpose for which the combination has been effected, will become actionable, since it then falls within that part of the well-known definition which describes an unlawful conspiracy as a combination to accomplish an unlawful purpose by lawful means. The essential inquiry, then, is whether the object of the combination is an unlawful one.

The legality of combinations in pursuance of which restrictions have been attached to the sale of goods is the subject of discussion in the cases following.

In Brown v. Jacobs' Pharmacy Co. 115 Ga. 429, 57 L.R.A. 547, 90 Am. St. Rep. 126, 41 S. E. 553, an action for damages for injuries to plaintiff's business and to enjoin further injury by combining to prevent plaintiff from purchasing goods, it was held that a combination of mercantile dealers to compel another dealing in similar goods to sell at prices fixed by it, or, upon his refusal so to do, to prevent those of whom its members are purchasing customers from selling goods to him, is, upon general legal principles, contrary to public policy, and void.

Murray v. McGarigle, 69 Wis. 483, 34 N. W. 522, holds that an action is maintainable by a dealer who is unable to obtain coal to carry out his contracts because of his refusal to comply with the rules of an association of coal dealers formed for the purpose of monopolizing the trade of the city.

In Delz v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755, 16 S. W. 111, it was held that a petition charging that defendants not only refused to supply plaintiff, who was a butcher, with animals or meat for the purposes of his business, but also conspired with others not to do so, whereby plaintiff suffered damage, states a cause of action.

In Hawarden v. Youghioghney & L. Coal Co. 111 Wis. 545, 55 L.R.A. 828, 87 N. W. 472, it was held that a retail coal dealer, who had been unable to obtain coal because of a combination between wholesalers and favored retailers to monopolize the business, enhance prices, and drive retailers, not members of the combination, out of business, may maintain an action against the conspirators for the damages caused thereby; and this although the court recognized the right of several persons to combine, in the absence of any statute to the contrary, for the purpose of increasing their business and making greater gains by any legitimate means, even though, as an incidental result of the combination, others are driven out of business.

So, also, an action lies where the refusal to sell is dictated by a combination which is declared unlawful by statute. See Ertz v. Produce Exch. Co. 82 Minn. 173, 51 L.R.A. 825, 83 Am. St. Rep. 419, 84 N. W. 743, where the constitution and by-laws of the defendant corporation regulated the credit to be allowed its members, discriminated in the prices to be paid for produce against persons not members, controlled the delivery of goods, and provided a penalty by fine and suspension for offending and defaulting members; Straus v. American Publishers' Assn. 177 N. Y. 473, 64 L.R.A. 701, 101 Am. St. Rep. 819, 69 N. E. 1107, in which the refusal to sell was due to an agreement entered into between publishers of and dealers in books, whereby they agreed not to sell books of any kind to dealers who should be suspected of selling copyrighted books at less than the net price fixed by the publishers, or who should supply books to dealers who were suspected of making such sales.

A case which it is interesting to compare with KLINGEL'S PHARMACY v. SHARPE & DOHME because of the different conclusions reached upon a state of facts which, as stated in the complaint to which demurrer was taken, is essentially similar, is that of John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Assn. 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L.R.A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 67 N. E. 136, in which it was held, by a divided court, that a merchant of large means, who is in position, by reason of large orders, to obtain more advantageous prices from manufacturers than others, so that he can undersell them in the market, has no cause of complaint if they combine, and, by representation and persuasion, induce the manufacturers to refuse to sell to him unless he will agree to maintain prices to consumers. The judge writing the opinion, however, seems to have understood that the combination in question would not prevent the purchase of goods by the plaintiff at the so-called "long" price. The decision seems to be based upon the theory that the plan adopted, of granting rebates to dealers who would agree to maintain prices, did not operate to restrict trade, but was, in effect, the creating of an agency on the part of the proprietors by which any druggist might receive the goods and dispose of them as an agent of the principal, receiving the commissions agreed upon therefor. The court further said that the members of the wholesale druggists' association clearly had a right to work for their own interest, and a right to devise and adopt a plan for the conduct of the business in which they could make a commission or a profit, so long as they did not unlawfully interfere with the rights of others; and that they might lawfully petition the manufacturers to adopt the plan devised by them, and might support their petition with all of the arguments and persuasions that they could bring to bear, so long as they did not resort to threats or intimidation. And it was further held that there was no boycott of the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) plaintiff, since it could obtain goods at the long price, and might at any time avail itself of the rebate provision by agreeing to maintain the selling price.

As bearing upon the general question of the right to recover damages for interference with business by a combination which imposes restrictions as to the persons with whom its members may do business, reference may be made to the cases of Martell v. White, 185 Mass. 255, 64 L.R.A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341, 69 N. E. 1085, which holds that an action will lie on behalf of a quarry owner against members of a voluntary association of dealers in stone, of which he is not a member, who enforce a by-law of the association imposing a fine upon members who deal with those who are not members, so that members who desire to deal with nonmembers are coerced from doing so, to the ruin of the business of the quarry owner; Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 43 L.R.A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746, 42 Atl. 607, in which it was held that an action for damages for conspiracy was maintainable by a partnership engaged in the business of polishing granite, which was unable to obtain business because of a resolution of the granite manufacturers' association not to do business with persons not members of the association, which was rendered effective by a by-law imposing a fine upon any member who should violate it; and Gatzow v. Buening, 106 Wis. 1, 49 L.R.A. 475, 80 Am. St. Rep. 17, 81 N. W. 1003, in which it was held that a by-law of a liverymen's association which binds the members not to do business with any person who does not patronize its members exclusively, and prevents any of them from letting a hearse to a private party for a funeral where the undertaker in charge of it is reputed to patronize nonunion members, or to any person whose family, for the occasion, patronize a nonunion livery, is unlawful as against public policy, and that therefore damages may be recovered by one from whose service a hearse and carriages at a funeral were withdrawn in pursuance of such by-law.

By the Federal anti-trust act, and also by some of the state anti-trust laws, express provision is made for the recovery of damages by any person suffering injury on account of the combinations thereby declared unlawful. What combinations come under the ban of such statutes is not within the scope of this note. A discussion of the question may be found in an exhaustive note in 64 L.R.A. 689, on Illegal trusts under modern anti-trust laws; and see also the case of Jayne v. Loder, herewith reported, and decisions collected in the case note thereunto appended.

Leppert v. Flags, 101 Md. 71, 60 Atl. 450.

Mr. Vernon Cook also for appellees.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question now before us is merely one of pleading, and involves only the sufficiency of the averments of the declaration. To the declaration the defendants demurred, and the superior court of Baltimore city sustained the demurrer and entered judgment for the defendants for costs, and from that judgment this appeal was taken.

In order to determine whether the ruling of the superior court was correct, it will be necessary to set forth with some fullness the allegations of the declaration; and the objections which have been urged against its legal sufficiency will then be stated and considered. The declaration avers that Klingel's Pharmacy, of Baltimore city, the plaintiff, is a duly licensed, incorporated retail vendor of drugs and druggists' supplies; that it was and still is able, ready, and willing to pay cash for all kinds of drugs and druggists' supplies needed by it and suitable for the proper conducting of its said business; that the defendants the Calvert Drug Company and Sharpe & Dohme 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

are corporations which have been for some time and still are engaged in the business of selling drugs and druggists' supplies; that the other defendant the Baltimore Retail Drug Association is a corporation formed and organized for the purpose, among other things, of unlawfully maintaining among dealers in drugs and druggists' supplies the maximum rate schedule of prices and of preventing, in restraint of trade, all vendors of drugs and druggists' supplies, who are unwilling to acquiesce in and submit to the prices so fixed by it, from buying at any price the drugs and druggists' supplies needed and desired by them in their business, by the unlawful coercion of threats that any and all vendors of drugs and druggists' supplies who shall sell for less than the schedule prices shall be themselves blacklisted, and all sales of drugs and druggists' supplies be refused them; that all the members of said retail drug association are bound by an agreement not to sell such supplies to any person or corporation who will not agree to maintain its maximum schedule of prices; that the plaintiff has steadily refused to become a member of said Baltimore Retail Drug Association, or to unite with it, and with its members, and with the other named defendants, in said combination and conspiracy to coerce the dealers in drugs and druggists' supplies to maintain said established prices by refusing to sell to them and by threats that, unless they shall so maintain the same, they shall be boycotted and placed on the blacklist, and be disabled from buying any drugs and druggists' supplies whatever; that, though the plaintiff has repeatedly applied to the Calvert Drug Company and to Sharpe & Dohme, and to sundry other druggists, to sell to it drugs and druggists' supplies, tendering itself ready, able, and willing to pay cash, yet the said defendants and said other druggists have refused to sell it drugs or druggists' supplies at any price whatsoever, because of said unlawful conspiracy and combination, coupled with the threat that for any violation of such unlawful combination and conspiracy the parties violating it should themselves be blacklisted and all sales be refused to them; that the avowed object of the conspiracy was and is to maintain in restraint of trade a maximum price of drugs and druggists' supplies, and to compel the plaintiff to become a member of said combination and to agree to charge all its customers such maximum price or to be driven out of business; that the retail drug association is wholly composed in its membership of such vendors, and that the entire power of the association and of its members is unlawfully exerted to coerce, by blacklisting and by potent and effective threats of boycotting, the illegal purposes and acts aforesaid; that the wrongful refusal of the Calvert Drug Company, and of Sharpe & Dohme, and of other parties, to sell to the plaintiff, was and is the direct result exclusively of said unlawful combination and conspiracy and of the wrongful actings and doings of said retail drug association in carrying out the unlawful object and purpose of said conspiracy; that the action of the defendants is not an action taken by them in the bona fide exercise of their supposed right to sell or to refuse to sell to whomsoever they please, nor in the bona fide exercise of their supposed right to advise other vendors as to selling or not selling their drugs and druggists' supplies, but, on the contrary, that, by the said combination and conspiracy, the defendants did wrongfully and maliciously intend to injure and destroy the plaintiff's business, which they have succeeded in doing; and that such injury to the business of the plaintiff is the direct result of said illegal, malicious, and wrongful conspiracy, and of the acts done in furtherance thereof.

Here, then, it is distinctly charged that there is an unlawful conspiracy to exact and to maintain a maximum schedule of prices for drugs and druggists' supplies in restraint of trade; and it is with equal directness alleged that, because the plaintiff will not enter into that combination and conspiracy, no drugs or supplies have been or will be sold to it by the defendants, and that no other dealer in those articles is or will be allowed to sell to it without incurring the penalty of being blacklisted and boycotted as threatened by the defendants, which action of the defendants was not taken in the bona fide exercise of their right to sell or to refuse to sell to whom they pleased, but was taken with a malicious intent to injure and destroy the business of the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff has been wholly deprived of the ability to purchase supplies, and has as a result been prevented from pursuing its lawful avocation. By sustaining the demurrer, the superior court held that these facts, if true, did not constitute a valid cause of action. We are not apprised by the record as to the ground upon which the trial judge based his decision. But the reasons assigned in the brief of the appellees to sustain that ruling are, first, because (a) an agreement or conspiracy not to sell to the plaintiff is not actionable, and because (b) no facts are alleged that amount to unlawful coercion by the defendants to the damage of the plaintiff; secondly, because the declaration is bad for misjoinder. These grounds are not tenable, as we shall see in a moment. They have been assumed, obviously, in con-

In the last analysis it will be seen that there are three salient facts averred in the declaration: First. A combination to exact and maintain a maximum schedule of prices for drugs and druggists' supplies is asserted to exist between the defendants and others in restraint of trade. That combination, if it does exist, and we are bound to assume that it does when dealing with the issue raised by the demurrer, is a criminal conspiracy at the common law, and is punishable by fine and imprisonment after indictment and conviction. It is the offense of forestalling the market, and is defined to be every practice or device, by act, conspiracy, words, or news, to enhance the price of victuals or other merchandise. Roscoe, Ev. 437; 3 Inst. 196; 3 Bacon, Abr. 261; 1 Russell, Crimes & Misdemeanors, 169. As it creates a monopoly it was held to be unlawful at the common law as being in restraint of trade and against public policy. Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181. The English statutes on this subject, which were merely declaratory of the common law, were repealed by 7 & 8 Vict. chap. 24. In the United States, while we hear little now about forestalling, engrossing, or regrating, we hear much of "corners" and "trusts" which are, in many instances, the old offenses under new names, since they are frequently attempts by a combination or conspiracy of persons to monopolize an article of trade or commerce and so to enhance its price. Where the direct and immediate effects of a contract or combination among particular dealers in a commodity is to destroy competition between them and others, so that the parties to the contract or combination may obtain increased prices for themselves, such contract or combination amounts to a restraint of trade in the commodity, even though contracts to buy such commodity at the enhanced price are constantly being made. Total suppression of the trade in the commodity is not necessary in order to render the combination one in restraint of trade. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 244, 44 L. ed. 141, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96. Though this was said by the Supreme Court in a case which arose under the anti-trust act of Congress of July 2, 1890, it equally applies to combinations and conspiracies of the character described in the declaration set forth in the record now before us. A combination is a conspiracy in law whenever the act to be done has a necessary tendency to prejudice the public, or oppress individuals by unjustly subjecting them to the power of the confederates, and giving effect to the purposes of the latter, whether of extortion or mischief; and the same proposition in one form of expression or another is laid down in all the criminal law. Bishop, Crim. Law, § 172; Desty, Crim. Law, § 2; 3 Chitty, Crim. Law, § 1138; Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 1830. A "corner," when accomplished by confederation to raise or depress prices and operate on the market, is a conspiracy, if the means be unlawful. Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159; People v. Melvin, 2 Wheeler, C. C. 262; People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 2 L.R.A. 33, and notes (54 Hun, 355, 3 N. Y. Supp. 401). In Van Horn v. Van Horn, 52 N. J. L. 284, 10 L.R.A. 184, 20 Atl. 488, it was ruled that an action will lie for a combination or conspiracy by fraudulent and malicious acts to drive a trader out of business, resulting in damage. The cases of Kimball v. Harman, 34 Md. 407, 6 Am. Rep. 340, and Robertson v. Parks, 76 Md. 118, 24 Atl. 411, decide nothing at variance with the principles just stated. They hold that an act which does not constitute a cause of action when done by one person does not become actionable merely because it has been done by conspirators; that an unlawful combination to do an act, which, if done, would injure another, does not of itself and without more furnish a ground for a civil suit; and finally, as a corollary to the previous proposition, that, though a conspiracy to do an injury exists, a plaintiff cannot recover against the conspirators unless some act has been done in furtherance of the conspiracy which has resulted in damage to him. "The quality of the act, and the nature of the injury inflicted by it, must determine the question whether the action will lie." Kimball v. Harman, supra. Having described a combination which, at the common law, is a criminal conspiracy, the declaration proceeds to set forth the acts done in execution of the unlawful conspiracy, and to aver that they were maliciously done, and then to allege the injury resulting therefrom.

The second salient fact averred in the narr. consists of a statement of the acts done in furtherance of the conspiracy. Those acts are twofold: First, a refusal by the defendants to sell to the plaintiff,—an act they would have the legal right to do if, when done, it were not done in the execution of and to carry into effect a criminal conspiracy in restraint of trade; and, secondly, coercion and intimidation practised by the defendants upon other vendors of like commodities, by means of threats to blacklist and to boycott such vendors, if they sold to the plaintiff any drugs or druggists' supplies, whereby they were deterred from selling those articles to the plaintiff, unless it joined the association.

"It is a part of every man's civil rights," said Judge Cooley, "that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice." Cooley, Torts, 278. Again: "The exercise by one man of his legal right cannot be a legal wrong to another. . . . Whatever one has a [legal] right to do another can have no right to complain of." Id. 688. It was upon this principle that the decision in Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis (Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Northwestern Lumbermen's Asso.) 54 Minn. 223, 21 L.R.A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, 55 N. W. 1119, was placed. In that case a large number of retail lumber dealers formed a voluntary association by which they mutually agreed that they would not deal with any manufacturer or wholesale dealer who should sell lumber directly to consumers, not dealers, at any point where a member of the association was carrying on a retail yard; and they provided in their by-laws that, whenever any wholesale dealer or manufacturer made any such sale, the secretary of the association should notify all the members of the fact. The plaintiff having made such a sale, the secretary threatened to send notice of the fact to all the members of the association, and it was held that no action would lie, and that there was no ground for an injunction. There was nothing unlawful in this. Each member of the association had the legal right to refuse to sell the lumber which he owned, if he saw fit to refuse, and the collective refusal of all the members was equally lawful. So, too, the defendants in this case had a perfect legal right to refuse to sell to the plaintiff any drugs and druggists' supplies owned by them, and it would have been wholly immaterial whether that refusal was the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice, if the bare refusal to sell had been the head and front of their offending. But the refusal to sell was not the exercise of a legal right, if that refusal were a mere step in the development and enforcement of a scheme to forestall the market in restraint of trade, or to drive the plaintiff into becoming a member of an organization which would control the prices he could charge for his wares, and which would thereby deprive him of the liberty to contract for the sale of his goods according to his own judgment of their value. While an act which is in itself lawful can never become unlawful simply because it may be done by several persons instead of by only one, yet the same act may be unlawful when it is a means of accomplishing an unlawful end. An act performed in furthering an unlawful enterprise cannot be a lawful act, though the same act would be free from censure if done with some other view. If it be conceded that a person has the lawful right to do a thing irrespective of his motive for doing it, the proposition that an act lawful in itself is not converted by a bad motive into an unlawful act is a mere abstract truism. But if the meaning of the proposition is that when a person or an aggregation of persons, if influenced by one kind of motive, has a lawful right to do a thing, the act is still lawful when done with any motive; or that an act lawful under one set of circumstances is therefore lawful under every conceivable set of circumstances,—then the proposition is neither logically nor legally accurate. In so far as a right is absolutely and unqualifiedly lawful, it is lawful whatever may be the motive of the actor; but in many cases the lawfulness of an act which causes damage to another may depend upon whether the act is for justifiable cause, and this justification may be found sometimes in the circumstances under which it is done, irrespective of motive, sometimes in the motive alone, and sometimes in the circumstances and the motive combined. Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 51 L.R.A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330, 57 N. E. 1011. The intent or knowledge with which an act is done may make a lawful act unlawful. It is no offense to receive stolen goods; it is an offense to receive them knowing them to be stolen. The act of receiving the goods is identically the same in each instance. In the one case it is lawful, in the other the same act is unlawful because the scienter makes it so. To utter forged paper is no offense, but to utter it knowing it to be forged is criminal. It is the same act in each instance, but it is lawful or unlawful according to the absence or presence of a guilty knowledge. Hence it is fallacious to say that an act which is lawful can never become unlawful, and equally fallacious to say that, though it is lawful for a person to refuse to sell to another, it is also lawful for the same person in combination with others to likewise refuse to sell when such refusal forms part of a scheme to raise and maintain the price of commodities in restraint of trade, and is not the bona fide exercise of their right to refuse to sell.

The declaration goes a step farther and charges that the defendants coerced other vendors of drugs and druggists' supplies to abstain from selling those articles to the plaintiff, and that they did this by means of threats of blacklisting and boycotting such vendors if they should sell to the plaintiff while it was not a member of that combination;

by reason of which threats those vendors were intimidated and were deterred from selling to the plaintiff. The plain meaning of all this is: The defendants notified the plaintiff that, unless it entered into the union or combination, and charged the same prices which other members thereof were required to charge, the defendants would, by threats of coercion, by blacklisting, and by boycotting other dealers, deprive the plaintiff of the ability to carry on its lawful business. Is such an interference with the legal right of an individual to conduct a lawful business in a lawful way tolerated by the law? And can it be permitted to flourish unscathed because no open deeds of violence or breaches of the peace have been committed? It would be a reproach to the law if such were the case. A boycott means the confederation, generally secret, by many persons whose intent is to injure another by preventing all persons from doing business with him through fear of incurring the displeasure, persecution, and vengeance of the conspirators. 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 639. The courts have generally condemned those combinations which are formed for the purpose of interfering otherwise than by lawful competition, with the business affairs of others, and depriving them by means of threats and intimidations of the right to conduct the business in which they are engaged according to the dictates of their own judgment. My Maryland Lodge No. 168 v. Adt, 100 Md. 248, 68 L.R.A. 752, 59 Atl. 721. While an owner of property has the legal right to refuse to sell it to another, and while, as in the case of Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis (Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Northwestern Lumbermen's Assn.) supra, several owners may unite to do the same thing, just as laborers may organize to improve their condition and to secure better wages, and in fact may refuse to work unless such better wages are obtained, still "the law does not permit either an employer or employee to use force, violence, threats of force, or threats of violence, intimidation, or coercion, to secure these ends (My Maryland Lodge No. 168 v. Adt, supra); nor does it permit vendors to resort, with impunity, to the like means to force or compel others engaged in the same business to abandon their own method of conducting a lawful business in a lawful way. In Erdman v. Mitchell, 207 Pa. 79, 63 L.R.A. 534, 99 Am. St. Rep. 783, 56 Atl. 327, it was held that a conspiracy by a number of persons that they will, by threats and strikes, deprive a mechanic of the right to work for others because he does not join a particular union, would be restrained.

The case at bar involves no right of labor; but the principles which have upheld the jujurisdiction of courts to intervene to prevent injury and loss that would result to both employer and employee, if a threatened strike or boycott were not prevented, are broad enough to include the situation presented by the declaration now before us. In the case of Plant v. Woods, supra, it was held that members of a labor union were entitled to an injunction restraining the members of another union, from which they had withdrawn, from doing acts in pursuance of a conspiracy to compel their reinstatement, by appeals to their employers to induce them to rejoin and to discharge them in case of refusal, accompanied by threats intimating results detrimental to the employer's business and property in case of a failure to comply, coercive in effect upon the will, although they committed no acts of personal violence or physical injury to property, where complainants have been injured by such acts, and there is reason to believe that further proceedings of the same kind are contemplated which will result in still more injury to them. In the course of the judgment it was said: "It is true, they committed no acts of personal violence, or of physical injury to property, although they threatened to do something which might reasonably be expected to lead to such results. In their threat, however, there was plainly that which was coercive in its effect upon the will. . . . Restraint of the mind, provided it would be such as would be likely to force a man against his will to grant the thing demanded, and actually has that effect, is sufficient in cases like this." If these facts warrant a court of equity in restraining anticipated injury, why do they not furnish a sufficient ground to enable a court of law to award damages for the injury which they have actually caused? The coercive threats of blacklisting and boycotting have been as efficacious in restraining the minds of the persons upon whom they operated according to the averments of the narr. as would have been the consummated boycott itself; and the result to the plaintiff's business has been just as disastrous as though the persons who have been deterred or terrorized by these threats from selling to it had been in fact blacklisted by the defendants. The threat to boycott produced the consequences intended by the defendants as completely as an actual boycott would have done; and it is no answer for them to say that no other overt act, or no act involving a breach of the peace, was done to make effective their unlawful combination. The threatened boycott was successful. It deterred persons from selling to the plaintiff, and as a direct result ruined the plaintiff's business. These are the allegations of the narr., and, if proved to be true, they show an injury to the plaintiff as the direct consequence of the lawless acts of an unlawful confederation, and entitle the plaintiff to recover.

The threat to injure the business of the persons who might sell to the plaintiff was just as efficacious in preventing them from doing the thing they were warned not to do, and therefore just as potent in causing damage to the plaintiff, as an actual boycott would have been. A threat is any menace of such a nature and extent as to unsettle the mind of the person on whom it operates, and to take away from his acts that free, voluntary action which alone constitutes consent. Anderson's Law Dict. That such a threat, coupled with the damage necessarily flowing from it in the prosecution of a conspiracy to do an unlawful thing, is sufficient to constitute a good cause of action, has repeatedly been decided. The principle is stated by Mr. Addison in these words: "Injuries to property, indirectly brought about by menaces, false representation, or fraud, create as valid a cause of action as any direct injury from force or trespass. Thus, if the plaintiff's tenants have been driven away from their holdings by the menaces of the defendant, damages are recoverable for the wrong done." Addison, Torts, 20. The threats were overt acts in the scheme of the conspiracy, and were as effective in accomplishing the result intended to be attained as would have been an agency or instrument of physical force had it been resorted to.

The damages alleged to have followed the acts and conduct of the defendants are charged to be the direct and necessary results of those acts and that conduct. Every element, therefore, which is required to make out a valid cause of action is distinctly set forth in the narr., and the demurrer should have been overruled, unless there has been a misjoinder of defendants. It is insisted that the retail drug association should not have been made a party, but the answer to this objection is found in the narr. itself, since by appropriate averments it charges that defendant with a complicity in and as being the medium to execute the various illegal acts which go to make up the cause of action.

Of course, what has been said must be understood as applying to the case as made by the pleadings. We know nothing of or concerning the facts which a trial of the issues may elicit. For the error committed in sustaining the demurrer, the judgment will be reversed, with costs.

Judgment reversed, with costs above and below, and new trial awarded.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

EBEN C. JAYNE et al., Pliffs. in Err.,
v.

C. G. A. LODER.

(— C. C. A. —, 149 Fed. 21.)

Verdict—incompetent evidence—remittitur.

1. A verdict for damages founded in part on incompetent evidence cannot be corrected by the court's requiring a remittitur of the amount, made up of the items to which the incompetent evidence related.

Monopoly—refusal to supply goods.

2. The owner of a proprietary medicine may lawfully fix the price and name, the terms and conditions, at and upon which alone he will supply his product to the trade, refusing to deal with those who refuse to comply with such conditions.

Trust—restraint of trade—maintenance of price.

3. That each proprietor and wholesaler of patent medicines is permitted to determine for himself to what retailers he will refuse to sell does not prevent an undertaking on the part of associations of proprietors, wholesalers, and retailers to prevent rate cutting from being within the Sherman anti-trust act, if they bind themselves by an agreement not to sell to aggressive cutters of prices, and the agreement is enforced by the retailers notifying wholesalers who are aggressive cutters, and putting upon the list of aggressive cutters all wholesalers who do not desist from selling to persons on the list so furnished; the result of which is greatly to increase the cost of proprietary medicines to consumers throughout the country.

Conspiracy—unauthorized acts—liability.

4. Persons agreeing to a plan to maintain the prices of proprietary medicines by refusing to sell to aggressive cutters are not, unless they expressly agree thereto, responsible for the acts of a retailers' association which is a party to the agreement, in putting in force coercive measures against aggressive cutters by requesting wholesalers of general druggists' supplies to desist from selling to aggressive cutters, and reporting their replies to the organized retailers; the effective working of which would drive the aggressive cutters out of business.

Case Note.—Combination of dealers as giving right of action for damages under Federal anti-trust law to merchants thereby restricted in, or prevented from, obtaining goods:—By § 7 of the Federal anti-trust act of 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 210, chap. 647, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3202), it is provided that "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides, or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy; and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

Since the right of action of any dealer who is restricted in, or prevented from, obtaining goods, must depend upon whether the contract or combination of which complaint is made comes within the scope of the act, the main question presented in the class of cases under discussion is the same as in cases of criminal prosecutions under the act, which may be found in an exhaustive note in 64 L.R.A. 689, on Illegal trusts under modern anti-trust laws.

In W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 48 L. ed. 608, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307, Affirming 63 L.R.A. 58, 52 C. C. A. 621, 115 Fed. 27, it was held that damages were recoverable by a dealer who, by reason of an association of wholesale dealers in tiles, mantels, and grates in San Francisco and vicinity, and nonresident manufacturers of tiles and fireplace fixtures, in which the dealers agreed not to purchase from manufacturers not members of the association, and not to sell unset tile to nonmembers for less than list prices, which were more than 50 per cent higher than prices to members; while the manufacturers agreed not to sell their products or wares to nonmembers at any price under penalty of forfeiture of membership,—was unable to procure tiles except from the local dealers and at the excessive price charged nonmembers of the association.

In Ellis v. Inman, P. & Co. 65 C. C. A. 488, 131 Fed. 182, it was held that a cause of action under the statute was stated by a complaint filed by a builder in an action for damages under the Federal anti-trust act, alleging that in his business he had occasion to purchase rough lumber from mills located in a neighboring state, and was unable to obtain finished lumber from the defendants, who comprised all the manufacturers and dealers in the city in which he was doing business, because of an agreement among themselves that they would not sell any finished lumber at any price to such consumers as bought lumber of any kind from other dealers, unless such consumer would pay the defendants the difference between the price he paid for lumber so bought from others and the price charged by defendants therefor, and should promise thereafter to buy all his lumber from them.

And in Mines v. Scribner, 147 Fed. 927, it was held that a dealer who could not buy books because of a rule adopted by a publishers' association controlling 90 per cent of the book business of the country, that they would not sell any books to anyone who cut prices on copyrighted books, nor to anyone who should be known to have sold to others at cut prices, had a cause of action for damages to his business, occasioned thereby.

Same—evidence.

5. In an action against members of a combination in restraint of trade having for its object the driving out of business of aggressive cutters of prices, evidence is not admissible of other measures adopted by only part of the members of the former combination, which are separate and distinct from it, unless they are shown to have been agreed to by all the defendants.

(December 3, 1906.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon him by a combination in restraint of trade. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Dallas and Gray, Circuit Judges, and Archbald, District Judge.

Mr. W. Horace Hepburn, for plaintiff in error, H. K. Mulford Company:

The tripartite agreement was lawful.

John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Asso. 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L.R.A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 67 N. E. 136.

Where an association is formed, whose objects and purposes are legal and laudable, and its powers are afterwards abused by those who have the control and management of it, only those who misuse it or give consent thereto are liable.

Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 120, 38 Am. Dec. 346.

No manufacturer is under any duty or obligation to sell his product to third persons; and if, acting under his own uncontrolled volition, he refuses arbitrarily or capriciously to sell, or even because he believes he will thereby secure the good will of his customers, he incurs no liability to third persons thus refused.

Whitwell v. Continental Tobacco Co. 64 L.R.A. 689, 60 C. C. A. 290, 125 Fed. 460; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis (Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Northwestern Lumbermen's Asso.) 54 Minn. 233, 21 L.R.A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, 55 N. W. 1119.

Messrs. Irving P. Wanger and John G. Johnson also for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Henry J. Scott, for defendant in error:

The mere fact that the subject-matter of an agreement or contract in restraint of trade was articles prepared under secret processes, recipes, and formulas, which were sold under trade names or marks, does not protect the combination from the provisions of the anti-trust act.

The facts show a combination in violation of the Sherman anti-trust act.

United States v. Coal Dealers' Asso. 85 Fed. 252.

Archbald, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was an involved and tedious one, and the reluctance of counsel to retry it is not to be wondered at. The suggestion at bar, however, that there should be no reversal unless it could be without a venire, was not put in shape to be acted upon; and, as material error has been assigned which cannot be passed by, notwithstanding the painstaking care with which the case was considered and the correctness with which, in the main, it was disposed of, it must nevertheless go back and be tried over.

The error which lies on the surface is the attempt of the court, by a reduction of the verdict, to eliminate items of damage with regard to which there was admittedly no sufficient evidence. The damages claimed by the plaintiff were $34,416.72, made up as follows: Compensation for extra time and labor, covering a period of four years, $20,000; 8 per cent increased cost on $96,000 worth of proprietary medicines purchased, $7,680; extra clerk hire for four years, $4,000; interest for four years on $10,000 increased capital required, $2,700; loss of profits on sales in June and July, 1904, $36,72. The jury gave a verdict somewhat less than this, for $20,738, which the court, on a rule for a new trial, still further reduced to $10,880.52, to which extent alone it was figured there was evidence to sustain it. Loder v. Jayne (C. C.) 142 Fed. 1010. It is not necessary to follow the steps by which this result was reached, or the reasoning by which it was sought to be justified. It is sufficient to note that the evidence with regard to the first and fourth items of claim was held to be insufficient, and that the item of clerk hire was found to be substantiated to the amount of but $3,164. Putting this and the remaining two items together, the verdict was allowed to stand for the aggregate; all above that being required to be released.

The error which was so committed is manifest. The admission of incompetent evidence could not be cured in any such way. The verdict rendered is based on the whole of it, good and bad, and there is no means of knowing by what items the jury were influenced, or how far the items which are now allowed were accepted by them, or entered into their calculations. As it stands, the verdict is judge made; the only virtue in it being that it is within the amount assessed by the jury. But that coincidence does not help it, the amount so found being the result of evidence improperly submitted for their consideration, the only remedy for which was to grant a new trial. Jacoby v. Johnson, 56 C.C.A. 637, 120 Fed. 487. See also Watt v. Watt [1905] A. C. 115.

More important, however, is the question which is raised, whether the defendants are in any respect liable. The action is for damages, under the act of Congress of July, 2, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200), commonly known as the "Sherman anti-trust law," the defendants being charged with having entered into an unlawful combination injurious to the plaintiff, within its terms. The sections which obtain are given below.* The drug trade is the one affected; the plaintiff being a retail dealer doing business in Philadelphia, and the defendants variously engaged as wholesale or retail druggists or manufacturers of patent medicines and pharmaceutical supplies. The plaintiff is the subject of trade animosity because he does not maintain the price of medicines as the defendants think he ought to, and as they have agreed among themselves that they shall be. He is what is known as an "aggressive cutter," against whom and others similarly actuated the acts complained of are directed.

That which is charged to be a combination in violation of the act consists primarily in what is known as the "tripartite plan," so called because of its being entered into by the three affiliated associations in the drug trade,—the Proprietary Association of America, the National Wholesale Druggists' Association, and the National Association of Retail Druggists,—of one or the other of which the defendants are members. The purpose was to maintain the retail prices of patent or proprietary medicines by combined action, which was recognized as necessary to accomplish it. These medicines, being compounded according to secret formulas by those who originate them, are made popular by extensive advertising, and are supposed to be retailed to the consumer at uniform prices, fixed by the proprietors and named on the package. In some parts of the country this is carried out, but in others, and particularly in the large cities, where competition is keen, there has for a long time been a cutting of prices by the retailer, which has reacted on the jobber or wholesaler, as well as the proprietary, demoralizing all branches of the trade. This condition was the subject of extended discussion and animadversion for a number of years at various meetings of the several associations involved; different means for remedying it being proposed. The plan finally formulated was adopted upon an overture from the retailers at the annual meeting of the wholesalers at Chicago in September, 1900, in which the proprietors as associate members participated. It seems to have had its inception in a resolution passed at the preceding annual meeting of the wholesalers, in conformity to which the chairman of the proprietary committee and the chairman of the executive committee of the retailers sent out, in March, 1900, a confidential circular, in the joint names of the two associations, to various patent medicine proprietors, urging them for the future to confine their best price sales to a uniform list of jobbers to be selected as wholesale agents. A number of prominent proprietors, who had already agreed to the proposed policy, was given; and, in order to make it effective, it was urged that each should send out to his wholesale distributing agents a printed price list, giving the regular rebates on goods when ordered in certain quantities, to be restricted, however, to those who did not divide quantities with others, or quote or sell these preparations, either directly or

*"Section 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract, or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

"Sec. 7. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides, or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

indirectly, or permit them to be disposed of in any way, at less than the prices stated. Favorable responses were received to these circulars; but, at the suggestion of members of the retail trade, as well as in pursuance of views expressed by a large percentage of the jobbers, it was decided that the selection of the list of wholesale agents, to whom alone best price sales should be made, should be subject to certain conditions: (1) That jobbers, through their salesmen, should refrain from running down proprietary goods, and should sell whatever was called for by the customer without reference to any particular article happening to pay a higher profit; (2) that they ask no further discounts than already allowed; (3) that each jobber discontinue his so-called nonsecret department (referring to substitute preparations offered in place of proprietary medicines called for); and (4) that they refrain from selling proprietary preparations at any price, either directly or indirectly, to aggressive cutters or brokers; an aggressive cutter being defined as a dealer who was so designated by 75 per cent of the local trade at any given place. The plan so recommended was adopted, not only, as already stated, by the National Wholesalers' Association, but by the proprietors and retailers as well, and became the so-called "tripartite agreement" in suit. To be successful, it required the adherence and concerted action of the members of each association, and this was secured by direct appeal and individual assent. As the result of it, the proprietors sold only, thereafter, at uniform and fixed prices, to those wholesalers and jobbers who agreed to maintain prices and not sell to aggressive cutters and brokers; the recognized list of such jobbers being furnished to the proprietors by the chairman of the proprietary committee of the wholesalers, and the list of aggressive cutters, as reported by local associations of retailers, whose organizers investigated the matter, being made up and sent out to jobbers and proprietors by the secretary of the national retailers. If a wholesaler failed to regard this list, and sold to an aggressive cutter, he was promptly reported, and his name added to it. A pink slip was also sent out to all retail druggists who were members of the retailers' association, calling attention to the fact, and insinuating that such individual action be taken by each, protective of his own interest, as might seem advisable; a cessation of dealing being plainly intimated. And this was followed, in case of a correction of his ways by the wholesaler and his reinstatement, by a yellow slip, announcing that he was entitled to the same favorable consideration as before.

Notwithstanding, however, the seemingly drastic character of these provisions, the aggressive cutter having still a certain margin on which to trade if not thrive, at the annual convention of the National Retailers' Association at Cleveland in 1902, it was resolved "that . . . the secretary be instructed to request all manufacturers of chemicals, pharmaceuticals, plasters, dressing, and like products, handled by the drug trade, to desist from selling to aggressive cutters, or suppliers of cutters, when solicited to do so by the respective local associations; and that the retail druggists shall be made acquainted with the responses to such requests, in such manner as the executive committee may deem best."

This is the so-called "resolution C," to be referred to more fully by that name as we proceed. Under the date of November 6 following, the national secretary accordingly addressed a circular letter to each of the manufacturers indicated, propounding the question whether, when specifically requested by local associations of retail druggists throughout the country affiliated with the National Retail Association, they would refuse all sales to those parties whom the various manufacturers of proprietaries had designated as aggressive cutters. To this appeal a large majority of the manufacturers made favorable reply; but, others having failed to do so, a second circular was issued, May 1, 1903, again calling attention to the matter, and notifying the parties addressed that there would be published in the official paper of the national association, called "Notes," a list of those who acquiesced and those who did not, requesting definite answer, as before. "It is believed," as it is significantly said in closing, "that a little reflection will convince you of the desirability of co-operating with the secretary of the National Association of Retail Druggists in the discharge of the important duty that has been laid upon him." The second circular brought in a large number not secured by the first; the names of several of the defendants being found in the published list. The resolution under which this action was taken did not suggest the specific use which was expected to be made of the information conveyed by the publication, but several who had given in their adherence to the plan having fallen by the way, an honor roll was proposed later on, which should contain the names of those wholesale druggists and jobbers who refused, in the words of the committee, "to have any business dealings whatever with unfair price demoralizers;" to be made up according as favorable response was made to the circular, and to be published the same as the other in the N. A. R. D. "Notes." In this connection, in the issue of January 22, 1904, the following assurance was given, anticipating, somewhat, the argument of counsel here: "There is no Federal or state law that can possibly be construed in such a way as to compel any jobber to sell goods he has bought and paid for to any person or persons he does not want to. This is a free country, . . . where freedom of trade within its borders is guaranteed by constitutional provisions; and each wholesaler has an unalienable right to frame for himself a selling policy, in accord with his own ideas of what is best for his individual interest and the trade at large, and then to adopt and put this policy into effect."

There were other and further suggestions, from time to time, for concerted action against price cutters, in line with what has been so referred to,—such as requiring salesmen to have cards of identification and regularity; providing for the advancing and making uniform the prices for prescriptions; having proprietors refuse to patronize newspapers where cut prices were advertised; and doing away with the necessity for a special request from local retail associations, in order to have wholesalers refuse to sell to aggressive cutters,—all, except, perhaps, the last, emanating from and being advocated by the National Retailers' Association. But it is not necessary to follow the matter further. Sufficient has been given to show the character of the combination in restraint of trade which is charged, and the only question is as to the law which is to be applied. It is contended, on the one hand, that no unlawful combination is made out, the manufacturers of proprietary goods having the right to decide, each for himself, as was done, to whom and upon what terms and conditions he would sell, or whether he would sell at all; it making no difference, provided his policy in this regard was individual, whether it coincided with a similar policy, adopted by others of the same class or not, nor that the action so taken was to that extent concerted. The tripartite agreement, to which alone the proprietors subscribed, was not, according to this, unlawful; and as to anything after that to which they did not agree, or which they did not recognize or subscribe to, such as the so-called "resolution C," with its honor roll and white list, got up by the secretary of the retailers on his own motion, under it, they are not answerable; and these were therefore improperly admitted in evidence against them. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It is argued, on the other hand, that the combination and conspiracy for which action is brought is not to be limited to the tripartite agreement, or the sale of proprietary medicines to which it related, which was, however, unquestionably, an unlawful restraint of trade, within the meaning of the act. But that it is to be taken as extending to everything which was done concertedly to carry out the pervading idea, to which the defendants individually and collectively subscribed, which was to cripple and drive out of business, by coercive measures, such cutters of prices as 75 per cent of the local trade at any given place declared obnoxious. This, it is claimed, was the real conspiracy, of which the various steps taken were merely manifestations or overt acts, including "resolution C," the "roll-of-honor list," etc.; all of which were therefore admissible against the defendants generally.

Both contentions are right to a certain extent; neither can be sustained in its entirety. Undoubtedly the originator and compounder of a proprietary medicine may shape his own policy, and sell or withhold from selling, as he pleases, according to supposed self-interest or whim; fixing the prices and naming the terms and conditions at and upon which alone he will do so, refusing to those who will not comply. And, so far as this is confined to his own goods, and pursued by independent and individual action, it cannot be challenged. It is quite a different matter, however, when two or more combine and agree that neither will sell to anyone who cuts the prices of any of the others. This concerted policy, by which it is sought not only to maintain by each the price of his own medicines, which alone he is interested in or has the right to control, but also the prices on those of all who are thus banded together, is manifestly a direct interference with and restraint upon the freedom of trade, which in commerce between the states it was the object of the act of Congress to preserve. As in every conspiracy, it is the joining together of a number that counts, and that the individual has to fear. It is true that a common plan or policy does not necessarily mean a combined one. The individual manufacturer or proprietor may be persuaded, for example, that the retailer or jobber who cuts the medicines of his neighbor to-day will likely cut his medicines to-morrow, and so decide not to sell him; and it will not make out a conspiracy that others are of the same mind. If that was all there was to the present case, it would be easily disposed of. But, unfortunately for the defendants, it is not. The policy adopted and pursued with respect to aggressive cutters and those who sold to them was not that of the proprietors only, acting independently, each with regard to his own, according to what seemed to him good. The arrangement was tripartite, in which all the affiliated associations of the drug trade were involved,—proprietors, wholesale distributing agents or jobbers, and retailers, the latter, if anything, dominating it,—evolved after extended agitation, discussion, and conference, to which the members were individually and collectively bound, disciplinary and coercive measures being provided against any who proved recalcitrant. Let a patent-medicine man or wholesaler disregard its terms, and he was quickly given to understand that, if he catered to the aggressive cutter, he could not expect the custom of the organized retailer, between whom it did not usually take him long to decide. He became, if he persisted, an unfair trader, to be treated accordingly, until he repented and was reinstated, after acknowledging the error of his ways, and agreeing to transgress no more. Against this discipline, and with this rod held over them, it is needless to say that there were few who went astray, and still fewer who held out. There was, perhaps, a murmur here and there, a question raised as to whether they might not overstep the law, and a recognition that they were close to the line; but it was met by assurances such as that quoted above, or by suggestions of escape by individual action, which can hardly be expected to deceive. Nor did, indeed, the individual proprietor control his own prices, nor determine to whom his goods should go. This was done for him in the cities by the local associations of retail druggists, into whose hands he thus committed himself. The prices which should there prevail were of their naming, and aggressive cutters were those who did not maintain them, who were ferreted out, and reported by the retailers' agents. All this and more was part and parcel of the tripartite plan, to which the proprietary, as well as the wholesaler, bound himself when he entered into it.

If co-operation and concerted action such as this does not make out a combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade, it is difficult to see what would be effective to do so. The combination is clear, and has been demonstrated; so, also, is the restraint of trade. That, indeed, was the avowed purpose of it, which was not simply to put the aggressive cutter out of business, but to maintain prices to the consumer, by this means, as they would not be maintained if left to themselves. It seems incredible, except as the trade in patent medicines is known to be immense, but it is confidently asserted, by those having the right to speak, that the cost to the country of the tripartite agreement amounted to $90,000,000 in six years. The general public have thus, as usual, been made to foot the bill. That this constitutes in law, as in fact, an unlawful combination in restraint of trade, within the meaning of the act, there can be no doubt. Whatever may be decided elsewhere, the question is set at rest by Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96, and W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 48 L. ed. 608, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396, which control. In the former there was a combination among certain manufacturers of cast-iron pipe, controlling two thirds of the business in states of the South and West, by which they agreed to advance the prices to the consumer by abolishing competition between themselves, parceling out the territory, and fixing the prices at which sales should be made therein, going through the form of bidding against each other at times as a blind; the prices and the successful bidder in each case being pre-arranged. It was sought to defend this action, because the restraint was only partial, not extending to the whole United States; also, that the monopoly secured was not complete, being tempered by fear of competition from others not in the arrangement, and affecting only a modicum of the price; and again, that the prices fixed were reasonable, and within those which were being continually and unrestrainedly made, simply doing away with ruinous competition, to which the parties had a right. But these and other arguments were put aside, and the case declared to be one prohibited by the act. "It is the effect of the combination," says the court, "in limiting and restricting the right of each of the members to transact business in the ordinary way, as well as its effect upon the volume or extent of the dealing in the commodity, that is regarded." So in Montague v. Lowry, by an agreement between eastern manufacturers of tiles and certain dealers in San Francisco and vicinity, an association was formed whose by-laws provided that no manufacturer should sell to any dealer not a member, nor should any dealer sell to the same except at certain list prices, which were 50 per cent higher than those at which sales were made to other members; membership also being confined to those who carried an average stock of not less than $3,000 and who were acceptable. The plaintiffs were dealers in San Francisco, where they had built up a business, but were not members of the association, and were not eligible; and after its formation they found themselves unable to buy to advantage, being restricted to dealing with San Francisco parties, to whom they were compelled to pay the extra prices listed. On a suit against the association for damages under the act, a verdict for the plaintiff was sustained; the case being held to be clear. It is useless, in the face of these authorities, to urge upon us the decision in John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Druggists' Asso. 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L.R.A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 87 N. E. 136, where a different conclusion has apparently been reached. It is to be noted, however, with regard to that case, that the agreement there, as viewed by the majority of the court, was merely to sell to all wholesale distributing agents at uniform rebate prices, so that the small dealer, with limited capital, was put on a par with the large ones, whose capital was more ample, thus tending to fairness and equality, on which stress is laid. There was, however, the further provision (to say nothing of other restrictions) that until a wholesaler agreed to the plan he could not buy of any member of the association whatever, in view of which three of the judges dissented; the case being still further weakened as an authority by the failure of the majority to altogether agree in their reasoning. At the best, therefore, it is near the line, and in no event can it be taken, contrary to the cases cited, as giving the law here.

So far, then, as the present case was kept within the limits indicated by these observations, it was correctly disposed of, and is to be sustained; but outside of them not. Unfortunately, it did not stop with the tripartite agreement and the action taken under it, but went on to resolution C, with its honor roll and white list. It is urged that these were merely further steps in the general combination and conspiracy, to get rid of the aggressive cutter, on which all were determined, and for which, therefore, by whomsoever taken, all were bound. But this fails to note several things. Speaking broadly, no doubt there was a general purpose, or conspiracy, if you will, to drive the plaintiff and others like him out of business, to which, in entering into the tripartite agreement, the parties committed themselves. At the same time, however, there was a selection of methods. Not only was a general policy declared for, but a definite line of action under it, adopted after extended consideration and conference, which could not be varied from at will. In accepting the tripartite plan, they did not necessarily agree to anything and everything which might be done in its name, and particularly not to resolution C, which was recognized as a new and decidedly advanced step, expected to work a radical change. As already stated, this project emanated from the National Retail Druggists' Association, in annual convention assembled at Cleveland in 1902. But even among the retailers there were those who doubted the propriety, as well as the legality, of it; as witness the remarks of the president, at the annual meeting just before that, at which, having been proposed, it was promptly voted down. Nor was it ever adopted by the proprietors or the wholesalers as a body; the only assent given to it being individual, and by no means by all. This was secured by direct appeal, and the circulars sent out were addressed to "manufacturers and dealers in non-tripartite goods;" showing that a different class was intended to be reached.

No connection, except the most general one, is thus established between the tripartite agreement and resolution C, and they are not to be taken as one and the same plan. They may not differ much in principle, but they do decidedly in results; pressure being put upon the aggressive cutter as it had not been by any means before. By the one, he was merely deprived of patent medicines, as to which, right or wrong, the proprietor might feel that he had a certain freedom to sell or withhold, the same as is argued here; but by the other, he was cut off from the most ordinary druggists' supplies, even toothbrushes and sponges being denied. A retailer cannot do much, it is true, without proprietary goods on his shelves; but without drugs and pharmaceuticals he cannot put up a single prescription, and might as well go out of business; and that, indeed, was what resolution C was designed to bring about. This was an excursion into a new field, and to whatever else short of that the proprietor or wholesaler was committed, he might not care to go that far. He was at least entitled to have it distinctly presented for his acceptance before being bound, and his assent is not to be implied simply because he had agreed to what had gone before. He did not put himself indiscriminately and to all lengths into the hands of his associates. The trade recognized that this was the case, and that there were classes among the wholesalers, as shown by the publication called "Notes," of May 21, 1904, where those operating under the tripartite agreement are set apart from those operating under resolution C. This may not be conclusive, but it is significant, and confirms, as it corresponds, with our own views.

As distinguished by parties, also, the combination was new. No doubt there were many who had agreed to the tripartite plan, who also agreed to resolution C. But there were some who did not, who are defendants here, as well as some who agreed to the resolution alone. They divide on these lines, and cannot be brought together as one, so far as anything has been shown; and neither, as the result, can a joint action be maintained. As the case stands, however, all are made liable without distinction, for all that has been done, both under the tripartite agreement, as well as resolution C; both being put in evidence against them all. It may be that a person who joins a conspiracy at an advanced stage of it makes himself party to what has been done in pursuance of it before. 3 Greenl. Ev. Lewis's ed. § 93; 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 658. But this must be with knowledge, and in promotion of the common cause. And even though, upon this basis, those wholesalers who, with knowledge of the existing purpose to drive aggressive cutters out of business, lent themselves to this design, by denying him their goods as called for by resolution C, could be held for the damages resulting from the whole scheme, still, as already pointed out, there is too wide a divergence between the original tripartite plan and this later extreme development of it to make those who merely agreed to the one committed irretrievably and without question to both.

Upon the whole case, therefore, we reach the conclusion that resolution C was inadmissible to charge those who had not assented to it, and should not have been received in evidence, nor anything done under it. The wrong which was committed by its adoption and enforcement was separate and distinct from that which resulted from entering into and carrying out the tripartite plan, as were also the damages experienced therefrom. The plaintiff in this respect pressed his case too far. He had a good one against some of the defendants under the tripartite agreement, and another against others under resolution C, and against some, no doubt, upon both, but not against all; and there was the mistake. A joint tort being charged, not only had it to be proved as laid (Howard v. Union Traction Co. 195 Pa. 391, 45 Atl. 1076; Wiest v. Electric Traction Co. [Wiest v. Philadelphia] 200 Pa. 149, 58 L.R.A. 666, 49 Atl. 891; Rowland v. Philadelphia, 202 Pa. 50, 51 Atl. 589), but the defendants had all to be liable for all that was resolved upon or done. This, in the view we take of it, was not the case, and the judgment must therefore also be reversed upon this ground.

the defendants, which renders it unnecessary to consider the special argument which was made for some. It will be for the trial judge, when the case comes up again, to determine, in the light of what has been said, how far they and others can be held.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial awarded.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

J. WOLFARD et al., Appts.,

v.

A. W. FISHER, Exr., etc., of H. F. Fisher, Deceased, Resp't.

(—Or. —, 84 Pac. 850.)

Railroad in street—consent—estoppel.

1. After the maintenance of a railroad switch in a public street for twenty years under the express consent of the abutting owners, neither those who gave the consent, nor their successors in title, are entitled to injunctive relief against the alleged nuisance.

On Rehearing.

Same—private use—nuisance.

2. That a railroad was constructed in a public street partly for the accommodation of a certain mill owner does not make it private, so as to constitute a public nuisance, if it is open to all persons generally for shipping purposes.

(April 3, 1906.)

Case Note.—Remedy of abutting owner as affected by his consent to the construction of railroad or street railway in street or highway:—The cases are substantially agreed that the express consent, whether evidenced by writing or shown by parol, by the owner of abutting property, to the construction of a railroad in a street or highway the fee of which is not owned by him, is irrevocable,—at least after it has been acted upon; and, if in terms unconditional and unqualified, precludes him or his privies, including subsequent grantees with notice, from maintaining either an action at law for damages, or a suit in equity for an injunction based upon the location of the road, or its construction and operation in a proper and reasonable manner.

The principle above stated is sustained by Pratt v. Des Moines Northwestern R. Co. 72 Iowa, 249, 33 N. W. 666, holding that an express consent, though by parol, by the owner of abutting property, having no title or interest in the street, is irrevocable after the road has been constructed in reliance thereon, and will preclude an action for damages—either by the owner who gave the consent, or by one who purchased the property after the construction of the road—which would otherwise lie against the railroad company under the provision of the APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in a suit to enjoin the maintenance of a railroad switch track in a public street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. H. McMahan for appellants.

Messrs. L. J. Adams, W. E. Yates, and George G. Bingham, for respondent:

A railroad track upon a street, properly constructed, is not a nuisance.

It is not a public nuisance, and the defendant can be called to account only by the sovereign authority.

Long acquiescence in the use of the street for a railway, and permitting the railroad company and defendant to spend large sums of money, should now prevent plaintiffs from making complaint.

Midland R. Co. v. Smith, 113 Ind. 233, 15 N. E. 256.

Bean, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in 1904, by the owners of property abutting on Water

Iowa Code declaring that a railway track shall not be laid on any street until the damages of the abutting lot owners are ascertained.

The principle was applied with the same result in Merchants' Union Barb-Wire Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 613, 44 N. W. 900. In this as in the preceding case, the action was brought by one who purchased the property after the road was constructed, was based upon the Code provision already referred to, and the consent was given by parol. It also expressly appeared that the abutting owners had no title to the street; and, in view of that fact, and of the further fact that another track nearer to the plaintiff's property than the one in question had been constructed before the enactment of the Code provision, and at a time when an abutting owner was not entitled to compensation, it was held that the right to damages on account of the track in question was effectively waived so as to prevent recovery by the plaintiff, notwithstanding that the consent was given by one only of the two tenants in common by whom the title was held at that time.

In Burkam v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 122 Ind. 344, 23 N. E. 799 (an action by an abutting owner for the abatement of a nuisance by the removal of a railroad track from the street), the supreme court, in sustaining the ruling of the trial court in admitting evidence tending to prove that plaintiff consented to the occupancy of the street and assisted in making the fill upon which the track was laid, declared generally that an abutting owner who expressly consents to the occupancy of a street cannot afterward ask a court to enjoin the use of the street, or award him damages. While the court does not expressly limit this principle to cases where the abutting owner does not own the fee, that seems to have been the fact in that case; and the same is true of the case of Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Heiss, 141 Ill. 35, 33 Am. St. Rep. 273, 31 N. E. 138, in which a similar principle was declared, although it was not applied for the reason that the court held that no consent had been shown.

In Wolfe v. Covington & L. R. Co. 15 B. Mon. 404, it was held that the consent of an abutting owner to the location of a railroad in the street deprives him of the right to claim damages incident to that location, or to a change of the grade of the street, made by the company under the authority of a valid ordinance in order to make it correspond with the grade of the road. The consent in this case was inferred from the conduct of the plaintiff. The opinion does not show whether or not he owned the fee of the street.

Distinction based on ownership of fee of street.

In Pratt v. Des Moines Northwestern R. Co. supra, the court said that the contention of counsel for plaintiff that a permanent interest in real estate cannot be acquired by a parol license would be conceded for the purposes of the case; but avoided any practical effect from that concession by the statement that the abutting owner in that case did not own the street or any interest therein. The distinction thus intimated between an abutting owner who owns the fee of the street and one who does not, as bearing upon the effect of a consent not amounting to a grant, is expressly recognized by the New York cases, or at least by some of them. Thus, the court of appeals, in White v. Manhattan R. Co. 139 N. Y. 19, 34 N. E. 887, for the evident purpose of explaining the emphasis laid upon the fact that the proof in that case showed that all the rights that the abutting owners had in the street were in the nature of easements of light, air, and access, said: "It has been the law in this state for a number of years that an easement to do some act of a permanent nature on the land of another can be created only by a deed or conveyance in writing operating as a grant, and that a consent in writing on the part of the landowner is no more valid than if it were by parol." The court then points out that a consent, not in the form of a grant, by the owner of the fee, may be revoked even after it has been acted upon street in the city of Silverton, and by persons engaged in business along such street, to enjoin and restrain the defendant from maintaining and operating on the street a switch or branch railroad from his flouring mill and warehouse connected therewith to the main line of the Oregon & California Railroad Company, a distance of about a quarter of a mile. This switch or branch road was built in 1881 by the Oregonian Railway Company, the grantor of the Oregon & California Railroad Company, under an agreement with the then owner of the flouring mill by which the latter was to obtain the right of way, furnish the ties, and pay the railway company $1,000 in cash; and it has been used and operated ever since. For a short time after it was built, horses were used in moving cars over the road; but this was found to be impracticable, and, for more than twenty years prior to the commencement of this suit, cars have been moved by the engines of the railroad company. What is now Water street was a county road at the time the switch or side track in controversy was built. All the property owners, except two, along that portion occupied by the track, joined in a petition addressed either to the railway company, asking it to build the road, or to the county court, praying that a right of way along the county road be granted for that purpose.

by the other party. It is clearly implied that this principle would have been held applicable if the abutting owners in this case had owned the fee of the street. The court, however, proceeds to show that the principle does not apply to a consent given by an abutting owner who does not own the fee, and holds specifically that the written consent of such an owner to the construction of an elevated railroad along the street, though given to meet the requirement of the constitutional provision forbidding the construction of a railroad in the street without the consent of property owners, and though not in the form of a grant which would be necessary in order to encumber the fee with a permanent easement, amounts to an abandonment and extinguishment of the special easements of the abutting owner in the street so far as is necessary for the construction and operation of the road; and that such consent, if absolute and unconditional in terms, is, after it has been acted upon, irrevocable, and precludes any claim for damages consequent upon the erection and operation of the road in a proper and reasonable manner.

In Paige v. Schenectady R. Co. 178 N. Y. 102, 70 N. E. 213, it is held that valid consents in writing, under seal, to the construction and operation of a railroad in a street, given by abutting owners who own the fee in the street, in reliance upon which the road has been constructed, cannot be withdrawn at the will of the owners, where there was no contract with the company to that effect, no consent by the state or general public, or by the stockholders of the company, and no consideration therefor. This case does not conflict with the White Case, since the consents were, as the court said, valid "grants," under seal, of the right to build and operate the road over the street, including the premises of the plaintiffs.

The doctrine of the White Case, that the special easements in the street, of an abutting owner who does not own the fee, may be abandoned without a grant, was recognized in Foote v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 147 N. Y. 367, 42 N. E. 181, though it was not applied for the reason that the evidence was insufficient to show an abandonment.

In Adee v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 65 App. Div. 529, 72 N. Y. Supp. 992, the appellate division of the supreme court declared, in effect, that written consents, which seem to have been given in compliance with the requirements of the railroad law, were not revocable, although the title of the abutting owners extended to the center of the street; and it does not appear that the consents were technical grants. The decision, however, on this point was largely influenced by the court's opinion that the legislature regarded the consents as something more than mere licenses, as evidenced by the formalities required in their execution, and the provisions making them capable of being recorded, and declaring them competent evidence, in connection with the provision of the act of 1895, amending § 91 of the railroad law, preserving indefinitely the life of such consents as had been granted prior to the adoption of that statute. This decision was affirmed by the court of appeals (173 N. Y. 580, 65 N. E. 1113) without an opinion.

Even assuming that a consent is revocable so as to sustain action for damages at law, it does not necessarily follow that the abutting owner is entitled to relief by injunction.

Thus, in Stephens v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 175 N. Y. 72, 67 N. E. 119, the court held that, even if the instrument in question by which the property owner consented to the location of the railroad in the street in front of his premises could be construed as a license revocable at law by the licensor, the fact of performance by the licensee under its authority in the expenditure of large sums of money in constructing its railroad plant would move a court of equity to protect the latter's right against revocation, though only to the extent of the acts which were warranted by the terms of the consent.

So, in Herzog v. New York Elev. R. Co. 76 Hun, 486, 27 N. Y. Supp. 1034, where it appeared that the city of New York, being the owner of certain premises and of the fee of the street upon which they abutted,

The evidence tends to show that this petition was presented to the county court, but there is no proof that any action was taken thereon. Two or three years after the road had been built some controversy arose about the matter, and the county court was requested to order its removal, but did not do so. In April, 1894, and after the incorporation of the city of Silverton, an ordinance was duly passed by the common council, granting to J. W. Cochran, who then owned the flouring mill, a ten-year franchise to maintain and operate a railroad on Water street from his mill to the main line of the Oregon & California Railroad Company, and in March, 1904, such franchise was extended for an additional ten years. The plaintiffs' position is that the road was built and is maintained for the private use and benefit of the owner of the flouring mill, and not for public purposes, and is therefore a nuisance, and an unlawful use of the street. The defendant, however, contends and alleges that the railroad in controversy be-gave its consent in writing to the construction of an elevated railroad in the street; and that, while the company was operating the road, the plaintiff acquired the title by mesne conveyances from the city,—the court, after holding, in effect, that the city's consent to the construction of the railroad extinguished its right as an abutting owner to compensation, suggested as an additional ground for its decision denying an injunction, that, the road having been built by and with the consent of the owners of the premises in question, it would be inequitable to permit a subsequent owner, buying the premises with knowledge of such consent, to enjoin the operation of the road in violation of its terms; and that, even if an action for damages might be sustained, a court of equity would not, under such circumstances, grant an injunction.

There seems to be an intimation in Murdock v. Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 579, that a parol consent by an owner whose title extended into the street, being revocable at the pleasure of the owner, even after money had been expended in reliance thereon, would not prevent a suit by the abutting owner to enjoin the operation of the road. The point, however, was not decided, as the decision below refusing the injunction was reversed upon the ground that no consent to the construction of the road had been established. The decision of the general term (10 Hun, 598) denying the injunction was upon the assumption that the road was constructed in reliance upon the consent of the property owner, and that it would be contrary to principles of equity to enjoin its operation. The decision, therefore, did not deny that the parol consent would be revocable at law.

Of course, the consent, even if it amounts to nothing but a revocable license, is a justification for acts done under it while unrevoked, and will protect the company from liability for the period prior to its revocation. Miller v. Auburn & S. R. Co. 6 Hill, 61.

The validity of the distinction based upon the ownership or nonownership by the abutting proprietor of the fee of the street depends upon the soundness or unsoundness of the general proposition stated in the White Case, as to the necessity of a grant in order to encumber a fee with a permanent easement. The discussion of that general question is, of course, beyond the scope of this note. It is touched upon in the case note in 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 359.

Right to withdraw consent before acted upon.

In White v. Manhattan R. Co. 139 N. Y. 19, 34 N. E. 887, the court suggested that perhaps the consenting party might withdraw his consent if he had given it without any valuable consideration, and if the other party had done nothing under it, so that its position could not be unfavorably affected by such withdrawal.

In Adee v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 65 App. Div. 529, 72 N. Y. Supp. 992, however, the court, alluding to this suggestion, said that it was made before the amendment to the railroad law in 1895, and could not be regarded as controlling in the case at bar, even if it were assumed that no valuable consideration passed.

Consent as affected by mode of construction or use.

The abutting owner's consent to the construction and operation of the road, of course, affords no protection—at least as against an action at law for damages—to the construction or operation of the road in an unusual or unreasonable manner not within the reasonable scope or intention of the consent.

Thus, in White v. Manhattan R. Co. supra, the court said that the written consent of the owner of abutting property to the construction of an elevated-railroad track in the street should have a reasonable construction; and the court would not hold that such a consent would authorize the building of a solid structure as high as the top of the building fronting on the street and completely covering the same from building to building, as that would not be regarded as within the contemplation of the parties to the consent. The court of appeals, however, for the reason that the court below denied all validity to the written consent, declined to pass upon the question whether the use actually made of the street was or was not unreasonable with reference to the consent.

The question, however, whether a particular mode of construction or use is rea-longs to the Oregon & California Railroad Company, and is maintained and operated by its lessee, the Southern Pacific Company, for public purposes, and that both of these companies are necessary parties to this suit. It is, we think, unnecessary to consider or determine either of these questions at this time. The road was built originally by the consent and at the request of the property owners along that portion of the county road occupied by it, and since 1894 has been maintained and operated under a franchise granted by the municipal authorities. It is used principally for the transportation of grain from the main line of the railroad company to the defendant's mill and of flour and other mill products from the mill to such main line; but there is evidence that the defendant owns and operates in connection with his mill a grain warehouse or elevator with a storage capacity of about 60,000 bushels, and that the road has been used for the transportation of hops, grain, building material, and the like for parties sonable and within the contemplation of the parties does not fall within the scope of this note.

When implied consent shown.

Assuming that an affirmative consent by the property owner has been shown, it seems to be immaterial, so far as the rights of an abutting proprietor who does not own the fee of the street are concerned, whether the consent is written or parol; and, as already shown, in case of an abutting proprietor who does own the fee of the street, the vital distinction is between consents which amount to grants and those which, whether oral or in writing, do not amount to grants. Some of the cases, however, have passed upon the sufficiency of the evidence to establish a parol consent.

In Wolfe v. Covington & L. R. Co. 15 B. Mon. 404, a finding of consent was sustained by evidence authorizing the jury to find that the plaintiff, as a member of the city council, advocated and voted for the location of the road, supported it in a speech before the directors of the company, and, in a contest between different neighborhoods as to its location, urged its location in the street in question, and said that its location on that street would be worth $1,000 to him.

In Pratt v. Des Moines Northwestern R. Co. 72 Iowa, 249, 33 N. W. 666, the court, while holding that evidence that the abutting owner expressly consented to the construction and operation of the road in the street was admissible, said that it might be that mere silence on his part would not amount to what may be termed a license to enter, or a waiver of damages.

The mere failure of the landowner to order a railroad company off his land, or to bring action against it as a trespasser until near the end of the statutory period of limitation, does not operate as a consent, so as to prevent him from maintaining an action. Rusch v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 54 Wis. 136, 11 N. W. 253.

In Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Heiss, 141 Ill. 35, 33 Am. St. Rep. 273, 31 N. E. 138, it was held that the fact, if it was a fact, that the abutting owner urged a member of the common council to vote for an ordinance allowing the company to locate its road in the street, was insufficient to show his consent, it not appearing that such member's vote was necessary for the passage of the ordinance. The court said: "To create the estoppel, there must be some affirmative act by the person sought to be estopped, in reliance upon which the company has acted to its prejudice."

In Foote v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 147 N. Y. 387, 42 N. E. 181, it was held that an intention by the abutting owner to abandon his easements in the street could not be inferred from the fact that he brought an action at law against an elevated street railway company to recover damages for the loss of rents and injury to the value of his premises occasioned by its trespass upon his property rights in the street, in connection with a provision, in an executory agreement with the parties to whom he afterwards conveyed the premises, reserving all claims which have arisen or are to accrue by reason of the road; and further, that the plaintiff, a remote grantee, could not be affected by the conduct of the original proprietor, after plaintiff had acquired the title, in discontinuing the action against the company and executing to it a release of all claims, in which he stated his intention to release all rights and easements in the street appurtenant to the premises which on a certain date (the date of his deed to the grantors of the plaintiff) were in the possession and occupation of the company.

In Griffin v. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. 33 Fla. 606, 15 So. 338, it was held that the bringing of an action against the company for trespass to recover damages for the construction of the road in the street in front of the premises amounted to a consent to the use of the street in a proper manner and with due care, and precluded plaintiff from maintaining an action of ejectment.

Effect of acquiescence to defeat particular remedies.

As already shown, an affirmative consent, at least, by an abutting owner who does not own the fee of the street, is effectual not only to prevent him from maintaining a suit to enjoin the operation of the road, but also to preclude an action at law for damages. Even assuming that the evidence does not establish an affirmative consent which would preclude an action at law for damages, the courts may, and in a number other than the mill company. Whether this is such a public use as would have authorized the construction and maintenance of the road in the street originally without the consent of the owners of the abutting property, is not necessary to consider. It was built by the express consent of and at the request of the property owners, and neither they nor their successors in interest are now entitled to injunctive relief against it. A property owner who has expressly consented to the use of his own property, or of the street in front thereof, for purposes such as shown, is not entitled, after the road has been constructed and operated for twenty years, to an injunction against its further maintenance. 3 Elliott, Railways, §§ 949, 1096; 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 2d ed. § 120; 2 Wood, Railways, p. 792; Burkam v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 122 Ind. 344, 23 N. E. 799. Injunctive relief will only be granted when application thereof is seasonably made. Midland R. Co. v. Smith, 113 Ind. 233, 15 N. E. 256.

The decree of the court below will therefore be affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Hailey, J., on November 21, 1906, handed down the following additional opinion:

of instances have, upon the ground of either public policy or laches, denied an injunction against the operation of the road where the abutting owner stood by and acquiesced in, or failed to object to, its construction. The following cases are to that effect: It is to be noted that they merely hold that the acquiescence in the construction of the road deprived the abutting owner of the right to an equitable relief by injunction, and they do not hold or imply that such acquiescence would extinguish the substantive right to damages, or prevent the maintenance of an action at law to secure the same. Hinnershitz v. United Traction Co. 206 Pa. 91, 55 Atl. 841; Pater-son & P. Horse R. Co. v. Paterson, 24 N. J. Eq. 158; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Strauss, 37 Md. 237; Tilton v. New Orleans City R. Co. 35 La. Ann. 1062; Hentz v. Long Island R. Co. 13 Barb. 646.

In Planet Property & Financial Co. v. St. Louis, O. H. & C. R. Co. 115 Mo. 613, 22 S. W. 616, the court held that an objection is not, alone, sufficient to protect the abutting owner; but that he must take some steps to prevent the construction of the road.

In Coombs v. Salt Lake & Ft. D. R. Co. 9 Utah, 322, 34 Pac. 248, however, it was held that an abutting owner does not, by his mere silence and inaction, lose his right to an injunction restraining the operation of the road unless the damages are paid within a specified time. The fact will be noted that the injunction allowed in this case was conditioned upon the nonpayment of the damages; and, besides, it appeared that the remedy at law was inadequate, for the reason that the defendant was insolvent.

It has also been held, upon the ground of public policy, that the acquiescence of an abutting proprietor in the construction of a railroad in the street will preclude an action of ejectment by him, even if he owns the fee of the street, and would otherwise be in a position to maintain that kind of an action. Reichart v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 51 Ark. 491, 5 L.R.A. 183, 11 S. W. 690; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Solt-wedde, 116 Ind. 257, 9 Am. St. Rep. 852, 19 N. E. 111; Taylor v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 63 Wis. 327, 24 N. W. 84. What was said of the cases above cited denying an injunction under such circumstances is also true of these cases; the courts merely deny the remedy by ejectment for the reason that the allowance of such a remedy would be contrary to the interests of the public, and relegate the owner to an appropriate remedy at law which may be pursued without prejudice to the interests of the public.

In Terre Haute & S. E. R. Co. v. Rodel, 89 Ind. 128, 46 Am. Rep. 164, however, it is declared that a property owner is not estopped from maintaining ejectment because he does not forbid the occupancy of the street by the railroad company. In this case, however, the discussion was principally upon the general question whether the ownership of the fee of the street will sustain an action of ejectment, and there was no mention of public policy as a ground for denying this particular form of relief.

In Taylor v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra, the court held, in effect, that, where the owner expressly or impliedly consents to the construction of a railroad in the street, he assumes to himself the process of ascertaining the compensation which would otherwise have devolved upon the railroad company; and that he thereby waives his common-law right of action to obtain his compensation, and is restricted to the proceedings prescribed by statute for that purpose. Strickford v. Boston & M. R. Co. 73 N. H. 81, 59 Atl. 367, is to the similar effect.

It will be observed that even the last two cases do not deny the substantive right of an abutting owner to damages merely because of his acquiescence, as distinguished from his affirmative consent, to the construction of the road, but merely restrict him to the statutory method of procuring such compensation; and, apart from such a restriction, acquiescence which might preclude equitable relief by injunction will not prevent recovery of damages by an action at law. Thus, Maysville & B. S. R. Co. v. Ingram, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 853, 30 S. W. 8, while recognizing the general rule that injunction will not issue against the construction of a railroad, holds that the fact that the owner takes no steps to prevent its construction does not preclude him from maintaining an action at law for damages.

On the rehearing in this case it was strenuously contended by the counsel for the plaintiff that the track in question is used for private purposes only, for the benefit of defendant, and, being so used on a public street, is a public nuisance per se. The evidence, however, shows that, while the track is used largely by the defendant for shipping in grain for his mill and shipping out his products, it has also been used by others, including at least two of the plaintiffs, for shipping other products, such as lumber, shingles, brick, sand, hops, and other freight, and is open to all persons for shipping purposes. Such being the case, it is clearly not a private track confined exclusively to the use of defendant or any limited number of persons, and, being available to the public generally for shipping purposes, its use is a public one. The number of shipments made by different individuals or firms over a track is not the criterion by which to judge whether or not it is a public track. The public or private character of a track or way depends upon the right of the public generally to its use, and not upon the extent of the exercise of that right. If such right is confined to a limited number only, it is a private use and a private track, although such persons may use it an equal or unequal number of times each, while, if it is available to all the public who desire to use it for shipping purposes, it is a public use, although some one or more of the public may use it more frequently than others. As stated in Phillips v. Watson, 63 Iowa, 33, 18 N. W. 659, "if all the people have the right to use it, it is a public way, although the number who have occasion to exercise the right is very small." 3 Elliott, Railroads, 3d ed. § 961; Bridal Veil Lumbering Co. v. Johnson. 30 Or. 210, 34 L.R.A. 368, 60 Am. St. Rep. 818, 46 Pac. 790; Towns v. Klamath County, 33 Or. 233, 53 Pac. 604.

The former opinion sufficiently covers the only other point in the case, and we adhere to that opinion. The decree of the lower court will therefore be affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
JOHN REAGAN.

(— Ark. —, 96 S. W. 168.)

Railroad—injured employee—delay in transportation—damages.

Upon failure of a railroad company promptly to furnish an injured employee 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

free transportation to its hospital, to which he is entitled under his contract, he cannot, in case he has in his possession the means of paying for the transportation, hold the company liable for pain and suffering due to delay in reaching the hospital.

(July 2, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Miller County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for pain and suffering alleged to have been caused to plaintiff by defendant's failure promptly to furnish him with transportation. Reversed.

Statement by Riddick, J.:

John Reagan was, in 1904, a section foreman in charge of section No. 50 on defendant's road. This section was located at and near Stephens, Ouachita county. On the 8th day of February, 1904, while riding on a hand car in the course of his duties, Reagan was injured by the explosion of a torpedo which had been placed on the track to warn passing trains. The injury was caused by a piece of tin from the torpedo striking the leg of plaintiff with such force that it penetrated the flesh, and lodged between the two bones of the leg. Reagan went to the local surgeon at Camden who gave him the following certificate:

"This is to certify that John Reagan is badly and must go to hospital at Tyler, Texas.

[Signed] G. W. Hudson,
Local Surgeon.

Case Note.—Right of servant to recover for master's delay in taking him to hospital:—Search has failed to find any case similar to ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN R. CO. v. REAGAN, which passes on the right of a servant to hold his master liable for pain and suffering due to the latter's delay in carrying him to a hospital. The question arose in an analogous case as to the liability of a railroad company for its refusal to admit an injured employee to a hospital maintained by assessments withheld from the wages of the employees of the company, and the court said that, when the injured employee was refused admission to the hospital, he was bound to do all that he could to keep the consequent injury and damage as light as possible; and, to do so, he should have employed medical and surgical attention to effect a cure, or at least to arrest further injury; and for such service and attention, or the cost thereof, the railroad company would have been required to pay. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Gheen, 112 Ky. 695, 66 S. W. 639, Rehearing denied in 112 Ky. 704, 68 S. W. 1087.

On the subject of the duty of a master to furnish medical aid to a servant, see exhaustive note in 28 L.R.A. 546.

The word "hurt" or "injured" was evidently omitted from this certificate by mistake, but the meaning thereof is plain. Reagan boarded the train with this certificate, but the conductor informed him that he could not receive it in lieu of a pass, and that he must procure a pass or ticket from the proper person, or pay fare. Reagan then told the conductor he would go to Stephens, the next station, where he lived, and was allowed to do so. Reagan got off the train at Stephens, and sent a telegram to Davis, the roadmaster, asking him to furnish him a pass for transportation to Tyler. By a series of accidents this pass was not received until the 12th of February. After the pass was received Reagan went to the hospital at Tyler, Texas. But there was some delay in performing the operation to remove the piece of tin, and the tin was not taken out of his leg until about twenty-four hours after his arrival. When the operation was performed the leg had become badly swollen and poisoned by the tin, which was imbedded between the two bones of his leg. About a pint of clotted blood and pus was removed from the leg. The wound healed slowly, and Reagan was confined at the hospital about four weeks on account of the injury, and had not fully recovered from the effects of the injury at the time of the trial. He brought an action against the defendant company to recover damages caused by delay in furnishing transportation to the hospital at Tyler and by delay in operating after his arrival. The defendant filed an answer and on the trial the evidence showed that a certain amount was deducted by the company from the wages of its employees as a fund to maintain a hospital for injured employees of defendant. This and other facts proved tended to show that there was a contract between the defendant and its employees that if the employee was injured while in the service of the company it would furnish prompt transportation to its hospital and treatment there free of charge.

The court, among other instructions, gave the following instruction to the jury: "You are instructed that, if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was delayed in receiving transportation, which he had a right to expect from the facts in this case, if such facts are proved, that he is entitled to recover for whatever suffering and pain there may have been caused by reason of the delay in furnishing him transportation, notwithstanding he may have been able to pay his transportation;" and refused to give the following instruction asked by the defendant: "(1) The jury are instructed that, if they find from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured while in the service of the defendant company, and was entitled, by virtue of an implied contract with defendant, to be transported free of charge to its hospital at Tyler, Texas, for treatment, and that defendant failed or neglected to promptly furnish transportation to plaintiff to go to the hospital, and by reason thereof, plaintiff's injury was increased; and you further find that the plaintiff had the means by which he could have paid his way and thereby reached the hospital promptly,—it was his duty to have done so, and thereby avoided increased injury; and, if you find he did have the means, and failed or neglected to use it, he cannot recover any sum as damages which resulted from the delay of defendant in furnishing him transportation to the hospital." There was a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,000, and the defendant appealed.

Messrs. S. H. West and Gaughan & Siford for appellant.

Messrs. Scott & Head, for appellee:

The railroad company violated its duty toward the plaintiff, when, after being injured, it failed and neglected to send him to its hospital with reasonable promptness.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Harney (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 791.

This case is controlled by Hot Springs R. Co. v. Deloney, 65 Ark. 177, 67 Am. St. Rep. 913, 45 S. W. 351.

Riddick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment for the sum of $2,000, rendered against the defendant company for failure to furnish the plaintiff prompt transportation to its hospital and prompt treatment after his arrival. The presiding judge instructed the jury that, if there was an agreement by the company, in case of injury, to furnish the plaintiff transportation to its hospital, and if it failed to do so, that plaintiff was entitled to recover whatever suffering and pain there may have been caused to plaintiff by reason of the delay in furnishing him transportation, notwithstanding he may have been able to pay for such transportation. Now, tickets from Stephens, Arkansas, where plaintiff lived, to Tyler, Texas, where the hospital of defendant was located, cost but $6, and the defendant company offered evidence to show that plaintiff had at all times an ample supply of money to have paid for this transportation had he desired to do so, and that when he arrived at the hospital he had over $3,000 cash in his possession. Instead of paying his fare and compelling the company to restore the amount paid afterwards, he chose to wait for the pass. This delay, no doubt, acted unfavorably upon his wound, and was the cause of considerable suffering on the part of plaintiff; but, as he had it in his power to have avoided this delay and injury by buying a ticket, we think it was his duty to have done so. Suppose the company had never furnished him a ticket, could he with $3,000 in his pocket have been justified in refusing to spend $6 for a ticket and in allowing his leg to mortify so that amputation would be necessary; and, if he did so, could he justly demand of the company compensation for the loss of a leg? It was the duty of plaintiff when the company failed to carry out its contract, to do what he reasonably could to avoid further injury to himself, and we are of the opinion that he cannot recover for pain and suffering caused by the delay under such circumstances, for he had it in his own power to have avoided such injury. Hall v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 15 Fed. 57; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Spinks, 104 Ga. 692, 30 S. E. 968.

The decision of this court in the case of Hot Springs R. Co. v. Deloney, 65 Ark. 177, 67 Am. St. Rep. 913, 45 S. W. 351, does not conflict with our conclusion here, for that was a case of an unlawful ejection of a passenger at a point between stations. In such cases there is an element of tort; and the court said that the passenger could recover "for the time and trouble of having to walk back to the Hot Springs depot, and for such humiliation as he was made to undergo by being put off," but that he could not recover damages for mental anguish caused by the resulting delay in reaching his sick brother; and the judgment was reversed on account of an improper instruction on that point. But this case has none of the elements of tort, for plaintiff was not ejected from the train. He does not complain that the conductor, at the time he boarded the train at Camden, refused to carry him beyond Stephens, for he had neither pass nor ticket, and did not offer to pay fare. He got off at Stephens, and for the first time notified the defendant company that he needed a pass to go to Tyler. He claims only that the defendant was bound, under its contract, to furnish him transportation to the hospital when thus notified. We may concede that this contention was well taken, but it does not follow that plaintiff can recover for pain and suffering caused by delay in reaching the hospital. It must be remembered that the railway company was under no obligation to enter into a contract of the kind set up by this plaintiff. The law requires railway companies to carry passengers who present themselves at the proper time and place and tender the amount required for transportation of passengers. A breach of 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) a contract of that kind by ejecting a passenger who has paid his fare is a violation of a duty which the company owes to the public, for which the passenger ejected may recover his damages in an action for tort. But in this case the law did not require the company to enter into a contract to carry its employees to a hospital when injured. In refusing to perform such a contract the company was guilty of no breach of duty to the public, nor of any tort. The damages must be assessed as in ordinary cases of breach of contract, and only those damages can be recovered as are the natural and proximate consequences of the defendant's breach of contract. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Spinks, supra; 3 Sutherland, Damages, § 899.

When a party has the money with which to purchase a ticket, the natural and ordinary damages which would result from a breach of a contract to give him free transportation would be the price of the transportation agreed to be furnished. If plaintiff in this case had the money with which to have purchased a ticket, we see no reason why he should be allowed to recover damages for failing to furnish a ticket, beyond the price of a ticket. For if, having the money to buy a ticket, he voluntarily exposed himself to this additional pain and suffering rather than pay the price of a ticket, his suffering caused by the delay is as much due to his own inaction as to that of the defendant, and he ought not to be allowed to hold the defendant liable for pain and suffering that he could have avoided by such a slight expenditure on his part. We are therefore of the opinion that the court erred in refusing to allow evidence that plaintiff had money with which he could have bought a ticket to Tyler. He also, we think, erred not only in giving the instruction to which we have referred, but in refusing to give instruction No. 1, asked by the defendant, which stated the law substantially as set forth in this opinion.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Pueblo County in defendants' favor in a suit to establish a trust. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Ed. Rizer and M. G. Saunders for appellants.

Messrs. Charles E. Gast and S. H. White, for appellees:

The deed creating the supposed trust can vest no legal title in the cestuis until the death of the mother, Mary H. Allen.

2 Perry, Tr. 4th ed. 920; Schaffer v. Wadsworth, 106 Mass. 19; Prentice v. Hall, 106 Mass. 597; Brandenburg v. Thorndike, 139 Mass. 102, 28 N. E. 575.

Goddard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th day of November, 1876, Stephen Wally executed a deed conveying lot No. 6, in block No. 58, in the town of South Pueblo, to Alfred Allen, trustee, for his heirs at the death of his wife Mary H. Allen. On the 30th day of July, A. D. 1884, Alfred Allen conveyed the property to Andrew Ruddy, and, through divers mesne conveyances, the appellee White, defendant below, became possessed of the property on the 20th day of March, 1900. On the 20th day of May, A. D. 1896, Alfred Allen died. Mary H. Allen, his wife, is still living. The appellants, who were all the living children of Alfred Allen, deceased, instituted this action for the purpose of obtaining an adjudication that the above property is impressed with a trust in favor of the children of the said Alfred Allen who may be living at the time of the death of the said Mary H. Allen, and that White holds the title to the property subject to this trust, for an accounting by the said White, and the appointment of a receiver to take possession and hold said property in trust for the children of Alfred Allen that may be living at the time of the death of said Mary H. Allen, and directing said receiver to hold and manage said property and hold the rents and proceeds thereof under the direction of the court. A demurrer was sustained to the complaint, on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to con-establish or enforce a trust: — The reluctance of the courts to enforce a trust at the suit of one whose interest therein is purely contingent is further illustrated by the case of McChord v. Caldwell, 96 Ky. 617, 29 S. W. 440, in which it was held that, where a will provided that, in the event of the death of testator's grandson without descendant and intestate, the estate devised to him should pass in accordance with the directions of a sealed paper left in the hands of the testator's trustees, one who alleged that the sealed paper referred to bequeathed to him, upon the occurrence of the contingencies named, the whole of the estate devised to the grandson, had too remote and uncertain an interest, in the absence of any allegation of the death of the grandson without descendant and intestate, to give him the right to complain of the management of the estate and the settlements made by the executor.

And in Association for Relief of Respectable Aged Indigent Females v. Beekman, 21 Barb. 565, it was held that where a testator directed that, after satisfying a provision in his will for the establishment of a dispensary, any estate then remaining should go to his executors in trust to apply the same in such sums and at such time and times as, in their discretion, they should think fit and proper, to the treasurer or other officer having the management of the pecuniary affairs of any one or more societies for the support of indigent respectable persons, especially females and orphans, and for the use of said society or societies, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the fact that a society which fell within the foregoing description might possibly be made a beneficiary of the trust did not entitle it to maintain a suit for its establishment and execution.

But in Carson v. Kennerly, 8 Rich. Eq. 259, it was held that a party entitled to a contingent remainder or interest might, under proper circumstances, be permitted to maintain an action for the preservation of the property in case his contingent rights should thereafter become vested; the criterion by which the court would determine the propriety of granting him relief being the reasonable probability that his claim would vest.

Upon the authority of the foregoing case, it was held in Clarke v. Deveaux, 1 S. C. N. S. 172, that cestuis que trust whose interests were future and contingent were entitled to maintain a bill in equity for the purpose of preserving the trust fund.

And in Hunt v. Hunt, 124 Mich. 502, 83 N. W. 371, it was held that, where property was devised in trust, the income to be paid to two persons equally as long as they lived, and, upon the death of either of them, to pay over one half of the trust estate to his heirs, devisees, or legatees, the prospective heirs of one of such persons were entitled to take proceedings to protect the trust fund, to compel the appointment of trustees, and to have them properly execute the trust, although such person was then living and had made a will devising the trust property to his wife.

stitute a cause of action, and the action was dismissed. From this judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

It is apparent from the foregoing statement that, if the deed to Allen created a trust, it continues until the death of Mary H. Allen, and cannot be terminated until that event occurs (2 Perry. Tr. 4th ed. § 920; Schaffer v. Wadsworth, 106 Mass. 19; Prentice v. Hall, 106 Mass. 597); and that said trust will inure to the benefit of such of the cestuis que trust only as may be living at the time this contingency shall happen. It is clear that it cannot now be determined whether any of them will be living at that time. This furnishes a conclusive reason why we should not now determine the question as to the existence or nonexistence of the trust. It is also evident that in these circumstances the plaintiffs are not now entitled to receive the rents and profits of the property, or to have them impounded for their benefit.

The judgment dismissing the action will therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

CHARLES WILLING HARE.

(— Colo. —, 87 Pac. 1032.)

Mortgage—rents and profits.

Notwithstanding the statute provides that a mortgage of real estate shall not be deemed a conveyance whatever its terms,

Case Note.—Power of equity, in jurisdiction where mortgage does not convey the title, to impound rents and profits of mortgaged property pending foreclosure: — In order to explain adequately the causes for the variance in the views taken in different jurisdictions as to the effect of statutes providing, expressly or in substance, that a mortgage shall not be deemed a conveyance so as to enable the mortgagee to recover possession of the property without foreclosure, on the appointing of a receiver for the mortgaged property, it is necessary to allude briefly to the different American theories of mortgages, and to the bases of equity jurisdiction to impound the rents and profits of mortgaged property.

According to a recognized authority (Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1186-1188), the English system, under which the mortgagee is regarded at law as the legal owner and in equity as having merely a lien, has not been wholly adopted in any of the United States, in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession without a foreclosure, a court of equity may, pending foreclosure, impound the rents and profits to be applied in reduction of the debt,—especially, where the rents and profits were pledged in the mortgage to the payment of the debt, in consideration of the release by the mortgagee of other security.

(December 3, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Arapahoe County in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to compel specific performance of a contract to apply the rents and profits of mortgaged property in reduction of the debt. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry C. Charpiot and John A. Perry, for appellant:

An agreement in a mortgage by which the mortgagor agrees, in case of default, to give up possession of the mortgaged property pending foreclosure, or to give up the incidents of that possession, the rents, is against public policy, and therefore void.

Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242-252, 28 L. ed. 415-419, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 420; Couper v. Shirley, 21 C. C. A. 288, 44 U. S. App. 586, 75 Fed. 170; Hazeltine v. Granger, 44 Mich. 503, 7 N. W. 74; Kelly v. A. 275, 60 U. S. App. 693, 89 Fed. 610.

The rents and profits of real estate have always been regarded as the necessary incidental accompaniment of use and occupation of the property.

Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242, 28 L. ed.

which equitable principles have penetrated the legal theory either to the extent that the mortgagee is recognized as the holder of the legal title only so far as may be necessary to protect his interests, or, partly through the adoption of equitable doctrines by the courts and partly through the operation of statutes of the kind under consideration, with the result of destroying the legal theory in toto.

Originally, the practice of appointing a receiver to impound the rents and profits of mortgaged property seems to have grown out of the lack of a remedy at law on the part of persons having only equitable mortgages, who, in consequence, were not in a position to recover the possession of the mortgaged premises in an action at law. But, as equity would give effect to a mortgage only so far as to afford protection to the mortgagee, such mortgagee could not enforce his right to the rents and profits in equity, unless he could show that the

The law does not permit the recovery of the legal incident, independent of the principal thing, from which it emanates.

Teal v. Walker; Hazeltine v. Granger; Couper v. Shirley; Wagar v. Stone; Beecher v. Marquette & P. Rolling Mill Co.; and American Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co.,—supra.

The legislature, in securing to the mortgagor the possession of mortgaged premises, with its incidents, placed the same beyond even the mortgagee's own contracts.

Teal v. Walker; Hazeltine v. Granger; property itself was inadequate security. Out of this enforcement, on equitable grounds, of a right incident to the mortgage itself, seems to have sprung the doctrine of so-called equitable lien on the rents and profits of mortgaged property, which courts of equity enforce by impounding them for the benefit of the owner of the mortgage when it appears that the property itself is inadequate to pay the debt and the mortgagor is insolvent, which doctrine is a part of the hybrid theory above alluded to as prevalent in some jurisdictions, that the mortgagee is to be regarded as owner so far as is necessary to keep him secure.

The difficulty of basing an equitable lien against property of an insolvent debtor on the mere inadequacy of security held by the creditor, which is what the rule that a mortgagee, regarded simply as a lienor, may have rents and profits sequestered for his benefit under such circumstances amounts to, has occurred to some of the courts.

Thus, in Lowell v. Doe, 44 Minn. 141, 48 N. W. 297, in discussing the effect of the statute declaring that "a mortgage of real property is not to be deemed a conveyance so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of real property without a foreclosure," the court intimated that whether a receiver should be appointed pendente lite from the mere fact of the insolvency of the debtor and the insufficiency of the security,—at least if that is not becoming depreciated by reason of the culpable acts or neglect of the mortgagor,—might, perhaps, be doubted; and in Marshall & I. Bank v. Cady, 76 Minn. 112, 78 N. W. 978, it was expressly held that, since a receiver could not be appointed on the ground that, under the mortgage, the rents and profits enter into and become a part of the security, for the payment of the debt, the only ground upon which an appointment may be made is the equitable one that it is necessary to prevent waste, and protect and preserve the premises themselves. The court said: "The fact that the premises are inadequate security, or that the mortgagor is insolvent, or both combined, is, of itself alone, no ground for the appointment of a receiver, although it might be a very material consideration in passing upon the propriety or necessity of appointing a receiver for the purpose of preserving the premises. To hold otherwise would be to defeat the provisions of the statute which gives the right of possession to the mortgagor, to deprive him of those substantial rights which it was the evident intent he should have, and to allow the mortgagee to do indirectly what he cannot do directly. . . . It must be conceded that, under similar statutes, the decisions of the courts on this question seem to be somewhat conflicting. Doubtless, some of them have been influenced by preconceived ideas derived from the common law, while others, which hold that a receiver of the rents and profits may still be appointed, have failed fully to appreciate the limitations upon the right resulting from the change in the law of mortgages."

In Post v. Dorr, 4 Edw. Ct. 412, the court said: "Notwithstanding the right of entry of a mortgagee has been abolished by our Revised Statutes, and there is no longer any existing analogy between putting a receiver into possession of mortgaged premises and any legal right or remedy which a mortgagee now enjoys or may resort to, yet the court of chancery has persevered in its ancient practice (doubtless borrowed from the practice of the chancery in England, and where a different state of things exists in regard to the legal rights and remedies of a mortgagee) of appointing a receiver over a mortgagor and his tenants, after default made in payment of the principal debt and a well-grounded apprehension of a deficiency of the security. This has been the practice so long, and it is so firmly established by order of the chancellor,—and even, I believe, in cases without reference to the point whether, by the terms of the mortgage, the rents and profits were expressly pledged or not as a part of the security,—that I am not at liberty to depart from it or to doubt the authority of the court in this particular. At the same time, I confess myself unable to discover the analogy or the principle under our laws in relation to the nature and true character of a mortgage, which authorizes such an interference with the legal rights of a mortgagor, unless, indeed, he has, by the express terms of his contract, pledged the rents and profits, as well as the corpus of the estate, as security for the debt."

And in later decisions the courts of New York have based the appointment of a receiver pending foreclosure upon other grounds. See Hollenbeck v. Donnell, infra.

And in Hardin v. Hardin, 34 S. C. 77, 27 Am. St. Rep. 786, 12 S. E. 936, it was held that where, by statutory provisions, a mortgage of real estate is not a conveyance of any estate whatever, but is simply a contract whereby the mortgagee obtains a lien on the property mortgaged as a security for the payment of a debt, in the absence of a stipulation in the mortgage that the mortgagee shall have a lien upon the rents and profits as well as upon the land, the mortgagee has no higher or better claim to the rents and profits than an unsecured creditor of the mortgagor, though the latter is insolvent and the mortgaged premises insufficient to satisfy the mortgage debt. The court attributes the conflict of authority upon this point to a failure to keep in mind the marked distinction between the nature and effect of a mortgage at common law and under statutes like the one in question.

Even where the effect of such statutes was not an element of the case, some courts seem to have found it impossible to recognize the right of a mortgagee to have the rents and profits of the mortgaged property impounded for his benefit as being purely equitable in character.

Thus, in Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Grant, 3 MacArth. 220 (Reversed on this point in 121 U. S. 105, 30 L. ed. 905, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 841), it was said: "It will be observed that the mortgage or deed of trust, as it is called, did not mortgage or create any lien upon the rents and profits of this property: and, while it is averred in the bill 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the property mortgaged is an inadequate security for the amount of money loaned to the mortgagor, and that he is insolvent, that affords no grounds whatever for seizing upon the rents and profits before foreclosure or sale of the mortgaged premises. Indeed, the grocer or merchant who supplied the necessities of life for Grant and family has a much higher equity on the rents and profits than the mortgagee. The latter loaned Grant money and took security for the repayment of it, but the former sold him goods on his personal credit. What justice or equity is there in allowing a mortgagee to claim any rights in reference to something not mortgaged to him over and above the rights of any other contract creditor? No well-adjudicated case can be found, I think, that allows the appointment of a receiver of rents and profits, when these rents and profits were not mortgaged, except, perhaps, in the state of New York, in which these decisions depend mainly upon the statute laws of that state; and these decisions may be laid out of the question so far as this case is concerned."

In New Jersey it is denied that the mere inadequacy in value of the mortgaged premises and insolvency of the mortgagor are a sufficient foundation for the appointment of a receiver, although it is admitted that one may be appointed where waste is being committed and the property has depreciated in value through the fault or negligence of the mortgagor or tenant in possession, or where there is any act on the part of the mortgagor or such tenant which shows fraud on his part, or makes him chargeable with bad faith in misappropriating the rents and profits for other purposes than that of keeping down the interest on the encumbrances. Cortleyeu v. Hathaway, 11 N. J. Eq. 39, 64 Am. Dec. 478; Frisbie v. Bateman, 24 N. J. Eq. 28; Horne v. Dey, 61 N. J. Eq. 554, 49 Atl. 154.

It certainly seems that the more consistent explanation lies in viewing the impounding of the rents and profits under such circumstances as a recognition in equity of right which is legal in character, even though it is the inadequacy of the principal

Nat. Bank v. Field, 156 Mo. 306, 56 S. W. 1095.

Campbell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This special proceeding, in the nature of a suit for specific performance, was begun in the county court of Arapahoe county to compel an administrator of an estate, who had received his letters from that tribunal, to conform to the terms of a real-estate mortgage given to secure the payment of estate indebtedness which he refused to observe, though at his request the court had specifically directed him to execute it. The county court granted the full relief asked by the appellee, and the administrator took the case by appeal to the district court, where the decree of the county court was affirmed, with modifications hereinafter adverted to. From the judgment of the district court, the administrator has brought the case here.

Upon this appeal there are no disputed questions of fact, and but a single legal question is involved. To show the equities, which are clearly with the mortgagee, who is appellee here, the facts are fully stated.

John Moncrieff, whose estate is now being administered by Zouave E. Moncrieff, in his lifetime borrowed $33,000, and gave his note therefor, which afterwards became the property of appellee, Hare. To secure its payment, John Moncrieff gave a mortgage upon a number of lots in the city of Denver. The note did not mature until after John's death, and while his estate was in security which evokes the action of the equity court. The significance of whether this right is essentially legal or equitable in nature lies in its bearing upon decisions as to the effect of statutes stripping the mortgagee of his legal estate upon the right to have a receiver appointed.

But there is another basis for the appointment of a receiver which presents no such difficulty,—the preservation of the security against waste by the mortgagor. The right to have a receiver appointed under these circumstances, being purely equitable in character, is generally regarded as unaffected by the statutes in question.

It should also be noted that the effect of these statutes, so far as they bear upon the right to have a receiver of rents and profits appointed, is frequently modified by other statutes directly governing the appointment of receivers.

An examination of the cases with reference to the holding of MONCRIEFF v. HARE that statutes stripping the mortgagee of his legal estate do not affect his right to ask, or the jurisdiction of equity to decree, the appointment of a receiver to impound rents and profits for his benefit under such circumstances as were formerly a ground for invoking such action, shows that the effect of many of the decisions on this question has been frequently misunderstood.

In Guy v. Ide, 6 Cal. 99, 65 Am. Dec. 490, a case commonly regarded as holding that a statute forbidding the mortgagee from recovering the mortgaged estate, and confining his remedy to a foreclosure, operates to prevent the appointment of a receiver, the ground on which the appointment was sought seems to have been that the mortgagee was entitled to rents and profits pending foreclosure as an incident to his mortgage; and it does not appear that the property itself was alleged to be insufficient. The effect of this decision, therefore, is not so sweeping as is commonly claimed for it.

In the case of American Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 32 C. C. A. 275, 60 U. S. App. 693, 89 Fed. 610, it was held that the Colorado statute providing that a mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance, whatever its terms, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the real property without foreclosure and sale, does not operate to preclude the appointment of a receiver of rents and profits pending foreclosure, for the purpose of applying them to the payment of taxes, insurance, and for repairs on the property which the mortgagor had covenanted to keep up. The criticism made in MONCRIEFF v. HARE, that so much of the opinion therein as intimates that a receiver could not be appointed pending foreclosure, solely for the purpose of sequestering rents and profits to be applied to the satisfaction of the mortgage debt, is contrary to the rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States, does not seem to be well founded, as the decisions of that court on the question, with the exception of the obiter dictum in Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co., discussed infra, have not been made with reference to statutes of the kind under discussion, altering the effect of mortgages.

In Pasco v. Gamble, 15 Fla. 562, it was held that a statute providing that a mortgage is a specific lien upon property, and that the mortgagee is incapable of acquiring possession until after decree of foreclosure, and then only by bidding and outbidding all competitors in market, does not operate to prevent the appointment of a receiver where the land is inadequate security for the debt and the mortgagor is insolvent. The court said: "We are now satisfied that his [the mortgagee's] right to possession was not the basis of this equity. He had no right in equity to possession as against the mortgagor, unless there were equities affecting the conscience of the mortgagor, by which his possession could be controlled for the benefit of the charge and encumbrance, and equity gave her aid when these circumstances existed, and when at law the mortgagee could not get possession, or his right there was obstructed or not available. The equity results from the fact that a mortgage is a charge upon the land; that the land is in-process of administration, against which the debt was established as a claim of the fourth class. Default was made in payment. Hare foreclosed the mortgage or deed of trust in the district court, and at the foreclosure sale bid in the property for $20,000, and credited the same upon the note, leaving a balance due of over $15,000, for which a deficiency judgment was rendered. It seems that the foreclosure and sale were brought about with an understanding between the mortgagee, Hare, the administrator, and the heirs of John Moncrieff for a readjustment of the indebtedness, upon the following plan: Hare agreed to, and did, extend the maturity of the entire indebtedness for three years, and, for a consideration of $20,000, reconveyed to the heirs the property purchased at the foreclosure sale. To secure the payment of the debt, a mortgage on the reconveyed property was given by the heirs, and Hare put into possession, with power to receive the rents and profits, out of which he was to pay taxes, insurance, repairs, and interest on the mortgage debt. As additional security, two other lots, being a part of the unencumbered estate of John Moncrieff, were covered by a second mortgage, in which the heirs and the administrator joined. As these lots belonged to the estate, application was made to the county court for leave to encumber it, and authority and direction were given to the administrator to mortgage both the property and its rents and profits. In pursuance thereof, the instrument contained the following adequate security for the debt; that the mortgagor is insolvent, or resides out of the state; that both the mortgagor and the purchaser at the execution sale have paid no attention to arrears of interest due upon the mortgage debt, or to pay taxes then due and unpaid. This rule we deduce from the uniform action of courts of equity in analogous cases, where, as against the legal right of possession, equity will sequester and apply the rents and profits to a charge or encumbrance. The right to appropriate the rents and profits which equity gives the mortgagee, where a receiver is appointed at this instance, does not result from any specific pledge of such rents contained in the mortgage. Equity makes the mortgage, as between mortgagor and mortgagee, a charge upon the rents and profits whenever the mortgagor is insolvent and the security is inadequate; and especially is it the duty of the purchaser in possession to keep down the interest." The effect of this decision, however, is considerably weakened by the fact that one of the grounds on which the appointment was based was the purely equitable one of the preservation of the estate, it appearing that the owner of the property had failed to pay the taxes.

Merritt v. Gibson, 129 Ind. 155, 15 L.R.A. 277, 27 N. E. 136, discussed in the opinion in MONCRIEFF v. HARE, hinged on the effect to be given to a statute authorizing the appointment of a receiver to protect or preserve, during the time allowed for redemption, any real estate or interest therein sold on execution or order of sale, and to secure to the person entitled thereto the rents and profits thereof, in connection with another statute providing that the owner of real estate sold under execution shall be entitled to the possession of the same for one year from the date of such sale; the court going on to state, however, that the appointment of a receiver might be justified aside from the statute, by well-settled principles of equity, a conclusion dissented from by two judges, it being said by Elliott, J., in the dissenting opinion, that the mere fact that the mortgaged property is not of value sufficient to satisfy the judgment does not authorize the appointment of a receiver. The case, therefore, lends little real support to the proposition that equity may, in the absence of a statute authorizing the appointment of a receiver, impound the rents and profits of mortgaged property pending foreclosure for the benefit of a mortgagee without right of possession.

In American Invest. Co. v. Farrar, 87 Iowa, 437, 54 N. W. 361, it was held that, where it was provided by statute that, in the absence of stipulations to the contrary, the mortgagor of real property should retain the legal title and right of possession thereto, a receiver could not be appointed pending foreclosure for the purpose of appropriating the rents and revenues of the mortgaged premises for the benefit of the mortgagee, whose mortgage did not, in terms, give to him the right of possession before sale and the termination of the right of redemption, nor pledge the rents and profits, even though it appeared that the mortgagor was insolvent and the security insufficient; the court saying: "To take possession of property so mortgaged, or to appropriate the revenue which is derived therefrom for the benefit of the mortgagee, even though done by means of a receiver, would be to violate rights which are created and protected by statute for the benefit of the mortgagor, and those who claim through him, and cannot be authorized."

In Wagar v. Stone, 36 Mich. 364, it was held that, where it was provided by statute that the mortgagor should be entitled to the possession during the proceedings taken to foreclose the mortgage, and until a sale should have been made and the title of the purchaser become absolute; and that, until the title should have become absolute upon a foreclosure of the mortgage, an action of ejectment could not be maintained by the mortgagee, his assigns, or representatives, to recover possession of the mortgaged premises,—rents and profits collected by a receiver appointed pending foreclosure could not be applied to a deficiency remaining after application of the proceeds of the foreclosure sale to the mortgage debt; the court taking the view that the legislature, clause, which gives rise to this controversy: "It is further covenanted and agreed that, after applying the rents and profits from the property aforesaid to the payment of the insurance premiums, taxes, assessments, necessary repairs, and necessary incidental expenses, that he will pay over the net balance of said rents to the said Charles Willing Hare, or to his duly authorized agent, to be applied upon the interest upon the notes secured by the mortgage ratably." The mortgagee was not placed in possession of this property, because the same was already in custodia legis, and the administrator, being the representative of the estate, was deemed a proper person to collect and apply the rents in accordance with the terms of the mortgage just quoted. Until about the time of the maturity of the debt, the administrator collected the rents and profits and applied them as the mortgage prescribed, and as the county court, in authorizing its execution, directed. Thereafter he refused to comply with these terms as to rents and profits, and, the indebtedness being due and unpaid, the mortgagee began foreclosure proceedings in the district court in the year 1901, and in a separate proceeding (which is the one now under consideration) applied to the county court for an order to compel the administrator to observe the covenants of the mortgage, and apply the rents and profits to the payment of the taxes and insurance then in arrears, and the balance, if any, in reducing the interest, and to continue so to do pending foreclosure.

in depriving the mortgagee of the means of enforcing possession, intended also to cut off and deprive him of all rights which he could have acquired in case he obtained possession before acquiring an absolute title.

And in Fifth Nat. Bank v. Pierce, 117 Mich. 376, 75 N. W. 1058, it was held, upon the authority of the foregoing case, that a mortgagee is not entitled to have the rents and profits pending foreclosure impounded, although it was alleged that the mortgagor's grantee did not intend to devote the rents and profits to the payment of the encumbrances.

In Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Mills Plaster Co. 3 L.R.A. 90, 37 Fed. 286, it was held that the right of the mortgagor to the rents and profits pendente lite is a substantial one under the Michigan statute above stated, which must be recognized by the courts of the United States in administering the rights of parties to a mortgage, and that, therefore, a receiver would not be appointed to take the rents and profits to apply on the mortgage prior to the completion of foreclosure, although the security was inadequate; it being stated, however, that there is nothing in Wagar v. Stone which controverts the power and duty of the court to appoint a receiver in foreclosure cases, where the property is being destroyed or wasted by the mortgagor, for the protection of the security.

In Belding v. Meloche, 113 Mich. 223, 71 N. W. 592, however, it was held that the statute does not apply to equitable mortgages, and that, therefore, a receiver appointed pending the foreclosure of a land contract providing that, on default of the purchaser, the vendor may re-enter without notice, might be required to apply rents and profits received by him to a deficiency remaining after sale.

In Lowell v. Doe, 44 Minn. 144, 46 N. W. 297, relied upon in MONCRIEFF v. HARE as supporting the doctrine that rents and profits may be impounded pending foreclosure for the benefit of a mortgagee, even where he is divested by statute of all legal rights, it was held that a statute declaring that "a mortgage of real property is not to be deemed a conveyance, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the real property without a foreclosure," was clearly intended to abrogate the common-law doctrine that a mortgage created an estate upon condition in the mortgagee, which, upon default in the performance of the condition, became absolute, entitling the mortgagee to recover possession; but that such statute could not be fairly construed as abrogating, also, the power of courts of equity to afford to mortgagees such remedies for the protection of their equitable rights as, upon equitable grounds, those courts had always been accustomed to afford, and the granting of which did not rest upon the doctrine of the legal title or right of possession being in the mortgagee. That this case cannot be regarded as authority for the proposition that the rents and profits pending foreclosure may be impounded for the benefit of the mortgagee where the security is insufficient and the mortgagor insolvent, is apparent from the fact that the propriety of appointing a receiver on such grounds was expressly doubted, and that the appointment of a receiver was put upon the ground of the nonpayment of taxes, the probable cancellation of the insurance, and the cessation of the use of the property for hotel purposes, resulting in a permanent impairment of the value of the mortgaged property.

And in Marshall & I. Bank v. Cady, 76 Minn. 112, 78 N. W. 978, hereinbefore quoted, and National F. Ins. Co. v. Broadbent, 77 Minn. 175, 79 N. W. 676, it was held that, while a receiver may be appointed to collect rents and profits to protect and preserve the mortgage security and to protect the mortgaged property from waste, such is the only purpose for which a receivership can be exercised, or for which the rents and profits can be used.

But in Davidson v. Allia, Fed. Cas. No. 3,600, it was held that the Minnesota statute above quoted did not restrict the power of a court of chancery to take charge of the rents and income and enforce the equitable right of the mortgagee to the rents, grow-proceedings, and until possession of the property was delivered to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. As a part of the readjustment plan, Hare, particularly in view of the new pledge of rents and profits, released securities he held on other property of the estate, relieved the Moncrieff heirs from personal liability upon the debt, and relinquished his claim against the estate. When this proceeding was begun, it is conceded that the mortgaged premises were and are insufficient security for the payment of the debt, and that they constitute the only asset available to apply on the debt, as all the mortgagors are insolvent. The legal question, therefore, is whether, under the facts disclosed by this record, the rents and profits belonged to the mortgagors until the period for redemption has expired, or whether they may be applied upon the interest on the mortgage debt. Counsel do not object to the form of the proceeding, apparently agreeing that, if this is a case where a court of equity, in which foreclosure proceedings are pending, might appoint a receiver to sequester the rents and profits to be applied in accordance with the rights of the parties, to be ascertained upon final hearing, that the same relief may be granted herein if the equities are with the mortgagee.

It is the contention of the administrator that, under § 261 of our Code of Civil Procedure, reading, "A mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance, whatever its terms, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the ing out of the fact of the insolvency of the mortgagor and the inadequate security.

In Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co. 107 U. S. 378, 27 L. ed. 609, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 911, it appears that the mortgage in question was affected by a Nebraska statute declaring that, "in the absence of stipulations to the contrary, the mortgagor retains the legal title and right of possession." It should be noted that what was said therein as to the power of courts of equity to take charge of mortgaged property by means of a receiver, quoted in the MONCRIEFF CASE, was purely obiter, the question before the court being the measure of damages to be recovered on an appeal bond in a foreclosure suit, and the effect of the statute referred to upon the power of the court to impound the rents and profits for the purpose of satisfying any deficiency is nowhere discussed.

In Hyman v. Kelly, 1 Nev. 179, it was held that a statute providing that a mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance, so as to enable the owner of a mortgage to recover possession of the real property without foreclosure and sale, simply operated to restrict the remedies available to the mortgagee, and did not curtail the power of equity courts to appoint a receiver pending foreclosure. It appears, however, that, in addition to the inadequacy of the property, and the insolvency of the mortgagors, the property was being wasted and destroyed; and further, that the rents and profits had been expressly pledged for the payment of interest and the making of repairs.

In New York it is held that, notwithstanding the right of entry of a mortgagee has been abolished, equity may appoint a receiver pending foreclosure, where there are grounds to apprehend a deficiency of the security. See Post v. Dorr, 4 Edw. Ch. 412.

And in Syracuse City Bank v. Tallman, 31 Barb. 201, it was held that, though a mortgage is simply a lien for the security of the mortgage debt, courts of equity, adhering to the ancient practice, will, after default in an action for foreclosure and sale, anticipate the final judgment of the court by the appointment of a receiver, and, in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

effect, put the mortgagee in possession, and allow him to divert the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises from the hands of the mortgagor, and hold them as additional security for the payment of the mortgage, where it appears that the mortgaged premises are an inadequate security for the debt, and that the mortgagor, or other person liable for the mortgage debt, is insolvent. The court said: "This relief, it will be readily seen from the conditions necessary to its enjoyment, does not grow directly out of the relations of the parties or the stipulations contained in the mortgage, but out of equitable considerations alone."

In Hollenbeck v. Donnell, 94 N. Y. 342, it was held that the right of a mortgagee to a receivership of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises does not rest upon his legal right to the possession of the premises, and consequently to the rents thereof, but upon the ground that, when default has been made in the condition of a mortgage, the mortgagee at once becomes entitled to a foreclosure of the mortgage and a sale of the mortgaged premises; and that, since this process requires time, on general principles of equity the court may make the decree, when obtained, relate back to the time of the commencement of the action, and, where necessary for the security of the mortgage debt, may appoint a receiver of the rents and profits accruing in the meantime, thus anticipating the decree and sale; and that, therefore, the right of the mortgagee to have the rents and profits impounded pending foreclosure was unaffected by a statute providing that no action of ejectment should thereafter be maintained by a mortgagee for the possession of the mortgaged premises.

In Hardin v. Hardin, 34 S. C. 77, 27 Am. St. Rep. 786, 12 S. E. 936, it was held that, where the effect of the statute is such that a mortgage of real estate is not a conveyance of any estate whatever, but is simply a contract whereby the mortgagee obtains a lien on the property mortgaged as a security for the payment of the debt, the mortgagee cannot, in the absence of a stipulation in the mortgage that he shall have a real property without foreclosure and sale," the rents of mortgaged property cannot be applied to the reduction of the mortgage debt, in consequence of any agreement in the mortgage itself, until the mortgagee has obtained actual possession, or has acquired the right to possession under a foreclosure and sale after the period of redemption has expired. The mortgagee contends that, while this provision of the Code makes the mortgage merely a security for the debt, and the mortgagee acquires no legal title, nevertheless, where his mortgage security is inadequate, especially where there is a specific pledge of rents as part of the security, and the mortgagor is insolvent, a court of equity may, upon default and after foreclosure suit has been brought, appoint a receiver to collect the rents and profits, and have the same applied upon the mortgage debt when final decree is made; in other words, the mortgagee says that this section was not intended to take away from courts of equity their power in such cases to apply rents and profits of the mortgaged estate towards the reduction of the mortgage debt.

It is familiar learning that at common law a mortgage vests the legal title in the mortgagee, and upon condition broken the mortgagee might re-enter or bring ejectment. Our statute, however, has taken from the instrument its common-law character, and deprived the mortgagee of all possession, or right of possession, either before or after condition broken; and before this right exists the mortgagee must foreclose lien upon the rents and profits as well as upon the land before or pending proceedings for foreclosure, subject the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises to the payment of his debt, though the security be inadequate, since he then has no higher or better claim to them than an unsecured creditor of the mortgagor.

In Schreiber v. Carey, 48 Wis. 208, 4 N. W. 124, it was held that, although, by the laws of the state, a mortgagor has a legal right to the possession of the mortgaged property until after foreclosure and sale, notwithstanding the condition of the mortgage has not been performed; and although all legal actions for the recovery of possession of the mortgaged premises have been taken from the mortgagee by express statute,—the power of a court of equity to appoint a receiver of the rents and profits in an action to foreclose the mortgage is unaffected. It appeared in the case that there was some doubt about the adequacy of the principal security to satisfy the debt, and that the premises had been sold for taxes and the certificates of sale transferred to strangers, so that a proper case for the protection of the security by a court of equity was shown independent of any supposed equitable lien arising out of the inadequacy of the mortgaged premises. The court, however, bases its decision on what it conceives to be the general current of authority, and also says that the want of legal remedy to enable the mortgagee to recover possession of the mortgaged premises before foreclosure is an additional reason why equity should aid him.

The correctness of this decision is reaffirmed in Sales v. Lusk, 60 Wis. 490, 19 N. W. 362; and the power of equity to appoint a receiver to take possession of the mortgaged premises, to the end that the rents and profits may be applied to the payment of any deficiency that may remain after foreclosure and sale, is recognized in Gaynor v. Blewett, 82 Wis. 313, 33 Am. St. Rep. 47, 62 N. W. 313.

As hereinbefore stated, the question under discussion is affected by the existence of statutes relating to the appointment of receivers, the relation of which to statutes governing the effect of mortgages is considered in the cases following:

Thus, in Scott v. Hotchkiss, 115 Cal. 89, 47 Pac. 45, the power of equity to appoint a receiver to take and hold the rents and profits of mortgaged premises to secure the debt, where it is averred that the security is insufficient, based upon a statutory provision to that effect, was recognized, although by the laws of California the remedy of a mortgagee is confined to a foreclosure.

See Guy v. Ide, 6 Cal. 99, 65 Am. Dec. 490. In Douglass v. Cline, 12 Bush, 608, and Newport & C. Bridge Co. v. Douglass, 12 Bush, 673, a statute providing for the appointment of a receiver, where it appears that the mortgaged property is in danger of loss or injury, or is, perhaps, insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt, was held to authorize the appointment of a receiver, notwithstanding the mortgagee had been stripped of his legal rights by a statute providing that actions at law for possession may, upon motion of the mortgagor, be transferred to the equity side of the docket.

And in Nebraska, although it is provided by statute that, in the absence of stipulations to the contrary, the mortgagor retains the legal title and right of possession, the power of a court of equity to proceed under a statute authorizing the appointment of a receiver in an action to foreclose a mortgage, when the mortgaged property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt, is regarded as unaffected. Jacobs v. Gibson, 9 Neb. 380, 2 N. W. 893; Philadelphia Mortg. & T. Co. v. Goos, 47 Neb. 804, 66 N. W. 843.

In Roberts v. Parker, 14 S. D. 323, 85 N. W. 591, it was held that the provision of the Civil Code that a mortgage does not entitle the mortgagee to the possession of the property unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage, is to be taken, under the rule of construction enacted by the legislature, that, if the provisions of any Code conflict with or contravene the provisions of any other Code, the provisions of each Code must prevail as to all questions arising thereunder out of the same his mortgage, and sell the mortgaged property. This court, in Pueblo & A. Valley R. Co. v. Beshoar, 8 Colo. 32, 5 Pac. 639, has so construed our statute in harmony with rulings in other jurisdictions where similar statutes are in force, and has said that, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, the equitable doctrine has thereby been made universal that a mortgage creates merely a lien. The language of this court that such was the doctrine, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, indicates that the mortgagor and mortgagee may, by special contract, work a change in the rule. To the same effect is Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 589, where, in speaking for the court, Chief Justice Field says the statute does not prevent the owner from making an independent contract for the possession or from authorizing a sale of the premises (the mortgagee consenting thereto) to pay off the debt; and this right to dispose both of the possession and estate follows, necessarily, from the ownership of the property, and no valid objection can be urged against incorporating the contract and power in the same instrument with the mortgage.

Such a contract as we find in the mortgage in this case concerning rents and profits is just as much independent of this mortgage proper as was the contract in the Fogarty Case creating a power of sale independent of that mortgage. But, in disposing of this case, we shall not rest our judgment upon the power of the parties, by subject-matter, as modified by the provision of the Code of Civil Procedure for the appointment of a receiver in foreclosure actions, where it appears that the mortgaged property is in danger of being lost, removed, or materially injured, or probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt.

In Rogers v. Southern Pine Lumber Co. 21 Tex. Civ. App. 48, 51 S. W. 26, and De Barrera v. Frost, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 580, 77 S. W. 637, the appointment of a receiver, under a statute expressly providing that a receiver may be appointed in an action by a mortgagee for the foreclosure of his mortgage and the sale of the mortgaged property, when it appears that the condition of the mortgage has not been performed and the property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt, seems to have been regarded as unaffected by a statute providing that a mortgagee is not entitled to possession, nor to rents of the property.

But in Hardin v. Hardin, supra, it is held that a statute authorizing the appointment of a receiver pendente lite on the application of a party establishing an apparent right to property which is the subject of the action, and which is in the possession of an adverse party, and the property, or its rents and profits, are in danger of being lost, or materially injured, or impaired, does not warrant the appointment of a receiver in an action to foreclose a mortgage which does not operate as a conveyance of any estate, but simply as a lien, and which contains no provision subjecting the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises to the lien.

And in Norfor v. Busby, 19 Wash. 450, 53 Pac. 715, it was held that a statute providing that a mortgage of realty shall not be deemed a conveyance, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession without a foreclosure and sale according to law, repealed by implication an earlier statute authorizing the appointment of a receiver in an action for foreclosure, when the mortgaged property is insufficient to discharge the debt, to secure the application of the rents and profits accruing before sale can be had.

effect of a statute authorizing the appointment of a receiver, compare Merritt v. Gibson, 129 Ind. 155, 15 L.R.A. 277, 27 N. E. 136.

While it is not purposed to discuss in this note the effect of a stipulation in the mortgage for the appointment of a receiver where statutes of the kind hereinbefore stated exist, reference may be made in passing to a few decisions upon this phase of the question.

In Scott v. Hotchkiss, supra, it was intimated, and in Baker v. Varney, 129 Cal. 564, 79 Am. St. Rep. 140, 62 Pac. 100, it was expressly held, that no stipulation in a mortgage can confer jurisdiction upon a court to appoint a receiver in a case where no authority is conferred by law.

In Hazeltine v. Granger, 44 Mich. 503, 7 N. W. 74, it was held that the Michigan statute forbidding ejectment by a mortgagee before foreclosure absolute renders a stipulation in a mortgage for the appointment of a receiver for the benefit of the mortgagee invalid. The court said: "The statute does not say that no ejectment shall lie unless there is an agreement to that effect, but that it shall not lie at all. Every mortgage made in common-law form contains words whereby, if applied as they read, possession would belong to the mortgagee, and his title would become absolute by default. The whole aim of equity was to arrest this forfeiture, and not to allow the language of a mortgage to have any force against the equity of redemption. The statute is a further step in the same direction for the protection of mortgagors against agreements which, as literally drawn and as theretofore expounded, were deemed dangerous and against public policy. The language of this mortgage expressly granting rents and profits on default is no stronger than the previous words of grant, and is really narrowed. It was no doubt intended to go further and to evade the statute. If it had contained an agreement that ejectment should lie, it could not very well be enforced against the clause of the statute prohibiting it. It can have no greater force in enlarging the jurisdiction of equity to ap-independent contract, to take the case out of the operation of the statute, but, giving to the statute all that the mortgagor here claims for it, we shall see, from a review of the authorities, that the prevailing rule established by the authorities, as well as the correct principle, is that in a case like ours the mortgagee is entitled to rents and profits.

The mortgagor relies chiefly upon the following cases: Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242, 28 L. ed. 415, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 420; Guy v. Ide, 6 Cal. 99, 65 Am. Dec. 490; Hazeltine v. Granger, 44 Mich. 503, 7 N. W. 74; Couper v. Shirley, 21 C. C. A. 288, 44 U. S. App. 586, 75 Fed. 168; Wagar v. Stone, 36 Mich. 364; Beecher v. Marquette & P. Rolling Mill Co. 40 Mich. 307; American Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 32 C. C. A. 275, 60 U. S. App. 693, 89 Fed. 610.

Teal v. Walker was an action at law brought by Walker, mortgagee, as against Teal, one of the mortgagors, to recover damages which the mortgagee claimed he had sustained by the refusal of Teal to surrender possession of the mortgaged property; and the court held that, inasmuch as the plaintiff mortgagee took no effectual steps to regain possession of the mortgaged premises, he was not entitled to the rents and profits thereof while they were occupied by the mortgagor, who was the owner of the equity of redemption. In that case, which arose in Oregon, the court, in construing a statute in the same words as ours, said that a mortgage is not a conveyance, and a mortgagee is not entitled to possession until after the foreclosure and sale; and therefore his claim to the rents is without support. It will be observed that no equitable principle was invoked in this case, the naked question being the relative rights of mortgagor and mortgagee to rents and profits of the mortgaged property while they were in possession of the mortgagor, and before the mortgagee, by suit or otherwise, sought to obtain possession. The court, in its opinion, refers to Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co. 107 U. S. 378, 27 L. ed. 609, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 911, in which it was also said that, under a similar statute, the land mortgaged is in the nature of a pledge, and the rents and profits are not pledged, and that they belong to the one in possession, whether he be the mortgagor or a third person claiming under him; and the conclusion in the Kountze Case was that, as the plaintiff was not entitled to possession he had no right to the rents and profits. In that case, however, which was equitable in its character for the foreclosure of a mortgage, the court expressly recognized the equitable doctrine that rents and profits might be applied to the satisfaction of a debt, and said: "There is another consideration which relieves the conclusion which we have reached from any supposed hardship or injustice to mortgagees. Courts of equity always have the power where the debtor is insolvent, and the mortgaged property is an insufficient security for the debt, and there is good cause to believe that it will be wasted or deteriorated in the hands of the mortgagor, as by cutting of timber, suffering dilapidation, etc., to take charge of the property by means of a receiver, and preserve not only the corpus, but the rents and profits, for the satisfaction of the debt. When justice requires this course to be pursued, and it is resorted to by the mortgagee, it will give him ample protection. There is no necessity, therefore, in order to protect him from injury, that a party, in order to have the benefit of an appeal, should be obliged to give security to account for the intermediate rents and profits of his own property."

In Grant v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 121 U. S. 105, 116, 30 L. ed. 905, 909, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 841, it was declared that a court point receivers, which we held, in Wagar v. Stone, 36 Mich. 364, had been abolished. Any such attempt to create a forfeiture is contrary to equity, and equity will not enforce it. The same principle which makes all original agreements void which destroy the equity of redemption in advance must cover a partial as well as complete destruction."

So also in Couper v. Shirley, 21 C. C. A. 288, 44 U. S. App. 586, 75 Fed. 168, it was held that the Oregon statute providing that a mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance, etc., is evidence of a public policy which is contravened by a provision in the mortgage for the appointment of a receiver for rents and profits pending foreclosure.

This decision was followed in Norfor v. Busby, supra.

But in Hardin v. Hardin, 34 S. C. 77, 27 Am. St. Rep. 786, 12 S. E. 936, the right of a mortgagee to have a receiver appointed, where there is a stipulation in the mortgage that he shall have a lien upon the rents and profits as well as upon the land, was recognized, although it was provided by law that a mortgage of real estate is not a conveyance of any estate whatever.

In Iowa, though it is provided by statute that the mortgagor shall retain the legal title and right of possession, it has been held that a stipulation in a mortgage for the appointment of a receiver in case of foreclosure, to receive the rents and profits during the period of redemption, to be applied on the mortgage debt, is not against public policy. Hubbell v. Avenue Invest. Co. 97 Iowa, 135, 66 N. W. 85.

of equity has the power before sale in a foreclosure suit to appoint a receiver of the property involved in litigation, and thus deprive the mortgagor of its use and of its rents and profits, even where the trust deed or mortgage did not embrace the rents and profits of the property as a part of the security. Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co. was cited to the point.

In Waterman v. Mackenzie, 138 U. S. 252, 34 L. ed. 923, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, the court said that, while a mortgage of real estate is now pretty generally, in this country, considered as mere security for the debt, creating only a lien, and leaving title in the mortgagor, yet everywhere it is considered as passing title in the land, so far as may be necessary for the protection of the mortgagee, and to give him the full benefit of his security; and, even against the mortgagor in possession, the mortgagee may obtain an injunction or damages for such cutting of timber as tends to impair the value of the mortgage security.

In United States Trust Co. v. Wabash Western R. Co. 150 U. S. 287, 37 L. ed. 1085, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 86, the court remarked that, if the mortgage there under consideration had conveyed the earnings and rentals of the property, and those had constituted a part of the estate conveyed as security for the bonds, there would be some reason for saying that the mortgagee would be entitled to recover these earnings and rentals before it demanded possession of the road, which was the mortgaged property. But the court concluded that the better doctrine, as established by its previous decisions, was that, even where a mortgage covered rents and profits, and the mortgagor was in default, and for such default the mortgage provided that the trustee or mortgagee should take possession of the road, until regular demand was made for the payment of the encumbrance by the defendants, the mortgagor was not obliged to account therefor. The court concluded, citing Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co., that the substance of the rulings of the various cases is that, until the mortgagee asserts his rights under the mortgage to the possession of the road by filing a bill of foreclosure, or by demanding possession of some third party who is in possession, he has no right to its earnings and profits; thereby clearly indicating that in a proper case, where equitable rights are asserted by the mortgagee, he may, upon filing a bill for foreclosure and before decree and sale, have the rents and profits sequestered to wait final determination of the case.

said that, as between mortgagor and mortgagee (and that is the case in hand), whether the mortgage be regarded as passing the legal estate, or as giving merely a lien for the debt, the right of the mortgagee to be protected from the impairment of his security is alike recognized,—citing Jones on Mortgages, § 684. And the learned chief justice added that it may be conceded that the mortgagee is not entitled to rents and profits unless a lien thereon is reserved in the mortgage; and, referring to Teal v. Walker, said that where a mortgagee may have the right to take possession upon condition broken, if he does not exercise the right he cannot claim rents; again indicating that, if the mortgagee had availed himself of his equitable right to preserve or impound the rents, relief could be given.

In Freedman's Sav. & T. Co. v. Shepherd, 127 U. S. 494, 32 L. ed. 163, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1250, Mr. Justice Harlan said that it was competent for the parties to provide in the mortgage for the payment of rents and profits to the mortgagee while the mortgagor remains in possession, and that when the mortgage contains no such provision, and even where the income is expressly pledged as security for the mortgage debt, the general rule is that the mortgagee is not entitled to the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises until he takes actual possession, or until possession is taken in his behalf by the receiver, or until in proper form he demands and is refused possession; and he refers to Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co. supra, as authority for the proposition that courts of equity, where the debtor is insolvent and the mortgaged property an insufficient security for the debt, may appoint a receiver to take charge of the property, not only to preserve the corpus, but the rents and profits, to the satisfaction of the debt.

The mortgagor lays much stress upon American Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 32 C. C. A. 275, 60 U. S. App. 693, 89 Fed. 610, as enunciating the doctrine that, under a statute like ours, a mortgagee cannot maintain a right to have rents and profits applied to the satisfaction of his mortgage debt, because the rents belong to the mortgagor, and the mortgage is not a lien thereon; nor will the appointment of a receiver for the purpose of collecting the rents create an equitable lien in favor of the mortgagee. If such was the announcement in that case, it was obiter; the court expressly saying that the record in the case before it did not show that any part of the rents collected by the receiver was used in payment of the original mortgage debt, but, on the contrary, the money paid to him as rental was expended in repairing the mortgaged premises, in keeping up insurance, and in paying taxes. For such purposes, it was said that a receiver might be appointed; but whether he could be appointed for the purpose of sequestering rents and profits to be applied to the satisfaction of the mortgage debt was not in that case, and was expressly eliminated. But, if it was there decided, the case would not be authority, for it is contrary to the rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases to which we have already adverted.

In an early case in California (Guy v. Ide, supra) it was said that, as their statute, of which ours is a copy, forbids a mortgagee from recovering the mortgaged estate, the same reason does not there exist as under the English rule for appointing a receiver to collect the rents and profits pending the litigation. The authority of this case seems somewhat shaken by subsequent decisions of the same court, though possibly subsequent statutes may account for the change. But in Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 589, it was said that the language of the statute, of which ours is a copy, was intended merely to control the terms of grant, bargain, and sale generally employed in mortgages, and was not intended to prohibit separate stipulations between the parties for possession.

In Sacramento & P. R. Co. v. Superior Court, 55 Cal. 453, in a proceeding which, like the one under consideration, was in the nature of a suit to enforce specific performance of the terms and conditions of a mortgage, it was held that a receiver might be appointed by the court to collect the income and profits of the mortgaged property, even though the mortgagee had not filed a bill for foreclosure. This was where the mortgage, as here, specifically pledged the income and profits of the railroad company as part of the security for the mortgage debt.

In Montgomery v. Merrill, 65 Cal. 432, 4 Pac. 414, the mortgage of land included the rents, issues, and profits thereof. In proceedings for foreclosure a receiver was appointed, and at the sale thereunder the sum bid was insufficient to satisfy the mortgage debt. Held, that the mortgage was a lien upon the crops growing upon the mortgaged premises, and the proceeds of its sale by the receiver should be applied to the payment of the deficiency. This would seem to be against the doctrine announced in Guy v. Ide, 6 Cal. 99, 65 Am. Dec. 490.

In Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 53 Am. St. Rep. 201, 40 Pac. 104, 44 Pac. 484, the court quotes with approval Jones on Mortgages, that upon a bill in equity to obtain foreclosure and sale the mortgagee, in proper cases, may apply for the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the earnings of the mortgaged property. The same principle is recognized in Freeman v. Campbell, 109 Cal. 360, 42 Pac. 35.

In Merritt v. Gibson, 129 Ind. 155, 15 L.R.A. 277, 27 N. E. 136, it was held, where lands are sold at a mortgage sale, and the mortgage creditor is the purchaser, if he shows that the mortgaged lands are inadequate to secure the debt, and the debtor is insolvent, and that the lands are in actual occupancy of tenants who are to pay rent therefor, a court of equity may appoint a receiver to collect rents and profits accruing from such lands, and hold them till the expiration of the year allowed for redemption, subject to the order of the court, to be paid to the debtor if he redeems, or to the mortgage creditor if no redemption is made. The Indiana statute gave to the mortgagor not only possession and right of possession before and after default, but also the right to redeem during an additional year after foreclosure sale. The opinion, though not unanimous, contains an exhaustive examination of the doctrine under consideration.

The earlier Michigan cases, above referred to, apparently bear out the mortgagor's contention. In Preston v. Young, 46 Mich. 103, 41 Am. Rep. 148, 8 N. W. 706, it was said that, where a mortgagor intentionally or deliberately puts his mortgagee in possession, the possession of the latter is rightful. This would seem to be not entirely in consonance with the earlier doctrine. In Morse v. Byam, 55 Mich. 594, 22 N. W. 54, it was ruled that, though, by statute, the mortgagee of lands is not entitled to possession until after foreclosure, this was a provision for the benefit of the mortgagor, and he is not obliged to insist upon it; and if, in mortgaging his lands, he gives a deed which in form is absolute, he thereby conveys the right to possession, and consents to the mortgagee taking possession. This is a departure from the rule theretofore announced, that the statute absolutely forbade the mortgagor from making a contract giving the right of possession to the mortgagee before foreclosure and sale.

In Byers v. Byers, 65 Mich. 598, 32 N. W. 831, which indicates a relaxing of the strict doctrine, it was said that defendant, merely as mortgagee, could not, under the statute, demand or enforce possession; but, if the mortgagor chose to put him in, the tenancy is at least good as a tenancy at will.

In Michigan Trust Co. v. Lansing Lumber Co. 103 Mich. 392, 61 N. W. 668, it was said that it had never been the policy of the Michigan laws to divest the mortgagor of possession until foreclosure and the expiration of the period of redemption; and, while the court was of opinion that it was within the power of the parties to stipulate that such possession might precede foreclosure, and in such case a court of equity may enforce specifically such an engagement, yet such power should be exercised with a full recognition of the settled policy of the state, and should not be exercised except in a case where the right is clearly given by the engagement of the parties. If the mortgagor, by special contract, may stipulate away his statutory right to retain possession until after foreclosure and sale occur and redemption is lost, it would seem a logical deduction that the right to rents and profits, which are but an incident of the right to possession, might, in like manner, be yielded up to the mortgagee.

In Kelly v. Bowerman, 113 Mich. 446, 71 N. W. 836, an assignment of rents of mortgaged property to be received by the mortgagee and applied upon the mortgage was considered valid.

In Hyman v. Kelly, 1 Nev. 179, under a statute exactly the same as that of California, the court refused to follow Guy v. Ide, and held that it did not deprive the mortgagee of any portion of the relief which is usually granted in foreclosure suits, where the sale of the property is sought; and that where, as in the case in hand, there was an allegation that the property mortgaged was insufficient to pay the mortgage debt, and the mortgagor was insolvent; and if, in addition, it appears that there was a specific pledge of the rents and profits to keep down the interest, and they were being diverted,—the case made was one for the appointment of a receiver, and the ultimate application of the rents and profits to the satisfaction of the mortgage debt. The case is an instructive one in support of the conclusion which we have reached.

In Schreiber v. Carey, 48 Wis. 208, 4 N. W. 124, the conclusion was that, under the laws of that state, the mortgagor of lands holds the legal title until foreclosure and sale; yet in a proper case, when necessary to protect the mortgagee's interests, equity will appoint a receiver of the rents and profits of the real estate mortgaged. The court comments upon the earlier Michigan and California cases, and declines to follow them; saying that it finds no courts in the country, which deny the power except in those states.

In New York which has a similar provision to ours with reference to the lien of a mortgage, it has invariably been held that a court of equity has the power to appoint a receiver of rents and profits of mortgaged premises when they are an insufficient security, and there is no other adequate remedy. Hollenbeck v. Donnell, 94 N. Y. 342; 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

MacKellar v. Rogers, 20 Jones & S. 360; Bryson v. James, 23 Jones & S. 374.

In Oregon, whose statute is exactly like ours, the supreme court, in Roberts v. Sutherlin, 4 Or. 219, held that a mortgagor might place his mortgagee in possession of the mortgaged premises, if he chose to do so, which in no wise would conflict with the rule that a mortgage is simply a security for a debt, and vests in the mortgagee no legal title in the mortgaged premises.

In Couper v. Shirley, 21 C. C. A. 288, 44 U. S. App. 586, 75 Fed. 168, in a foreclosure suit, Hawley, Justice, observed that, under the provisions of the Oregon statute, the parties to a real-estate mortgage have no power to bind the courts, independent of any equitable condition which might be shown to exist, by any stipulation contained in the mortgage for the appointment of a trustee or receiver to take charge of the rents and profits pending foreclosure. This observation implies that, if equitable conditions such as are present in this case were shown to exist, a receiver might be appointed, though not because the parties had stipulated for it. The case went off solely upon the proposition that the stipulation of the parties could not bind the court; and it was expressly said that the appointment of a receiver was not sought upon any of the established general principles of equity, which, when alleged to exist, would authorize a court of equity to appoint a receiver.

In Lowell v. Doe, 44 Minn. 144, 46 N. W. 297, the true ground upon which the appointment of a receiver to collect rents of mortgaged property for application to the reduction of the mortgage debt is stated. The court said that the exercise of this power is not based upon the ground that the legal title has passed from mortgagor to mortgagee, but upon the equitable rights of the mortgagee to have his security preserved, so that it should be adequate for the satisfaction of the mortgage debt; the court observing that this power, in fact, was exercised in favor of those who had no legal title. In Minnesota, as here, the statute expressly declared that a mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance so as to enable the mortgagee to recover possession without a foreclosure. The Minnesota court, as did the supreme court of Wisconsin, declined to follow the Michigan and California cases, and referred with approval to the New York cases and to Pasco v. Gamble, 15 Fla. 562. The opinion in the latter case is a full and able discussion of the principles involved in the pending case.

Phillips v. Eiland, 52 Miss. 721, also is authority for the appointment of a receiver of rents and profits pendente lite in a bill for a foreclosure, where the showing is that the mortgaged property is insufficient security, and the mortgagor is insolvent.

Cases from other states are to the same effect, though their statutes are different from ours. In chapter 33, §§ 1516 et seq. 5th ed. Mr. Jones in his valuable work on Mortgages, vol. 2, says that the prevailing rule in those states in which the legal title is regarded as being in the mortgagor until foreclosure is that a receiver will be appointed upon the application of the mortgagee, upon default, without reference to his legal rights, whenever sufficient equitable ground for this relief is shown, which is, in general, that the premises are an inadequate security for the debt, and the mortgagor, or other person who is liable for the debt, is unable to make good the deficiency. Additional equitable grounds are stated by the learned author, and in a note to § 1516 the author says that the practice of appointing a receiver is chiefly confined to those states where, as in Colorado, the mortgagee's right of entry upon default is taken away.

We think the prevailing rule, as stated by Jones, is the one that should be followed in this jurisdiction. In the case in hand the equities are peculiarly strong in favor of the mortgagee. In consideration of obtaining, as additional security for the mortgage debt, the rents and profits of the encumbered premises, the mortgagee released other security which he theretofore held, he relieved the heirs of any personal liability for the debt, and relinquished his adjudicated claim against the estate. The independent stipulation or agreement in the mortgage, by which the rents and profits were specifically pledged, was inserted at the request of the administrator himself, who applied for and obtained an order of the county court, to whose mandates he was amenable, for permission to mortgage the rents and profits, upon the faith of which order and agreement the mortgagee made the foregoing relinquishment of additional securities.

With the decree made by the district court both parties are dissatisfied, but we think it should be affirmed, with the modification hereinafter made. The authorities which we have followed agree that, so long as the mortgagee does not take some effectual step to regain possession, and while the mortgagor is in actual possession, the latter, and not the former, is entitled to the rents and profits. Applying that doctrine to the present case, it would seem to follow that the mortgagee's right to the rents and profits should be limited to those accruing after the filing of the suit to foreclose the mortgage, which was the first attempt by the mortgagee to gain possession and prove his rights.

The judgment of the District Court should be affirmed, with the modification that the mortgagee's right to the rents and profits should begin on the date of the filing of the suit to foreclose the mortgage, instead of May 12, 1902, the date of the foreclosure decree, and it is so ordered. Modified and affirmed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

NEW ORLEANS BASEBALL & AMUSEMENT COMPANY, LIMITED,

CITY OF NEW ORLEANS.

(118 La. —, 42 So. 784.)

Injunction—void ordinance.

1. Where property rights will be destroyed or greatly impaired, interference by criminal proceedings under a void law or ordinance may be reached and controlled by a court of equity.

Same—discrimination.

2. Where the facts alleged show injury to property rights resulting from the enactment of an ordinance excluding the erection or operation of baseball parks within certain limits, and that the ordinance was personal, arbitrary, and discriminatory in its character, and the power of the city council to enact any such ordinance as a police regulation is questionable, a proper case is disclosed for the interference of a court of equity by the process of injunction.

(January 7, 1907.)

APPLICATION by defendant for a writ of prohibition against the enforcement of an injunction restraining interference with plaintiff's use of its property as a baseball ground. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Samuel L. Gilmore and John P. Sullivan, for relator:

Land, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On November 27, 1906, the council of the city of New Orleans adopted ordinance No. 4,211, which reads as follows, to wit:

"Sec. 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to establish or operate a baseball park or parks on any of the following streets or avenues of this city, or within a radius of two squares from such streets or avenues, to wit: St. Charles avenue, Esplanade avenue, Carrollton avenue, and Canal street.

"Sec. 2. That any person or persons violating the foregoing section of this ordinance 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

nance shall be subject to a fine of not more than twenty-five dollars ($25.00), or to imprisonment for not more than thirty (30) days, or both, at the discretion of the recorder in whose jurisdiction such violation shall take place, and every day during which such baseball park or parks shall be operated in violation of this ordinance shall constitute a separate violation of the same, and shall be punishable as such."

On November 10, 1906, the New Orleans Baseball & Amusement Company, Limited, a corporation duly chartered for the purpose of establishing, operating, and maintaining a park for the playing of baseball, and to that end to acquire by purchase such property and ground as might be necessary to carry out the objects and purposes set forth in its charter, purchased a certain square of ground in the first district of the city of New Orleans, comprised within and bounded by Carrollton avenue and Banks, Palmyra, and St. James (now Pierce) streets, for the price of $40,000, with the intention to erect and operate thereon a baseball park.

On December 10, 1906, said company filed suit in the civil district court of the parish of Orleans, praying for an injunction restraining the mayor and officials of the city of New Orleans from enforcing said ordinance against the petitioner, and from interfering with petitioner in erecting and operating a baseball park on said square of ground.

The petition charged that said ordinance is illegal, null, and void for the reasons, to wit:

(1) That the council of the city of New Orleans had and has no power, right, or authority to pass said ordinance, and the same is ultra vires.

(2) That said ordinance is oppressive, unreasonable, unjust, and illegal.

(3) That said ordinance deprives petitioner of its property without due process of law, in violation of the Constitution and laws of this state, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and especially the 14th Amendment thereof.

(4) That said ordinance denies to petitioner the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the Constitution and laws of this state, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and especially the 14th Amendment thereof.

(5) That said ordinance operates an illegal discrimination against petitioner, by preventing petitioner from owning and operating a baseball park within the limits named, while others are permitted to own and operate baseball parks within said area, and are so operating the same by and with the consent and acquiescence of the said city of New Orleans.

The petition charges that said ordinance was adopted solely for the purpose of prohibiting petitioner from erecting and operating a baseball park on said square of ground, and that petitioner has been notified by the mayor of the city that said ordinance would be enforced against said company. The petition further alleges that the business of operating a baseball park is legitimate, and licensed by the city and state, and, if properly conducted, affords an innocent, harmless, and pleasant amusement to the people; and the enforcement of said ordinance will damage petitioner in many thousand dollars by deprivation of its franchise and property rights in the premises.

The district judge ordered the defendant city to show cause why the preliminary injunction should not be granted as prayed for by the plaintiff.

The city of New Orleans answered:

(1) That the court was without jurisdiction ratione materiae to issue an injunction to restrain the municipal authorities from enforcing a police ordinance penal in its nature.

(2) That plaintiff's petition discloses no cause of action.

(3) That the ordinance complained of is legal and valid.

After hearing argument of counsel, the district judge ordered the preliminary writ of injunction to issue as prayed for by the plaintiff. Defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and thereupon application was made to the supreme court for a writ of prohibition. This court ordered the district judge to show cause why the writ of prohibition applied for should not be granted. The respondent judge, for answer, avers that the civil district court was seised of jurisdiction to issue the injunction and to grant the relief prayed for by plaintiff; and makes part of his answer the record of the cause, including his written opinion assigning reasons for his action, from which we make the following extracts, to wit: "The substance of the petition is that plaintiff purchased a piece of property and proposed to erect thereon a baseball park, in which to play baseball, and thereafter the city of New Orleans, for the purpose of preventing its operating that baseball park, passed an ordinance prohibiting baseball parks in a certain area. It is alleged in the petition that other baseball parks are operated in the same area, and in the argument of counsel on this application it is admitted or stated that there are from two to three baseball parks in that same area, which had existed there for twenty-five years before the passage of this ordinance. This court has jurisdiction to preserve property rights. It makes no difference, where the court undertakes to preserve property rights, that it has to deal, in connection therewith, with criminal ordinances. Now, in passing upon this application, the allegations of the petition must be taken as true. The playing of baseball on a park, or keeping a baseball park, is not a nuisance per se. It cannot be declared a nuisance by ordinance, nor can an ordinance be passed to prevent the playing of baseball in a park in a certain area, in a park owned by certain persons, and permit certain other persons in the same area to play or continue to play the game of baseball in a park owned by them. Such an ordinance is discriminatory and personal, and, if the facts or allegations in the petition are true, it is certainly illegal, null, and void."

The writ of prohibition issues to the judge of the inferior court where the cognizance of the cause does not belong to such court, or it is not competent to decide it. Code Pr. § 846.

In the case at bar the city contends that the civil district court for the parish of Orleans is without jurisdiction to issue an injunction, when it appears that the effect of the injunction is to prohibit the enforcement of an ordinance in the nature of a police regulation; and that the question of the legality and constitutionality of such an ordinance should be left to the court in, and to the occasion upon, which the attempt is made to enforce it. It is argued that jurisdiction is vested in the recorders' courts in the city of New Orleans for the trial of offenses against city ordinances, subject to an appeal to the criminal district court for the parish of Orleans; and that the civil district court of said parish is without any criminal jurisdiction whatever. Articles 141, 139, and 133 of the Constitution of 1898. There can be no doubt, as a general proposition, that the civil district court has jurisdiction of all ordinary injunction suits against the city of New Orleans, but it is contended that such court is not competent to enjoin the enforcement of a quasi criminal ordinance, and in so doing exceeded its legitimate powers. In State ex rel. Behan v. Civil Dist. Judges, 35 La. Ann. 1075, it was pointed out that a court may have jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy, and at the same time exceed its legitimate powers in the premises, as when the court enjoined a city council from exercising its delegated power of removal of one of its officers.

In Boin v. Jennings, 107 La. 410, 31 So. 866, the plaintiff had enjoined the execution of an ordinance prohibiting the selling or giving away of spirituous liquors within the corporate limits of the town. This court held that the inferior court properly declined jurisdiction to maintain the injunction, the effect of which was to prohibit the enforcement of an ordinance in the nature of a police regulation, saying that "the question of the legality or constitutionality of such ordinance, whether as to all of its provisions, or in part, should be left to the court in which the attempt is made to enforce it, a remedy by appeal to this court being open, in such cases, to the party as against whom the attempt is made;" and citing New Orleans v. Becker, 31 La. Ann. 644; Hottinger v. New Orleans, 42 La. Ann. 629, 8 So. 575; Darcantel v. People's Slaughter-House & Refrigerating Co. 44 La. Ann. 645, 11 So. 239; State ex rel. New Orleans v. Theard, 48 La. Ann. 1449, 21 So. 28; Lecourt v. Gaster, 49 La. Ann. 487, 21 So. 646; State v. Crozier, 50 La. Ann. 247, 23 So. 288. In the case of Boin v. Jennings plaintiff alleged irreparable damage to his business of conducting a barroom. In Devon v. First Municipality, 4 La. Ann. 11, it was held that an injunction would not lie to restrain a municipal corporation from instituting suit before a justice of the peace against a party for infractions of an ordinance prohibiting the sale of groceries in the vegetable market. In Levy v. Shreveport, 27 La. Ann. 620, it was held that the plaintiff could not test the authority of the mayor to enforce the ordinance of the city prohibiting private markets, and the legality of said ordinances, by an injunction.

In Hottinger v. New Orleans, supra, the same doctrine was announced as to an ordinance changing the location of dairies; the plaintiff alleging damage to her business and property rights. The court held that the ordinance was a police regulation, in the interest of public health, with a penalty for its violation, and if it was unconstitutional, as alleged, the plaintiff could suffer no injury, as she could urge her defense in the recorder's court, and, failing there, had her remedy by appeal to the supreme court.

In all of the cases cited the ordinances sought to be enjoined were relative to matters clearly within the domain of the police power, such as the traffic in intoxicating liquors, markets, dairies, slaughterhouses, and the like. There is a line of decisions, however, to the effect that, where penal ordinances injuriously affect existing property rights, their legality or constitutionality may be inquired into by a court of equity, and their execution in a proper case enjoined.

In L'Hote v. New Orleans, 51 La. Ann. 93, 44 L.R.A. 90, 24 So. 608, this court said: "The plaintiff seeks the injunction for the protection of his rights of property, menaced, as he conceives, by an illegal ordinance. The right of the citizen to that protection is too clear to permit dispute."

The ordinance in that case was sustained as a proper exercise of the police power, yet the jurisdiction of the court to issue the injunction was affirmed. In that case the decision was bottomed on the principles announced in High on Injunctions, vol. 1, § 68, from which we make the following extracts, viz.: "So, equity will not interfere by injunction to restrain municipal officers from the prosecution of suits for the violation of city ordinances, such proceedings being of a quasi criminal nature, since equity will not interfere with the execution of the criminal law, whether pertaining to the state at large, or to municipalities, which are agents in the administration of the civil government. . . . If, however, the act concerning which an arrest or criminal prosecution is threatened affects civil property and its enjoyment, in protecting the property right, equity may properly enjoin the criminal prosecution. But in such case its interference is founded solely upon the ground of injury to property and the necessity of preserving property rights; and, where such rights are not clearly involved, the relief will be denied."

In the case of Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 49 L. ed. 169, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18, the question was thoroughly considered, and the following principles announced:

1. Municipal ordinances, and even legislative enactments, are subject to investigation by the courts, with a view of determining whether the law or ordinance is a lawful exercise of the police power, or whether, under the guise of enforcing police regulations, there has been an unwarranted and arbitrary interference with constitutional rights to carry on a lawful business, make contracts, or use and enjoy property.

2. While the right to exercise the police power is a continuing one, and a business lawful to-day may in the future become a menace to the public welfare and be required to yield to the public good, the exercise of the police power is subject to judicial review, and property rights cannot be wrongfully destroyed by arbitrary enactment.

3. Although an ordinance may be lawful on its face and apparently fair in its terms, yet, if it is enforced in such a manner as to work a discrimination against a part of the community for no lawful reason, such exercise of power will be invalidated by the courts.

4. Where property rights will be destroyed, unlawful interference by criminal proceedings under a void law or ordinance may be reached and controlled by a court of equity.

In that case the plaintiff had purchased grounds for the erection of gas works, within the prescribed limits for such plants, and had commenced the construction of the same, when the municipal authorities arbitrarily changed the limits so as to exclude such grounds and works. The court said that the allegations of the bill disclosed facts sufficient to bring the case "within the class of cases wherein the court may restrain the arbitrary and discriminatory exercise of the police power, which amounts to a taking of property without due process of law, and an impairment of property rights protected by the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution."

As the plaintiff in this case claims the protection of such amendment, the views of the Supreme Court of the United States, above enunciated, must be accepted as controlling. The case as presented by the plaintiff's petition herein need not be repeated. Suffice it to say that, taking all the allegations of the fact for true, a case is presented of a personal, discriminatory, and arbitrary ordinance, the execution of which will greatly impair the plaintiff's right of property. We have not been referred to any provision of the city charter which subjects the game of baseball as described in the petition to the police power of the municipal authorities. The playing of baseball does not injuriously affect the public health or morals, and is not a public nuisance any more than any other athletic sport. The power of the city council to enact any such ordinance may well be questioned.

It is therefore ordered that the rule issued herein be discharged, and that relator's application be dismissed, with costs.

On the subject of rights and duties in regard to the burial of the dead, see note in 14 L.R.A. 85.

Jaggard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following facts are alleged in the complaint in this action: The defendant and appellant, as a common carrier, undertook to transport a casket containing the body of the dead wife of plaintiff and respondent. In taking the casket through a named station, it became necessary to transfer the same to another of its trains. In so doing, defendant carelessly and negligently left the same out of doors upon a railroad truck, and exposed it to rain, and wilfully ignored the request of the plaintiff to place the truck under cover, so that the rain might not get into the casket and injure and destroy the same as well as mutilate the corpse. Thereby the casket was soiled and ruined, and the corpse mutilated and greatly disfigured. Plaintiff suffered great mental anguish to his damage in the sum of $1,000. From an order overruling a demurrer by the defendant, this appeal was taken.

This case is concluded by Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L.R.A. 85, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 50 N. W. 238. It was there held: The right to the possession of a dead body for the purposes of preservation and burial belongs, in the absence of any testamentary disposition, to the surviving husband or wife, or next of kin. This right is one which the law recognizes and will protect, and for any infraction of it, such as an unlawful mutilation of the remains, an action for damages will lie. In such an action a recovery may be had for injury to the feelings and mental suffering resulting directly and proximately from the wrongful act, although no actual pecuniary damage is alleged or proved. That case was followed and approved, for example, in Foley v. Phelps, 1 App. Div. 551, 37 N. Y. Supp. 471. In Koerber v. Patek, 123 Wis. 453, 68 L.R.A. 956, 102 N. W. 40, 43, Mr. Justice Dodge says of Larson v. Chase, and Foley v. Phelps, after citing them and other cases: "The first two—and especially the first—of these cases may be considered leading, as they have been cited as the basis for most of the later ones upon this immediate subject, and in many others approaching it." Later in the opinion he says: "In Larson v. Chase, supra, the remarks of Mitchell, J., on this subject (sentimental damages), are so philosophical that we cannot forbear quoting them." Scores of the cases in which Larson v. Chase has been followed and approved will be found collected in volume 2 of L.R.A. Cases as Authorities at pages 776 and 777. Modern text writers, with no known exception, recognize it as a leading authority on the subject, and as an- 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) nouncing the true principle. That this decision accords with the spirit of the earlier law on this subject is demonstrated in an article by Mr. Justice Elliott, of this court, in 16 Cent. L. J. 161; and see Perley, Mortuary Law, chap. IV. pp. 20 et seq.

No good reason is assigned for reversing that decision, or for differentiating it from the case at bar. Injury to the feelings of the family of deceased spring as naturally from disfigurement and mutilation of the body by exposure to the elements as by dissection. Nor is there any merit in the contention of the defendant that this was an action on the contract, and that therefore there could be no recovery for mental anguish because of the breach of contract. The plaintiff is right in his insistence that the present case sounded in tort. It is elementary "that a tort is a violation of legal duty and may involve as one of its elements a breach of contract." Rich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 382; Chase, Lead. Cas. on Torts, 56; and see Mykleby v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 39 Minn. 54, 38 N. W. 763; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Spirk, 51 Neb. 167, 70 N. W. 927. The complaint set forth a cause of action in quasi tort at least, for which an action ex delicto lies. 1 Jaggard, Torts, 22 et seq. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wilson, 123 Ga. 62, 51 S. E. 24, which also approves Larson v. Chase, is on all fours with the instant case. There the declaration alleged "that a widow desired to have her husband's body carried by a railroad from the place of death to the place of intended burial; that the route was over the railroad to a junction, and thence by a branch of the same road to the destination; . . . that on arrival at the junction the company's agent had the coffin and body placed on an open platform in the rain, and allowed it to remain there for several hours while waiting for the second train to arrive, and refused, on request of the wife, to have it placed where it would be protected from the weather; and that the coffin and shroud were damaged to the extent of $75 and the body was 'soaked, and otherwise mutilated.'" It was held that the declaration stated a cause of action.

Order affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

RIKCHEN WASSERMAN, Appt.,

v.

SOPHIA METZGER et al.

(105 Va. 744, 54 S. E. 893.)

Bona fide purchaser—outstanding title.

1. One to whose trustee the equity of redemption of real estate has been conveyed while the title is in trustees for a mortgagee, and who has not paid more than one sixth of the purchase money, cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser entitled to protection against an attempt to set aside a fraudulent sale under a deed of trust in the chain of title; and the fact that he assumed the outstanding mortgage is immaterial, since his undertaking will fall if the consideration falls.

Case Note.—Effect of assumption of obligation before notice of defective title to sustain the bona fide character of purchaser of real estate: —Whether the assumption by the vendee of real estate of a debt of his vendor due to a third person is sufficient consideration to make him a bona fide purchaser, in the absence of all the other elements that might deprive him of that character, depends upon whether or not, by the assumption of such debt, he has placed himself in a worse position than if he had not assumed it; that is, whether he has so obligated himself that, even if he should lose the property in question, he would still be called upon to discharge the obligation he has assumed. If he has placed himself in such position, the few authorities that can be found are unanimous in holding that he will be protected. From these decisions, however, the inference is plain that, if such purchaser receives notice of other equities before paying the obligation he has assumed, and is in such position that he can be relieved from his promise to pay the same, he will not, if he pays such obligation, be deemed a bona fide purchaser, though WASSERMAN v. METZGER seems to be the only case in which that specific result was arrived at.

Thus, in Warren v. Wilder, 114 N. Y. 209, 21 N. E. 159, a creditor was held to be a bona fide purchaser, and to take a good title as against all other creditors of his grantor, where it appeared that he purchased the real estate in question of his debtor, in good faith, for the purpose of securing himself, and, as a consideration therefor, agreed to discharge his own debt and to pay certain other debts of the grantor, which was an adequate consideration, and the creditors whom he agreed to pay consented to the arrangement; though, before paying such debts, the grantee had notice that there were still other creditors of his grantor. The court said that upon the making of the agreement by the grantee to pay such debts, and the subsequent delivery and acceptance of the deed, and the adoption of the grantee's promise by the grantor's creditors, the grantee became the principal debtor and the grantor his surety; and the grantee was legally bound as such principal to pay such creditors the amount of their claims.

And in Watkins v. Reynolds, 123 N. Y. 211, 25 N. E. 322, a vendee of land was held to be a bona fide purchaser as against the holder of an equitable mortgage of which the former had no notice, and an equitable lien was therefore denied against the land in question, in favor of the mortgagee, for the purchase money unpaid at the time of such notice, though the vendee had notice of such mortgage before he paid certain debts of the vendor assumed by him as part of the purchase price; upon the ground that such vendee had made a valid agreement by which he was bound to pay the money to other parties, and hence no longer owed it to his vendor, and that this obligation, therefore, though entered into before, remained in full force and effect after, he had notice of the mortgage.

Some authority for this principle may also be found in Citizens' Bank v. Shaw, 14 S. D. 197, 84 N. W. 779, in which it appeared that the grantees in a conveyance of land had paid part of the purchase money in cash and executed their promissory notes for another part thereof, and for the balance assumed a mortgage on the property; and in which the court, upon the ground that, in contemplation of law, the entire consideration had been paid, refused to apply the rule, which it held to be undoubted, that, if a portion of the consideration for land remained unpaid at the time the grantee had notice of a prior existing equity, so much of the consideration as remained unpaid would be applied by a court of equity to such equitable claim. The specific question raised in this case, however, was whether the owner of the equitable claim was entitled to recover the amount of the notes because of notice of his rights having been brought to the grantee before the latter paid the notes.

So, in Drey v. Doyle, 99 Mo. 459, 12 S. W. 287, in which the question was, What notice was necessary to postpone a recorded deed of real estate to a prior unrecorded lease? it was said that, where a vendee of real property paid part of the purchase money in cash, and for the balance assumed the payment of an encumbrance on the property, there was an irrevocable agreement on the part of the grantee to pay such encumbrance, "and that of itself constituted him a purchaser for value."

And in Jackson ex dem. Glover v. Winslow, 9 Cow. 13, it was held that the assumption by the grantee, in a conveyance of land, of the payment of a debt due from his grantor to a third person, was a sufficient consideration, within the registry acts, to make a mortgage of land valid as against an unrecorded deed.

when it is paid, as the result of which a fraud is committed by securing the sale of the property under it to the detriment of the security of the other notes, so as to subordinate his equities to those of one claiming an interest derived from such sale, but who has not secured the title or paid the purchase money.

Same—receipt of proceeds.

4. The receipt by the beneficiary in a deed of trust to secure notes of a portion of the proceeds of the fraudulent sale of the property will not estop him from contesting the validity of the sale if he acted without full knowledge of the facts, where no prejudice has resulted to anyone from his act.

(September 13, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant Rikchen Wasserman from a decree of the Law and Chancery Court of the City of Norfolk setting aside a sale under a trust deed of real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. White, Tunstall, & Willcox for appellants.

Messrs. Burroughs & Brother, for appellees:

The power of sale, in the trust deed, was to be exercised upon the request of Mrs. Metzger or her assigns. This request was a condition precedent to the exercise of the power. There being no such request, the sale was void. A purchaser from the trustee, the requisitions of the deed not having been complied with, does not, in equity, get a complete title.

2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 3d Am. ed. p. 72.

Buchanan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the second time this case has been to this court. Upon the former appeal, the merits of the case were not considered, but it was remanded in order that the bill might be amended bringing in a new party. 102 Va. 837, 47 S. E. 820. The material facts of the case are the same now, however, as they were then, and, briefly stated, are as follows:

By a deed dated December 10, 1892, Samuel Wasserman and wife conveyed to L. B. Allen, trustee, a house and a lot in the city of Norfolk to secure to Sophia Metzger the payment of two negotiable notes for $1,250 each, payable one and two years after date, respectively, and dated December 10, 1892. In January, 1902, one P. J. Morris, representing himself to be the owner of one of the notes secured by the deed of trust, and the National Bank of Commerce of Norfolk, claiming to be the holder of that note as collateral security for a debt due it from Morris, informed Allen, trustee, that default had been made in the payment of the note, and directed him to sell the trust subject to satisfy the debts secured. The trustee thereupon advertised and sold the property at public auction, and Morris became the purchaser at the price of $2,200, on the 21st day of January, 1902. The trustee conveyed the property to Morris by deed dated as of the day of the sale, which was acknowledged for recordation two days afterwards. On the 25th of that month Morris and wife conveyed the property to trustees to secure to the Mutual Building & Loan Association of the City of Norfolk the payment of $2,000, which Morris had borrowed from it. On the 30th day of the next month Morris and wife conveyed the property to David Kalberman, as trustee for Mrs. Rikchen Wasserman, the wife of Samuel Wasserman (but who was divorced from him soon afterwards), at the price of $2,400, the grantee in the deed assuming the payment of the debt due the Building & Loan Association secured upon the property. After deducting the costs and expenses of the sale made by Allen, trustee, to Morris, the trustee paid one half of the proceeds of the sale upon the note which Morris and the Commercial Bank claimed to be the owner and holder of, as before described, and notified Mrs. Metzger, the payee and holder of the other note, that he had a sum of money in his hands to be paid upon that note. A few days afterward the agent of Mrs. Metzger, who seems to be quite an old woman, called upon the trustee, pursuant to the notice. The agent denied any knowledge of the sale made by the trustee, stated that the note held by the parties who had directed the trustee to make sale of the house and lot had been paid, and that his mother held the other note, which was still due and unpaid, and declined to receive the money in the hands of the trustee. Subsequently, he did receive and credit it upon the note held by his mother, but at the time he received the money he did not have knowledge of all the facts, nor had he or his mother taken the advice of counsel at that time. The note claimed by Morris and the bank had been paid five years or more before the sale by the trustee, and had been delivered by the payee or her agent to Samuel Wasserman, the maker. Mrs. Metzger, who lived in the city of Norfolk, had no notice of the sale made by the trustee, and gave him no direction to sell. Mrs. Wasserman, the vendee of Morris, and the present holder of the house and lot, had no actual notice of the fraud of Morris (who was in collusion with Samuel Wasserman) in claiming the note and causing the property to be sold by the trustee, nor that the sale made by Allen, trustee, was not made in accordance with the terms of the trust.

Upon a hearing of the cause, the trial court held that the sale of the trustee and the conveyances subsequent thereto were null and void as to the plaintiff, Mrs. Metzger, and declared that she had a valid and subsisting lien upon the house and lot for the residue of the debt, and decreed its enforcement. From that decree, Mrs. Wasserman and her trustee alone appealed. The question we are to determine, therefore, is whether or not there is any error in that decree to their prejudice.

One of the grounds upon which it is insisted that the decree is erroneous is that Mrs. Wasserman was a purchaser for value and without notice of the fraud or irregularities in the sale made by the trustee. If she were a complete purchaser, it may be that she would be entitled to the protection which she claims; but upon that question I express no opinion, as I do not think it is involved in this appeal. Upon the facts of this case, I do not think that Mrs. Wasserman is a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice. Neither she nor her trustee has the legal title, nor has she paid the purchase money.

As a general rule, in order for a vendee to be protected as a purchaser for valuable consideration and without notice, he must have received a conveyance and paid the whole of the purchase money before notice of the defect in his title. But there is a qualification of that general doctrine, viz., "that, where the first purchaser has not the legal title, and the subsequent one has paid his money, and has not received the legal title, but the best right to call for the legal title, before he receives notice, he shall be entitled to priority, notwithstanding he has not actually acquired such title." 2 Minor, Inst. 1st ed. 1029, 1030; Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Stone, 3 Leigh, 218, 236; Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh, 365, 23 Am. Dec. 280; Cox v. Romine, 9 Gratt. 27, 29; Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147.

It is true, as insisted, that Judge Christian, in his opinion in Preston v. Nash, 75 Va. 949, 956, 957, does state that he was of opinion that "a complete purchaser is one who has paid the purchase money, and who, though he has not received a conveyance of the legal title, is entitled to call for it." But that opinion was not the opinion of the court, though erroneously so stated in the report of the case in 75 Va. 949. The case was afterwards directed to be reported again (76 Va. 1, 11) so as to correct that mistake. Judge Moncure did not sit in the case; Judge Anderson concurred in Judge Christian's opinion; Judges Staples and Burks concurred in the result, but not in the reasoning of Judge Christian, and based their conclusion upon the doctrine of equitable estoppel. The view expressed by Judge Christian as to what will constitute a complete purchaser, is not only contrary to the decisions of this court, above cited, but is in conflict with the maxim which prevails in equity as well as at law, that he who is prior in time is prior in law,—that, where two equities are equal, the prior equity shall prevail. For, if the mere fact that a subsequent purchaser has paid his purchase money and has the right to call for the legal title makes him a complete purchaser and entitles him to the protection which complete purchasers receive at the hands of a court of equity, the fact that another has an equal or superior equity, prior in point of time, will be of no avail.

In no view of this case can Mrs. Wasserman be regarded as a complete purchaser. It does not appear that she has ever paid more than one sixth of the price which she agreed to pay. It is true that in Morris's deed to her she assumed the payment of the debt due the Building & Loan Association. But she has not paid that sum, nor is she bound to pay it, if the consideration for her undertaking to pay fails. The only ground upon which the Building & Loan Association can hold Mrs. Wasserman liable for its debt is that of equitable subrogation. She made no contract with the association, nor did it furnish any consideration for her assumpsit. As was said by Judge Staples in Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va. 392, 401, 402: "Where the grantee of lands assumes the payment of a mortgage thereon, as between himself and grantor he becomes in equity the personal debtor and the grantor the surety, and the latter may insist that the grantee shall pay the debt for his relief and protection. The creditor, upon familiar principles, may claim the benefit of all the collateral securities held by his debtor, by way of equitable subrogation. In doing so, however, he stands in his debtor's shoes, and is substituted to the rights and remedies of the latter, but nothing more. In other words, the new creditor takes the place of the old one and succeeds to his rights." Osborne v. Cabell, 77 Va. 462, 463.

As between Mrs. Wasserman and Morris, if the consideration for her undertaking fails, and she does not obtain what she purchased, Morris could not compel her to pay the Mutual Building Association debt. And, as that association stands in his shoes, and has no greater rights against her than Morris had, it cannot compel her to pay. Mrs. Wasserman, not having paid that debt, is for the purposes of this case in no worse condition, than if she had not assumed to pay, because she can be fully protected against the debt assumed if she loses the house and lot.

Actual payment of the purchase money is required in order to constitute a vendee a complete purchaser, as a general rule. Lamar v. Hale, supra; 2 Minor, Inst. 1029, 1030. Giving security for its payment—not even the giving of negotiable notes—is not sufficient, unless the parties are so circumstanced that a court of equity cannot prevent their enforcement. 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 489, 490; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 751.

Mrs. Wasserman was therefore not a complete purchaser, but the purchaser of a mere equity which had not been paid for, and she had no right to call for the legal title when she received notice of the fraud of Morris and the irregularity in the trustee's sale. A payment after notice would give her no right to call for the legal title, for whatever she does to perfect her title after notice is done mala fides and does not avail. 2 Minor, Inst. 1029–1031, and cases cited.

The general rule is that the purchaser of a mere equitable title must take the place of the person from whom he purchases. He stands in his vendor's shoes. He gets the title of his vendor and nothing more. Yancey v. Mauck, 15 Gratt. 300, 306; Briscoe v. Ashby, 24 Gratt. 454, 475, and cases cited; Evans Bros. v. Roanoke Sav. Bank, 95 Va. 303, 304, 28 S. E. 323; Sands v. Stagg, 105 Va. 444, 52 S. E. 633. See also 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 756. The principle underlying this doctrine is stated as follows, in Briscoe v. Ashby, supra: "The reason of the distinction between the purchaser of a legal and an equitable interest seems to be that the protection accorded to bona fide purchasers is a departure from the general rule of jurisprudence, which holds that no man can transfer a greater right than he possesses, and regards the vendee as standing in the same position as the vendor under whom he claims. This exception was made by equity against the rights and remedies which it had called into being, and in favor of purchasers who bought in good faith and under the impression that they were acquiring a good legal title. But when the purchase is of a mere equity which owes its existence to a court of chancery and cannot be enforced without its assistance, the reasons for departing from the general maxim, Nemo plus juris in alium transferre potest quam ipse habet, is at an end, and the right acquired by the vendee is necessarily limited to that of the vendor. When, therefore, a purchaser buys an equitable estate or interest with a knowledge of its real character, and without obtaining a legal title, he can found no claim on the mere fact of the purchase and must stand or fall by the title of the vendor. 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 95, and cases there cited. So, it was declared in the most unequivocal manner by Chief Justice Marshall, in Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 34-48, 3 L. ed. 260-265, that the purchaser of an equitable title takes it subject to all existing equities. . . . In Chew v. Barnett, 11 Serg. & R. 389, Chief Justice Gibson said: "When it is asserted that a purchaser for valuable consideration takes the title free of every trust or equity of which he has no notice, it is intended of a title perfect on its face; for every purchaser of an imperfect title takes it with all its imperfections on its head. It is his own fault that he confides in a title which appears defective to his own eyes, and he does so at his peril. Now, every equitable title is incomplete on its face. It is in truth nothing more than a title to go into chancery to have the legal estate conveyed and therefore every purchaser of a mere equity takes it subject to every clog that may lie on it, whether he has had notice or not."

This language of Chief Justice Gibson in Chew v. Barnett was again quoted approvingly by this court in Evans Bros. v. Roanoke Sav. Bank, supra.

If the contest here was between Morris and Mrs. Metzger alone, there would be no question of her right to have the trustee's sale set aside, for the sale was not only made in violation of the terms of the trust, which of itself would be sufficient to justify the court in setting the sale aside at which he became the purchaser (Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 358, 8 Am. Dec. 746; Harris v. Harris, 6 Munf. 367; Pownal v. Taylor, 10 Leigh, 172, 34 Am. Dec. 725; Norman v. Hill, 2 Patton & H. [Va.] 676; Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 93 Va. 315, 25 S. E. 232; Preston v. Johnson, 105 Va. 238, 53 S. E. 1; Shears v. Traders' Bldg. Asso. [W. Va.] 52 S. E. 860), but he was also a party to the fraud by which the trust sale was procured to be made. Mrs. Wasserman, standing in his shoes, as under the authorities quoted she clearly does, can, under the facts of this case, make no defense as against Mrs. Metzger that he cannot make. The fact that she had no notice of the irregularity in the sale or of Morris's fraud is wholly immaterial, as she acquired only such rights in the property as he had; for, as already shown, the purchaser of a mere equitable title takes it subject to all prior equities, and this, too, without regard to the question whether he had notice of them or not, where the holder of the prior equity was not required to and could not give notice of it under the registry law. Briscoe v. Ashby, supra, and authorities cited; Yancey v. Mauck, supra.

While, as was said by Judge Carr in Dos- 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) well v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh, 365, 382, 23 Am. Dec. 280, "the plea of purchaser for value without notice, if sustained, is a perfect defense, and that against such purchaser equity will not take the slightest step, not even to perpetuate evidence against him or to take from him any advantage the law gives him. . . . But it is equally clear that this plea is a complete defense or no defense at all,"—unless the purchaser can bring himself within the protection of § 2472 of the Code of 1904, which provides that, although a subsequent purchaser is not a complete purchaser, "as against any person claiming under a deed or other writing which shall not have been admitted to record before payment by a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration of the whole or a part of his purchase money, such subsequent purchaser, notwithstanding such deed or other writing be admitted to record before he becomes a complete purchaser, shall in equity have a lien on the property purchased by him for so much of his purchase money as he may have paid before notice."

It is insisted that Mrs. Metzger's equity, although prior in time to that of Mrs. Wasserman, is inferior to it because Mrs. Metzger surrendered the note held by her against Louis Wasserman when it was satisfied without marking it paid, and thus enabled him, in collusion with Morris, to perpetrate the fraud which resulted in the sale to Mrs. Wasserman without fault on her part. The payee in the note had the right to it when paid, and it was not negligence in her not to mark it satisfied to prevent the owner of it from perpetrating a fraud upon someone by the use of his own property,—an act which no one would anticipate, and which could not be done without the collusion of another. Certainly her failure to mark it satisfied, if negligence at all, was not such negligence as will deprive her of her prior equity. In discussing the question, Mr. Pomeroy says: "The rule extends to gross negligence, which is tantamount in its effects to fraud. An equity otherwise equal, or even prior in point of time, may, through the gross laches of its holder, be postponed to a subsequent interest which another person was enabled to acquire by means of such negligence. To admit the operation of this rule in either of its phases, and to displace the otherwise natural order of priority, there must be intentional deceit,—that is, intentional misrepresentation or suppression of the truth,—or else gross negligence. In the one case, the party possessing the claim which it is sought to postpone must both know of his own right and also of the other person's intention to acquire, or of his acts in acquiring, an interest in the same subject-matter. In the other case there must be gross laches, for mere carelessness or ordinary negligence will not suffice according to the weight of modern authority." [2 Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 687.]

In the note to Bassett v. Nosworthy, vol. 2, pt. 1, White & Tudor's Lead. Cas. in Eq. 4th Am. ed. 54, it is said: "It should nevertheless be remembered that a rule by which one is precluded from asserting a right which is indisputably his own, operates as a forfeiture, and should not be enforced, unless he has been guilty of the gross negligence which, if not conclusive, prepares the way for fraud. Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. Jr. 190; Plumb v. Fluitt, 2 Anstr. 432; Colyer v. Finch, 19 Beav. 500, 5 H. L. Cas. 905. A man may fall short of the care which a large experience of life and business would suggest without being responsible to third persons for a loss which they might have avoided if he had been more cautious;" citing, among other cases, Biddle v. Bayard, 13 Pa. 150. In that case the plaintiff lost a pocketbook containing a negotiable certificate of stock indorsed in blank. The certificate was purchased by the defendant from a third person and without notice that the vendor had no title. The plaintiff brought trover, and it was contended for the defense that the plaintiff should have indorsed the instrument to his own order; that, by carrying it about with him indorsed in blank, he had enabled the finder to mislead the defendant, and should consequently bear the resulting loss. This argument was overruled and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

The action of Mrs. Metzger in receiving a portion of the proceeds of the trust sale cannot, under the facts and circumstances of the case, be regarded as a ratification of the sale made by the trustee; nor does it estop her from objecting to the validity of the sale. When she received the money she was not fully informed of all the facts connected with the sale (Smith v. Miller, 98 Va. 535, 541, 542, 37 S. E. 10), and no prejudice has resulted to anyone by reason of her receiving the money which was paid her. Smith v. Powell, 98 Va. 431, 36 S. E. 522. Prior to that time the trustee had conveyed the property to Morris, Morris had executed the deed of trust to secure the Building & Loan Association the payment of the money loaned him, and Mrs. Wasserman had purchased the equity of redemption in the property from Morris, assumed the payment of the Building & Loan Association debt, and had paid the residue of the purchase price in cash. The only effect of Mrs. Metzger's refusal to receive the money paid her by the trustee would have been to leave it in his hands until after the controversy in this case was settled.

I am of opinion that there is no error in the decree complained of to the prejudice of the appellants, and that it should be affirmed.

Cardwell, J., dissenting:

I am constrained to adhere to a view of this case entirely opposed to that taken by the majority of the court, and shall review the case as presented in the petition for the appeal and as argued by counsel here.

The case was formerly before this court, at which time the court, without passing upon the merits of the case, decided that the court below should have directed the complainant to amend her bill so as to make the National Bank of Commerce a party defendant. 102 Va. 837, 47 S. E. 820. When the case went back, the bill was so amended and the bank made a party. It answered, stating its connection with the note in question, which it had at one time held as collateral; denied knowledge of the fraud alleged, or that it received any part of the proceeds of the sale made by L. B. Allen, trustee. Depositions were taken, the case reheard, and on February 25, 1905, the court held that there was no liability on the bank, and as to other parties made the same decree which was entered at the previous hearing. From this decree the case is again before us on appeal, but no error is assigned to the decree so far as it decides that there is no liability on the bank, and therefore the case upon its merits is the same as to the parties concerned, other than the bank, that it was on the former appeal.

It will be necessary to restate the principal facts of the case, which may be summarized as follows:

By deed bearing date on the 10th day of December, 1892, Samuel Wasserman and wife conveyed to L. B. Allen, as trustee, certain real estate in Norfolk, Virginia, in trust to secure to appellee, Sophia Metzger, two negotiable notes of even date with the deed, each for the principal sum of $1,250, and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent per annum from December 26, 1892, and payable, respectively, one and two years after date.

By deed dated March 20, 1893, the said Samuel Wasserman and wife conveyed the property to Louis Wasserman for certain considerations, part of which was the assumption by Louis Wasserman of the payment of the above-mentioned notes.

In January, 1902, one P. J. Morris, representing himself to be the holder of one of the above-mentioned notes, and the president of the National Bank of Commerce, representing that this note was held by it as collateral for an indebtedness of P. J. Morris to the bank, informed L. B. Allen as trustee in the deed of December 10, 1892, that default had been made in the payment of the said note, and directed him to sell the property under said deed of trust, as thereby required, to satisfy the debts secured.

The trustee, L. B. Allen, having satisfied himself that the conditions had arisen under which he was required to execute the trust, advertised the property for sale, as required by the deed, for at least ten days in the Norfolk Landmark, a newspaper of large circulation, printed in the city of Norfolk, and pursuant to said advertisement, on the 21st day of January, 1902, at the Real Estate & Stock Exchange of Norfolk, sold the property at public auction to the said P. J. Morris for $2,200 cash. He accordingly conveyed the property to P. J. Morris by deed bearing date the 21st day of January, 1902, and acknowledged on the 23d day of January, 1902.

In this deed the trustee made the following recital: "And whereas the said S. Wasserman having made default in the payment of said notes, the holder thereof had directed that the said property be sold by said trustee, as provided by said deed."

The "said notes" referred to in this recital were identified by the previous recital in the deed as the notes secured by the said deed of trust.

By deed bearing date the 25th day of January, 1902, P. J. Morris and wife conveyed the property to certain trustees, to secure to the Mutual Building Association of Norfolk, $2,000 money borrowed. By deed bearing date the 30th day of January, 1902, P. J. Morris and wife sold and conveyed the property to David Kalberman, as trustee for Rikchen Wasserman, for $2,400; she assuming as part of the purchase money the above-mentioned lien of $2,000. Mrs. Wasserman fully complied with the terms of her purchase, and her deed went to record on the 31st day of January, 1902.

The bill filed by Mrs. Metzger claims that she was the holder of one of the notes secured by the deed of trust to Allen, trustee; that she had received from the trustee on the note only $995.47, leaving a balance due as of February 20, 1902, of $334.93; that the note which P. J. Morris and the National Bank of Commerce represented themselves as holding had in fact been paid long before the trustee, Allen, had been requested by them to sell; that she knew nothing of the sale, which was therefore void as to her; and praying that the series of deeds above mentioned since the trust deed of December 10, 1892, be set aside, and the property subjected to pay the balance due her.

The decree appealed from grants the prayer of the bill; that is to say, it sets aside as null and void all deeds made conveying the property in question since the deed to Allen, trustee, December 10, 1892, and subjects the property to the payment of the balance claimed by Mrs. Metzger as being due to her on the second note secured by said deed of trust.

The proof in the cause discloses that Mrs. Metzger has been continuously living in Norfolk since the deed to Allen, trustee, was made, as were her grown sons (who were business men), all during the period the property was being advertised by the trustee for sale and at the time it was sold; she did not, however, go upon the witness stand to prove she knew nothing about the sale or the advertisement. It is practically conceded that the note held by Morris had been paid prior to the direction to the trustee to sell the property; but it clearly appears from the proof that Mrs. Wasserman, the purchaser of the property from Morris, had no notice or knowledge whatever of this fact, and, before receiving such notice, she had purchased for a valuable consideration, and had practically paid the entire purchase money, and received a conveyance of the property. It further appears that while Mrs. Wasserman had been the wife of Samuel Wasserman, who doubtless participated in the fraud perpetrated by Morris when he caused the property to be advertised and sold by Allen, trustee, she had lived apart from him for many years, and finally, and before any of the transactions connected with the sale and purchase of this property, had secured from him an absolute divorce. There is not the slightest evidence in the record that Mrs. Wasserman had actual notice of the fraud and wrongdoing complained of in this case; and, as expressly found by the lower court as a fact, "Mrs. Wasserman had no actual notice of the fraud of Morris and Sam Wasserman, nor of the irregularity of the sale." She had employed counsel to examine the title, and counsel employed, after investigation, reported to her in favor of the title, and she thereupon consummated the transaction.

It will be observed, therefore, that the fraud complained of is that the note on which the direction to Allen, trustee, to sell had been given, had in reality been paid; and the fact that the sale was made pursuant to the request of a holder of a paid note is the irregularity relied on by the complainants in the court below. It will also be observed that Mrs. Wasserman was not the purchaser from the trustee, but was the purchaser from that purchaser. Were the controversy here between Mrs. Metzger and P. J. Morris, the purchaser from the trustee, it would be of easy solution, since the fraud of Morris is made so apparent that he would have no standing whatever in a court of equity. The question, therefore, to be determined is, whether a purchaser from a purchaser who bought at a trustee's sale has constructive notice that the recitals made by the trustee in his deed to the purchaser are false. The court below practically held such to be the case; and this is the only error assigned for a reversal of the decree appealed from.

Upon the face of the deed from Allen, trustee, to Morris, there is nothing whatever to suggest irregularity in the sale by the trustee, or anything to suggest to a purchaser from Morris that the recitals made by the trustee in his deed were false. We therefore have a case where the purchaser from a purchaser at a trustee's sale is a purchaser for value and without actual notice of fraud or irregularity in the sale made by the trustee. It is a case of the highest importance to the security of titles in this state, and requires the gravest consideration at the hands of the court.

It has been the law in this state since the case of Taylor v. King, 6 Munf. 365, 8 Am. Dec. 746, that a trustee in a deed to secure debts does not exercise a mere "naked power," and that a deed of such a trustee passes the legal title, even though made in violation of the trust. The opinion in that case, decided in 1819, says: "With respect to the deed in this case, it is not at this day to be questioned that the deed of a trustee conveys a legal title. The trustee himself takes a legal, though defeasible, title; and that title became absolute in his vendee by the deed in a court of law. We are also of opinion that in a court of law the vendee need not show that the conditions of the trust deed have been complied with." See also Underwood v. McVeigh, 23 Gratt. 409; Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 93 Va. 315, 25 S. E. 232, and authorities there cited.

The case is, however, different with respect to title attempted to be made by a person clothed with a mere "naked power," not coupled with an interest, for in such a case it is necessary for the person claiming the title to establish the fact that every requisite to the exercise of the power preceded it. Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 601; Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, supra.

In the first class of cases mentioned—that of a title made by a trustee in a deed of trust to secure debts—a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of the breach of the trust is protected; while in the last class mentioned—that of a sale under a "naked power"—such a purchaser is not protected.

legal title passes by deed of the trustee, and hence the title of the purchaser is perfect at law; but it is contended that this principle does not govern in a court of equity, and it has been so held in cases where the title of the purchaser from a trustee was called in question. To this effect are the cases of Norman v. Hill, 2 Patton & H. (Va.) 676; Brown v. Lambert, 33 Gratt. 256; Loving v. Ashlin, 76 Va. 911.

But that is not the case here. As remarked, if the controversy was between Mrs. Metzger and Morris, it would be proper to set aside the conveyance obtained by Morris from Allen, trustee, because, if for no other reason, of the fraud of Morris. But the controversy here involves the right of Mrs. Wasserman to the property, who was in no way connected with, or had knowledge of, the fraud of Morris.

If it were conceded that a purchaser from a trustee clothed with not merely a "naked power" to sell, but an absolute power, because coupled with an interest, must see to it that all of the prerequisites to the exercise of the power have been complied with, is this rule to be applied to a purchaser from a purchaser from the trustee? And if so, would not the rule have to be extended to a purchaser of the same property, however far he may, by intervening conveyances, be removed from the original purchaser from the trustee? Were such the established rule of law, it will be seen that our registry acts would be of little avail.

In Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, supra, it was held that a trustee clothed only with a naked power, not coupled with an interest and therefore not absolute but conditional, would not by his deed invest a purchaser from him with title unless the conditions existed upon which a sale was authorized, and the sale made in accordance with the trust; that the burden of proving these facts was upon the party claiming under the deed, and the recitals in the deed, unless made so by statute, were not prima facie evidence of the existence of such facts. There is nothing, however, in the opinion that can be construed as extending the rule to a deed from a trustee clothed with absolute, not conditional, power to sell; and the only inference to be drawn from the opinion is, that where this power is in the trustee his deed invests a purchaser from him with title, and the recitals in the deed that the prerequisites to the exercise of the power preceded it were to be considered as prima facie evidence of the existence of such facts. It is now so declared by statute, passed February 10, 1898 (Acts 1897-98, chap. 293, p. 322), and amended March 7, 1900 (Acts 1899, 1900, chap. 1145, p. 1247; Code 1904, § 3333a, p. 1760), and the rule is made applicable to all deeds made in the execution of a deed of trust, mortgage, or any judicial proceeding theretofore or thereafter made. I am not unmindful of the well-settled principles relied on by appellee, Mrs. Metzger, stated at page 508, 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, and sustained in Wood v. Krebbs, 30 Gratt. 714, Long v. Weller, 29 Gratt. 347, and other cases that might be cited, that a purchaser of real estate must look to the title papers under which he buys, and is charged with notice of all the facts appearing upon their face, or to the knowledge of which anything there will conduct him; that he has no right to shut his eyes and his ears to the inlet of information, and then say he is a bona fide purchaser without notice; and whenever inquiry is a duty, the party bound to make it is affected with knowledge of all which he would have discovered had he performed the duty. But the binding force of the principles maintained by these authorities is to be measured by the facts and circumstances of the particular case to which it is sought to apply the principles.

It is said by the court below, in its opinion made a part of the record, that although Mrs. Wasserman "had no actual notice of the failure of Mrs. Metzger to direct Allen to sell, she had constructive notice of the trust to Allen and of all of its provisions, by reason of such constructive notice she knew that Allen could not sell without Mrs. Metzger's direction, and it was her duty to ascertain by inquiry if such direction had been given." In this view I cannot concur, and do not think that the authorities cited in support of it sustain the view. They are the authorities to which I have just adverted. If the view be correct as to Mrs. Wasserman, the rule must be applied to a purchaser of property once conveyed by a trustee, no matter how far removed from the immediate purchaser from the trustee, and when it would be impossible for him to obtain the information that it is held that Mrs. Wasserman should have obtained before taking her conveyance from Morris. Such a rule, it seems to me, would be attended with baleful consequences to purchasers of real estate in this state.

There is nothing whatever upon the face of the deed from Allen, trustee, to Morris, to suggest inquiry as to the validity of the title it conveyed; but let us, for the sake of the argument, admit that it became Mrs. Wasserman's duty to inquire if the prerequisites of the power in Allen to sell the property preceded the exercise of the power. Of whom was she to make the inquiry? Surely the inquiry was first to be made of Allen, the trustee; and can it be doubted that he would have told her that the recitals of his deed to Morris were correct? 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Should she then have doubted Allen's statement and inquired further, and, if so, of whom? Had she inquired of Morris, doubtless he would have told her the same that Allen did, and perhaps have shown her the note in question either in his possession or Allen's, past due, and not marked paid, in the condition it was in by reason of the failure of Mrs. Metzger to so mark it when she delivered it to Sam Wasserman or to someone for him.

In Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 602, the opinion by Moncure, P., says: "A bona fide purchaser without notice, from one clothed with a mere power of sale, but who, in making the sale and conveyance, has pursued the terms of the power, is entitled to the same advantage and protection with such a purchaser from a trustee invested with the legal title." That case is clearly authority for the position that a bona fide purchaser from the trustee invested with a legal title, and with an absolute power to sell, would be protected, even though the trustee did not pursue the terms of his power; and this on the principle that the plaintiff who seeks to upset the title must resort to equity to do so, and equity will withhold its hand whenever the defendant has equal equity, and will permit the law to prevail. A court of equity will not disarm a bona fide purchaser for value of his legal estate in favor of one who has a prior equity in point of time.

In Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. ed. 162, Marshall, Ch. J., says: "If a suit be brought to set aside a conveyance obtained by fraud, and the fraud be clearly proved, the conveyance will be set aside as between the parties; but the rights of third persons, who are purchasers without notice, for a valuable consideration, cannot be disregarded. Titles which according to every legal test are perfect are acquired with that confidence which is inspired by the opinion that the purchaser is safe. If there be any concealed defect, arising from the conduct of those who had held the property long before he acquired it, of which he had no notice, that concealed defect cannot be set up against him. He has paid his money for a title good at law; he is innocent, whatever may be the guilt of others, and equity will not subject him to the penalties attached to that guilt. All titles would be insecure, and the intercourse between man and man would be very seriously obstructed, if this principle be overturned." See also Snyder v. Grandstaff, 90 Va. 477, 70 Am. St. Rep. 863, 31 S. E. 647.

In Siter v. McClanachan, 2 Gratt. 280, the opinion says: "The doctrine that whatever puts a party upon inquiry amounts to notice is inapplicable to the provisions of the statute in regard both to registered and unregistered conveyances. The registry is not intended to put subsequent purchasers and encumbrancers upon inquiry, but to put an end to the necessity of all inquiry. It is notice in point of law to all persons of the contents, import, and legal effect of the registered instrument; but not of other matters connected with the subject, not apparent upon the face of the instrument. The statute contrasts this notice in point of law, . . . with notice in point of fact of any title or claim not disclosed by a registered instrument. The notice in point of fact must be such as to affect the conscience of the subsequent purchaser or encumbrancer. It may be either actual,—in other words direct and positive,—or it may be circumstantial and presumptive. But it is not sufficient if it merely puts the party upon inquiry. It must be so strong and clear as to fix upon him the imputation of mala fides. Dey v. Dunham, 2 Johns. Ch. 182."

"It is not enough that an overprudent and cautious person, if his attention had been called to the circumstance in question, would have been likely to seek an explanation of it. There must be some clear neglect to inquire, after actual notice that the title is in some way defective, or some fraudulent and wilful blindness, as distinguished from mere want of caution." Briggs v. Rice, 130 Mass. 50; Grundies v. Reid, 107 Ill. 304; Woodworth v. Paige, 5 Ohio St. 70.

The reasoning of the learned judge below in his written opinion, and of the argument here for Mrs. Metzger, is, that the deed of trust to Allen was a part of the record title; and, as it provided that he was to sell when directed by a holder of one of the notes secured, this put upon any person who dealt with the property at any time within the period of the statute of limitations on inquiry, and, if the trustee committed a technical breach of his trust, although misled by fraud, any person dealing with the property within the period mentioned has constructive notice of the breach, and must bear its consequences. This proposition clearly denies the whole doctrine of innocent purchaser for value, as applied to the acts in pais of such a trustee, and according to it every such purchaser must be affected with constructive notice of the breach of the trust. No distinction is made in the argument for that proposition between a purchaser from the trustee and derivative purchasers; so that any purchaser of the property within the period of the statute must, at his own peril, inquire into and establish the fact, not by prima facie, but by conclusive, proof, that everything mentioned in the deed as a direction to the trustee has in fact been followed. Of the two classes of requirements made by deeds to secure the payment of a debt, one calls for acts on the part of the trustee which necessarily involve public notoriety, such as advertising in a prescribed way and for a prescribed time, and that the sale shall be on certain terms of cash or credit. The other class embraces acts that do not involve notoriety, are essentially private in their nature, and cannot be inquired into and ascertained, if at all, without the greatest inconvenience in many instances, among which is whether the holder of the debt has actually directed the sale to be made. As to the first class of requirements, there seems to be nothing unreasonable in holding, as was held in the recent case of Preston v. Johnson, 105 Va. 238, 53 S. E. 1, and other cases, that the purchaser at the trustee's sale has constructive notice of these requirements, and must see that the advertisement of the sale at which he is bidding conforms to the requirements of the deed, and that the terms of sale are those prescribed by the deed; and there is no hardship to him, nor inconvenience to the public interest, in requiring this simple act of reasonable prudence on his part, the neglect of which would be gross negligence. But these cases go no farther than that, and are certainly not authority for the proposition that a subsequent purchaser of the property is to be charged with constructive notice that the creditor secured had not directed the trustee to make the sale he made, or that the debt secured had in fact been paid.

The authorities do not hold it sufficient to affect a person with constructive notice that he might have acquired the information, but that he ought to have acquired it, and would have done so but for gross negligence on his part.

Says the opinion in Wilson v. Wall, 6 Wall. 90, 18 L. ed. 730: "A chancellor will not be astute to charge a constructive trust upon one who has acted honestly and paid a full and fair consideration without notice or knowledge. On this point, we need only to refer to Sugden on Vendors [page 622], where he says: 'In Ware v. Egmont, 4 DeG. M. & G. 473, Lord Chancellor Cranworth expressed his entire concurrence in what, on many occasions of late years, had fallen from judges of great eminence on the subject of constructive notice, namely, that it was highly inexpedient for courts of equity to extend the doctrine. When a person has not actual notice, he ought not to be treated as if he had notice unless the circumstances are such as enable the court to say not only that he might have acquired, but also that he ought to have acquired it, but for his gross negligence in the conduct of the business in question. The question, then, when it is sought to affect a purchaser with constructive notice, is not whether he had the means of obtaining, and might by prudent caution have obtained, the knowledge in question, but whether not obtaining was an act of gross or culpable negligence."

It is, of course, not to be lost sight of that "means of knowledge, with the duty of using them, are in equity equivalent to knowledge itself." But means of knowledge are not sufficient. There must, in addition, be the duty of using them.

This court has often declared the principle, as to what is required to make it the duty of a person to use his means of knowledge to ferret out undisclosed facts, to be that the person must have "knowledge of facts and circumstances which are naturally calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary care and prudence." Fischer v. Lee, 98 Va. 163, 35 S. E. 441, and authorities cited.

In Williams v. Jackson, 107 U. S. 482, 27 L. ed. 530, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 814, there were two deeds of trust to secure debts. The first gave to the trustees power to release the land on payment of the notes secured, but the payment of the notes was a condition precedent to their power to release. The notes were assigned to a third party by the payee, and, after this was done, the original payee and the trustees united in a release deed. Being assured that the record was clear as to the title of the property which was conveyed in the first deed and which he purposed to loan money upon, Williams loaned the money, taking the second deed upon the property to secure the loan. He had no actual knowledge of the facts connected with the release of the first deed, and the question was whether he had constructive notice, or was entitled to the position of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The opinion of the court, citing a number of authorities to sustain the conclusion reached, says: "To charge Williams with constructive notice of the fact that the notes [secured by first deed] had not been paid, in the absence of any proof of knowledge, fraud, or gross or wilful negligence on his part, would be inconsistent with the purpose of the registry laws, with the settled principles of equity, and with the convenient transaction of business. . . . The equity of Williams being at least equal with that of the plaintiffs, the legal title held for Williams must prevail, and he is entitled to priority."

That case is quoted from and approved in Evans Bros. v. Roanoke Sav. Bank, 95 Va. 301, 28 S. E. 323, where there was a release by a marginal entry on the deed book by the original payee of notes secured by a first deed of trust after the transfer of the notes and before they were paid. The question was between the innocent transferee of these notes and an innocent lender of money upon the faith of the record, taking in good faith a trust deed upon the property to secure the money loaned. Held, that the trustee in this second deed obtained the legal title for the benefit of the lender of the money secured, and the lender had a right to rely upon the public record as to the title to the property conveyed; that to charge him with constructive notice that the notes secured by the first deed of trust had not been paid, in the absence of any proof of knowledge, fraud, or wilful negligence on his part, would be inconsistent with the purpose of the registry laws, with the settled principles of equity, and with the convenient transaction of business.

Since it is conceded in the case at bar that Mrs. Wasserman had no actual knowledge of the failure of Mrs. Metzger to direct Allen to sell, or that her first note had been paid; and especially in view of the fact that both notes secured by the deed to Allen were long past due,—what was said in the cases just adverted to applies with equal force to this case. The deed from Allen did not give Mrs. Wasserman notice that the note in question was paid; on the contrary, it advised her that the note was unpaid. So there is nothing whatever upon the face of the deed from Allen, or by way of proof in this record, upon which to rest the imputation to Mrs. Wasserman of means of knowledge to ferret out the undisclosed fact that the note was paid, which it was her duty to use, and the neglect to make use of which was gross or culpable negligence, and such negligence is essential to constructive notice. Wilson v. Wall; Williams v. Jackson; and Evans Bros. v. Roanoke Sav. Bank,—supra; Staunton Nat. Valley Bank v. Harman, 75 Va. 608; Siter v. M'Clanachan, 2 Gratt. 280.

Our statute, supra, provides that the recitals made by a trustee in his deed of conveyance "shall be prima facie evidence that such sale was regularly made, and that the other recitals in such deed or conveyance are true." Is a purchaser from a purchaser from a trustee to be required to disregard the statute and treat the recitals in the trustee's deed as not prima facie evidence that his sale was regularly made and the other recitals untrue, and, if he fails to ascertain all the facts behind the record, to be held guilty of gross or wilful negligence? I think not. The principle upon which a purchaser for value without notice is protected in a court of equity has its origin in the necessity for one of two innocent persons to suffer; the question being which one. Leaving entirely out of view the fact that Mrs. Metzger made it possible for Morris and Sam Wasserman to defraud her by delivering to one of them the note in question without canceling it, to hold that Mrs. Wasserman was a purchaser for value without notice would be no greater hardship upon Mrs. Metzger than had to be borne by the losing parties in the cases to which I have referred.

The distinction between the original purchaser at the sale under the deed of trust or mortgage and a subsequent purchaser is well recognized in the authorities, and the latter is held to be entitled to protection in the absence of actual notice.

In Wilson v. South Park, 70 Ill. 46, the opinion says: "In this case there are innocent purchasers; and, where there are such and the deed executed by the trustee recites a compliance with all such requirements, they are not bound to go behind the deed to ascertain whether or not the recitals are true. This rule is announced in the cases of Reece v. Allen, 10 Ill. 236, 48 Am. Dec. 336; Cassell v. Ross, 33 Ill. 244, 85 Am. Dec. 270; Hamilton v. Lubukee, 51 Ill. 415, 99 Am. Dec. 562. In such a case the remote purchaser to be affected must be chargeable with notice. In such cases the person executing the trust deed selects his trustee, and usually conveys to a person in whom he reposes confidence, both as to his integrity and business capacity, and, having reposed the confidence and conferred the power on him to act, if it is abused, he must be held responsible for the improper selection. Even where he authorizes the assignee to execute the power, he must be equally responsible, as he confers the power; and, if improvidently done, the innocent must not suffer for his want of prudence, unless they can be charged with notice of the abuse of the power. It would be highly inequitable and unjust to hold otherwise, and would lead to ruinous sacrifice of the trust property, as none but the speculator would purchase, and he at low rates, if the remote purchasers, at every step in the chain of title, were compelled to collect and preserve the evidence of the regularity of the trustee's sale."

To what was there said as to the responsibility of the grantor in a deed of trust, with reference to the character and business capacity of the trustee he selects, it may be added, according to the rule prevailing in this state, that the trustee in a deed of trust to secure the payment of debt is to be as acceptable to the creditor secured, both with respect to his integrity and business capacity, as to the grantor.

In Hamilton v. Lubukee, supra, it is said: "It is certainly true that the record of the 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

mortgage was notice to them [subsequent purchasers] and that informed them only of the facts stated in it. It gave them no information of the kind of notice published for the sale of the mortgaged premises, nor of any irregularities which might have been committed in it, nor that the price paid was inadequate. All those were matters in pais, and must be brought home to their knowledge on a proper case-made, sustained by proof."

As opposed to the views taken in the cases above cited, counsel for Mrs. Metzger rely upon a class of cases to which belong Burwell v. Fauber, 21 Gratt. 463, and Long v. Weller, 29 Gratt. 347; but those cases are easily to be distinguished from the case here. In one of them the purchaser traced his title to a will, and it was held that he was chargeable with constructive notice of that will and what it disclosed, and in the other the purchaser bought from a special commissioner, and he was charged with notice of the decree directing the sale.

So, in Wood v. Krebs, 30 Gratt. 714, it was held that purchasers under a decree of a court were bound to know all that the suit in which the decree was made disclosed, and could not rely on the certificate of the clerk, that the records of his office disclosed no liens or encumbrances on the property, as sufficient to entitle them to the defense of bona fide purchasers without notice. In that case, as in Briscoe v. Ashby, 24 Gratt. 454, the purchaser was claiming title under a decree in a chancery cause, and it was held that the case did not come within the registry laws, and that the purchaser was chargeable with notice of what the record in the chancery cause disclosed.

Counsel for Mrs. Metzger cite, also, cases in which it was held that a conveyance by a trustee in a deed, after the debt it secured was paid, conveyed no title to the grantee, and the principal case is Shippen v. Whittier, 117 Ill. 282, 7 N. E. 642. It would unduly extend the length of this opinion to state that case fully. Suffice it to say the opinion shows that the decision turned on three propositions: (1) That there had been a conveyance of the mortgagor's estate to the mortgagee, and the grantee in that conveyance had extinguished the first deed-of-trust debt, which in equity had the effect of a merger; (2) that the trustee who sold and conveyed the property was clothed with only a "naked power," and a purchaser under a mere "naked power" purchases at the peril of the sale being void if a material condition precedent to the existence of the power does not exist; and (3) that the express provision in the deed, that it should be void if the note it secured was paid, was, in view of the limited power in the trustee to sell, sufficient to impose upon a purchaser of the property the duty of showing the existence of the debt at the time of the trustee's sale. The court does not evince a disposition to impair as authority its older decisions which I have cited and others, and does not even allude to them. On the contrary, the opinion says: "This case is not analogous to those where a title passes which is subject to be defeated on the ground of the fraudulent acts of the parties, and in which it is held that a bona fide purchaser without notice is to be protected. In this case no title passed. What appears to be a conveyance is not a conveyance any more than the deed of a person in no wise connected with the title to the property."

It is suggested, both in the opinion of the learned judge below and in the argument for Mrs. Metzger here, that the weight of the decisions by the Illinois court is to be lessened by the fact that they were actions in ejectment. This is true as to some of them, but not as to all; notably the case of Gunnell v. Cockerill, 79 Ill. 79, which was a bill in equity and a case in point. There the trustee was empowered to sell on demand of one fourth of the creditors, and was required to give notice of the time, place, and terms of the sale. He violated the trust by selling privately to one Caswell, who afterwards sold and conveyed to Howell & Lord. Held that, while a purchaser under a trust deed containing a power of sale is chargeable with notice of defects and irregularities attending the sale, and their effect cannot be evaded by him, the rule is different as to remote and subsequent purchasers; that, if there is nothing upon the face of a deed from the trustee in a deed of trust to the purchaser showing that the sale was made in violation of or contrary to the power contained in the deed of trust, a subsequent purchaser who has no notice in fact of any irregularity in the sale by the trustee will be protected as an innocent purchaser. See also the more recent case in point, decided by the same court in 1901, of Lennartz v. Quilty, 191 Ill. 174, 85 Am. St. Rep. 260, 60 N. E. 913.

We are also cited by the learned counsel for Mrs. Metzger to the cases of Kenney v. Jefferson County Bank, 12 Colo. App. 24, 54 Pac. 404; Bent-Otero Improv. Co. v. Whitehead, 25 Colo. 354, 71 Am. St. Rep. 140, 54 Pac. 1023; Penny v. Cook, 19 Iowa, 539; Wells v. Estes, 154 Mo. 291, 55 S. W. 255, and Walker v. Beauchler, 27 Gratt. 511, as sustaining the view taken by the lower court of this case; but I do not consider these cases as authority for that view. In the first named the purchaser asking protection as an innocent purchaser without notice was clearly not such a purchaser. The second was a case of an immediate purchaser. The third was a case in which the controversy was between the beneficiary in the deed of trust and the grantor; the beneficiary being also the purchaser of the property, and had all possible notice that the sale was wrongful. In the fourth the case was also between the grantor in the deed of trust and a purchaser from the trustee, who was also the beneficiary in the trust deed, and was plainly not a bona fide purchaser. In the fifth it was merely held that, where the debtor was within the Confederate lines and the creditor within the Union lines during the Civil War, the former could not pay, nor the latter receive, the debt, and therefore the deed of trust could not be enforced and a sale under it was invalid; that the purchaser from the purchaser at the trustee's sale could stand in no better condition than the purchaser at the sale, as he was present at the sale and knew as well the circumstances as did the first purchaser, but the decree protected the last purchaser in all respects by restoring the status quo without loss to anyone.

In none of the cases to which we have been cited, or that I have been able to find, is the strength of the decisions of this court and others which I have mentioned and which maintain the principle that in order for Mrs. Metzger to succeed in this case upon the proposition under consideration she must convict Mrs. Wasserman not only of gross negligence, but of bad faith, in the least impaired. The record failing to so convict Mrs. Wasserman, she is in equity, as at law, to be considered a bona fide purchaser without notice, and as such entitled to protection.

It is contended, however, that she is not a complete purchaser, inasmuch as she has not paid the debt of the building association, which she assumed, nor has she the legal title.

The view taken by the majority of the court is that while the building association, to the extent of its lien, is a complete purchaser, having loaned Morris that amount of money and caused the legal title to be conveyed to the trustees in the deed of trust securing its debt, and therefore giving it priority over Mrs. Metzger's debt, Mrs. Wasserman cannot be regarded as a complete purchaser because it does not appear that she has paid more than one sixth of the purchase price she agreed to pay.

I fully agree that to the extent of its lien the building association is a complete purchaser, with priority of right over Mrs. Metzger to have its lien satisfied out of the property in question; but cannot agree that Mrs. Wasserman is to be regarded as having paid only one sixth of the purchase money she agreed to pay Morris, and for that reason not entitled to protection as a complete purchaser. True, Morris conveyed to her only an equity of redemption; but, in my view, this carried with it the right to call for the legal title from the trustees of the building association, who, after the conveyance from Morris to Mrs. Wasserman, held the legal title for her benefit, subject only to the lien in favor of the building association. Upon the payment of this lien, and its release on the record, the release would not inure to the benefit of Morris or anyone else other than Mrs. Wasserman. As between her and Morris, her grantor, clearly she stands in the same position as if she had paid him the whole of the purchase money in cash. Moore v. Holcombe, 3 Leigh, 597, 24 Am. Dec. 683; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 489; Jackson ex dem. Glover v. Winslow, 9 Cow. 13; Partridge v. Chapman, 81 Ill. 137.

Payment in actual cash is not indispensable. It is enough that there is an absolute change of the purchaser's legal position for the worse. Such a condition is brought about by the undertaking of the purchaser to pay a debt due from his vendor to a third person, in such manner that he is absolutely substituted as the debtor in the place of his vendor. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 751, and notes.

It is conceded, as it would seem from the argument, that, if Mrs. Wasserman had paid in cash, before notice of Mrs. Metzger's claim, the whole of the purchase money to Morris; or had she so paid the building association's debt assumed by her,—she would be entitled to absolute protection as a complete purchaser for value; and I am unable to see that she would have been, in either of those positions, any more entitled to protection than she is now, occupying the position of an innocent purchaser who has paid the purchase price, so far as her vendor is concerned, and cannot hold the property without the payment of the debt of the building association; it not being questioned that the amount she actually paid Morris and the amount of the debt she assumed was a full and fair consideration for the property.

But let it be conceded, for the sake of the argument, that Mrs. Wasserman cannot be regarded as a complete purchaser. Which has the better equity, Mrs. Metzger or Mrs. Wasserman? I am of opinion that the equity of the latter is superior to that of the former. Is the manner in which Mrs. Metzger has dealt with her equity to be left out of view? Surely not. By delivering up the first of the two notes she held when it was paid, without canceling it by indorsing thereon "Paid," Mrs. Metzger made possible the fraud of Morris, resulting in injury to Mrs. Wasserman, who, as is conceded, is innocent of that fraud; and it needs no citation of authority for the proposition that in such a contest as is here between Mrs. Metzger and Mrs. Wasserman, where one of the two parties is to suffer, the one guilty of no neglect or wrongdoing must be regarded as having an equity superior to that of the other party. It is only where equities are equal that the maxim, "Prior in time, prior in right," has application. Whether negligence is to be regarded as gross or not is to be measured by its resulting injury to the party affected. Not only was Allen, trustee, Mrs. Metzger's agent, for whose acts Mrs. Wasserman was in no way responsible; but, had Mrs. Metzger herself not been negligent, Mrs. Wasserman would not be in the position she now occupies and have to suffer to the extent, at least, of the amount of the claim asserted by Mrs. Metzger. In my view, the negligence of Mrs. Metzger cannot, under the circumstances, be regarded by a court of equity other than gross; and therefore the equity she asserts should not be preferred over that of Mrs. Wasserman.

With reference to the remaining contention of appellants, that Mrs. Metzger should be held to have ratified the sale of Allen, trustee, to Morris, by accepting from the trustee a part of the purchase money as a payment on the note she then held, I agree with the opinion of the court that the conduct of Mrs. Metzger, as disclosed in the record, was not such as should estop her on this ground to assert her right to payment of the balance due on that note.

For the reasons stated, I am of opinion that the decree appealed from should be reversed and annulled, and that this court should enter the decree the lower court ought to have entered, dismissing the bill of Mrs. Metzger, with costs to appellant.

Keith, P., dissenting:

Conceding that Mrs. Wasserman was not a complete purchaser clothed with the legal title, or with the right to call for it; that she acquired only an equity,—I am of opinion, notwithstanding, that, upon the facts of this case, for which I refer to the opinion of Judge Cardwell, she is better entitled to consideration at the hands of a court of equity than Mrs. Metzger. In other words, that, while neither one of them has more than an equitable interest in the subject of controversy, their equities are not equal; and it is only where equities are equal that priority of time becomes decisive as to priority of right.

In my view of the case, Mrs. Metzger has so acted as to require the court to postpone her right to that of Mrs. Wasserman. Mrs.

Metzger held a lien by deed of trust of record. She so dealt with that lien that the record upon which Mrs. Wasserman had a right to rely showed that the deed had been executed and the lien created by it satisfied. It is conceded that the building association, as a result of the action of Mrs. Metzger's trustee, gets a legal title and is a purchaser for value and without notice. It is conceded that Mrs. Wasserman purchased the equity held by her in good faith and without actual notice of Mrs. Metzger's rights. So far as the record goes, it not only gave her no notice of any adverse right; but, showing as it did the deed of trust securing Mrs. Metzger and its execution and satisfaction, it lulled her suspicions and was an assurance that she had nothing to fear from that quarter; and yet, while these facts are held sufficient to transmit the legal title and a complete equity to the building association, the conclusion of the court leaves Mrs. Wasserman, who was equally deceived by the false appearances and equally innocent, to suffer the consequences and to be postponed in her rights to Mrs. Metzger, who could have protected herself and others,—to Mrs. Metzger, whose agent made the sale under conditions which on their face it is admitted authorized him to sell, and whose deed conferred upon Morris the legal title which he in turn conveyed to secure the loan to him from the building association.

In the face of the conduct of Mrs. Metzger; in the face of the acts of the trustee in the deed to secure her debt, who was her agent and not Mrs. Wasserman's,—I cannot think that the equities existing between Mrs. Wasserman and Mrs. Metzger are equal.

In Hume v. Dixon, 37 Ohio St. 67, it is said: "When the equities are equal, the rule of law is adopted that the oldest in point of time will prevail; but it is a mistake to suppose that the age of an equity is of material significance when the relative character of equities are otherwise not equally meritorious. It is only where, all things considered, the conflicting equities are equally meritorious in quality that the element of time becomes material."

In Rice v. Rice, 2 Drew. 76, 77, 78, it is said: "What is the rule of a court of equity for determining the preference as between persons having adverse equitable interests? The rule is sometimes expressed in this form: 'As between persons having only equitable interests, qui prior est tempore potior est jure.' This is an incorrect statement of the rule, for that proposition is far from being universally true. In fact not only is it not universally true as between persons having only equitable interests, but it is not universally true even where their equitable interests are of precisely the same nature, and in that respect precisely equal; as in the common case of two successive assignments for valuable consideration of a reversionary interest in stock standing in the names of trustees, where the second assignee has given notice, and the first has omitted it. Another form of stating the rule is this: 'As between persons having only equitable interests, if their equities are equal, qui prior est tempore potior est jure.' This form of stating the rule is not so obviously incorrect as the former. And yet even this enunciation of the rule (when accurately considered) seems to me to involve a contradiction. For, when we talk of two persons having equal or unequal equities, in what sense do we use the term 'equity?' For example, when we say that A has a better equity than B, what is meant by that? It means only that, according to those principles of right and justice which a court of equity recognizes and acts upon, it will prefer A to B, and will interfere to enforce the rights of A as against B. And therefore it is impossible (strictly speaking) that two persons should have equal equities, except in a case in which a court of equity would altogether refuse to lend its assistance to either party as against the other. If the court will interfere to enforce the right of one against the other on any ground whatever,—say on the ground of priority of time,—how can it be said that the equities of the two are equal? i. e., in other words, How can it be said that the one has no better right to call for the interference of a court of equity than the other? To lay down the rule, therefore, with perfect accuracy, I think it should be stated in some such form as this: 'As between persons having only equitable interests, if their equities are in all other respects equal, priority of time gives the better equity; or, qui prior est tempore potior est jure.'"

Sugden, Vendors, chap. 19, § 32, approves the law as stated in Rice v. Rice, supra.

Cyc. Law & Proc. vol. 16, p. 139, states the rule to the same effect as follows: "Where conflicting equities are otherwise equal in merit, that which first accrued will be given preference; but this test is the last resorted to and does not prevail when any other equitable ground for preference exists." See also 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 413.

But, in addition to this, when the first note fell due and was paid to Mrs. Metzger, she should have canceled or in some way so marked that obligation as to disable it from being restored to circulation, and, by passing into the hands of an innocent holder, become a competitor with the second note of the series representing the deferred payment upon the property originally sold by her, and thus bringing about the situation which must result in loss either to her or to Mrs. Wasserman. It is true that Mrs. Metzger was the payee in the note, and that she never assigned it to anyone; but it is also true that a note may be transferred without written assignment so as to pass an equitable right to the transferee (Bell v. Moon, 79 Va. 351); and, by surrendering the note which was the evidence of the debt, and had been paid to her by the maker, with nothing upon it to indicate that it had been satisfied, she enabled Wasserman to transfer it by delivery to Morris, and thus became responsible, however innocently, for the first link in the chain of circumstances ending in this controversy. The note was in her possession, the money which it represented was paid to her, it was wholly within her power to have prevented the catastrophe; and, as her conduct is responsible for the conditions which have arisen, I think that her equity should be subordinated, though prior in point of time, to that of Mrs. Wasserman, who is wholly innocent and without fault in the transaction.

As showing a better equity in Mrs. Wasserman than that claimed by Mrs. Metzger, I rely then, first, upon the fact that it was the trustee in the deed to secure Mrs. Metzger who made the sale under circumstances which the court holds were sufficient to transfer the legal title without carrying notice of any infirmity in the transaction to those who purchased at that sale, and that, as a result of the act of the trustee, the building association is a complete purchaser for value without notice and holds the legal title for its protection; that, as a result of the conduct of the trustee, Mrs. Wasserman acquired an equity, not only without any notice of prior equities, but was lulled to sleep by the act of the trustee who executed the trust and thus satisfied the lien created by it; and from that moment the record gave assurance to Mrs. Wasserman and all the world that there was nothing further to fear from the lien of that deed of trust.

Now, the trustee in that deed was the agent, not of Mrs. Wasserman, but of the grantor and beneficiary in that deed. A trustee in a deed of trust is the agent of both parties,—that is, of the grantor and the beneficiary in the trust,—said this court in Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Gratt., at page 498. If anyone is to suffer, therefore, by his acts performed in good faith, but the effect of which has been to impose a loss upon one of two innocent persons, each of them holding an equity, surely it should fall upon her whose agent he was, and not upon one a stranger to that transaction.

that Mrs. Metzger surrendered a note which had been paid and satisfied to her by the maker, constituting one of a series secured by deed of trust, into the possession of the maker without any mark upon it by which she could easily have rendered it impossible for anyone to assert or to transfer any right under it and bring it into competition with the second note representing the deferred payment upon the land originally sold by Mrs. Metzger.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the equities between Mrs. Metzger and Mrs. Wasserman are not equal, and that Mrs. Wasserman holds the better equity, though junior in point of time to that of Mrs. Metzger.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

JOHN BEST, Impleaded, etc., Plff. in Err.,
v.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL BANK OF CENTRAL CITY.

(— Colo. —, 85 Pac. 1124.)

Party—real party in interest.

1. A bank for whose benefit a note is taken in the name of its president, and which has always had exclusive ownership and possession of it, may maintain an action thereon in its own name as the real party in interest, notwithstanding the statute provides that an action may be maintained by a trustee of an express trust, which will include a person in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another.

Note—failure of consideration—burden of proof.

2. Upon the introduction, by the maker of a promissory note, of evidence tending to show absence of consideration, the burden of showing consideration by a preponderance of the evidence is upon the one seeking to enforce it.

(May 7, 1906.)

ERROR to the District Court for Gilpin County in plaintiff's favor in an action

Note.—The right of beneficial owner of undorsed note payable to order of a third person to maintain an action thereon in his own name as the real party in interest is fully covered by an exhaustive note in 64 L.R.A. 581, on "Who is the real party in interest within the meaning of statutes defining the parties by whom an action must be brought?" Since the compilation of such note, no cases seem to have arisen upon the precise point herein involved.

brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clinton Reed, L. M. Goddard, S. C. Warner, and H. A. Hicks for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Wolcott, Vaile, & Waterman, Chase Withrow, A. B. Seaman, and W. W. Field for defendant in error.

Gunter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action against Byron J. Smith, Joseph H. Smith, and plaintiff in error, John Best, to recover upon a promissory note executed by them. There was a judgment by default against Byron J. Smith, and a verdict and judgment against Joseph H. Smith and plaintiff in error, John Best. Two points are principally relied upon for a reversal.

1. The plaintiff had no right to maintain the action; that is, that it was not the real party in interest, under § 3, Mills's Anno. Code. The facts pertinent to this contention were these: In October, 1889, Joseph H. Smith and Byron J. Smith were interested in developing a mine, their bank account was overdrawn, and further funds were necessary for continuing the operation of the mine. Defendant in error, through its then cashier, its now president, Thomas H. Potter, loaned to Byron J. Smith and Joseph H. Smith $2,200, and a note was executed payable to it, signed by Joseph H. Smith and John Best. As will appear hereinafter, there was evidence for plaintiff in error that he signed this note at the request of the bank as an accommodation maker, and that the object in his signing the note, and the purpose of the bank in requesting him to do so, was to enable it to negotiate the note. There was testimony for defendant in error that John Best was a joint and several maker of the note with reference to it, and that it accepted the note upon faith of the signature of plaintiff in error. The note that was taken in 1889 was a number of times renewed. The original note and all subsequent renewals thereafter down to March, 1893, were signed only by Joseph H. Smith and John Best, but subsequent to March, 1893, the renewal notes were signed by Byron J. Smith as well as by the two original makers above named. Upon such renewal the old note was held until the new one was fully executed and delivered, whereupon the preceding note was surrendered to the makers. As to the renewal note here sued on, being that of date December, 1898, an original draft of the note was sent to Joseph H. Smith at Denver to execute. This copy of the note was misplaced, and another note was prepared in Denver, executed by Joseph H. Smith, and returned to the defendant in error, in which note the name of Thomas H. Potter appeared as payee instead of the name of the defendant in error, which had appeared in all of the preceding notes. Substituting the name of the bank by that of Potter was simply an oversight of Joseph H. Smith in redrafting the note. The consideration for the original note and all the subsequent renewals was paid by the defendant in error. When the note sued on returned from Denver Mr. Potter noticed that it ran to himself instead of defendant in error. The note was delivered to the bank as its property, and it has ever since been its property, and in its possession. To repeat, the undisputed testimony is that the note at the date of its execution was and ever since has been the property of defendant in error, and has at all times been in its possession, as it was so at the time of the institution of this action.

Plaintiff in error contends that this suit should have been brought in the name of the payee of the note, Thomas H. Potter, and that it could not be brought or maintained in the name of defendant in error. Defendant in error contends that, under § 3, supra, it was the real party in interest, and that the action was properly brought in its name. The determination of this question rests upon the construction to be given the following sections of our Code. Section 3 reads: "Every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in this act." Section 5 prescribes: "An executor or administrator, or trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person or persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section, shall be construed to include a person with whom or in whose name the contract is made for the benefit of another." It will be observed that § 3 provides that the action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in the act, while § 5 prescribes that the trustee of an express trust, which includes a person in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another, may sue without joining with him the person or persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted.

Whatever conflict of authority there may be in other jurisdictions upon the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action, we think the question practically settled here in favor of the contention of the defendant in error. The undisputed facts here are: Defendant in error is, and at all times has been, the sole owner of the note sued upon, and the note is, and has been at all times, in its possession. The note, immediately upon its execution, was delivered to defendant in error as its property, and ever since such date, in such right, it has held the note. There was no indorsement made upon the note transferring it from Potter to defendant in error. In Davis v. Johnson, 4 Colo. App. 545, 547, 36 Pac. 887, among other questions, the validity of a decree was involved which provided for the foreclosure of two trust deeds securing notes. The decree was in favor of the owner of these notes; the notes had not been indorsed, they were transferred only by delivery. It was contended that, under our statute, they could not be transferred by delivery so as to pass title to the purchaser. It was contended that such a transfer did not invest the purchaser with title to the notes. The court held that such manner of transfer did pass title, and that such holder of the note was the real party in interest, and that an action could be maintained in her name. Inter alia, it said: "But it is not true that such transfer of a note does not invest the purchaser with title. At common law he took the equitable title, and at law could sue only in the name of the last holder of the legal title; but this distinction has been abrogated by the requirement of the Code that actions shall be prosecuted in the name of the real parties in interest." Gumaer v. Sowers, 31 Colo. 164, 167, 71 Pac. 1103, 1104, was an action by the indorsee against the makers of promissory notes. The only evidence at the trial consisted in the production by plaintiff of the promissory notes, upon the back of each of which was what purported to be a written transfer by the payee to the plaintiff. The court, after holding that there was sufficient evidence through the indorsements and possession to establish the right in the plaintiff to maintain the action, said: "If such was not the law, still, under the doctrine of Davis v. Johnson, 4 Colo. App. 545, 36 Pac. 887, the judgment in this case was right. For it was there held that, under our law and Code of Procedure, a note payable to order may be transferred by delivery only, and without indorsement, so as to vest in the purchaser a complete title, subject, of course, to defenses in favor of the maker existing at the time of notice of the transfer. It is also held that such purchaser can sue in his own name. This case meets with our approval." The holding of the court of appeals in the case cited was that an indorsement was not necessary to transfer the title to a promissory note, that the title passed by delivery, and that a title so passed was sufficient to permit the holder thereof to institute a suit in his own name; he was the real party in interest for the purpose of instituting and maintaining the action. This doctrine was expressly approved in the case we have just cited from the supreme court. Westcott v. Patton, 10 Colo. App. 544, 546, 51 Pac. 1021, 1022, was an action by the assignee against the maker on certain promissory notes. The court said: "The only question to be determined, therefore, is: Did the answer present an issue which required a trial? Did it put in issue any fact necessary to be proved by plaintiff before she could recover judgment? We think it did not. The answer, it is true, put in issue the alleged assignment by the payee to plaintiff, but this was not essential to the plaintiff's recovery. The answer did not attempt to put in issue the allegation that plaintiff had become and was the legal owner and holder of the note for value. This was the material part of plaintiff's allegation. If she were the legal owner and holder of the note for value, and had possession of it, she was entitled to recover even though the payee may not have made any formal assignment to her. The answer expressly admitted the execution and non-payment of the notes, and did not set up as a defense any matter which would, if admitted, defeat a recovery."

In Maxwell on Code Pleading, 4th ed. p. 22, it is said: It may be stated as a general proposition that "where a thing in action is assigned absolutely, so that the assignee becomes in fact the owner thereof, he is the real party in interest, and it is not material whether his title is legal or equitable, he may maintain an action in his own name." Mr. Pomeroy, in Remedies and Remedial Rights, 2d ed., at § 138, says: "It is no longer, consistently with the provisions of the Codes, possible for one person to sue 'to the use of' another, as was common in some states. The parties beneficially interested must themselves bring the action. There are cases which hold that when there is a trustee of an express trust he must bring the action, and that the beneficiary can, in no such case, sue in his own name, at least alone. The correctness of this ruling may well be doubted. The section relative to the real party in interest is, in all the Codes, imperative; while that in relation to the trustee of an express trust is permissive." And at § 140: "Upon the same principle, the equitable owner of a promissory note is the real party in interest within the statute, and is the proper person to sue upon it, although there may be no indorsement, and possession of the instrument is prima facie evidence of such ownership. In fact, wherever the spirit of the reformed system is carried out,—and this is now very generally, if not universally, the case,—the equity rule as to parties is freely applied to all legal actions; and this one principle will easily solve all particular cases of difficulty or doubt." Professor Bliss says: "By the law merchant, the legal title to commercial paper payable to order can pass only by indorsement, and the purchaser who would sue as holder must show his right as indorsee. But one may become the equitable owner without indorsement, and, as being the real party in interest, is required to sue in his own name. No particular mode of transfer is required; written indorsement or assignment upon the back of the paper, evidencing the debt, is to be desired as a matter of evidence; but, so far as concerns the right of a holder to become plaintiff, the transfer may be shown by other evidence. Thus, it may be made upon a separate paper; even a verbal sale is sufficient." Bliss, Code Pl. § 50. The same principle is announced in the following Colorado cases: Walker v. Steel, 9 Colo. 389, 12 Pac. 423; Jackson v. Hamm, 14 Colo. 58, 23 Pac. 88; Moulton v. McLean, 5 Colo. App. 454, 462-464, 39 Pac. 78; Austin v. Snider, 17 Colo. App. 176, 182, 68 Pac. 128. Many other authorities might be cited in support of our conclusion that defendant in error was the real party in interest, and that suit is maintainable in his name, among them Eaton v. Alger, 57 Barb. 189, in which there is a valuable discussion of this question.

Plaintiff in error has cited many cases as contra the conclusion we have reached; we will confine our consideration of them to those cited from this state. First Nat. Bank v. Hummel, 14 Colo. 259, 8 L.R.A. 788, 20 Am. St. Rep. 257, 23 Pac. 986, was an action by the First National Bank of Central City to collect certain money which it had been expressly authorized to collect by Risdon, to whom the money was owing. It was contended that the suit should have been brought in the name of the beneficial owner, Risdon. The court held that the suit could be maintained in the name of the plaintiff, the trustee. The holding is entirely consistent with the conclusion we have reached in this case. Bassett v. Inman, 7 Colo. 270, 3 Pac. 383, was an action before a justice of the peace upon a promissory note alleged to have been executed and delivered by the defendant to a third party, and by the latter assigned to the plaintiff. Also upon an account due to a third party and assigned to the plaintiff. The principal ground of reversal relied upon was the dissolution of the attachment; but it seems to have been further contended that the suit was not properly brought in the name of the assignee of the note and the account. The court said the suit was properly brought in the name of the assignee, "even though the consideration of the assignment may have been a payment to the assignor after the recovery in the suit by the assignee." The holding simply is that the trustee of an express trust could sue. There is nothing in the opinion in conflict with our conclusion herein. In Gomer v. Stockdale, 5 Colo. App. 489, 39 Pac. 355, Stockdale, the owner of lands and timber, entered into a contract with one Jackson, a mill owner, engaged in making lumber. The contract provided that Jackson might locate his mill machinery, and such temporary structures as were essential to his milling operations, on certain parts of Stockdale's land. Stockdale sold to Jackson by the contract the right to fell trees and reduce them to lumber. As a consideration Jackson gave certain promissory notes maturing monthly, and to secure payment Jackson agreed to give a mortgage on the mill machinery. Jackson assigned the contract to Gomer, who brought suit upon this contract. The court held that, as the legal title to rights created by the contract was in Gomer, an action would lie in his name. The court said: "It has accordingly been decided that it is no infraction of this statute to bring the suit in the name of the person to whom the claim has been assigned, whether it be an open account or otherwise, although there may be annexed to the transfer the condition that when the sum is collected the whole or some part of it must be paid over to the assignor. . . . Since this doctrine prevails in Colorado, it is clear Gomer had the right to bring the suit on the transferred claim. The agreement between Gomer and Jackson concerning the disposition of the proceeds did not affect the recovery." We see nothing in this holding contrary to our conclusion in the present case. Gomer was simply the trustee of an express trust, and, under § 5 of the Code, the action would lie in his name. In Walsh v. Allen, 6 Colo. App. 303, 40 Pac. 473, Allen sued Walsh upon a promissory note; defendant insisted that, on account of some understanding between Allen and Gordon, the original payee of the note, that a portion of the avails of the note when collected were to be paid to Gordon, and that plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and, therefore, not entitled to maintain the suit. The court held that, as the legal title to the note was in Allen by reason of the assignment, the action would lie in his name.

These are all the cases cited from this jurisdiction as in conflict with the conclusion we have reached. We think no one of the cases to be contra such conclusion. Cases are cited from other jurisdictions, and cases can be found supporting the contention of plaintiff in error, but they conflict with the weight of authority, and conflict with the rule laid down in this state. It would serve no useful purpose to extend this opinion by reviewing them.

2. It is contended that the court committed reversible error in the giving of the instruction No. 3, whereby it placed upon defendant John Best the burden of showing that the note sued on was without consideration. The facts pertinent to this instruction were these: Plaintiff introduced the note signed by the defendant John Best, Byron J. Smith, and Joseph H. Smith. The defendant Best then introduced evidence tending to show that he was only an accommodation signer of the original note, and all renewal notes, including the note sued on, that he signed such note at the request of the payee, the plaintiff, for its accommodation, and solely to enable it to negotiate the note. There was evidence for the plaintiff that defendant Best was not an accommodation maker, but a joint and several maker, and that his signature to the note was the security upon which plaintiff relied in making the loan. An issue of fact was thus presented to the jury for determination. Who should prevail thereon depended largely upon whether credit should be given to the testimony of Potter, or to that of Best. It is important for the jury to know upon whom was the burden of proof as to this issue. The court thus charged the jury at plaintiff's request: "The jury are instructed that, under the law in this case, the chief matters for them to consider, between the plaintiff and the defendant Best, are whether or not the defendant John Best signed the said note sued upon in this case, without consideration, and solely at the request, and for the benefit of, and for the accommodation of, either the said Potter, or the plaintiff herein. And the jury are further instructed that the said promissory note itself is prima facie evidence that the said John Best signed the same as maker thereof for a valuable consideration, and the jury are further instructed that the burden is upon the defendant John Best to show by a preponderance of evidence, that he signed the said note sued upon in this action, solely at the request of the said Potter, and solely for the accommodation of the said Potter, or the said plaintiff, and wholly without consideration; and, unless the jury believe from the evidence, that the said defendant John Best did so sign the said promissory note sued upon in this action, solely at the request of, and for the accommodation of, the said Potter, or the said plaintiff, and without any consideration whatever, then their verdict must be for the plaintiff and against the defendant John Best. . . ." It will be seen that the burden of the proof that the note was without consideration was thus placed upon the defendant below.

The weight of authority is clearly against the correctness in this particular of this instruction. Daniel's Negotiable Instruments, 5th ed. vol. 1, § 164, says: "Weight of Evidence. While a bill, or negotiable note, imports in itself a consideration, yet, when evidence has been introduced to rebut the presumption which it raises, the burden is upon the plaintiff to satisfy the jury upon all the evidence, and by the preponderance of evidence, that there was a consideration; and the mere production of the instrument does not shift upon the defendant the burden of proving that there was no consideration. The production of the note, as has been said, is prima facie evidence of a consideration sufficient, if not rebutted, to maintain plaintiff's case. But to hold that such an admission in the note of a consideration therefor (as the words 'value received') changes the burden of proof and compels defendant to assume it, would be to hold that such an admission, when made orally, and when not contained in the instrument, would have the same effect." In Black River Sav. Bank v. Edwards, 10 Gray, 387, the following instruction was approved: "The burden of proof is on the plaintiffs to establish a consideration, and the burden does not shift from them to the defendant. The note containing the words 'value received,' in law imports a consideration, and, upon the evidence of the note itself, the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict, unless there is some other evidence to affect it. The note, being produced, is prima facie evidence of a consideration; yet the burden is upon the plaintiffs to satisfy the jury upon all the evidence, and by the preponderance of the evidence, that there was a consideration." In Huntington v. Shute, 180 Mass. 371, 91 Am. St. Rep. 309, 62 N. E. 380, decided in 1902, the court said: "The rule is well settled in this commonwealth that, in an action on a promissory note, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to establish the fact that it is given for a valuable consideration. While the production of the note, with the admission or proof of the signature, makes a prima facie case, yet, if the defendant puts in evidence of a want of consideration, the burden of proof does not shift, but remains upon the plaintiff, who must satisfy the jury by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the note was for a valid consideration." In Small v. Clewley, 62 Me. 155 and 156, 16 Am. Rep. 410, the court said: "The effect of the instruction was to impose the burden of proof upon the defendant to show that there was a want of consideration for the notes, and in this respect the instruction was erroneous." See also Delano v. Bartlett, 6 Cush. 364; Search v. Miller, 9 Neb. 26, 30, 1 N. W. 975; Campbell v. McCormac, 90 N. C. 491; Bogie v. Nolan, 96 Mo. 85, 9 S. W. 14; Manistee Nat. Bank v. Seymour, 64 Mich. 59, 31 N. W. 140; Solomon v. Huey, 1 Posey, Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 265; Stevenson v. Gunning, 64 Vt. 601, 614, 25 Atl. 697; Conney v. Macfarlane, 97 Pa. 361.

The weight of authority is clearly in support of the contention of plaintiff in error, defendant below; that is, that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the note was not without consideration. We can see no reason for not following the prevailing doctrine. Cases are cited by defendant in error as contra this conclusion; some of them can be explained and reconciled; some cannot. There is no sufficient reason for taking them up and discussing them. We will confine our consideration to the two Colorado cases which are cited against our conclusion. They are not in conflict with our conclusion, and do not touch the point before us. Perot v. Cooper, 17 Colo. 80, 31 Am. St. Rep. 258, 28 Pac. 391, was an action by plaintiff upon certain promissory notes given by one Isaac Cooper against his administratrix. Payment was the principal defense relied upon. All that is said in the opinion, in the most remote degree bearing upon the question of consideration, is this: "The execution and delivery of the notes being admitted, the presumption would be, in the absence of proof, that they were founded upon a sufficient consideration to sustain the plaintiff's cause of action. In addition to this, a full consideration for the notes was expressly admitted on the trial." This language is not inconsistent with our conclusion. It simply is that, the execution and delivery of the notes being admitted, the presumption is that they were founded upon a sufficient consideration. It does not say that, when rebutting proof going to show that there was no consideration has been introduced, the burden is not on the plaintiff to show that a valuable consideration existed for the notes. The case does not rule the question before us. Welch v. Mayer, 4 Colo. App. 440, 36 Pac. 613. Groth & Company, to whom Welch was indebted, drew an order upon Welch payable to Mayer, which order Welch accepted. There was an attempt by the debtor, Welch, to show that Mayer gave no consideration for the order. The court held that the want of consideration between Mayer and the drawer, Groth & Company, was not a defense to an action on the bill or order against Welch, the drawee. The case does not go into or decide upon whom rests the burden of proof for want of consideration in a case like the one before us. Murphy v. Gumaer, 12 Colo. App. 472, 55 Pac. 951, is not cited by appellee as sustaining its contention that the burden of proof as to want of consideration was upon the defendant, appellant. It is well, however, to distinguish that case. In the case we are deciding the action was brought by the payee against the maker. In such case the burden was upon the payee, the plaintiff, to show that a valuable consideration existed for the note. In Murphy v. Gumaer, the action was by an indorsee before maturity against the maker. In such case the burden as to want of consideration is upon the maker. A different rule obtains in this particular when the suit is by the indorsee from that which applies when the suit is by the payee. There the suit was by the indorsee, here by the payee. The distinction between the rule as to the burden of proof in the one case from that obtaining in the other developed in §§ 164, 165, vol. 1, 5th ed. Daniel on Negotiable Instruments.

It has been suggested that instruction No. 6, asked by defendant Best and given, lays down the law as defendant Best contends it to be, and as we have here held it to be, as to the burden of proof of consideration. If we assume that this instruction declares the law properly as to the burden of proof in the matter of consideration, which we do only for the purpose of this ruling, it is in direct conflict with instruction 3 given at the request of plaintiff; and, as we cannot say such conflict did not work a prejudice, we must declare that instruction 3, given at the request of plaintiff, was erroneous, was not cured by instruction 6, and worked reversible error. Grant v. Varney, 21 Colo. 329, 334, 40 Pac. 771.

The judgment will be reversed as to defendant Best.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

WABASH RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

F. E. THOMAS.

(222 Ill. 337, 78 N. E. 777.)

Carrier—shipment beyond line.

1. By accepting freight marked for a particular place, a carrier is prima facie bound to carry it to and deliver it at that place, although beyond the terminus of its own line.

Same—limitation of liability—assent.

2. Whether or not a stipulation in a bill of lading limiting the liability of the carrier to his own line is understood and assented to by the consignor is a question for the jury to determine.

Case Note.—Reasonableness of the time fixed in a contract of shipment of live stock for presentation of claim for damages:

—By the great weight of authority, a carrier may stipulate in his contract of shipment that, as a condition precedent to bringing suit for any loss or injury to the live stock, the shipper must give notice of his claim for such loss or injury within a certain time, or before the stock is taken from the place of destination or delivery, or is mingled with other stock. In view of the fact that the greater amount of stock shipped is usually mingled with other stock immediately upon its delivery, or is slaughtered, and all stock shipped is liable to be injured in various ways after the carriage is completed and without any fault on the part of the carrier, such a stipulation is usually considered as preventing fraud in the presentation of ungrounded claims for loss or injury to the stock. But it is just as generally held that the requirements of the stipulation as to time must be reasonable, and not of such a nature as to work undue hardship upon the shipper, or unduly permit the carrier to escape the consequences of his negligence. But what is a reasonable stipulation in one case may not be in another. As has been frequently said, much must depend upon the facts of the individual case.

And the courts not infrequently determine the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the time allowed by the stipulation with reference to the actual facts as they afterwards developed; in other words, with reference to the question whether the time stipulated proved, under all the circumstances of the case as they afterwards developed, reasonably sufficient for the shipper to ascertain the nature and extent of his loss or damage, and to give notice of his claim as required by the stipulation.

It will be observed that the decision in WABASH R. Co. v. THOMAS is not based upon the ground that a contract of shipment limiting the time within which notice of claim for injury or loss must be given is necessarily invalid, but upon the ground Same—claim for damages—presentation—reasonableness.

3. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that a stipulation in a bill of lading that a claim for damages for injury to freight must be presented within ten days after the freight is removed from the car is reasonable, when applied to live stock, the character of the injury to which cannot be determined within ten days.

Same—limited liability—burden of proof.

4. The carrier has the burden of showing that a shipper assented to special conditions in the bill of lading, limiting the liability of the carrier for injury occurring beyond its own line and requiring claims to be presented within a specified time.

Evidence—rejection—error.

5. There is no reversible error in refus-that a limit of ten days was not reasonable in that case, it appearing that the injury could not by any reasonable degree of diligence have been discovered within that time.

So, in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Hubbard, 72 Ohio St. 302, 74 N. E. 214, where the defendant asked the trial court specifically to charge that, if the notice of the claim for damages was not given within the five days required by the contract, the plaintiff could not recover, it was held that all the circumstances connected with the unloading and the injuries should be examined, and, if the exact nature of the injuries could not have been discovered within the time stated in the contract, it would be considered unreasonable and not binding. The court said: "As stated by counsel for defendants in error, the owners were entitled to time sufficient to know whether the claim should be for injury to a live horse, or for the value of a dead one."

Among other cases holding similarly may be noticed Richardson v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 149 Mo. 311, 50 S. W. 782; Harned v. Missouri P. R. Co. 51 Mo. App. 482; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Steele, 6 Ind. App. 183, 33 N. E. 236.

And where the carrier, by his own act, rendered it impossible for the shipper to give the notice within the time limited by the contract, it has been held that the failure to give such notice would not bar a recovery. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. York, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 814; Richardson v. Chicago & A. R. Co. supra; Baker v. Missouri P. R. Co. 19 Mo. App. 321.

The following cases, more or less clearly recognizing the principle that the reasonableness or unreasonableness of a stipulation limiting the time within which to give notice of loss is to be determined from the facts as they finally developed, hold that the event did show that the time allowed by the stipulation was reasonable in the particular case:

Within one day. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Park, 66 Kan. 248, 71 Pac. 586; Kansas & A. Valley R. Co. v. Ayers, 63 Ark. 331, 36 S. W. 515.

ing to admit in evidence an application for carriage of freight where it is not materially different from the carriage agreement which is admitted.

(April 17, 1906.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Vermilion County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to freight while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

H. Clinton, H. S. Tanner, and Penwell & Lindley, for appellee:

A common carrier is an insurer of the safe delivery of live stock, and as such is answerable, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, for every loss that cannot be attributed to God, public enemies, or to the vices of the animals themselves.

Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Hamilton, 76 Ill. 393; Burke v. United States Exp. Co. 87 Ill. App. 505.

Carriers seeking to avoid this common-law liability by means of a special contract have the burden of showing that the restrictions on the common-law liability, contained in a bill of lading or alleged shipping contract, were assented to by the consignor.

Within ninety days. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Mayes (Tex. Civ. App.) 97 S. W. 318.

Very frequently the contract of shipment of cattle requires the notice of claim for loss to be given to some officer of the carrier, or its nearest station agent, before the stock is moved from its place of destination or delivery, or is delivered to the consignee or mingled with other stock. Such contracts also usually provide for the transportation of the shipper or his agent to accompany the cattle, who, being present at the unloading, is presumably in a position to discover the loss or damage, and to give the required notice within the stipulated time. Many cases hold, or assume, that such a stipulation is reasonable and consequently valid, without showing that the reasonableness is or is not dependent upon the circumstances as they are finally developed in connection with the individual case. Among these cases may be noticed Sprague v. Missouri P. R. Co. 34 Kan. 347, 8 Pac. 465; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dill, 48 Kan. 210, 29 Pac. 148; *Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Whether the plaintiff in the present case wick, 68 Tex. 314, 2 Am. St. Rep. 494, 4 S. W. 567.

But other cases where the contract contains stipulations of this character recognize more or less clearly the principle that the reasonableness of the requirements as to the time within which notice of claim for damages must be given is to be determined by the circumstances as they afterward develop; and the validity or invalidity, as the case may be, of the contract, and its conclusiveness upon the shipper, are determined according as the result shows that the shipper could or could not have reasonably given the notice so as to have accomplished the result aimed at by the stipulation,—namely, the prevention of fraud in the presentation of ungrounded claims.

Thus, in Ormsby v. Union P. R. Co. 2 McCrary, 48, 4 Fed. 170, 708, it was held that a stipulation in the contract requiring that a demand for any loss to live stock should be made in writing to the agent of the company before the stock was removed from the point of destination was of no effect as to sickness, the extent of which could not have been known for some time after the removal of the stock from the car.

So, also, in Western R. Co. v. Harwell, 91 Ala. 340, 8 So. 649, it was held that, where the shipper did not discover, and by ordinary diligence could not have discovered, the injury and its extent, before the animals were removed, notice thereof within such reasonably short time after their removal as effectually secures the carrier from fraud is a substantial and sufficient compliance with the condition.

Where horses were injured by the burning of a car in which they were shipped, it was held, in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Davis, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 24, 31 S. W. 308, that a stipulation requiring notice of claim for damages to be given before the removal of the shipment from the station, which notice should contain a statement of "the full amount of such loss or damage," bore on its face prima facie evidence of its unreasonableness; and nothing short of an affirmative showing by the defendant that the full extent of the injury had been developed in time for such notice to be given within the time required by the contract would relieve it from this objection.

And to the same general effect: Wood v. Southern R. Co. 118 N. C. 1056, 24 S. E. 704; Goggin v. Kansas P. R. Co. 12 Kan. 416; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Temple, 47 Kan. 7, 13 L.R.A. 362, 27 Pac. 98; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Collins, 47 Kan. 11, 27 Pac. 99; Rice v. Kansas P. R. Co. 63 Mo. 314.

To the contrary, however, was Kalina v. Union P. R. Co. 69 Kan. 172, 76 Pac. 438, where the court distinctly held that the contract was to be determined by its prima facie reasonableness, and, if it was reasonable upon its face, the facts as they developed would not have any bearing upon the question. The plaintiff in this case insisted that the stipulation in the shipping contract did not contemplate a case where plaintiff's loss could not be ascertained, and therefore no claim could be made for it, until after the sale of the cattle; and that the carrier was not injured in any way by failure to make timely claim. In reply to this argument, the court said: "It is a sufficient answer to this to say that the contract, in terms, conditions plaintiff's right to recover upon the timely making of this claim, and such contract is within the power of the parties to make."

Numerous cases hold that a stipulation requiring notice before removal, although it may be reasonable as a general proposition, will not be held binding upon the shipper where it does not appear that there was an officer or station agent at the point of destination, or so situated that notice could be reasonably served upon him within the time stipulated.

Thus, it was held in St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Turner, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 625, 20 S. W. 1008, that, if a carrier desired to claim exemption from damages because of failure to give notice, in accordance with the contract of shipment, to some officer, or to the nearest station agent, before the stock had knowledge of and assented to the provisions of the so-called shipping contract was a question for the jury.

The appellant, having assumed the duty of carrying the horses to Paris, Illinois, was liable for any loss or injury on any road over which the cars passed from Council Bluffs.

Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Radbourne, 52 Ill. App. 203; St. Louis, S. W. R. Co. v. Elgin Condensed Milk Co. 175 Ill. 557, 67 Am. St. Rep. 238, 51 N. E. 911.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the appellate court for the third district, affirming a judgment of the circuit court of Vermilion county in favor of the appellee, against the appellant, for $2,400 and costs of suit. The declaration consisted of two counts substantially alike, charging the defendant, as a common carrier, with a breach of duty in failing to safely carry 25 head of horses from Council Bluffs, Iowa, to Paris, this state; negligently failing to properly feed and water the animals while en route; carrying them by slow trains; and suffering the cars in which they were loaded to stand on the track for an unreasonable length of time,—all of which resulted in 'heir becoming reduced in flesh, diseased, and lessened in value, and in consequence of which neglect 12 of them died. A plea of not guilty was filed by the defendant, and upon the trial by jury a verdict was returned and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff.

It appears from the evidence that at the date of the shipment appellee resided in Paris, Illinois, though for sixteen years immediately preceding that time he had been in western Nebraska, where he was engaged in raising and shipping stock. The horses in question were first shipped from Nebraska to Council Bluffs over the Union Pacific Railway, arriving at Council Bluffs about 9 o'clock Saturday evening. They were unloaded, fed, and watered, and the next morning appellee called on the Wabash agent at that place to arrange for shipment over the appellant's line. He testified that he told the agent, that he wanted the stock sent to the stock yards at St. Louis, and there fed before being sent to Paris. The agent prepared an application and contract of shipment, the former of which purports to have been signed by the plaintiff, and the latter by the agent, on behalf of the company, and by the plaintiff. The contract was for shipment from Council Bluffs to St. Louis, and stated that the carrier had agreed to forward the car of horses from Council Bluffs to St. Louis; that its responsibility extended only to its own line; that appellee had agreed to care for the horses while in transit, load and unload, and feed and water them at his own risk and expense; and that in case of loss or damage he would make and present his was removed from the point of shipment, or from the place of destination, and before it was mingled with other stock, it must furnish reasonable facilities for such notice to be given; and the court said it was not prepared to say that it would be reasonable to require a shipper to leave his stock to go to a station in another state in search of someone upon whom to serve notice.

And there are numerous other decisions to the same effect. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Paine, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 621, 21 S. W. 78; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Short (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 142; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fagan, 72 Tex. 127, 2 L.R.A. 75, 13 Am. St. Rep. 776, 9 S. W. 749; Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Greathouse, 82 Tex. 104, 17 S. W. 834; Engesether v. Great Northern R. Co. 65 Minn. 168, 68 N. W. 4; Carpenter v. Eastern R. Co. 67 Minn. 188, 69 N. W. 720.

Where the delivery is to be made by a connecting carrier, numerous cases hold that, if the carrier wishes to take advantage of the condition requiring notice to be given before the stock is removed from its place of destination, it must show that it had an officer or agent where the shipper could reasonably find him, so as to give the required notice.

Thus, in Baxter v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 165 Ill. 78, 45 N. E. 1003, where the contract required notice to be given to "some officer" of the carrier, or "its nearest station agent," before the stock was removed from its place of destination, and it appeared that the shipment terminated upon a connecting line, it was held that the provision requiring notice to be given to some officer was unreasonable and uncertain because it in no way indicated or designated what officer, nor where he was to be found; and that the requirement that notice should be given to the nearest station agent was impracticable of performance because no means were given to the shipper to ascertain who such agent was, nor where his station was. In speaking of such a condition in the contract, the court said: "When the carrier seeks to apply it to a shipment terminating on a connecting line, it must show that it had an officer or station agent at or near the place of delivery, upon whom the required notice could have been served, and who could, by reasonable diligence on the part of the consignee, have been ascertained and found."

And to the same effect is Coles v. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. 41 Ill. App. 607, where it was held that such a stipulation would be unreasonable in a contract of shipment when the place of destination was about 150 miles distant from the nearest point of the initial carrier.

Where the contract provided that notice should be given to an officer or agent of the company before the cattle were removed from the place of delivery, and before they were mingled with other stock, it was held, in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Harris, 67 Tex. 166, 2 S. W. 574, that it was incumbent upon claim in writing, verified by affidavit, within ten days after the horses were unloaded, or be barred from recovering anything on account of the same. The horses were loaded into a Street's Western Stable car about 12 o'clock Sunday night, and delivered to the company about 2:45 Monday morning, July 27th, leaving for St. Louis about fifteen minutes later. They arrived at the yards in North St. Louis at 6:12 o'clock the following morning, and the car in which they were being shipped was immediately delivered to the Terminal Association of St. Louis, which, in turn, delivered it to the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, & St. Louis Railway Company at East St. Louis for transportation to Paris. Plaintiff offered evidence to the effect that he told the conductor in charge of the train to St. Louis that he wanted the horses unloaded, fed, and watered at the stock yards in St. Louis, and was assured that it would be done. This was denied by the conductor. Appellee claims that, after thus being assured that the horses would be unloaded at the stock yards, he left the train at St. Louis to get his breakfast, and then went to the stock yards to see about his horses, but could not find them, and spent the day searching for them, until about 11 o'clock at night, when he learned that they had been forwarded to Paris. The car stood all day in the yards at St. Louis, and the horses were neither fed nor watered until after they arrived in Paris. They left St. Louis some time during the night, arrived at Paris the next day, and were unloaded. They had been en route about fifty-two hours, and when unloaded went immediately to a pool of stagnant water and began to drink, but were driven into another pen. Their manes and tails were partly eaten off, and they were very weak and gaunt. They were removed to a farm not far distant, where they were attended by a veterinary surgeon but 12 of them died as a result of their treatment, and 8 were sold two months later for $375. On the back of the contract of shipment was the following: "July 26, 1903.—Shipper, F. E. Thomas, Kimball, Nebraska; consignee, F. E. Thomas, Paris, Illinois; No. of cars 3455 S. W. S.—Pass F. E. Thomas, parties in charge and accompanying stock. F. S. Blanchard, Agent." The car in which the animals were shipped was marked Paris, Illinois. The night operator of the company at Luther, North St. Louis, testified: "July 28, 1903, train 96 [in which the horses were shipped] arrived at North St. Louis 6:12 o'clock in the morning. There was a car of horses in the train for Paris, Illinois, care of the the defendant to show that the carrier had an officer or agent so situated that the notice could be readily and easily given; and, where the place of delivery was beyond the line of the appellant's railway and in another state, no presumption would arise that the carrier had an officer or agent near the place of destination. The decision in this case was followed in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Reeves, 90 Tex. 499, 59 Am. St. Rep. 830, 39 S. W. 564; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Vaughn (Tex. App.) 16 S. W. 775; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Williams (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 1019; Good v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (Tex.) 11 S. W. 854.

But, in Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Koch, 47 Kan. 753, 28 Pac. 1013, where a railroad company contracted to carry stock beyond its own terminus, and there was a stipulation that the shipper must give notice of his claim to an officer of the company, or its nearest agent, before the stock was removed from the place of destination or delivery, or was mingled with other stock, it was held that the officers and agents of the connecting line should, for the purposes of the contract, be treated as officers and agents of the initial carrier; and, where notice was not given to the carrier within twelve days after the delivery, it was not given within reasonable time, where the injury and loss were known immediately, and notice to the officers of such connecting company could have been given immediately.

It will be noticed that in the latter case the court, in passing upon the reasonableness of the stipulation in the contract, distinctly took into consideration the facts as they finally developed, and based its decision of the reasonableness of the stipulation upon the fact that the shipper failed to give notice of his claim for loss, which notice he could have reasonably given.

It appears to be the general rule in Texas, where this subject has been a fruitful source of litigation, that the reasonableness of such a contract is wholly one for the jury; and this ruling has been held in numerous cases. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Leibold (Tex. Civ. App.) 55 S. W. 368; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clarke, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 547, 24 S. W. 355; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Garrett, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 540, 24 S. W. 354; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Childers, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 302, 21 S. W. 76; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wright, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 402, 21 S. W. 80; Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Greathouse, supra.

In some states it has been held that a contract limiting the time within which notice of claim for loss must be given violates a statute or the Constitution of the state, and is therefore invalid irrespective of whether or not it is reasonable as to time; and in these states, of course, the question considered in this note will not arise.

Big Four. The consist showed this. I reported this car load of stock to the Merchants' Bridge connection," etc.

Appellant's line east from Council Bluffs, Iowa, terminated at St. Louis, and it is insisted by its counsel that the burden of proof was upon the shipper to show a special agreement on its part to transport the horses beyond its own line, without which the carrier's obligations were fully discharged when it delivered the freight in good condition to its connecting carrier. We think, even under this claim, the evidence fairly tended to prove that the contract was for a through shipment. The company, from its conduct, must have so understood it. When, however, a carrier receives freight to be transported, marked to a particular place, he is prima facie bound to carry and deliver at that place. By accepting the goods so marked he impliedly agrees so to do, and he ought to be answerable for the loss. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Copeland, 24 Ill. 332, 76 Am. Dec. 749; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Johnson, 34 Ill. 389; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Frankenberg, 54 Ill. 97, 5 Am. Rep. 92.

But it is said the agreement on its face limits the liability of the defendant to its own line. Even if it should be admitted that such is the fair construction of the bill of lading, it was still a question of fact for the jury and the appellate court whether or not that contract was assented to by the shipper. Whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions, it is well settled in this state that whether the terms of a special agreement limiting the liability of the common carrier was understood, and entered into by the consignor and assented to by him, is a question of fact. The earlier cases so holding will be found cited in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Simon, 160 Ill. 648, 43 N. E. 596. In that case we said: "By the adjudications of this court the rule is established, as a principle of the common law, that, where a carrier receives and accepts goods marked to a place beyond the terminus of its own line, its receipt for goods so marked is to be construed as a prima facie contract to carry and deliver at the point so marked. . . . Neither can the carrier limit his common-law liability safely to deliver such property at the place to which the same is to be transported, by any stipulation or limitation expressed in the receipt given for such property. Starr & C. Anno. Stat. chap. 114, § 96, and chap. 27, § 1. By these two sections (the first adopted in 1872, and the second in 1874) the right to limit a common-law duty in a receipt was prohibited. It has, however, been recognized by frequent decisions of this and other courts that a common-law duty may be limited by express contract. . . . The rule that a limitation of a carrier's liability for safe carriage and delivery of freight beyond the terminus of the carrier's own line may be made by restrictions contained in that part of the bill of lading which may constitute a contract has been recognized in this state. [Citing cases.] Where a contract limiting the liability of a carrier is contained in a bill of lading which in its entirety constitutes both a receipt and contract, the onus is on the carrier to show the restrictions of the common-law liability were assented to by the consignor (Field v. Chicago & R. I. R. Co. 71 Ill. 458; Boscowitz v. Adams Exp. Co. 93 Ill. 523, 34 Am. Rep. 191); and whether there is such assent is a question of fact. The mere receiving the bill of lading without notice of the restrictions therein contained does not amount to an assent thereto,"—citing cases. And in that case it was further held, whether the limitations in the bill of lading were assented to by the consignor was a question of fact determined by the appellate and trial courts adversely to the appellant. To the same effect are Illinois C. R. Co. v. Carter, 165 Ill. 570, 36 L.R.A. 527, 46 N. E. 374, and Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Davis, 159 Ill. 53, 50 Am. St. Rep. 143, 42 N. E. 382.

If it be conceded that the case of Black v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 111 Ill. 351, 53 Am. Rep. 628, announces a different rule, still the later cases would govern. The Black Case does, however, hold that all facts and circumstances connected with the execution of the special contract were proper to be considered by the jury. The reasons for imposing the burden of proof upon the carrier in such case, as distinguished from ordinary cases of contract between parties, will readily suggest themselves. But it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that the law is settled adversely in this state to appellant's contention. The parol evidence is admitted, not for the purpose of changing or varying the terms of a written contract, but for the purpose of showing whether the written contract was assented to by both parties.

The tenth condition in the contract of shipment provides that no action shall be brought for damages "unless a claim for such loss or damage shall be made in writing, verified by an affidavit of the party of the second part, or their agent, and delivered to the freight-claim agent of the party of the first part, at his office in the city of St. Louis, within ten days from the time said stock is removed from said cars; and it is also agreed that, if any loss or damage occurs upon a connecting line, then such line shall not be liable unless a claim shall be made in like manner and delivered in like time to some officer or general agent of the line on which the loss or injury occurred." That there was on the part of the connecting carriers gross negligence, amounting to absolute cruelty to the horses, cannot be denied. Nor can it be said that, in view of the nature of the injury to the animals, the actual damage could, by any reasonable degree of diligence, have been discovered and sworn to within ten days after they were unloaded; and it cannot therefore be said, as a matter of law, that the foregoing provision was reasonable. Baxter v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 165 Ill. 78, 45 N. E. 1003. But the question of the plaintiff having understandingly assented to that provision having been determined adversely to appellant by the jury and the appellate court, he was not barred of his right of action by his failure to comply with it.

The contention that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that the burden of proof was upon the carrier to show that the plaintiff had assented to the terms and conditions of the contract of shipment is answered by Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Simon and Illinois C. R. Co. v. Carter, supra, and by the still later cases of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Calumet Stock Farm, 194 Ill. 9, 88 Am. St. Rep. 68, 61 N. E. 1095, and Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Patton, 203 Ill. 376, 67 N. E. 804.

It is also insisted that the trial court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the application of the plaintiff purporting to have been made by the plaintiff to the agent of the company at Council Bluffs. The plaintiff testified, though somewhat indefinitely, that he did not sign the application, and there is no positive evidence that he did. We are unable, however, to see what particular injury resulted to the defendant by the court's refusal to admit it in evidence. It was not materially different from the agreement which was admitted in evidence.

All controverted questions of fact having been conclusively settled adversely to the appellant, and questions of law alone being subject to review here, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the Appellate Court must be affirmed.

Cartwright, J., dissenting:

It is the law of this state that a railroad corporation cannot limit its common-law liability by any stipulation or limitation expressed in the receipt given for the property. Section 33 of the act in relation to fencing and operating railroads, in force July 1, 1874 (Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 114), so provides. But a bill of lading may contain provisions and restrictions which, if assented to by the shipper, will amount to a contract, and the carrier may thereby limit its liability to such damage or loss as may arise on its own line. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Simon, 160 Ill. 648, 43 N. E. 596; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Carter, 165 Ill. 570, 36 L.R.A. 527, 46 N. E. 374. A limitation of that character in a bill of lading is not binding on the shipper unless he knew of and assented to the limitation, and that is a question of fact, as to which the judgment of the appellate court is conclusive. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Davis, 159 Ill. 53, 50 Am. St. Rep. 143, 42 N. E. 382. The carrier must show that there was an express contract for the exemption; and, where the limitation is contained in a bill of lading not signed by the shipper, the burden is on the carrier to prove the contract by showing that the shipper assented to the limitation. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Simon, supra. That is merely proving that there was a contract, and, if the proof is made, the limitation in the bill of lading will bind the shipper as effectually as though he had signed it. Boscowitz v. Adams Exp. Co. 93 Ill. 523, 34 Am. Rep. 191. In this case there was an express contract, signed by the plaintiff and the agent of the defendant, restricting the defendant's liability to its own line; but it is held that the burden was upon the defendant to prove by other evidence that the plaintiff assented to the terms and conditions of the contract which he signed. I have not been able to discover any good reason for reversing the rule applied to other contracts and transactions, that one who has signed a contract is presumed to have understood and assented to its provisions. The validity of such a contract may be impeached. Black v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 111 Ill. 351, 53 Am. Rep. 628. But I cannot agree with the conclusion that there is no presumption that the contract was assented to by the parties to it, and that the fact of such assent must be proved by other evidence. The only case where such a rule was applied to a contract which appeared from the facts stated to have been signed by the shipper is Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Patton, 203 Ill. 376, 67 N. E. 804, where it was said that, in the absence of evidence that the terms of the contract were assented to by the consignor, the presumption followed that he did not assent to the terms of such contract. I think that decision ought not to be followed in this case.

I concur in the views of Mr. Justice Cartwright, above expressed.

GEORGE L. SHUMAN, Respt.,

v.

BENJAMIN F. STEINEL, Appt.

(— Wis. —, 109 N. W. 74.)

Married woman — necessities — Stoddard's Lectures.

1. A set of Stoddard's Lectures is not a necessary, which a woman may purchase on the credit of her husband.

Same—ratification.

2. To render a man liable on his promise to pay for goods not necessities ordered by Case Note.—Validity of husband's express promise to pay debt previously contracted by wife:—With the exception of a few cases subsequently cited, relating to the liability of the husband after his wife's death upon his express promise to pay antenuptial debts contracted by her, it is assumed, for the purposes of this note, that, prior to the express promise, there was no liability on the part of the husband to pay the debt. As indicated in the foregoing opinion, the distinction between debts incurred by the wife upon the credit of the husband and those incurred by her on her own credit is vital for the purposes of this subject. The following cases, in which the husband, by virtue of his subsequent express promise to pay, was held liable for debts contracted by the wife under such circumstances that he was not originally liable, are upon the ground that the debts were contracted by the wife on the husband's credit, and that his subsequent promise to pay them amounted to a ratification. Hardenbrook v. Harrison, 11 Colo. 9, 17 Pac. 72; Conrad v. Abbott, 132 Mass. 330; Allen v. Aldrich, 29 N. H. 63; Day v. Burnham, 36 Vt. 37. This is also implied in Shreve v. Dulany, 1 Cranch, C. C. 499, Fed. Cas. No. 12,817, and Theriot v. Bagioli, 9 Bosw. 578.

In Day v. Burnham, supra, the court said that the rule would apply notwithstanding that at the time of the purchase the wife requested the merchant not to call on her husband for payment as she wished to pay for the goods herself, there being no proof that the request was made or granted with a fraudulent purpose, and it being the intention of the parties that the sale should be made on the husband's credit.

There are also, of course, cases in which 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain goods alleged to have been sold and delivered. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action to recover on alleged contract liability. The complaint was to the effect that, October 15th, 1902, defendant contracted in writing to take of the plaintiff a set of "Stoddard's Lectures" and pay therefor $36.00; that plaintiff fully performed his part under such contract, but the husband has been held liable upon an implied ratification without any express promise. (See note to 65 L.R.A. 549.) This question, however, is not within the scope of the note.

If the wife contracted the debt in her own name and on her own credit, the husband's subsequent promise to pay cannot, of course, be upheld upon the theory of ratification, nor, according to principle, though there is but comparatively little specific authority on the point, can it be upheld as an original promise, in the absence of any new consideration other than the moral obligation that may be supposed to rest upon a husband to pay debts contracted by his wife in her own name and on her own credit.

In McBride v. Adams, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1060, the court, after holding that there was not sufficient evidence of a ratification by the husband of a purchase of goods made by the wife on his credit, said that liability was not to be imposed upon the husband on the weight of his bald promise to remit when finally apprised of the claim, which, upon the facts, was the debt of the wife, in the absence of anything which would suggest a consideration for his promise.

A promise made by the husband before marriage, to pay a debt against his intended wife for which the creditor had no lien on her estate, is without a legal consideration, and void. Agnew v. Williams, 1 Bush, 4.

In Leipird v. Stotler, 97 Iowa, 169, 66 N. W. 150, testimony was admitted, in an action against the husband to recover the amount of a promissory note executed by his wife in her lifetime, to show a verbal promise by him after her death to pay the note; but this was upon the theory that the testimony was to be followed by other that defendant refused to pay for the property.

Defendant answered denying that he agreed to purchase, or that he received the property mentioned. The signature to the contract was duly put in issue so as to cast on plaintiff the burden of proof as to whether it was that of the defendant. The evidence was undisputed that the paper was made by defendant's wife, she using his or her own name. There was some testimony tending to show that she signed her own name to the paper, and that it was subsequently changed by an erasure of the letter "s" from "Mrs." There was no evidence that the contract was made for the benefit of the defendant, or that his wife pretended to act by his authority, or as his agent, in making it, except as indicated by evidence tending to show that she signed his name. There was an indorsement on the paper by the person who acted on behalf of plaintiff, as follows:

Report of agent on subscriber:

J. L. Day, Jr., Solicitor.

The evidence further tended to show that defendant's wife received the books; that some time thereafter, when his attention was called to the matter, he said that, if she ordered them, he would pay for them; and that subsequently he declined to do so and offered to return the property. After the testimony was closed, defendant's counsel asked leave to introduce further evidence as to the signature having been evidence tending to show that the promise of the husband was made on a new and independent consideration, to accomplish some purpose of his own, e. g., to prevent administration of his wife's estate, or for some other reason promising a benefit or advantage to him. It is clearly implied that, in the absence of a new consideration to the husband, his promise would be invalid. That, however, would have been true by reason of the statute of frauds, if for no more fundamental reason, since, in the absence of a new consideration, the promise, at best, would have been but a verbal one to pay another's debt.

In Schnuckle v. Bierman, 89 Ill. 454, holding that a husband, in the absence of an express agreement to pay, would not be liable for board furnished his wife while she, without justification, was living apart from him; and that there could be no recovery on his agreement to pay for her past board because the agreement was upon the condition that she return to his home, which condition was not complied with,—it seems to be implied that, if the agreement had been unconditional, the husband would have been liable thereon. This point, however, was not decided; and the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was reversed for the reasons above stated.

In Belknap v. Stewart, 38 Neb. 304, 41 Am. St. Rep. 729, 56 N. W. 881, expressly approving the last case, the decision is that, in the absence of a special promise of the husband to pay for the board and lodging of his wife living apart from him, he will not be responsible therefor, unless she lives separate from him by his consent, or his conduct was such as to justify her in leaving him. Here, too, there seems to be an implication that the husband would be liable upon an express promise. The implication in these cases may, perhaps, be accounted for upon the assumption that the board was furnished the wife upon the husband's credit, in which case, under the authorities previously cited, his subsequent express promise would amount to a ratification.

In Thompson v. Brown, 121 Ga. 814, 49 S. E. 740, the syllabus by the court (there being no opinion) is to the effect that, where a wife made a contract in her own name for the improvement of her husband's house, the husband is not liable therefor when it does not appear that the wife was his authorized agent, or that he knew that the work was being done on his property, "or that he adopted the contract as his own." The last phrase seems to imply that the husband would have been liable if he had adopted the contract as his own notwithstanding that it was made by the wife in her own name. The facts assumed in the syllabus, however, included the fact that the improvement benefited the husband's property; and, as shown in the note in 53 L.R.A. 375, there is authority for the proposition that a subsequent promise to pay for improvements placed on one's property without his knowledge or consent is valid. This is upon the ground that, while there is no pre-existing legal obligation, there is a material benefit conferred, and therefore something in addition to a mere moral obligation to sustain the subsequent promise.

The principle which precludes an action upon the husband's express promise to pay a debt previously contracted by the wife in her own name and on her own credit has been applied in a somewhat different, though analogous, class of cases holding that the husband's common-law liability for antenuchanged, and asked to have the question submitted to the jury as to whether the credit was given to the wife and the contract signed in her name. The court ruled that the property purchased was not of the class called necessities; that it made no difference how the contract was signed, or whether there was any contract at all; that the paper did not cut any figure, except that it fixed the price of the property; and that, if defendant's wife ordered the goods and received them, and he subsequently promised to pay therefor, he was liable. Accordingly, a question covering those matters only was submitted to the jury, and was answered in the affirmative. Both sides then moved for judgment upon the verdict and the minutes of the court and the evidence. Plaintiff's motion was granted and the defendant's denied.

Mr. James F. Trottman, with Mr. Edward J. Yockey, for appellant:

Except, possibly, as to necessities, neither husband nor wife has any right to contract for the other unless duly authorized.

1 Jones, Ev. § 262; Savage v. Davis, 18 Wis. 608; Sturtevant v. Starin, 19 Wis. 268; Meek v. Pierce, 19 Wis. 300; O'Conner v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 31 Wis. 160; Brown v. Worden, 39 Wis. 432.

tial debts contracted by the wife, which, by the common law, ceased upon the death of the wife before a recovery against the husband, could not be continued by the husband's express promise, not founded upon a new consideration, made during the wife's lifetime, to pay the same. Mitchinson v. Hewson, 7 T. R. 348; Callan v. Kennedy, 3 Cranch, C. C. 630, Fed. Cas. No. 2,319; Crawford v. Verry, 13 Ind. 427; Waul v. Kirkman, 13 Smedes & M. 599; Cole v. Shurtleff, 41 Vt. 311, 98 Am. Dec. 587.

Nor revived by an express promise without a new consideration after the wife's death. Hetrick v. Hetrick, 13 Ind. 44; Waul v. Kirkman, supra.

The case of Beach v. Lee, 2 Dall. 257, 1 L. ed. 371, seems to be opposed to the cases just cited. That was an action on express assumpsit, brought after the death of defendant's wife, to recover the amount of an antenuptial debt contracted by her, it appearing that, in consequence of the marriage, the defendant became possessed of property belonging to the wife more than sufficient to pay the debt, and that during her lifetime he had assumed to pay the debt, and had actually made several payments on account of it, and had promised to pay the remainder, even subsequent to her decease. It is stated in the report of the case that, upon these facts, it was agreed by counsel for the defendant, and sanctioned by the court, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover; though it was not admitted that without proof of the special assumpsit the defendant would have been liable for the debt.

In Crawford v. Verry, supra, where, during the marriage, the husband, with the wife's consent, undertook to pay an antenuptial debt of hers by selling to the creditor a piece of land belonging to her, but the wife died before the deed was made, and the heirs refused to execute a deed, it was held that the husband was liable to the creditor. This decision was rendered in 1859. It does not appear whether the marriage was celebrated prior or subsequent to the act of 1852, by which the husband's liability for the antenuptial debts of the wife, to the extent of the property received from her, was declared to continue after her death. L.R.A. (N.S.) death. This act did not apply where the marriage was celebrated prior to its enactment. Hetrick v. Hetrick, supra.

In Allen v. McCullough, 2 Heisk. 174, 5 Am. Rep. 27, it was said that, if a husband released by the wife's death from the antenuptial debt of the wife promises to pay it, the promise will create a valid obligation. This was said to follow, by parity of reasoning, from the proposition that if, after the husband's death, the wife, being under a moral obligation to pay debts contracted by her during the marriage, but for which she could not have been sued, promises to pay, the moral obligation is a sufficient consideration to support the promise, and the action can be maintained.

As shown in the note to Gilbert v. Brown, post, 1053, the proposition from which this conclusion was drawn is contrary to the weight of authority. As shown in that note, however, there are sound reasoning and judicial authority in support of the doctrine that a new promise, after discovery, to pay a debt incurred during coverture, is valid,—at least where the consideration for the original promise inured to the wife personally. It is obvious, however, that the analogy fails if the doctrine which upholds the new promise after discovery is limited to cases where the wife personally received the consideration for the original promise; and the analogy is not perfect even if that doctrine be extended to cases where the husband received the consideration for the wife's original promise; since there is obviously more reason for holding a woman bound by her promise after discovery, to pay an obligation which she undertook to assume during coverture, even though the consideration therefor moved to her husband, than to hold the husband liable on his subsequent express promise to pay a debt incurred by his wife in her own name and on her own credit, and where no reliance was originally placed on his responsibility. In the last case there is at best nothing but a moral obligation, in the sense of a conscientious duty, to support the express promise; and it is well established that a moral obligation in this sense is insufficient to constitute a consideration. See note to 53 L.R.A. 353.

The variance between pleading and proof is fatal.

Bowman v. Van Kuren, 29 Wis. 209, 9 Am. Rep. 554; Atkinson v. Harran, 68 Wis. 405, 32 N. W. 756; Little v. Staples, 98 Wis. 344, 73 N. W. 653; Hocks v. Sprangers, 113 Wis. 123, 87 N. W. 1101, 89 N. W. 113.

It was the wife's contract, and the husband is not liable without his express promise to pay, based on a new and independent consideration.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The assignments of error urged by appellant may be stated thus: (1) The court should have granted a nonsuit on appeal 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

lant's motion because the complaint was on contract, charging him with being the maker thereof, while the proof showed that the contract was made by his wife, and that he did not subsequently ratify the same; (2) the contract was that of appellant's wife, and so he was not liable without an express promise to pay, based on a new and independent consideration; (3) the contract was shown to be void because altered fraudulently in a material part; (4) the court refused to submit to the jury the question of whether appellant's wife signed the contract, and the credit was given to her; (5) there was no proof that appellant promised to pay for the property. These various propositions we will not discuss in detail, but treat the case in a somewhat general way.

We can make little or no headway in determining whether the facts found by the jury are sufficient to render appellant liable by reviewing such authorities as Day v. Burnham, 36 Vt. 37; Conrad v. Abbott, 132 Mass. 330, and Allen v. Aldrich, 29 N. H. 63, cited to our attention by counsel for respondent. They are all cases where the wife purchased necessities on her husband's credit. Here it was properly held that the property purchased was not necessities, and the question of whether the purchase was made on the credit of the husband or on the credit of the wife was held by the learned court to be immaterial. The subject dealt with in Conrad v. Abbott, supra, is well indicated in the following language of the syllabus: "A promise by a husband to pay for necessities which have been furnished to his wife upon his credit, if they are such as he is bound to supply her with, . . . amounts to a ratification of her contract, upon which an action may be maintained, even if she had no previous authority to purchase them." The decision went upon the ground, which all such do, that the wife, in making the purchase, was presumed to assume authority to act for her husband. The court said: "The act of one assuming to be an agent, but done without authority, may be ratified; and in such case the liability of the principal arises from the ratification."

Cases cited by respondent to support the contention that the mere promise of the husband to pay for goods, not necessities, purchased by the wife on her own credit, makes him liable, do not so hold. They all proceed upon the theory of ratification of the act of the wife assuming to act for her husband. Of course, in case of necessities the element of assumed agency is much more readily proved than in case of other property. When a wife contracts an indebtedness on her own credit, then the mere promise of the husband to pay it is of no greater dignity than any promise without consideration to answer for the debt of another. That is elementary. It must be assumed that the trial court so understood the law and held appellant liable under the doctrine of ratification, upon the theory that it applied to the circumstances of the case though they only included the elements of ordering the goods by the wife, receiving the same by her, and promise by appellant to pay therefor; that the elements of whether she assumed to act as agent in the matter, or ordered the goods on her own credit, were immaterial.

As to the importance of the omitted elements, in Mechem on Agency, at § 127, the rule is stated thus: "The act ratified must also have been done by the assumed agent as agent and in behalf of the principal. If the act was done by him as principal and on his own account it cannot thus be ratified."

The judicial authorities are in harmony therewith. In Meiners v. Munson, 53 Ind. 138, cited by appellant, we have a good example. There the court said: "The rule of law is, that a ratification can only be effectual between the parties when the act is done by the agent avowedly for or on account of the principal, and not when it is done for or on account of the agent himself, or of some third person." And further, citing from Chitty on Contracts, 11th Am. ed. vol. 1, p. 293: "But where the party making the contract had no authority to contract for the third person, and did not profess, at the time, to act for him, it seems that the subsequent assent of such third party, to be bound as principal, has no operation." And further, citing from 1 Parsons on Contracts, *346, where the author was speaking of a situation similar to that before us, "we may add that such a case would perhaps fall within the rule that no act is capable of ratification by the principal which was not performed by the agent as agent, and in behalf of the principal."

To the same effect are Saltmarsh v. Candia, 51 N. H. 71-76; Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 4 L.R.A. 196, 12 Am. St. Rep. 754, 42 N. W. 467; Mitchell v. Minnesota Fire Assn. 48 Minn. 278, 51 N. W. 608; Schreyer v. Turner Flouring Co. 29 Or. 1, 43 Pac. 719; Minnich v. Darling, 8 Ind. App. 539, 36 N. E. 173.

The argument advanced, that appellant could not become liable in the absence of an express promise, based on a new and independent consideration, in any event, is answered by the rule that the liability of one who ratifies as principal the unauthorized act of another, who assumed to contract in his behalf, goes upon the ground of adoption of the unauthorized act, and therefore requires no consideration. So, if appellant's wife, assuming to act as his agent, ordered the books from respondent and received them, and he subsequently, with knowledge of the facts, adopted her act as his own by promising to pay for the property, or by accepting the benefit of the transaction, or in any other way, he thereby became liable for the indebtedness.

From the foregoing it seems plain that the question of whether appellant's wife signed his name to the contract, and the one as to whether she assumed to act for him, were material on the question of his liability. There was some evidence that she signed her own name to the paper; and we must assume that other evidence on that line, which appellant asked leave to present after both sides had rested, would have been offered and received had the court not held that, if she signed her own name, and the credit was given to her, the promise by her husband to pay the debt made it his obligation, since the rejection of the offer of additional evidence was placed on the ground of immateriality.

What has been said seems to govern all the questions raised which need attention. The motion for a nonsuit upon the ground that the signature of the appellant was put in issue, and no proof was produced to show that he did sign the paper, but, on the contrary, the evidence was to the effect that his wife signed her own name thereto, and that subsequently the signature was fraudulently changed, was properly overruled because, as to whether the signature was changed, the evidence was in conflict, and as to whether the signature should be regarded as appellant's turned on the question of ratification. If the wife signed appellant's name, assuming to act as his agent, and he afterwards adopted her act, the contract became, in legal effect, his from the beginning, and was enforceable as such. It follows that the claim that a recovery based on ratification was a departure from the one set forth in the complaint cannot be approved.

The claim that, assuming, for the purposes of the case, the circumstances were such that a promise on the part of appellant to pay for the books would have ratified the act of the wife as his, there was no proof of such a promise, the court properly ruled in respondent's favor. The testimony to the effect that appellant said that, if my wife ordered the goods, I will pay for them at the rate of about $10.00 a month, was in effect assented to, as the jury were warranted in concluding. The person who represented plaintiff testified that he said to the appellant he thought the condition of payment suggested would do, and in subsequent communications in respect to the matter there was no change as to such assent.

So the case comes down to this: The trial court erred in not submitting to the jury in some proper way whether appellant's wife assumed to act as agent for her husband, or signed her own name and the credit was given to her. If she signed her name to the paper, and did not assume to act as agent for her husband, as before indicated, there could be no ratification, and, under the circumstances of the case, no liability on the part of appellant created by his mere promise to pay for the goods.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN H. GILBERT et al., Appts.,

v.

LYDIA D. BROWN.

(29 Ky. L. Rep. 1248, 97 S. W. 40.)

Note—married woman—presumption.

1. In the absence of proof that a note executed by a man and wife was for neces-

Case Note.—Validity of new promise by woman after discovery, to pay debt incurred during coverture:—It is assumed, for the purposes of this note, that the debt was not originally enforceable at law against the promisor, though some cases are included in which the original promise was binding in equity. As shown in the note in 53 L.R.A. 366, the doctrine of GILBERT v. BROWN on the point under discussion is in accord with the weight of authority,—numerically considered at least,—though the other side of the question is well sustained by both reason and authority. The question has generally been discussed from the point of view whether the moral obligation arising from the void promise during coverture, in connection with the consideration upon which it was made, is sufficient to sustain the new promise after discovery. As shown in the note referred to, it is well established that a moral obligation, in the sense of a mere conscientious duty not arising from a precedent promise or the receipt of material value by the promisor, is insufficient to sustain a subsequent promise. A good illustration of the application of the rule to a moral obligation in this sense is furnished by cases like Mills v. Wyman, 3 Pick. 207, holding that an express promise to pay for the past support of a relative is not binding where services ordered by the wife, the presumption is that it was for the husband's debt.

Same—ratification.

2. A woman cannot, after discovery, ratify a note which was executed by her during coverture, and was void because not for a debt for the payment of which she could contract.

Same—renewal note.

3. The execution, by a woman, of a note to take up one of her deceased husband, is without consideration if she received nothing from his estate.

(November 8, 1906.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clay County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. B. Golden and A. B. Hampton for appellants.

Messrs. W. W. Rawlings and Stivers & Wright for appellee.

Lassing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In December, 1891, W. H. Brown and Nancy Brown, his wife, executed a note to F. M. Brown for $200. In December, 1895, this note was renewed for $264, this being the amount due on said note. After the execution of this second note, W. H. Brown died, and Nancy Brown executed and deliv-

the promisor was not before under an implied obligation to pay for such support. There is a great difference of opinion as to the scope and extent of this rule. There are many instances in which an express promise to pay has been sustained, although there was no new consideration, nor enforceable legal obligation. The exception to the rule is stated comprehensively by Gaynor, J., in Drake v. Bell, 26 Misc. 237, 55 N. Y. Supp. 945, as follows: "The rule seems to be that a subsequent promise founded on a former enforceable obligation, or on value previously had from the promisee, is binding." This statement of the exception, although from the opinion of a lower court, is to be commended not only for its clearness, but for its comprehensiveness. The first alternative, i. e., where there was a former and enforceable obligation, is well illustrated by the numerous cases applying the well-settled rule that a new promise to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations or discharged by operation of law is valid and enforceable without any new consideration. The exception to the general rule that a moral obligation is not sufficient to sustain a promise is frequently stated in a form which excludes from the exception, and therefore leaves within the general rule, a case presenting merely the second alternative of Judge Gaynor's statement,—that is, ered to F. M. Brown her note for $285.12 in satisfaction of the note which he held against her and her deceased husband; thereafter, she paid through Lee Brown, her son, $50 on this note. F. M. Brown assigned and transferred this note to Lydia D. Brown, his wife. No further payments were made upon this note by Nancy Brown or anyone else for her. After her death, Lydia D. Brown, the holder of said note, brought suit against her heirs at law to enforce its collection, and to subject certain real estate which had been given them by their mother just prior to her death to its payment. The plea of no consideration was interposed in the trial court, proof taken, and judgment entered in favor of plaintiff, and from that judgment defendants appeal.

The only question in this case necessary for determination is, Was there any consideration for the execution of this note from Nancy Brown to F. M. Brown upon which suit was brought? This question of necessity relates back to the execution of the original note in 1891. When the original note was executed a wife could not bind her estate, except for necessities; and she was wholly incapable of making any contract for any purpose, except for the purpose described by the statute,—that is, for necessities. And, where one is seeking to hold her upon a contract, it must be shown af-where there was value previously had from the promisee, but no enforceable legal obligation. It will be observed that, in the most favorable aspect for its validity, a new promise after discovery, to discharge a void contract made during coverture, falls within the second of the alternatives stated by Judge Gaynor. It must be conceded that it is more difficult to sustain his statement of the exception with respect to this alternative than with respect to the first; that the exception has, however, been frequently applied to cases presenting the second alternative is illustrated by cases upholding the validity of an express promise to repay one who has voluntarily paid the promisor's debt, or to pay one for past services rendered to the promisor under such circumstances as not originally to create any legal obligation upon his part, and unaccompanied by any contemporaneous promise, void or otherwise, to pay the same. (See note to 53 L.R.A. 372.) It may be noted in passing, though they have been alluded to merely by way of illustration, that there is a conflict of authorities on both these specific questions.

Coming to the specific question covered by this note, as to the validity of a new promise after discovery, to pay a debt incurred during coverture, and which, by reason of the coverture, was not legally binding: As already intimated, the authorities—numerically considered at least,—are against the validity of such promise. The following cases hold that the moral obligation resting upon the promisor under such circumstances is insufficient to sustain the new promise after discovery: Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Ad. & El. 438, 4 Jur. 1081 (this case has been generally regarded as overruling the contrary doctrine asserted by Lee v. Muggeridge, 5 Taunt. 36); Dixie v. Worthy, 11 U. C. Q. B. 328; Watson v. Dunlap, 2 Cranch, C. C. 14, Fed. Cas. No. 17,282; Loyd v. Lee, 1 Strange, 94; Union Nat. Bank v. Hartwell, 84 Ala. 379, 4 So. 156; Thompson v. Hudgins, 116 Ala. 93, 22 So. 632; Maher v. Martin, 43 Ind. 314; Putnam v. Tennyson, 50 Ind. 456; Thomas v. Passage, 54 Ind. 106; Long v. Brown, 66 Ind. 160; Austin v. Davis, 128 Ind. 472, 12 L.R.A. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

120, 25 Am. St. Rep. 456, 26 N. E. 890; Keadle v. Siddens, 5 Ind. App. 8, 31 N. E. 539; Davis v. Schmidt (Ind. App.) 31 N. E. 840; Ruppel v. Kissel, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2371, 74 S. W. 220; Holloway v. Rudy (Trimble v. Rudy) 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1406, 53 L.R.A. 353, 60 S. W. 650; Porterfield v. Butler, 47 Miss. 165, 12 Am. Rep. 329; Hendricks v. Robinson, 56 Miss. 694, 31 Am. Rep. 382 (the last two cases overruled Franklin v. Beatty, 27 Miss. 347, to the contrary); Musick v. Dodson, 76 Mo. 624, 43 Am. Rep. 780; Bragg v. Israel, 86 Mo. App. 338; Parker v. Cowan, 1 Heisk. 518 (obiter); Manard v. Cawood, 1 Tenn. Ch. App. 36 (obiter); Hayward v. Barker, 52 Vt. 429, 36 Am. Rep. 762; Valentine v. Bell, 66 Vt. 280, 29 Atl. 251.

And the following cases sustain the general rule, with the qualification, express or implied, that the new promise will be valid if the original promise, though unenforceable at law, was binding in equity upon the separate estate of the wife: Condon v. Barr, 49 N. J. L. 53, 6 Atl. 614; Felton v. Reid, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 269; Long v. Rankin, 108 N. C. 333, 12 S. E. 987; Wilcox v. Arnold, 116 N. C. 708, 21 S. E. 434; Hubbard v. Bugbee, 58 Vt. 172, 2 Atl. 594.

Probably the qualification expressly made by the cases last cited is also to be understood as a qualification of the decisions previously cited in support of the general rule. And the following cases expressly hold that the rule above stated does not apply to an express promise made after discovery, where the original obligation, though not legally enforceable, was binding upon the wife's separate estate. Vance v. Wells, 8 Ala. 399; Viser v. Bertrand, 14 Ark. 267; Doss v. Peterson, 82 Ala. 253, 2 So. 644; Craft v. Rolland, 37 Conn. 491; Cleland v. Low, 32 Ga. 458; Hubbard v. Bugbee, 55 Vt. 506, 45 Am. Rep. 637; Sherwin v. Sanders, 59 Vt. 499, 59 Am. Rep. 750, 9 Atl. 239.

The leading case against the doctrine which denies the validity of the new promise by a woman after discovery, to pay an obligation incurred by her during coverture, and not originally binding either in law or equity, is Goulding v. Davidson, 28 N. Y. 604, which, within certain limitations, firmatively that the claim comes within the statutory exception. Price v. Keeney, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 706. The proof in this case shows: That at the time of the execution of the original note W. H. Brown sought the loan. That he was indebted for taxes due upon his wife's land for perhaps as much as two years, for grocers' bills, and other bills. That he applied to his son, F. M. Brown, for the money, and, after some delay, the loan was negotiated. The note was forwarded by W. H. Brown and Nancy Brown to F. M. Brown, who sent his check to them for $200, payable to W. H. Brown. W. H. Brown owned no estate, but his wife, Nancy Brown, owned a farm. There is not the slightest proof in the record as to the amount of taxes due, or the amount of the grocers' bills, or that credit therefor had been extended to Nancy Brown; but, on the contrary, the fact that the loan was sought by W. H. Brown, and the check made payable to him, goes to show that the debt was the debt of W. H. Brown, and not the debt of his wife, Nancy Brown. In the absence of any proof that the note was executed for necessities contracted for by the wife, Nancy Brown, the presumption is that it was the debt of her husband, and that she attempted to sign the note as security for him. The renewal of the note in 1895, and the execution of her own note in lieu thereof upholds the validity of the new promise. In that case a married woman carrying on trade as an unmarried woman in her own name bought goods for her business on her own credit and responsibility, and gave her notes for part of the price; and, after her husband's death, promised to pay the notes and the residue of the price of the goods. The court held that such subsequent promise had a sufficient support in the moral obligation founded upon the antecedent valuable consideration created for the promisor's own personal benefit. This case, in effect, excepts from the rule declared by it cases where the original debt, though contracted in the name of the wife, was in legal effect originally the debt of the husband. The distinction thus suggested is also recognized in Smith v. Allen, 1 Lans. 101; Watkins v. Halstead, 2 Sandf. 311; Kennerly v. Martin, 8 Mo. 698; and Stockton Bros. v. Reed, 65 Mo. App. 605, although these cases do not necessarily imply that the subsequent promise would be good, even though the original promise did not create a liability on the part of the husband.

The doctrine of Goulding v. Davidson is also adopted in Pennsylvania. See Hemphill v. McClimans, 24 Pa. 367; Leonard v. Duffin, 94 Pa. 218; Brooks v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 125 Pa. 394, 17 Atl. 418; Holden v. Banes, 140 Pa. 63, 21 Atl. 239; Rathfon v. Locher, 215 Pa. 571, 64 Atl. 790; Kelly v. Eby, 141 Pa. 176, 21 Atl. 512.

There is an obiter statement to the same effect in Allen v. McCullough, 2 Heisk. 174, 5 Am. Rep. 27.

It was also held in Lafitte v. Delogny, 33 La. Ann. 659, and Brownson v. Weeks, 47 La. Ann. 1042, 17 So. 489, that a wife may, after the death of her husband, ratify an act during his lifetime by which she bound herself and her property for his debt. But these decisions were upon the ground that the nullity of the contract was not such as to make it absolutely nonexistent, and that it simply remained, during the marriage, without effect.

It will be observed that in Goulding v. Davidson, supra, the wife personally received the consideration for which her original promise during coverture was made; and 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that fact is alluded to in the opinions, though it is not clear that it was intended to be made a limitation of the decision. In this connection, it may be noted that in Rathfon v. Locher, supra, the original note, given during coverture, the renewal of which after discovery was held to be valid, was executed by the wife as surety for her husband's debt.

As suggested in the conclusion to the note in 53 L.R.A. 376, if, as a general rule,—and the cases other than those involving a new promise after discovery seem to sustain such rule,—the receipt of value by the promisor under circumstances creating no legal, but merely a moral, liability is sufficient to sustain a promise, it is not apparent why the fact that a void promise has intervened should make any difference, since it would seem that the void promise might be eliminated altogether and the new promise made to rest upon the moral obligation arising from the promisor's receipt of value. In this view, it must be admitted that there would be more reason for upholding the subsequent promise if, as in Goulding v. Davidson, the original consideration moved to the promisor personally, than in a case like GILBERT v. BROWN, where the consideration moved to the husband. As already shown, some of the cases uphold the validity of the new promise, even in the latter event.

It is obvious that the question discussed in this note does not legitimately arise where there was a new consideration at the time of the new promise, whether that consideration consists of a benefit to the promisor or a detriment to the promisee. In Spitz v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 8 Lea, 641, the court expressly refrained from passing upon the question whether the surrender of a note executed by a married woman alone would constitute a good consideration for a note executed by her after discovery, and upheld the validity of the new note upon the ground that the surrender by the holder of his right to proceed immediately against the indorsers on the original note constituted a sufficient contemporaneous consideration to sustain the new promise.

after the death of her husband, were without consideration; and this court has held that, where the original obligation is void, a promise to pay after she became discoverer does not make it binding on her. The contract of a married woman, being void, cannot be ratified. Chaney v. Flynn, 2 Ky. L. Rep. 417; Bagby v. Bagby, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 540; Marble v. Marble, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 360. The original note in this case, not being for necessities furnished the wife, was void as to her. And, following the rule laid down in the above-cited cases, the execution of the renewal note in 1895, and her individual note executed in lieu thereof after the death of her husband, was void, and of no binding force and effect whatever. In the case of Grimes v. Grimes, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 549, 89 S. W. 548, in which the wife was induced to execute her own note in satisfaction of the note against her deceased husband, it was held that there was not consideration sufficient to support the execution of this last note, as the wife received nothing from the estate of her deceased husband. In the case before us there is no evidence that any property subject to execution was received by Nancy Brown from the estate of her deceased husband, W. H. Brown. And there was therefore no consideration for the execution by her of the note to take up the note of her deceased husband.

We do not deem it necessary to pass upon the other question raised upon this appeal; but, for the reasons given, the judgment is reversed for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

v.

CHARLES L. TUCKER.

(189 Mass. 457, 76 N. E. 127.)

Appeal—withdrawal of plea.

1. The appellate court cannot review the action of the trial court in refusing to permit an accused to withdraw his plea of not guilty and file a special plea to the indictment.

Jury—venire—service—qualification of officer.

2. That a constable has not given the bond required by statute to qualify him for serving civil process does not disqualify him for serving a venire for the summoning of a jury in a criminal case.

Evidence—poverty of accused.

3. For the purpose of connecting one accused of murder with money taken from the possession of the victim, evidence is admissible that, before the crime, accused was short of money, pawning his belongings, and that, after the crime, he had money, as well as his statements as to his lack of money, his losses, and his financial transactions before and after the crime; and the fact that it has not been shown as yet that money had been taken from the possession of the victim is immaterial.

Bill of exceptions—sufficiency—introduction of evidence.

4. That evidence upon a certain question was presented at the trial is sufficiently shown by a bill of exceptions which states that no question was made but that there was evidence for the jury upon all the issues submitted to them, where the instructions show that the issue upon which the evidence is claimed to be wanting was submitted to them.

Evidence—erroneous admission—waiver.

5. Failure to request the exclusion of evidence which has become immaterial because not connected with the point in issue will waive the error of its admission, although objection was made to it at the time it was offered, which was overruled upon the promise to connect it with the issue.

Trial—opening speech—promises.

6. In the absence of anything to show want of good faith on the part of the prosecuting attorney in making statements in his opening speech to the jury, the court is not in error in relying upon them, although he is not able to produce evidence promised.

Evidence obtained wrongfully—admissibility.

7. If officers armed with a search warrant, upon presenting it at the home of one accused of crime, are invited by his mother to enter and search the premises, so that they do not act under the warrant, evidence obtained during the search is not

Case Note.—Elements of deliberation and premeditation as affected by the brevity of the period elapsing between the resolution to kill and the homicide:—The statement in the foregoing opinion, to the effect that the law will not undertake to state any limit to the time which must elapse between the formation of an intent to kill and its consummation in the homicide, in order to admit of a finding of the existence of the elements of deliberation and premeditation essential to a conviction of murder in the first degree, is abundantly sustained by the authorities, as is apparent from the cases hereafter cited. That a very brief period is sufficient for this purpose is manifest from the general declarations that the courts have made with reference to the subject, as well as the holdings in concrete cases.

In the cases herein cited nothing appeared to show that an intent to kill had been entertained prior to the beginning of the affray which culminated in the homicide; yet in all of them it was held that sufficient time elapsed between the evident formation inadmissible against accused, although the act may have been a trespass as against him.

Handwriting—comparison—standard.

8. Under a rule that a standard for comparison of handwriting must be established by direct proof or equivalent evidence, a signature may be established for such purpose by showing that it was attached to a slip handed in by the one whose name it is, and whose signature it is alleged to be, and whose duty it is to fill out and sign such slips, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

Same—question for court.

9. Although the preliminary question as to the authenticity of standards for the comparison of handwriting is for the court, it is not error to submit the final determination of that question to the jury.

of the intent to kill and the killing, even though of the briefest duration, to admit of a finding of deliberation and premeditation essential to constitute murder in the first degree.

In Bailey v. State, 70 Ga. 617, the court said that it is not necessary that the deliberate intention to take life should exist for any particular length of time, even before the killing; that, if it enters the mind of the slayer the moment before he fires the shot, that is sufficient; it is deliberately intentional at the time he makes up his mind to shoot, and, if it exists only that length of time, it is sufficient in law.

In Peri v. People, 65 Ill. 17, where the deceased, together with friends, went into the defendant's saloon, and one of his friends became involved in a dispute with the defendant, the latter seized a knife, for which one of the party remonstrated with him, and stabbed deceased with it. The court, in affirming a conviction of murder in the first degree, said: "Whilst it appears that there was but a short space in which to form a deliberate purpose, still, when we can see no such assault as to create a well-founded apprehension of great bodily harm, or such provocation as was calculated to produce an irresistible passion on the part of . . . [defendant] as would justify the homicide or reduce it to manslaughter, we must conclude the accused acted with sufficient deliberation."

It is sufficient, in order to constitute premeditation in the eye of the law, that the defendant had the intention for a minute, as well as for an hour, or a day, before he stabbed deceased. State v. Bowles, 146 Mo. 6, 69 Am. St. Rep. 598, 47 S. W. 892.

In Daughdrill v. State, 113 Ala. 7, 21 So. 378, the court said that the words "deliberate" and "premeditated," as used in the statute, mean only this: That the slayer must intend, before the blow is delivered, though it be for only an instant of time before, that he will strike at the time he does strike, and that death will be the result of the blow; or, in other words, if the slayer had any time to think before Evidence—photograph—discretion.

10. The trial court has discretion to admit in evidence a photograph of wearing apparel taken from a murdered body, although the apparel is in court at the time of the trial.

Same—writing.

11. Upon a trial for murder, it is not error to admit in evidence the name and address on a card found in the pocket of accused, in connection with a slip of paper found near the dead body, containing a name and address which are alleged to have been written shortly after the crime was committed, and which are similar to that on the card, as tending to connect accused, through an association of ideas, with the writing on the paper.

Same—experiment.

12. Evidence of an experiment made by the act, however short such time may have been, even a single moment, and did think, and struck the blow as a result of an intention to kill, produced by this even momentary operation of the mind, and death ensued, that would be a deliberate and premeditated killing within the meaning of the statute.

Thus, in Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615, the court said if "the intention to shoot entered the mind even a moment before the firing, and the slayer does shoot, and the effect of the shot is death, I can see no reason why a deliberate intention to kill is not manifested by the circumstances."

"Whilst malice and premeditation involve a prior intention to do the act in question, it is not necessary that this intention should have been conceived for any particular time. It is as much premeditation if it be entered into the mind a moment before the act as if it entered years before." State v. Dennison, 44 La. Ann. 135, 10 So. 599.

Thus, in the following instances where the length of the period elapsing between the formation and consummation of the intent to kill was measured by the time required for the intervening acts and occurrences while presumably following in rapid sequence, the period, though very brief, was held sufficient to admit, so far as it was concerned, of a finding of premeditation and deliberation essential to murder in the first degree:

Where defendant, after the fancied provocation, put on his shoes, arose, stepped back about two steps, drew his pistol, and shot deceased. McKenzie v. State, 26 Ark. 334.

Where deceased, after having attacked defendant with an axe, but failing to strike him, walked away, and, when about 60 feet from defendant, the latter stealthily approached, and, seizing the axe, slew him. King v. State, 68 Ark. 572, 82 Am. St. Rep. 307, 60 S. W. 951.

Where defendant, after having turned his gun on deceased and threatened to kill him, turned and walked away with the gun, followed by deceased, then turned about and shot the latter; even upon the assumpan expert to determine whether or not a stab in the body of a murdered person severed a particular vein is properly excluded.

Same—supporting witness—statements.

13. The mere making of contradictory statements on cross-examination does not justify the admission of evidence of prior statements to support the witness by corroborating the testimony given on direct examination, although the contradiction consisted of the admission of the making of prior statements in conflict with the testimony given, so that it may be contended that the testimony is a matter of recent contrivance.

Same—talking with defense.

14. The mere fact that a witness admits that he has talked with a person assisting in preparing the defense in a criminal case does not show such bias or moral duress as to make admissible evidence of state-tion that the intent was formed after the first attempt and threat. McAdams v. State, 25 Ark. 405.

7 Where defendant, after picking up a gun, immediately went down a stairway and shot deceased; even assuming that the intent to kill was formed after taking up the gun. Dixon v. State, 128 Ala. 54, 29 So. 623.

7 Where defendant, upon seeing deceased, a stranger, walking with his wife, approached, and, after some words, stabbed him. State v. Peppers, 80 Iowa, 580, 46 N. W. 662.

Where deceased having resisted defendant's efforts to eject him from a saloon, defendant drew a knife and struck him on the shoulder, whereupon the deceased drew a knife but dropped it, the defendant picking it up and then drawing a revolver and shooting him. Mitchum v. State, supra.

Where defendant, having gone to the deceased's home to collect a bill, was thrown from the door by the latter and ran out of the yard, cursing the deceased and daring him to come out, and shot the latter as he reached the gate. Lovett v. State, 30 Fla. 142, 17 L.R.A. 705, 11 So. 550.

7 Where defendant, having been ordered off an engine, and having reached the ground, asked the engineer to hold a light so that he could find his hat, and, while the engineer was complying with the request, shot him. State v. Dowden, 118 N. C. 1145, 24 S. E. 722.

7 Where defendant, after receiving the provocation, drew a revolver from his pocket with his left hand, transferred it to his right hand behind his back, and shot deceased. State v. Daniel, 139 N. C. 549, 51 S. E. 858.

7 Where, deceased and another having engaged in a scuffle, and the deceased, having been struck with a roll of tar paper, seized a stick of wood, the defendant came up and seized a wagon spoke and killed him. Savary v. State, 62 Neb. 166, 87 N. W. 34.

7 Where defendant, a patient in a hospital, after receiving his fancied provocation from a nurse, borrowed a knife from another patient, the latter opening it at his request, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ments made prior to that time, tending to support his testimony.

Same—statements in argument—effect.

15. The view of the cross-examination of a witness taken by the attorney general in arguing the case to the jury cannot affect a ruling upon the admissibility of evidence to support the witness, under a view of the cross-examination which the court had a right to take at the time.

Same—expert—identification of article.

16. The question whether or not a particular pin is one shown in a photograph is not one for expert testimony.

Murder—first degree—definition.

17. To bring a homicide within the statute defining murder in the first degree as one committed with deliberately premeditated malice aforethought, all that is necessary is that a resolution to kill must have followed deliberation and premeditation, and and rapidly followed the nurse and inflicted a fatal wound upon her, although but ten or twenty seconds elapsed between the first intimation of his purpose and the infliction of the fatal wound. Com. v. Buccieri, 153 Pa. 535, 26 Atl. 228.

Where defendant, immediately after receiving the provocation, held his head down a moment with his hand in his pocket, and suddenly drew a knife and inflicted the fatal wound. State v. Bell, 136 Mo. 120, 37 S. W. 823.

Where defendant, an escaped convict, who was walking with deceased, with whom he had just become acquainted, was heard to say, "You will raise hell," and immediately shot deceased. State v. Tabor, 95 Mo. 585, 8 S. W. 744.

Where the defendant, being angered by deceased, drew a pistol, but was prevented from using it, and, some moments afterwards, called deceased names, reached over the bar and struck him a blow in the face, and again drew his pistol, and, being seized by bystanders, broke away from them and shot deceased. State v. Wieners, 66 Mo. 13.

Where defendant drew a knife and stabbed deceased while engaged in a fight with him. State v. Bowles, 146 Mo. 6, 69 Am. St. Rep. 598, 47 S. W. 892.

Where defendant, having made an assault with a heavy cane upon the deceased, and the cane having been taken away by bystanders, followed the deceased, who was retreating, and, drawing a pistol, shot him. State v. Dennison, 44 La. Ann. 135, 10 So. 599.

Where sufficient time elapsed to permit the defendant to draw a revolver from his pocket and fire it. People v. Brunt, 27 N. Y. Week. Dig. 427, 11 N. Y. S. R. 59.

Where sufficient time elapsed to permit of defendant to put his hand in his pocket and release a revolver, which was caught in the lining, and shoot the deceased. People v. Conroy, 97 N. Y. 62.

Where defendant choked the deceased to death, about three minutes being required.

that the killing must have been in pursuance of the resolution, regardless of the rapidity with which the commission of the crime followed its first suggestion.

Juror—taking notes—effect.

18. Taking notes of the testimony, by a juror, does not require the setting aside of the verdict; but the matter is within the discretion of the trial court.

(November 28, 1905.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Middlesex County convicting him of murder. Overruled.

In June, 1904, Mabel Page was found to have been murdered. Suspicion fell upon defendant, and he was placed upon trial for that crime.

People v. Pullerson, 150 N. Y. 339, 53 N. E. 1119.

Where defendant, a convict, having engaged in a fight, broke away from keepers who interfered, drew a knife which he had previously concealed about his person, and stabbed another convict. People v. Johnson, 139 N. Y. 358, 34 N. E. 920.

Where defendant came up to where deceased, a policeman, was scuffling with an intoxicated person, whom he was assisting home, and struck deceased with a stick, in People v. Clark, 7 N. Y. 385, it was said: "It is enough that the intention precedes the act, although that follows instantly."

In Perugi v. State, 104 Wis. 230, 76 Am. St. Rep. 865, 80 N. W. 593, the court approved a charge to the effect that there is, in law, sufficient deliberation to constitute murder in the first degree, no matter whether the design to take life had been for a long time contemplated by the slayer, or whether the design to kill was formed by him at the instant of the fatal shot. That it is enough that the intention to kill preceded the fatal act although the act followed instantly.

Where defendant, who was intoxicated, broke down a door, and dragged deceased from his house, and struck him in several places with a club. Com. v. McFall, Addison (Pa.) 255.

Where defendant, having engaged in a dispute with deceased and been knocked down by him, turned, arose, and walked toward deceased, but turned and walked back, and, turning again with his hand behind him, came up to deceased and stabbed him with a knife he had concealed in his hand. Com. v. Morrison, 193 Pa. 613, 44 Atl. 913.

Where defendant fatally stabbed a street-car conductor, who was attempting to eject him from a car. Keenan v. Com. 44 Pa. 55, 84 Am. Dec. 414. The court said that an intent to kill, distinctively formed even "for a moment" before it is carried into effect, is sufficient.

Where, a dispute having arisen among defendant and others riding in a wagon, re-

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

The broken pieces of knife were procured by means of a search warrant, which was obtained for the purpose of searching defendant's house in order to obtain them and to use them as evidence against him. By sulting in a scuffle, the defendant, after saying, "let's quit," jumped from the wagon, taking with him a bundle, from which he drew a pistol and shot deceased. People v. Calton, 5 Utah, 451, 16 Pac. 902. The court said, however, that the evidence warranted the inference that the defendant formed the design to kill before he jumped from the wagon.

Where deceased approached defendant after a dispute with him, and tried to induce him to go into a barroom, and defendant went 8 or 9 feet away, drew a pistol with which he had previously armed himself, and fired two shots into the floor, and, as deceased ran up, grappled with him and fired the fatal shot. Clifford v. State, 58 Wis. 477, 17 N. W. 304.

Where deceased, in a dispute with defendant, threatened to kick the former's head off, and defendant immediately drew a revolver and shot deceased. Perugi v. State, supra.

Where defendant shot deceased as the latter was approaching him in a threatening attitude, immediately after a fancied provocation. Daughdrill v. State, 113 Ala. 7, 21 So. 378.

Where deceased, a storekeeper, having declined to give defendant any change until he found certain missing money which he charged defendant with having taken, the defendant insisted upon having his change, and deceased refused to give it, but finally stated that he would go upstairs and get a bill changed in order to stop the fuss, and, as he started toward the door, the defendant began quarreling again, and finally, stepping between the deceased and the door, shot him. Bailey v. State, 70 Ga. 617.

Hammond, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have not found it necessary to consider whether the indictment should have been quashed for the reasons set forth in the special plea and the motion to quash, because we are of opinion that that question is not before us for decision. The defendant, having entered a plea of not guilty, was not entitled, as a matter of right, to retract his plea and plead anew. He could do this only by the permission of the court (1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 436; Com. v. Lake, 12 Allen, 188; Com. v. Lannan, 13 Allen, 563), and whether that permission should be granted rested with the sound discretion of that court. Acting under that discretion, the court declined to allow the defendant to retract his general plea, overruled the motion, and therefore, because not filed in time, the plea. No error in law is shown in this decision. It was final, and cannot be revised by this court.

2. The only objection to Hubbard, who was summoned as a jurymen, was that the constable to whom the venire was sent for service had not given a bond to serve civil process. This was not ground for a challenge for cause. The statutes provide that "the venires shall be delivered to the sheriff of the county to be transmitted by him to a constable in each of the cities and towns to which they are respectively issued, who shall forthwith serve them in cities on the board authorized to draw jurors and in towns on the selectman and town clerk." Rev. Laws, chap. 176, § 11. After the jurors are drawn, "the constable shall, four days at least before the time when the jurors are required to attend, summon each person who is drawn, . . . and shall make a return of the venire with his doings thereon to the clerk of the court, before the sitting of the court by which it was issued." § 24. It is plain that this is not a service of a writ or an execution in an action between two persons, but is simply a part of the process for the organization of the court. It is special and specific, and we are of opinion that the term "civil process," as used in Rev. Laws, chap. 25, § 88, does not include this specific work. The challenge for cause was rightly disallowed.

3. In the course of his opening address to the jury, the district attorney stated that "the family of the deceased searched the house after the murder, and only 36 cents were found in one pocketbook downstairs in the bureau; that when Amy Roberts, a servant in the family of the deceased, went away in the morning, there was at least a $10 bill and two $1 bills and other money in the deceased's pocketbook downstairs." He then proceeded as follows: "The rest of it [money] had disappeared. It also appears that, shortly before this time, the defendant was trying to raise money to go to St. Louis; that he sold a revolver, . . . several suits of clothes; that he pawned a watch." Here he was interrupted by the defendant's counsel, who contended that any such evidence would be incompetent, and therefore it was improper for the district attorney to speak to the jury about it, even in the opening. Thereupon a colloquy ensued between the court, district attorney, and defendant's counsel, in which the defendant's counsel conceded that it was "competent for them [the government] to show that money was missing from the house, and to argue, if it is possible, that the defendant had that money;" but his contention was that it was not proper to attempt to show that "the defendant was hard up, or that he was attempting to go to St. Louis, or anything which indicated his poverty;" that such evidence does not establish any motive as matter of law. In response to an inquiry from the court, he further said that, if the intention of the district attorney was to show that the defendant was without money prior to the murder, but that afterwards he had money, he would not object. The district attorney then said that he intended to go as far as that. The counsel for the defendant still insisted that the district attorney ought to say "what he intends to prove," and that in the absence of any such further statement the opening remarks referred to were improper. At the end of the colloquy the court allowed the district attorney to finish what he had to say on the subject, "with the understanding that the court has not ruled on it yet, and it will be ruled on when the whole statement is made," and said that the court understood that the defendant had seasonably interrupted to save his rights. The subject was not again referred to by the defendant's counsel, and no further request for a ruling thereon was made. The district attorney then continued as follows: "It will appear, also, gentlemen of the jury, that within a few days after the murder he appeared at a certain place, and displayed money, a part of which was a $10 bill; that he then explained the loss of other money by saying that it had been taken from him by a woman whom he had met at a theater, and afterwards went to a hotel with." During the trial the commonwealth offered evidence in support of this statement of the district attorney, and the court directed the jury to disregard entirely so much of the evidence as related to the defendant's statement that money had been taken from him by a woman.

Following out the purpose thus outlined in the opening, the commonwealth introduced evidence tending to show that upon various occasions within ten days prior to the murder the defendant sold or pawned various articles of personal property, mostly wearing apparel of small value, receiving in all $17.50 in cash; that on April 8th, being a few days after the murder, he redeemed for $5.75 two of the articles pawned before the murder. To the admission of all this evidence the defendant excepted. One Davis, a witness called by the commonwealth, after having testified without objection that on the 6th day of the same April the defendant was in a restaurant where the witness was working, and said that he had needed some money, and had pawned some things a short time before, further testified, subject to the exception of the defendant, that the defendant, upon the same occasion, said that "he had been out on a good time, and lost some money; that he had pawned some . . . to raise money;" that in paying for his dinner, he handed the witness a $10 bill "brown on one side," and that at the same time the witness saw in defendant's possession a $5 and a $2 and some other bills. There was no contention that the articles pawned and sold were not the defendant's property. It also appeared, upon the cross-examination of one of the witnesses called by the commonwealth, that, on the 6th day of the same April, the defendant pawned his own diamond ring, receiving therefor $15.

It is argued by the defendant that before the law the rich and the poor stand alike, and that the poverty of the defendant is not admissible to show a motive in him to commit the crime with which he is charged. All this may be conceded to be true. As stated by Bigelow, Ch. J., in Com. v. Jeffries, 7 Allen, 548, 565, 566, 83 Am. Dec. 712: "It is doubtless true that in a large class of cases the poverty or pecuniary embarrassments of a party accused of crime cannot be shown as substantive evidence of his guilt. The reason for the exclusion of such evidence is that in those cases there is no certain or known connection between the facts offered to be proved and the conclusion which is sought to be established by it. To render evidence of collateral facts competent there must be some natural, necessary, or logical connection between them and the inference or result which they are designed to establish. It does not follow, because a man is destitute, that he will steal, or that, when embarrassed with debt and incapable of meeting his engagements, he will commit forgery." Mere poverty, considered apart from all other facts tending to connect the accused with a crime, never can tend to show criminal intent or criminal motive. Upon this record, however, it is perfectly clear that the evidence, the substance of which we have recited, was offered and admitted upon an entirely different ground, namely, to show that at the time of the murder there was in the house in which the murder was committed a certain amount of money consisting mostly of bank bills, and that shortly after the murder this money was in the possession of the defendant; or, to use the language of the defendant's counsel, "to show that money was missing from the house, and to argue, if it is possible, that the defendant had that money."

Such evidence, unexplained, would tend to show that the defendant was in the house at the time of the murder. It was not necessary that the bills should be identified by earmarks. Com. v. O'Neil, 169 Mass. 394, 48 N. E. 134. One of the steps in such a process might be to show that before the murder the defendant was short of money and after the murder he was not short; that is, to show a marked change in the amount of money in his possession. This the commonwealth undertook to do, and all the evidence which was admitted upon this branch of the case, including the defendant's statements as to his lack of money, his losses, his financial transactions both before and after the murder, and his possession of money, were admissible upon this step. It is true that all this evidence did not tend to connect the defendant with the crime with which he was charged, unless there was evidence tending to show that at the time of the murder money was taken from the house. The court was assured by the district attorney that he expected to show that such was the fact. Evidence must go in by piecemeal, and evidence having a tendency to prove a proposition is not inadmissible simply because it does not wholly prove the proposition. It is enough if, in connection with other evidence, it helps a little. The commonwealth in this part of its case sought to prove two things, namely, that, after the murder, the defendant had more money than before, and that he got some of it from the house. Subject to the direction of the court, the prosecuting officer could begin with either proposition he might see fit; and it was within the discretion of the court to permit him to introduce the evidence tending to prove the first before passing to the evidence tending to prove the second. Relying upon his assurance as to his ability to prove the second, the court permitted him to put in the evidence tending to prove the first.

It is argued by the defendant that, so far as appears from the bill of exceptions, there was no evidence whatever tending to prove the second proposition, namely, that any money was missing from the house; but we do not so interpret the bill of exceptions. Near the end of the bill is the statement that it presents all the testimony material to the questions raised by the bill, and that "no question was made, but that there was evidence for the jury on all the issues submitted to them." In the charge to the jury the court said: "The claim of the commonwealth is that he [the defendant] might well have been there; . . . that he carried from that house upon his knife and his clothing stains of the blood of his victim; that he stole money from her pocket-book. . . . On the other hand, it is claimed by the prisoner that he was not on that day in the Page house at all; . . . and all the circumstances claimed to incriminate him which I have mentioned are denied, or claimed to have been fully accounted for, by him." It thus appears that one of the issues submitted to the jury was "whether he stole the money from her pocketbook;" and the fair interpretation of the bill is that on that issue there was evidence in support of the claim of the commonwealth. But whether or not there was such evidence is not material to the inquiry before us. Even if there was no such evidence upon the second proposition, or if it was insufficient, the most that can be said is that the evidence introduced to prove the first became thereby immaterial; and if, at the close of the whole evidence, the defendant had requested the court to exclude from the consideration of the jury the portion relating to the first, upon the ground that there was no sufficient evidence of the second, and the court had refused to grant the request, there would have been error. But no such action was taken, the defendant preferring, apparently, to stand upon his original exceptions. It is further suggested that at the time the district attorney made his opening he had no reason to suppose that he could show that money had been taken from the house; but there is nothing to show that the statement was not made in good faith, and the trial court, at any rate, committed no error in law in relying upon it. We are of opinion that no error was committed in the action of the court with reference to the opening of the district attorney, or in the admission of the evidence.

4. It was contended by the defendant that the broken pieces of knife found in his coat pocket were not admissible. The exception to their admission was taken in various forms, but, in substance, the ground of the exceptions was that the pieces were obtained by an abuse of legal process, and their admission, therefore, was an infringement of his constitutional rights, especially those under the 4th, 5th, and 14th Amendments to the Federal Constitution, and the 12th and 14th articles of the state Declaration of Rights. The question of the manner in which the articles were obtained was tried before the court in the absence of the jury at the request of the defendant. The evidence is given in great detail in the bill of exceptions. The finding of the court is as follows: "The court finds that one of the purposes of taking out the search warrant alluded to was to search for evidence to be used in this case against the prisoner if there should subsequently be a trial, but that this was not the sole purpose, and that the warrant was taken out in good faith, under an honest belief that the facts stated in the complaint were true, and that one purpose was to search for the article therein mentioned, but that no service was made of this warrant, and that nothing was actually done under it; that officers went with it to the door of the house where Tucker resided, and stated to his mother, at the outside door of the house, that they had this search warrant to search for the article named therein, and offered to let her examine the warrant; that she declined to take it or examine it, and invited the officers to make all the search they desired, saying that she knew her son to be innocent, and thereupon the officers made search, not upon the warrant, but in consequence of her invitation, and in such search found the articles in question; that the warrant bears a return that no service thereof has been made, which we find to be the fact. The court is also of opinion, if this is material and competent, that, if the prisoner's mother had not invited the officers to make the search, they would still have made it under and by virtue of said warrant."

It is strongly argued by the defendant that this finding is not warranted by the evidence, and that the court should have found that, as far as respected the graphophone, the only article named in the warrant, the warrant was not taken out in good faith; and that in entering the house and in searching therein the officers acted solely under their warrant, without any invitation or consent on the part of the defendant's mother. We have carefully examined the evidence bearing upon this matter, and are of the opinion that it fully justifies the finding of the court. It also is to be noted in this connection that, while the court in the first instance had to pass upon these facts, still it recognized that the defendant had the right, also, to the decision of the jury upon them; but the defendant did not desire to go to the jury upon them. We think, therefore, that the finding that neither in entering the house, nor in making the search did the officers proceed under the search warrant, but in consequence of and under the invitation of the mother, must stand. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the argument of the defendant which is based upon the assumption that the articles were obtained by an abuse of legal process.

It is further argued that the defendant did not consent, and that his mother could not consent for him. But that is immaterial. The officers did not act under the warrant, but under the invitation of the mother; and even if, not acting under the warrant, they were trespassers as against the defendant, still this was no abuse of legal process, but simply an individual trespass, and that is not sufficient to exclude the evidence. They might have been liable for the trespass, but the evidence thereby obtained was nevertheless admissible. Com. v. Tibbetts, 157 Mass. 519, 32 N. E. 910; Com. v. Hurley, 158 Mass. 159, 33 N. E. 342; Com. v. Byrnes, 158 Mass. 172, 33 N. E. 343; Com. v. Brelsford, 161 Mass. 61, 36 N. E. 677; Com. v. Acton, 165 Mass. 11, 42 N. E. 329; Com. v. Smith, 166 Mass. 370, 44 N. E. 503.

5. Upon the question whether the written address, "J. L. Morton, Charleston, Mass.," which was found in the Page house shortly after the murder, was in the handwriting of the defendant, the commonwealth offered as standards for comparison certain "sales slips" which it contended were in the handwriting of the defendant. The defendant objected to the use of these slips as standards. As to the authenticity of these standards, the commonwealth made an offer of proof, and to expedite the trial it was agreed by both parties that "all statements of fact [therein] included, . . . together with the offered statements of witnesses therein referred to, were to be considered and taken as facts established by the evidence;" the "defendant contending that such facts were not competent to render the sales slips . . . admissible as standards of the defendant's handwriting." Upon hearing the offer of proof, "the court ruled as a preliminary matter that the agreed statement of facts contained in the . . . offer of proof made the sales slips competent as standards of comparison, but that the jury were to determine from the agreed statement of facts whether such slips were in the handwriting of the defendant." The defendant excepted. We understand the action of the court to be a finding by the court, as a preliminary question of fact, that, upon the agreed statement of facts contained in the offer, the slips were in the handwriting of the defendant, and might be used as standards; but that the question whether they were in the defendant's handwriting should be finally left to the jury.

The first objection of the defendant to this action is that the facts contained in the offer were not sufficient to justify the use of the slips as standards. The defendant contends that the handwriting of a standard must be proved by direct evidence of the signature, "or by some equivalent evidence;" and that the only way in which this can be done is either by the testimony of the witness who saw the defendant write it, or by the defendant's admission that he wrote it. Even if the defendant's contention were correct as to the method of proof, we are of opinion that, upon the facts contained in the offer, the trial court may properly have found that the defendant had admitted the signature upon some of the slips at least to be his. The facts show that it was his duty as salesman, in the instance of every sale, to make a memorandum of the articles sold, their kind and price (using blank forms, called sales slips, furnished for that purpose), together with his name or initials, and to transmit these slips so filled out to a shipping clerk. Many of the slips were delivered to the shipping clerk by the defendant in person. All had upon them the name of "Tucker." As to those which were handed in personally by the defendant, the court might well have found that by that act unexplained the defendant admitted them to be his own handwriting. It was his duty to make them out as memoranda of his work, and to hand them in as such, and the handing in of such a memorandum with his own name upon it would justify a finding, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that he admitted the writing to be his. Com. v. Coe, 115 Mass. 481.

But we do not rest upon this narrow ground, for we are of opinion that the defendant's contention as to the method of proof is not correct. There is a considerable diversity in the various courts as to the use of standards of handwriting and the degree and kind of proof required to establish a piece of writing as a standard. See 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 252 et seq., for a collection of the authorities. But, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, it has been said by this court that here the standard shall be proved by "direct proof of the signature, or other equivalent evidence;" and we understand that to be the true statement of our rule. Com. v. Eastman, 1 Cush. 189, 48 Am. Dec. 596; Martin v. Maguire, 7 Gray, 177; Bacon v. Williams, 13 Gray, 525. An examination of the cases in which this language is used will show, however, that the distinction declared is between evidence based solely upon an inspection of the paper, as, for instance, that given by an expert or one acquainted with the handwriting of the party charged, and who testifies as to the genuineness solely by comparison with another standard or with an exemplar in his own mind, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, evidence of a different kind having a tendency, independent of any opinion as to handwriting, to show that the paper was written by the party charged. In other words, you cannot prove a standard by the opinion of witnesses as to the handwriting of the person charged, whether the opinion be based upon comparison with other writings, or upon a knowledge of the party's handwriting, obtained in any other way. The evidence to prove the standard must be entirely independent of opinion as to handwriting. The first kind of evidence is not sufficient, but the second may be, even if it contain no statement of a witness who saw the standard written, or any admission by the party charged. There is no reason why evidence which, independent of any opinion upon the handwriting as such, justifies a finding beyond a reasonable doubt that the proposed standard was written by the defendant, should not be regarded as the equivalent of evidence given by a witness who testifies that he saw the paper written. And that is so even if the evidence of the genuineness of the writing be partially, or even wholly, circumstantial. Indeed, it is only commonplace to remark that circumstantial evidence is frequently more satisfactory than direct. By reason of mistake, bias, or dishonesty, the testimony of a witness that he saw the standard written may be utterly unreliable, while a compacted mass of circumstantial evidence, the existence of each circumstance being satisfactorily proved, and the proof of each being confirmed by the proof of the other, and all, without an exception, leading by mutual support to but one conclusion, may be impregnable. In the case before us the facts contained in the offer of proof were sufficient to warrant a finding beyond a reasonable doubt that the sales slips were written by the defendant, and, if the writing of these slips had been a crime, and the defendant had been on trial for it, they would have amply justified his conviction of the offense. To say that such evidence is not the equivalent of the evidence of a witness who testifies that he saw the standard written is to fly in the face of common experience, and to ignore the basis upon which rest the leading principles of our system of evidence. The court made no error in admitting these slips as standards.

6. The court, having admitted the slips as standards, in its closing charge submitted to the jury the question whether they were written by the defendant, instructing them that, "unless the commonwealth shows by strong, undoubted proof,—that is, by proof beyond a reasonable doubt,—that the writing upon these slips was actually made by the defendant, and if [the jury] do not so find, they are not to be used at all; and the jury should wholly disregard them and all the great body of evidence which they have heard about them." No exception was taken by the defendant to these instructions; but it is objected by him that the decision of the court that the slips were written by the defendant was final, and that the submission of that question to the jury was error. In support of this position the defendant has cited some authorities from other jurisdictions which seem to support his contention; but here, as in other branches of the law, as to the admission, proof, and use of standards, there is much conflict in the authorities (see, for instance, Rowell v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 688, 10 Atl. 853; State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 460), and it would serve no useful purpose to review them here.

The law with reference to the decision of preliminary questions concerning the admissibility of evidence, especially in criminal cases, has been quite recently considered by this court in Com. v. Reagan, 175 Mass. 335, 78 Am. St. Rep. 496, 56 N. E. 577, and we need only refer to that case and the cases therein cited to show what the practice is in this state. The practice as to confessions is thus stated by Morton, Ch. J., in Com. v. Preece, 140 Mass. 276, 5 N. E. 494: "When a confession is offered in evidence, the question whether it is voluntary is to be decided primarily by the presiding justice. If he is satisfied that it is voluntary, it is admissible; otherwise, it should be excluded. When there is conflicting testimony, the humane practice in this commonwealth is for the judge, if he decides that it is admissible, to instruct the jury that they may consider all the evidence, and that they should exclude the confession if, upon the whole evidence in the case, they are satisfied that it was not the voluntary act of the defendant." In Com. v. Reagan, ubi supra, the same doctrine was said to be applicable to the question of the competency of a witness to understand the nature of an oath. In these and similar questions the defendant has the right to the decision of the court upon the admissibility of the evidence, and, if the decision involves a finding of fact, he has a right to such finding. But if in a criminal case the decision is against the defendant, he has another chance before the jury, so far as it depends upon a question of fact. In passing upon the question of the authenticity of the proposed standards in the first instance, and then submitting any question of fact involved for the final determination of the jury, the court followed the uniform and long-continued practice of this commonwealth.

In addition to the authorities cited from other jurisdictions, the defendant, in support of his contention that the decision of the court is final in the sense that it cannot be submitted afterward to the jury, cites Com. v. Coe, 115 Mass. 481, 435; Cos- telo v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 588, 590, 2 N. E. 098. But it is manifest that in each of those cases where the court says or implies that the decision of the court is final, unless error in law is shown, the meaning simply is that it is final so far as respects the power of this court to revise it on questions of fact, and the language has no reference to the powers or rights of the jury. In Com. v. Coe, Wells, J., uses the following language, which not only shows the sense in which the decision of the court is said to be final, but also hints at the practice of considering the decision of the court as only preliminary: "Upon the question whether a given writing or written word is sufficiently proved to have been written by the defendant to allow it to be submitted to the jury as a standard of comparison, the judge at the trial must pass in the first instance. So far as his decision is of a question of fact merely, it must be final if there is any proper evidence to support it. As in all questions of that nature, exceptions to the ruling at the trial will be sustained only when they show clearly that there was some erroneous application of the principles of law to the facts of the case, or that the evidence was admitted without proper proof of the qualifications requisite for its competency." In other words, the finding of the trial court, so far as respects facts, cannot be revised by this court provided the finding is justified by the evidence. These cases adjudicate nothing as to the power or duty of the trial court, after admitting the evidence, to submit the question to the jury under proper instructions. In dismissing this branch of the case, it may be remarked that, even if the court's decision was final in the sense urged by the defendant, it is difficult to see how the defendant in this case could be harmed by having another chance given to him by the submission of the question to the jury.

7. The exception to the refusal of the court to allow the defendant to interrogate Carvalho, an expert in handwriting, called as a witness by the government, as to certain mistakes which he had made in testifying in other cases, as well as the exception to the action of the court in permitting the same witnesses to use certain photographs as "chalks," must be overruled. These were matters within the discretion of the court. This is too clear to require further comment or the citation of authorities. No error therefore appears in these rulings.

8. It does not appear distinctly that the defendant took any exception to the admission of the addresses upon the postal card taken from the clothing of the defendant at 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the time of his arrest. The bill of exceptions recites only that "they were introduced in evidence subject to the defendant's objection." As both parties, however, have argued the question upon the assumption that the defendant did except, we have assumed that the word "objection" inadvertently appears instead of "exception." The commonwealth contends that the written words, "Morton & Co." and "Charlestown," which there was testimony to show were written by the defendant, were competent, because of the inferences to be drawn from the close resemblance of the name and address to that which appeared upon the writing found near the body of the deceased and alleged to have been written shortly after the murder had been committed, and may have had a tendency to establish a connection through an association of ideas between the defendant and the J. L. Morton address. The bearing of the evidence, it is true, is very slight, but its weight was for the jury. We cannot say that its admission was erroneous.

9. As to the admission of the photograph of the corsets of the deceased, worn at the time of her death, and appearing to have been cut by a knife, it is sufficient to say that, so far as respects the questions whether the corsets were in the same condition at the time the photograph was taken as at the time of the murder, with the exception of the change naturally arising from handling, and whether such change would have any substantial or material effect upon the use of the photograph as evidence, were in the first instance for the court. Blair v. Pelham, 118 Mass. 420. The evidence justified a finding for the commonwealth upon both of these questions, and, the court having admitted the photograph, it is to be taken that it so found. And it was within the discretion of the court to admit the photograph to show the condition of the corsets at the time the photographs were taken, although at the time of the trial, which was nearly six months later, the corsets themselves were in court. The photograph was a representation of a part of the history of the condition of the corsets from the time of the murder to the time of the trial, and may have been of assistance to the jury in the consideration of questions relating to the substance and fabric of the material of which such corsets were made, and of the possibility of changes therein where the cut was made, as well as for the purpose of comparing the photograph with the corsets as the jury saw them.

10. There is nothing in the exception to the hypothetical question put to the witness Harris, an expert in surgery, called by the government. "Where expert testimony is offered by way of answers to hypothetical questions, much must be left to the discretion of the presiding judge. The jury are instructed to disregard the answers, unless they find the facts as assumed in the questions; but, as it cannot be known in advance what may be the ultimate decision of the jury as to the facts in dispute, the usual practice is to allow counsel, in framing a hypothetical question, to assume the existence of such facts and conditions as the jury may have a right to find upon the evidence as it then is, or as there may be fair reason to suppose it may thereafter appear to be; and, in determining whether a hypothetical question shall be allowed, the judge in many cases must rely to a great extent upon the good faith of counsel in their statements as to what they expect the evidence will be." Anderson v. Albertstamm, 176 Mass. 87, 91, 57 N. E. 215. Under this rule of practice, the question was properly admitted.

11. The exception to the use by Dr. Harris of a photograph of the pieces of the broken knife blade put together is untenable. The sole objection of the defendant was that the original pieces were already in evidence, but this did not prevent the use of the photograph as a chalk. It might be so used just as the witness, in illustration of his testimony, might have drawn upon a blackboard a sketch of the pieces if in the opinion of the court such an illustration might be of assistance to the jury.

12. One of the questions claimed at the trial of the defendant to be material was whether the azygous vein of the victim was severed by the stab in the back, the commonwealth contending that it was and the defendant contending to the contrary; and, as is usual upon such occasions, the expert witnesses divided on that question, each taking the view favorable to the side by which he was called. Dr. Pease, a medical expert called by the defendant, on direct examination testified at first, in substance, that, while it was barely possible that the vein was thus severed, yet it was highly improbable, and finally said that to him it seemed impossible. He was then asked whether he had made any experiments for the purpose of "ascertaining that opinion," and in reply, he said that he had. To this question and answer no objection was made. The defendant then asked him what experiments he had made. Upon objection by the commonwealth, this question was excluded, and the defendant excepted. The following question was then put to him by the defendant: "Let me ask you, in order to make the matter clear, whether or not you have made experiments upon a body, a human body approximating the size of the body of the victim in this case as described to you?" To which he answered, "I have." Whereupon the attorney general objected, because it was immaterial whether he had or not, to which the defendant's counsel replied: "I am simply trying, in order to save whatever rights we have, to make the facts conform as closely as they can to this case. I am not intending to ask him any further. I understand your Honors having ruled it out." The attorney general then said: "Well, it was ruled out, as I understand your Honors, because the experiment is absolutely immaterial and uninformative, and therefore whether he has or not made an experiment is incompetent and immaterial;" and then the court ordered the evidence stricken out.

We have stated this matter in detail, because the defendant has argued that the witness was not allowed to testify that he had made an experiment upon a dead body approximating in size that of the deceased. But he was allowed, without exception, to show that he had made experiments, and it was only when he undertook to define the nature of the experiment in some detail that he was stopped. We understand the ruling of the court to be, in substance, that he could not show the nature of the experiment, not that he could not show that he had experimented. Whether the details of an experiment not otherwise material may be shown as having some bearing as substantive evidence upon a question on trial depends upon the nature of the question and that of the experiment. If, for instance, the question be with reference to the operation, chemical or otherwise, of some natural force which acts uniformly under any given conditions, and the conditions under which the experiment is made are shown to be so similar to those which existed in the case on trial that the court can see that the experiment may be really of assistance to the jury, the details of the experiment may be put in as independent evidence. The true ground of admitting the details and result of such an experiment is that it may be of assistance, but the question whether it may be or whether it may or may not lead to too many collateral questions is largely within the discretion of the court. It is manifest that, in view of the nature of the question in dispute, namely, whether the azygous vein was cut by the stab in the back, taken in connection with the difference necessarily existing between the conditions in the case on trial and those under which the experiment was performed, and the obvious difficulty, if not impossibility, of ascertaining whether such difference had any material effect upon the result, the court was fully justified in excluding the experiment or any inquiry into its nature.

It is argued, however, that, inasmuch as an expert has the right to explain the reasons for his opinion, it was competent for the witness to state this experiment in detail to fortify his opinion. But it is settled in this commonwealth that the rule allowing an expert to give the reasons for his opinion has its limitations, and one of them is thus stated by W. Allen, J., in Hunt v. Boston, 152 Mass. 168, 25 N. E. 82: "A party cannot put in evidence incompetent facts under the guise of fortifying the opinion of his witness, even if the evidence might have been properly admitted on cross-examination to test the opinion of the expert." Accordingly, it was held in that case that an expert witness on the value of land could not include in the statement of his reasons his knowledge of certain sales in the neighborhood, the sales not being such as were competent evidence of the value of the petitioner's land. The experiment being incompetent as substantive evidence, the court properly excluded all evidence as to its nature, even whether made upon a dead or a living body, although offered under the guise of a reason for the opinion of the witness.

13. One Doyle, called by the defendant, testified that he saw the defendant pass his (the witness's) house between 12:15 P. M. and 12:30 P. M. on the day of the murder. On cross-examination he was questioned at considerable length as to whether he had not made previous statements inconsistent with this statement. The defendant then offered to show by a re-examination of this witness, and afterwards by one Hammond, called by the defendant, that the witness, about ten days after the murder, told Hammond that he saw "the defendant . . . passing by his [the witness's] house, on March 31, 1904, between 12:15 and 12:30, and that he [Doyle] said that he was sure it was" the defendant. This evidence was offered to show that the testimony of the witness Doyle as to this occurrence was "not a matter of recent contrivance." The evidence was excluded, and it is strongly argued by the defendant that the credibility of the witness having been attacked upon the cross-examination the evidence should have been admitted for the purpose for which it was offered. In the books there always has been a difference of opinion as to the admissibility of previous statements to corroborate a witness. In Craig v. Craig, 5 Rawle, 97, there is an instructive opinion by Gibson, Ch. J., on this subject, in which 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

some of the leading authorities are mentioned, and the question is briefly, but forcibly, discussed. In our own state the leading case on this subject is Com. v. Jenkins, 10 Gray, 485. In that case, Graham, a witness called by the commonwealth, had previously testified in the same case in the police court. The defendant attempted to show by cross-examination of this and other witnesses that Graham, in testifying in the police court, gave a different account of the transaction from that given by him at this trial. The attorney of the commonwealth then, for the purpose of confirming and corroborating the testimony of Graham at this trial, was allowed to introduce evidence that Graham on another occasion, when not under oath and when the defendant was not present, before the examination in the police court, gave substantially the same account of the transaction as that given by him at this trial. It was held that this was error, and that the testimony should have been excluded. In the opinion it was said by Bigelow, J.: "The purpose of the government in offering these statements was to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice, which the defendant had sought to invalidate and discredit by proof that on the preliminary examination before the police court the witness had given a different account of his interviews and dealings with the defendant from that to which he had testified before the jury. Although there is some contrariety of opinion in the books on the question of the competency of such evidence, it seems to us that on principle it ought to be excluded. It has no legitimate or logical tendency to establish the corroboration for which it is offered. How did the case stand on the evidence of the accomplice, when the government offered the statements objected to? He had testified in behalf of the government to an account of his dealings with the defendant concerning the stolen property. The counsel for the defendant then called witnesses to show that at a previous time he had given under oath a different account of this same transaction. This evidence was offered, not for the purpose of proving the truth of such previous statements, but to show that he was unworthy of belief, inasmuch as he had given two inconsistent accounts of the same transaction, one of which was necessarily untrue. . . . It did not relieve the difficulty, or in any degree corroborate the last story told by the witness, to show that previously he had made similar statements of the transaction. The discredit arising from the fact that he had made contradictory statements remained untouched. The contradiction was not disproved by such evidence, and this was all that the prior statements were offered to establish. . . . Such a corroboration is altogether too slight and remote." After proceeding further to show why the general rule should be adopted, the opinion goes on to say that the decision in the case "is not to be understood as conflicting with a class of cases, in which a witness is sought to be impeached, by cross-examination or by independent evidence, tending to show that at the time of giving his evidence he is under a strong bias, or in such a situation as to put him under a moral duress to testify in a particular way. In such case, it is competent to rebut this ground of impeachment, and to support the credit of the witnesses by showing that, when he was under no such bias, or when he was free from any influence or pressure, he made statements similar to those which he has given at the trial. Another similar class of decisions . . . is also to be distinguished from the case at bar, namely, when an attempt is made to impeach the credit of a witness by showing that he formerly withheld or concealed the facts to which he has now testified. In such cases, it is competent to show that the witness, at an early day, . . . did declare the facts to which he has testified." It was held that the case was not within either of these exceptions, and accordingly that the evidence was improperly admitted.

At the time the evidence in the case at bar was excluded, there had been no attempt to impeach the credit of Doyle except by his cross-examination; and it therefore becomes necessary to examine that to see if there was any other impeachment of his credit than that which necessarily and ordinarily would arise from the fact that he had made contradictory statements. In his cross-examination, he stated that at the office of the attorney general, in the presence of a stenographer and several other persons whose faces he could not recall, he had made a statement of the case; that he had testified before the grand jury; that he could not tell how many times since then he had talked over the fact of the defendant's passing his house; that he had talked the matter over with one Ducey, an officer who was assisting in the preparation of the defense; that ever since he had talked with the state officers about the case, he had expected to testify; that he intended to tell the truth before the grand jury, and also at the office of the attorney general in Boston; and, that so far as he remembered, his present testimony was in accordance with that given by him before the grand jury; that he remembered that, before the grand jury, he was asked whether he saw the defendant on the day of the murder; that he replied in the affirmative, and said that he saw him two different times, "once between 1:30 and 1:45," at the Metropolitan boathouse, in company with one Bourne, and next at 3 o'clock; that he did not remember that he was asked whether he had seen the defendant at any time "except that once, and with Bourne," but he would not say he was not asked that question; that he did not know whether he then said that he "couldn't say for sure" whether he saw him go down past his (the witness's) house; that he would not say he did not say that; and that he would not say whether he did not say that he could not tell whether the defendant went by the house or not. And, finally, this question was put to him: "Now didn't you say in my office and to other people that you couldn't tell who the man was that passed your house; that you couldn't describe his dress; that you couldn't tell whether he had a beard or not; and you couldn't tell which way he was going? Haven't you said all those things before you came on to the stand here to-day?" To this question, he said, in substance, that he did not know,—would not say whether he had or had not.

The first question is whether, in this examination, it appeared that the witness ever had made any statements inconsistent with his then present testimony about seeing the defendant going by the witness's house. As to his testimony before the grand jury, he said that, while testifying there, he intended to tell the truth, and that, so far as he could recall his testimony there, it was the same as here. So far there is no evidence of contradiction. Upon being further pressed, he finally said that he did not know whether he there said: "I can't say for sure whether I saw him [the defendant] go down past our house;" although he would not say that he did not then say so; that he did not remember that he said it. Here, too, there is no direct contradiction of his present testimony. If, however, it be assumed that, when a witness, upon being asked whether he formerly made a certain statement, replies that he does not know whether he did or not, but that he will not say he did not, this may be an admission by implication that he did say it, or that upon such evidence it may be legitimately inferred that he did say it, still we have at the utmost here evidence that before the grand jury the witness said that he could not say for sure whether he saw the defendant go past his house on the day of the murder. This was a simple contradictory statement at the most. The same remarks may be made about the effect of the answer of the witness to the general question above quoted in full, with reference to whether the witness had not said in the attorney general's office, and to other people, that he could not tell who the man was who passed his house, nor which way he was going, nor how he was dressed. If the answers of the witness that he did not know, but would not swear whether he had or not, are to be regarded as sufficient to warrant the inference that he had made such statements, still here, as in the matter of his testimony before the grand jury, the statements are simply contradictory of his testimony at the trial; and, within the doctrine laid down in Com. v. Jenkins, 10 Gray, 485, they do not justify the admission of the evidence offered by the defendant. It is argued, however, that the situation was such as to bring the offer within the exception to this general rule, namely, when an attempt is made to impeach the credit of a witness by showing that he formerly withheld or concealed facts to which he has now testified; or, in other words, where it may be contended that the testimony of the witness is a matter of recent contrivance. In a certain sense it is always true that every prior statement of a witness inconsistent with the one made by him at a trial has or may have a tendency to show that the latter is a matter of recent contrivance. It is certainly a recent statement and may be recently contrived. If the exception to the rule is to be so broad as to permit in every such case the introduction of previous consistent statements to prop up the credibility of the witness, the exception would very soon abolish the general rule. The general rule is founded upon sound policy. The corroborative evidence, even when admitted, can have, at most, only a very indirect bearing upon the credibility of the witness, while from its very nature it may be likely to influence the jury as substantive evidence of its own truthfulness. And, since the danger that the evidence will have such an illegitimate influence is so great, it is important that the general rule should be adhered to unless the case appears clearly within the exception.

It is to be noted that this is not a case in which the commonwealth attempted to impeach the credit of the witness by showing that he formerly withheld or concealed the fact that he had seen the defendant pass his house. The position of the commonwealth was that he had made contradictory statements about that, and the admissions of the witness (if admissions they may be called), were simply to that effect.

It was not a case where he had failed in former statements to speak on the subject, but where, in speaking on the subject, he had made previous statements inconsistent with his testimony at the trial. In other words, it was a simple case of contradictory statements, and so far was within the general rule. Nor do we think that the admission of the witness that he had talked with the officer who assisted in the preparation of the case is sufficient to bring the case within the other exception arising out of a claim of strong bias or sort of moral duress, stated in Com. v. Jenkins, ubi supra. We think that these two exceptions, which were recently considered in Griffin v. Boston, 188 Mass. 475, 74 N. E. 687, should be construed with some strictness, so as not to nullify the general rule. Sometimes it will appear, from the nature of the evidence and the course of the cross-examinations, that the cross-examining counsel intends to argue against the truth of the testimony, because the witness is not shown to have spoken previously of the matter, when, if it were true, he would have been likely to speak of it. To meet such a contemplated argument, it may well be proved that he did speak of it. Or something of recent occurrence may appear, which would be likely to create a strong bias in the mind of the witness, and to put him under a kind of moral duress to testify as he does. To answer the argument from such a fact, it may be shown that he said the same thing before the occurrence. The admissibility of the testimony depends upon the previous introduction of such facts and the existence of such conditions. Whether the course of the trial has been such as to require a statement of what the witness had previously said, to meet an attack upon his testimony, founded on either of these peculiar conditions, is primarily a question of fact, to be decided by the presiding judge. His decision upon such a question ought not to be set aside by an appellate court unless it is plainly wrong. To use a common expression, the reason for which has just been stated, the admission or exclusion of such testimony rests largely in the discretion of the trial court.

The court had the right to infer from the cross-examination that this was the ordinary case of an attempt to impeach the credibility of a witness by showing that he had made previous statements inconsistent with his then present testimony, and that the general rule existing in this commonwealth should be applied. In applying the rule under this interpretation of the cross-examination, the court committed no error. It is contended by the defendant that the attorney general, in his closing argument, went further, and made remarks inconsistent with this view of the cross-examination; but it does not appear that he pressed the argument against the witness to any greater extent than is allowable in the ordinary case of inconsistent statements of a witness. And in any event this could not affect the view which, at the time of the offer of the evidence, the court might rightfully take of the cross-examination.

14. The question to Thode, the photographer who had made the enlarged photograph, was rightfully excluded. The witness had already testified that he could not say whether the pin shown to him was or was not that which appeared in the photograph. It is sufficient to say that, both pins and the enlarged photograph being all before the jury, it does not appear that the witness could see any better than the jury which pin was shown in the photograph. It was not a matter for expert testimony.

15. So far as respects the refusal of the court to give the fourth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth instructions requested, we have examined the charge with special reference to the subject-matter of these requests, and are of the opinion that, while the court did not give the rulings in the language requested, still it gave them in substance, and with great clearness and accuracy stated the principles of law applicable thereto. The court committed no error in the manner in which it dealt with these requests.

16. Upon the subject of deliberately premeditated malice aforethought, much was said in the charge. Very clearly and very emphatically the jury were told that, in order to convict the defendant of murder in the first degree, they must find beyond a reasonable doubt not only that he committed the homicide, but that he did it with deliberately premeditated malice aforethought. The court then proceeds as follows: "The words 'deliberately premeditated malice aforethought' mean simply thought upon, resolved upon beforehand, not a thing done suddenly, not a thing that comes into the mind of a sudden, and is done before there is time to think about it, but a thing thought of, or planned some time before, or, if not planned some time before, yet thought upon long enough before the act is done so that it can reasonably be said to have become a purpose of the mind. No particular length of time is necessary. If it is thought upon reasonably beforehand, that is enough to warrant you in finding the crime to be murder in the first degree. Accordingly, the chief justice of the highest court in our state 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

said in one case, in language which I adopt and give to you: 'To premeditate is simply to meditate beforehand. It need not be for a long time. It merely requires time to form a clear intent. For example, a robber with a dirk or pistol turns a corner and meets a bank messenger with a roll of bills. In a moment he determines to get it. The next moment he shoots or stabs the messenger dead, takes the package and flees. His malice was deliberately premeditated though it occupied only a few seconds; for it was a cool act of the will, and is unlike the intent stimulated by a sudden act of quarrel, where one kills another suddenly, not having intended violence beforehand.' And to apply that principle, gentlemen, to this case, if you should find it shown with the requisite degree of certainty that this prisoner went to the Page house for the purpose of stealing something, or with any other unlawful purpose, but carried with him a deadly weapon for the purpose of taking human life, if that should be necessary to make his escape, or to remove a witness to his guilt, or to carry out his unlawful purpose; and if you should find that he did take the life of Mabel Page in pursuance of that purpose thus existing in his mind when he started upon the execution of his first or principal purpose,—then, gentlemen, you would be warranted in saying that he committed the crime with deliberately premeditated malice aforethought, and that it was shown that he had been guilty of murder in the first degree. To constitute deliberate premeditation, you see, there must be a design, or plan, actually formed and resolved upon before the act; and the murder must be committed pursuant to the design or plan which had been thus formed. And it must be shown that the murder was the result of a design or plan formed after the prisoner had thus made it the subject of deliberation or reflection, although, in view of the quickness with which the mind may act, this deliberation, or reflection, may have been measured by seconds, only by an appreciable interval. The act must have been deliberately thought upon, resolved upon, beforehand, long enough before the act was done to warrant the inference that it was so thought upon and resolved. If, accordingly, having first found that the prisoner is guilty of the crime of murder, you shall further find that he committed the murder with deliberately premeditated malice aforethought, then he is guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree, and you will say so by your verdict; if you do not find this further fact to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, then your verdict will be only guilty of murder in the second degree."

After the case had been submitted to the jury, the court, in reply to requests from them for more light, further instructed them as follows: "Answering your question, gentlemen, exactly as you put it, deliberately premeditated malice aforethought cannot take place instantly with the act, if by that is meant that the two come exactly together. To constitute deliberately premeditated malice aforethought the purpose must have been formed so that you can say that it did distinctly precede the act. It makes no difference whether the interval between them was long or short, if it can be said that the purpose did distinctly precede the act, so that it became a fixed purpose of the mind, and was then executed by the act in pursuance of that purpose. As in the illustration which you will remember that I gave to you—a robber with a dirk or a pistol turns a corner. He has no intention of committing crime when he turns the corner, but, as he turns the corner, he meets a bank messenger with a bundle of bills; a few seconds would suffice, perhaps one second would suffice, for the messenger to pass him in safety; but the minute that his eye lights upon that messenger with the roll of bills which the messenger is carrying, he conceives the purpose of robbery, and of taking the life of the messenger to obtain that money. He shoots or stabs the messenger to the heart, seizes the money, and flees. That was deliberately premeditated malice aforethought, although scarcely an appreciable interval of time separated the formation of the purpose from its execution. But it was deliberately premeditated malice, although the time was so brief because of the quickness with which the mind can work, and because the purpose was formed, was resolved upon, became a fixed purpose, before it was executed. It was the subject of resolution, of deliberation, although the resolution, the deliberation, were instantaneous,—almost, at any rate, instantaneous,—yet there was a real interval between them, because the act done in pursuance of the purpose could not have been carried into execution, could not have become an act, had it not been that the purpose was first formed; for that is the way in which I have stated the supposition. And so in this case, if this prisoner did unlawfully take the life of this woman with malice aforethought, and if he did so in pursuance of a plan, a purpose, a resolution which he formed to do so; if, for example, to make a supposition, he saw, or thought he saw, that to make his escape to avoid the danger of an accusation of crime against him he must put her out of the way; and if he made up his mind, if he formed the purpose, the resolution, to put her out of the way for his protection; and, in pursuance of that resolution, or that deliberate purpose, formed with a resolution and with deliberation although quickly formed, he executed that purpose and wrongfully took her life,—you would be warranted in saying that it was done with deliberately premeditated malice aforethought, even though the fatal blows followed at once after the determination to inflict them, immediately after the formation of the purpose; provided, gentlemen (and I pray you to follow every word that I say); provided the purpose was distinctly formed and concluded upon, provided the plan was formed before it was acted upon, so that you could fairly say that it became a distinct resolution of the mind, a distinct purpose formed upon reflection, though upon the speediest reflection, formed upon deliberation, though upon the speediest deliberation. If those things, gentlemen, are found, deliberately premeditated malice aforethought is properly to be inferred. If those things are not found, although you shall have found that malice aforethought existed, you would not say that deliberately premeditated malice aforethought was to be properly found."

The defendant excepted "to that portion of the court's definition of murder in the first degree above recited;" also to the definition of the phrase "deliberately premeditated malice aforethought;" and especially to that part of the charge in which the illustration as to the bank messenger is given. The phrase first appears in Stat. 1858, chap. 154, p. 126. Before the passage of that statute the common-law definition of murder was the one in force in this commonwealth. Murder at common law was murder here. In the charge of Shaw, Ch. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295 52 Am. Dec. 711, the trial of which took place in 1850, will be found a very clear exposition of this crime. There was only one degree, and it was punishable with death. Rev. Stat. 1836, chap. 125, § 1. By Stat. 1858, chap. 154, p. 126, now Rev. Laws, chap. 207, § 1, murder committed with deliberately premeditated malice aforethought, or in the commission of an attempt to commit any crime punishable with imprisonment for life, or committed "with extreme atrocity or cruelty," was declared to be murder in the first degree and punishable with death. Murder not appearing to be in the first degree was declared to be murder in the second degree, and punishable with imprisonment for life. Shortly after the passage of the statute, it was held that it did not change the common-law definition of murder as recognized by our courts, but simply manifested the intention of the legislature to consider murder as a crime "the punishment of which may be more or less severe according to certain aggravating circumstances which may appear at the trial." Com. v. Gardner, 11 Gray, 438, 444; Com. v. Desmarteau, 16 Gray, 1. In the case at bar the only ground upon which it was contended by the commonwealth that this was murder in the first degree was that it was committed with deliberately premeditated malice aforethought. We are of opinion that, in defining that phrase, the court laid down the law as it has been held ever since the passage of the statute of 1858, and that both by reason and by authority it is sound. The reasons for such an interpretation of the phrase are so clearly stated in the language of the various judges who have had occasion to expound to jurors the law on this subject that it seems necessary to do little more than quote their language.

One of the earliest cases after the statute of which we have any accessible report is Com. v. Andrews. That case was tried in October, 1868, in this court, before Chapman, Ch. J., and Foster, Wells, and Colt, JJ., being four of the six justices of which this court was then composed, and sitting as a full court. In charging the jury, Chapman, Ch. J., speaking for all the judges present, after defining malice, proceeds to speak of the word "aforethought" as used in connection with malice, in the common-law definition of murder, and uses the following language: "The term 'aforethought' indicates simply what is thought of beforehand or premeditated. But, by the common law, malice aforethought was held to be sometimes implied when there was no premeditation. For example: If a man who was provoked to sudden anger by mere words took a deadly weapon and killed the offender, the law implied malice aforethought because words are no adequate provocation for such an act as this. There were other cases of the same character. This feature of the law was regarded too severe, and our legislature, several years ago, modified it by statute." He then quotes Stat. 1858, chap. 154, p. 126, then Gen. Stat. chap. 160, § 1. It is interesting in passing to note how nearly the illustration given corresponds with the one given by Shaw, Ch. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 305, 52 Am. Dec. 711, ad finem, and how the statement of the reason for the passing of the statute is reinforced by the following language of Shaw, Ch. J., in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Com. v. Gardner, 11 Gray, 438, 443: "This statute does not declare for the first time that murder in the first degree shall be punished with death. It declares it in almost the same words as before. It takes very nearly the same distinction which the common law took between murder by express, and that by implied, malice." Chapman, Ch. J., having given the reason for the passage of the statute as above stated, quotes the statute at length, and proceeds as follows to expound the meaning of the phrase "deliberately premeditated malice aforethought:" "To premeditate is merely to intend beforehand. It need not be a long time; it merely requires time to form a clear intent. For example, a robber with a pistol or dirk, walking in the street, turns a corner and meets a bank messenger with a roll of bills. In a moment he determines to get it; the next moment he shoots or stabs the messenger dead, takes the package, and flees. His malice was deliberately premeditated, though it occupied but a few seconds; for it was a cool act of the will, and is unlike the intent stimulated by a sudden fight or quarrel, where one kills another suddenly, not having intended violence beforehand. The malice and premeditation are actual, and are not merely inferred from the use of a deadly weapon." See Davis's report of Com. v. Andrews (printed by Hurd & Houghton) 246, 247.

Stat. 1872, chap. 232, p. 170, provided that a capital trial might be conducted by two justices of this court, instead of a quorum of the full court, and after the passage of that statute such trials were carried on before only two judges. In Com. v. Sturtevant (see Appendix in Wharton on Homicide, 743, 744; also MSS. report in 2 Suffolk Law Library, p. 6 of the charge), tried in 1874 before Wells and Ames, JJ., the former, in the charge to the jury, said: "It is the intent of the statute to make murder in the first degree only of those cases where the murder is of such a character as to show a deliberate purpose. But deliberation does not require any considerable length of time. The mind deliberates rapidly, sometimes instantaneously, going from its premises to its conclusions in an instant of time; so that a deliberately premeditated murder with malice aforethought may result from an intent to kill which the mind conceived the instant before the weapon was taken or the blow struck." In the same year, in Com. v. Pomeroy (see Appendix to Wharton on Homicide, 754, 755; also MSS. report in Suffolk Law Library, 255, 256), tried before Gray, Ch. J., and Morton, J., afterward Chief Justice, the former, in charging the jury, spoke as follows in defining the phrase in question: "If you hear that phrase now for the first time, perhaps it seems to be a heaping up of words having no meaning; but if you stop and think of it, you will see that the words 'deliberately premeditated malice aforethought' mean simply, thought upon, resolved upon beforehand, not done suddenly; not a thing that comes into the mind in a moment and is done before there is time to think about it, but a thing either thought of or planned some time before, or, if not planned long before, thought upon long enough before the act is done or the blow struck so that it can be said reasonably to have been purposed. No length of time is necessary. Sometimes long preparation is made, sometimes a firm determination is made, completed, and acted upon very shortly. The law does not prescribe any limit of time, does not attempt to define the quickness with which the human mind can act. If it is thought upon reasonably beforehand, that is sufficient to make it murder in the first degree." In Com. v. Dwight (see MSS. report in Suffolk Law Library), tried also in the same year before Gray, Ch. J., and Endicott, J., the same judge instructed the jury on substantially the same line, saying, among other things: "It is only necessary that it [the act of homicide] is thought upon and resolved upon beforehand. . . . It is not sufficient . . . that it should be the fruit of sudden impulse, without any reflection, deliberation, resolution, determination, or thinking it over. But, on the other hand, the law does not undertake to fix any time within which the human mind must act, or which may be necessary to form a resolution. The only question is: 'Was it thought upon, resolved upon, determined upon, beforehand?' " And in the case of Com. v. Pemberton (see MSS. report in Suffolk Law Library, p. 17 of the charge), tried in June, 1875, the same judge, sitting with Devens, J., charged as follows: "The law does not undertake to say how long it will take you to make up your mind on a given subject, so as to resolve and determine of set purpose to carry it out,—whether it will take days, or hours, or minutes, or seconds; but, in order to constitute 'deliberate premeditated malice aforethought,' the act must have been thought upon, resolved upon, determined upon, beforehand, no matter how long or short a time. It must not be committed as the result of a mere sudden impulse, but must be the offspring of a resolution of the mind."

Perhaps one of the most instructive charges upon the question is that given in the case of Com. v. Frost (see MSS. report in Suffolk Law Library, pp. 17, 18, 19 of the charge), which was tried at Worcester in October, 1875. The defendant admitted the homicide, and the only real question was whether it was murder in the first degree, as contended by the commonwealth, or only manslaughter, as admitted by the defendant. The attention of the court, therefore, was sharply drawn to the true definition of murder in the first degree. In his charge, Devens, J., after speaking of the phrase in question, and saying that, in order to constitute murder in the first degree, it "must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt that the murder was done in pursuance of a previously formed plan, which previously formed plan was completed by the act of killing," proceeded as follows: "It is necessary to show that the intent preceded the act by some definite and distinct period of time, so that we can say that the act was the consequence of that premeditation. But, it is unnecessary that any great length of time should precede. Length of time may be of importance in the consideration of a jury as to whether or not it is shown to have been a deliberately premeditated murder; but, if the length of time is brief; if there is a distinct period which does intervene between the premeditation and the act,—that is long enough. I take the illustration which was used by the attorney general [Train] in his argument, and which was an illustration occasionally used by the late chief justice of this court [Chapman] in illustrating this subject. If one sees another going along the street with a watch or a bundle of money in his pocket or in his hand, and, in order to get that money, he shoots him, with a view to possessing himself with that money, although he never saw the man before, so that there is no personal malice against the individual who carries the money, and, although he did not expect to meet him upon the street, and formed the design merely because he did meet him upon the street, and found himself armed, and thought he could accomplish his wicked purpose, the jury would be justified in finding, upon that evidence, that there was the 'deliberately premeditated malice aforethought,' contemplated by the law." Perhaps the most concise definition of this phrase is found in the charge in Com. v. Piper (see state ed. 920), tried in January, 1876, before Lord and Colt, JJ. The former, in speaking of the time, said to the jury: "What is necessary is that the person shall intend to kill, he shall unlawfully intend to kill, and he shall kill in pursuance of a purpose which he has formed previously to his putting it into execution. Where the word and the blow come together it is not deliberately premeditated malice aforethought; but when the purpose is resolved upon and the mind determined to do it before the blow is struck, then it is, within the meaning of the law, deliberately premeditated malice aforethought."

We have thus reviewed to some extent the opinions of the various judges of this court as expressed by Chapman, Ch. J., in Com. v. Andrews, where a quorum of the court was present, and afterwards by the judges in their respective charges to the jury in other cases as to the meaning of the term in question. We are aware of no discordant note. The various extracts speak for themselves. In substance, the view expressed is that, while it must be shown that a plan to murder was formed after the matter had been made a subject of deliberation and reflection, yet, in view of the quickness with which the mind may act, the law cannot set any limit to the time. It may be a matter of days, hours, or even seconds. It is not so much a matter of time as of logical sequence. First the deliberation and premeditation, then the resolution to kill, and lastly the killing in pursuance of the resolution; and all this may occur in a few seconds. Since jurisdiction over capital offenses has been transferred from this court to the superior court, our attention has not been called to any case where the court has failed to adopt the same view, while it appears from such examination as we have made of the charges in that court that this view has been uniformly followed. See, for instance, Com. v. Borden (see typewritten report in Superior Court Lobby, vol. 2, p. 1889), tried in Bristol; Com. v. Trefethen (state ed. 218, 381), tried twice in Middlesex; and Com. v. O'Neil (state ed. 704, 705), tried in Franklin.

Eminent counsel, determined, if possible, to free their clients, and fertile in resources in that direction, frequently have acted for the defense in capital cases; and yet our attention has not been called to any case, either in this court or the superior court, and we are not aware of any, where this definition of the phrase in question has been challenged, except in the case before us. Upon this subject, we have been referred by the defendant to cases in other states; but, upon the construction of our own statute, they are of little assistance, and it is not necessary to discuss them. So far as they are inconsistent with the doctrine above laid down, we cannot follow them. For more than a generation this view of the meaning of the phrase in question has been adopted in the courts of this state, and men whose right to life hinged upon its accuracy have been tried, convicted, and sent to death. The legislature, in the light of this uniform and long-continued construction of the statute, has made no change. The interpretation of the phrase given in the case at bar is in accordance with the law as previously laid down with great clearness and uniformity by justices in charging juries, is suggested by the hardship in the old law set forth by Chapman, Ch. J., as hereinbefore recited, is in accordance with the rapidity of mental action, and is founded upon sound sense as applied to the subject; and we are satisfied that it is correct. The charge of the court, including the illustration of which the defendant complains, furnishes the defendant no ground for a valid exception.

17. We have noticed all the exceptions argued upon the defendant's brief. There are one or two which he has not argued. In view of the nature of the case, and of the statement made by his counsel that nothing is waived, it is sufficient to say that, considering them as not waived, we have examined them, and see nothing in them.

18. After a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, the defendant made a motion for a new trial. One of the reasons assigned for the motion was that one of the jurymen during the trial took notes or memoranda of the testimony of the witnesses, "in violation of law and this defendant's rights." As to this matter it may be said, in the first place, that it is difficult to see how the counsel for the defense could help seeing that the juror was taking notes of some kind. The juror used sheets of paper "about 6 by 4 inches in dimensions, with a lead pencil, resting upon his hand and knee, as the case might have been, and so wrote memoranda" of the testimony as it was going in. "This was done openly, frequently, while the counsel for the defendant were in front of him, and in his plain view, either while examining witnesses or exhibits." The trial of the case lasted three weeks, and these notes were taken daily, "with the possible exception of the first day or two." The juror was seated on the second row of jury seats, at the end nearest the bench and witness stand. It is very difficult for anyone familiar with the arrangement of our court rooms to conceive how so conspicuous an act, so continuously and openly performed by a juror seated so prominently within the view of all in the court room, especially of those within the bar, could have escaped the attention of the defendant and every one of his counsel. And, as stated by the commonwealth in its brief, there is nothing in the affidavit of the defendant or of his counsel which is inconsistent with the theory that they each saw the act of the juror and that he was writing. They simply say that they did not know he was taking notes of the evidence. In a certain sense that may be true; and yet, if they saw the juror writing while the evidence was going in, they should be held to reasonable diligence in ascertaining what he was doing. In the mind of a person seeing a juror continuously writing while testimony is going in, the most reasonable inference would be that the juror was taking notes of the testimony. But, however that may be, we are of opinion that while, as a rule, the taking of notes of testimony by a juror may not be a commendable practice, yet, by the great weight of authority, it is not illegal; and, as matter of law, it does not require the setting aside of the verdict. The question, therefore, was left to the discretion of the court. The court having heard the motion upon the evidence, in which the juror made affidavit that he took the notes "in aid of memory," filed a written statement of its decision, and the grounds thereof, the last part of which is as follows: "We rule that the evidence does not require us, as matter of law, to set aside the verdict on this ground. We do not find that any of the prisoner's rights have been at all affected by the taking of notes, or that the action of the juror has in any way worked to his prejudice; and we are satisfied that no injustice to him has resulted from this circumstance. We therefore, in the exercise of our judicial discretion, for the furtherance of justice, decline to set aside the verdict upon this ground." The evidence justified their conclusions as to the facts, and upon these conclusions no error of law is shown in declining to set aside the verdict.

Exceptions taken at the trial, and those taken on the motion for a new trial, overruled.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

DENNIS FOLEY

v.

BOSTON & MAINE RAILROAD.

(— Mass. —, 79 N. E. 765.)

Carrier—jolt—negligence—burden of proof.

1. To hold a carrier liable for injury to a passenger by reason of a jolt of the vehicle, plaintiff must show that it was caused by the carrier's negligence.

Same—care of passenger.

2. A passenger is not exercising due care in standing near an open door without supporting himself by his hands while the car is passing over a cross-over switch of which he knows, and which is necessary because of repairs in progress on the track.

(January 1, 1907.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Essex County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The plaintiff was injured by being thrown from a moving train while it was passing over a cross-over switch at a point where repairs were in progress on the railroad. He testified that he boarded the smoking car; that he walked two or three seats up the aisle looking for a seat, but saw none vacant; that he then walked back to the rear of the car and took his position just

Case Note.—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine as applied to jolts or jerks causing injury to passengers on vehicles:—It is generally held that a passenger makes out a prima facie case, or raises a presumption of negligence, against the carrier, by showing that, while riding in the vehicle, he was injured by its unusual or violent jerking, jolting, or stopping. Georgia R. & Electric Co. v. Reeves, 123 Ga. 697, 51 S. E. 610 (under statute); Lavis v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 54 Ill. App. 636; North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Schwartz, 82 Ill. App. 493; Chicago City R. Co. v. Morse, 98 Ill. App. 662. Affirmed in 197 Ill. 327, 64 N. E. 304; Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Mommsen, 107 Ill. App. 353; Cincinnati, I. & W. R. Co. v. Bravard (Ind. App.) 76 N. E. 899; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Mills (Ind. App.) 77 N. E. 608; Harris v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 89 Mo. 233, 58 Am. Rep. 111, 1 S. W. 325; Redmon v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 185 Mo. 1, 106 Am. St. Rep. 558, 84 S. W. 26.

While the courts, in some of the cases, in laying down the rule, may not have employed the words "unusual or violent," it is believed that, as expressed above, the rule is the correct one; and that in every case inside the open door, leaning against the door jamb; that the speed of the train was very swift and continued to be so until it struck the cross-over switch, the jar from which he described as "awful," "terrible," which caused him to lose his support, and a fellow passenger lurched against him throwing him out of the car and off the platform.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry F. Hurlburt and Damon E. Hall, for defendant:

It is contributory negligence per se for a passenger unnecessarily to stand in an exposed position upon a car of a moving train.

Plaintiff must be held to have assumed the risk of the accident which happened.

Springfield Street R. Co. 182 Mass. 158, 65 N. E. 29; Spooner v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 190 Mass. 132, 76 N. E. 660; Pike v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 192 Mass. 426, 78 N. E. 497.

There was no evidence of the negligence of the defendant, its agents and servants.

Byron v. Lynn & B. R. Co. supra; Francis-where it has been applied the evidence showed that the jolt, jerk, or stop was unusual or violent. In Fitch v. Mason City & C. L. Traction Co. 124 Iowa, 665, 100 N. W. 618, and Hite v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 130 Mo. 132, 51 Am. St. Rep. 555, 31 S. W. 262, 32 S. W. 33, it was held that it must have been such a jerk or jar as, under ordinary circumstances, would not have happened if those who had the management of the car or train had used proper care.

Some of the cases expressly hold that, before any presumption of negligence will arise, it must appear that the jolt or jerk which caused the injury was unusual in degree. Adams v. Washington & G. R. Co. 9 App. D. C. 26; Chicago City R. Co. v. Morse, supra; Pryor v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 85 Mo. App. 367; Bartley v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 148 Mo. 124, 49 S. W. 840; Johnson v. Interurban Street R. Co. 88 N. Y. Supp. 866.

In Byron v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 177 Mass. 303, 58 N. E. 1015, it was said that, unless such jolts or jerks are "unusual in degree," and "caused by some defect in the car or in the track, or by some unusual or dangerous rate of speed, they furnish no evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier." In Chicago City R. Co. v. Morse, supra, the court said that the rule as laid down in the Byron Case would be without objection if the word "or" had been used instead of "and." This statement of the rule, with "or" substituted for "and," was also approved in Adams v. Washington & G. R. Co. and Bartley v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. supra.

In Saunders v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 6 S. D. 40, 60 N. W. 148, it was held that the presumption of negligence does not arise against the carrier where the evidence merely shows that there was a shock which injured the passenger, with nothing to show or suggest the cause or nature of the shock, or whether it affected the train or car in which he was riding, or simply his person.

In Hoffman v. Third Ave. R. Co. 45 App. Div. 586, 61 N. Y. Supp. 590, it was held 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that there was no presumption of negligence where a street car, proceeding along a crowded street at a rate of 2 or 3 miles an hour, was suddenly stopped, and it affirmatively appeared that the gripman who controlled the car had nothing to do with stopping it.

In Jacksonville Street R. Co. v. Chappell, 21 Fla. 175, it was held that the mere fact that the street car suddenly started, throwing the passenger to the floor and injuring him just as he was turning to seat himself, did not prove negligence on the part of the carrier. But, upon a similar state of facts, it was held in Dougherty v. Missouri P. R. Co. 9 Mo. App. 478, Affirmed in 81 Mo. 325, 51 Am. Rep. 239, that, if it appeared that the car was started with an unusual jerk, and, by the proper use of the reins and brake, it could have been started without a jerk, a prima facie case of negligence was made out against the carrier.

In Herstine v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 151 Pa. 244, 25 Atl. 104, it was held that no presumption of negligence was raised against the carrier by evidence showing that the passenger was injured by a severe shock caused by violently coupling a car to the car in which he was seated.

But in Clow v. Pittsburgh Traction Co. 158 Pa. 410, 27 Atl. 1004, where it appeared that the car, while in motion, was suddenly and violently stopped, thus causing injury to the passenger, it was held that a presumption of negligence was raised against the carrier.

And, so it was held in Dixey v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 180 Pa. 401, 36 Atl. 924, where the evidence showed that the injury was the result of an unusual and sudden jar or plunge of the car, which affected all the passengers.

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 79 Va. 241, where plaintiff testified that he did not know whether the engine was reversed or not, but that the cars ran together so hard as to cause him to be thrown out of the caboose in which he was riding, the court co v. Troy & L. R. Co. 78 Hun, 13, 29 N. Y. Supp. 247; Spooner v. Old Colony Street R. Co. supra.

Messrs. D. W. Quill and William H. Pew, Jr., for plaintiff.

Rugg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is at least difficult to see how, upon this testimony, there was any negligence on the part of the defendant. Timms v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 183 Mass. 193, 66 N. E. 797. It is a matter of common knowledge that tracks of steam railroads must be repaired and bridges replaced from time to time, and that, in the performance of this work, it may be necessary to use cross-overs from one main track to another. It is also common knowledge that, in the performance of the duty resting upon steam railroads of rapid and prompt transportation, even in the exercise of the high degree of care required of them, there may be jolts and lurches in the management of trains. Weinschenk v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 190 Mass. 250, 76 N. E. 662; Byron v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 177 Mass. 303, 58 N. E. 1015. There is nothing to show that the jar in question resulted from any negligent act on the part of the defendant, either as to speed or construction of car or track. It is true that the speed was described as "swift," and the jar or lurch as "quite violent," "terrible," "awful," "very severe," and "unexpected." Mere expletive or declamatory words or phrases as descriptive of speed, or acts unaccompanied by any evidence capable of conveying to the ordinary mind some definite conception of a specific physical fact, and depending generally upon the degree of nervous emotion, exuberance of diction, and volatility of imagination of the witness, and not upon his capacity to reproduce by language a true picture of a past event, are of slight, if, indeed, they are of any, assistance in determining the real character of the fact respecting which they are used.

Passing to the other branch of the plaintiff's case, there are greater difficulties in his way. He knew of the existence of the cross-over, and that it had been there for several days, and that all trains going to Beverly from Salem were obliged to use it, and that the going upon the cross-over said that, no negligence being proved on the part of the railroad company, or by any of its agents or employees, the law would not impute it.

The passenger who seeks to recover on this presumption alone must show that he was not only a passenger, but also that at the time of the accident he was in a place where he had a right to be; or, at least, that the place where he was, if he was not in the right place, did not affect the result. Tuley v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 41 Mo. App. 432.

Where a passenger proves that, on the stoppage of the train, he at once walked out on the platform to get off, and, while in the act of alighting, the train was suddenly started with a jerk, which caused him to fall, whereby he was injured, he establishes a prima facie case of negligence in the management of the train. Barringer v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 73 Ark. 548, 85 S. W. 94, 87 S. W. 814; Kefauver v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 122 Fed. 966.

And this is the rule where a passenger on a street car is injured while in the act of alighting. Birmingham Union R. Co. v. Hale, 90 Ala. 8, 24 Am. St. Rep. 748, 8 So. 142; Griffin v. Pacific Electric R. Co. 1 Cal. App. 678, 82 Pac. 1084; Renfro v. Fresno City R. Co. 2 Cal. App. 317, 84 Pac. 357.

An injury so occurring is said to justify an inference of a breach of duty, and falls within the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur. Consolidated Traction Co. v. Thalheimer, 59 N. J. L. 474, 37 Atl. 132; Scott v. Bergen County Traction Co. 63 N. J. L. 407, 43 Atl. 1060. Affirmed in 64 N. J. L. 362, 48 Atl. 1118; Paul v. Salt Lake City R. Co. 30 Utah, 41, 83 Pac. 563.

sit Co. 48 Misc. 629, 96 N. Y. Supp. 259, it was held that in such a case there was no ground for invoking the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

Still another way of stating the general rule is that the burden of proof is on the carrier to show that an unusual jerk, jolt, or stoppage of the vehicle, injuring a passenger riding therein or thereon, was unavoidable, or caused by agencies beyond its control. Crine v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 84 Ga. 651, 11 S. E. 555; West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Kennelly, 66 Ill. App. 244; Coudy v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 85 Mo. 79; Hite v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 130 Mo. 132, 51 Am. St. Rep. 555, 31 S. W. 262; 32 S. W. 33; Burr v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 64 N. J. L. 30, 44 Atl. 845; Murphy v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. 36 Hun. 199; Bartlett v. New York & S. B. Ferry & Steam Transp. Co. 25 Jones & S. 348, 8 N. Y. Supp. 309; Martin v. Second Ave. R. Co. 3 App. Div. 448, 38 N. Y. Supp. 220.

This form of stating the rule, however, is objectionable for the reason that it disregards the distinction between the effect of a given fact to raise a prima facie presumption of negligence and its effect to shift the burden of proof.

The distinction between the rule res ipsa loquitur and the rule as to circumstantial evidence is pointed out in the note in 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 337.

As to a freight-train passenger's assumption of risk of injury from jolts and jerks, see note in 19 L.R.A. 310.

Starting a car before a passenger is seated is the subject of a note in 42 L.R.A. 293.

Injuries in getting on and off railroad trains are treated in 21 L.R.A. 354.

would cause more or less jar to the train. He also testified that, if he had supported himself by his hands, he would not have been thrown off his balance. He took his position within, at farthest, 3 inches from the open door of the car, although he might have stood farther in the car in a place of perfect safety, and he failed to investigate whether there were vacant seats in other cars of the train than the one in which he was standing. It is manifest that no injury would have been sustained by him if he had been seated. It has been said that one who elects to stand in a steam train, when there are vacant seats, cannot recover for an accident which he would not have suffered except for his standing position. Farnon v. Boston & A. R. Co. 180 Mass. 212, 62 N. E. 254. To be either upon the platform of a car, or just within its threshold, on the way to and in search of a permanent place of safety within a car, is quite different from voluntarily taking one's stand for the journey barely inside an open door, with the knowledge that, by reason of construction repairs, reasonably and necessarily prosecuted so far as appears, the train must pass over a switch under such circumstances as almost necessarily to cause some disturbance to the train. It is true the plaintiff testified that he intended to go back into other cars of the train; but, without any disclosed reason for so doing, he stood in this position of danger while the train passed a distance of $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile. Under the particular circumstances of this case, with the plaintiff's special knowledge of conditions, he cannot be said to have been in the exercise of such care as ordinary prudence requires.

Exceptions sustained.

citizens of the United States; second, that it was not within the range of the police power of the state, because it did not tend to elevate the morals or promote the welfare of the public, and, as it attempted to regulate a useful business, the legislature was not the exclusive judge as to what was a reasonable restraint upon the constitutional right of the citizen; third, that the statute was void for discrimination in prohibiting the use of the flag for advertising purposes generally, while permitting it for public or private exhibitions of art. This decision was followed, in substance, by the appellate division of the supreme court of New York in the case of People ex rel. McPike v. Van De Carr, 91 App. Div. 20, 86 N. Y. Supp. 644, which held that, while the legislature might lawfully prohibit the mutilation of the flag, and perhaps, on this ground, might prohibit the printing of an advertisement on the flag itself, it could not prohibit constitutionally the use of a picture or representation of the flag in connection with an advertisement of merchandise or with trademarks or trade labels, because this would infringe upon the personal liberty of the citizen; and also held that prohibiting such use generally, while permitting publishers, stationers, and jewelers to use the symbol in their business, would amount to a denial of the equal protection of the law.

These cases were considerably criticized at the time they were rendered, as taking too narrow a view of the police power of the legislature. The New York case was taken to the court of appeals, which affirmed the decision of the appellate division (178 N. Y. 428, 66 L.R.A. 189, 102 Am. St. Rep. 516, 70 N. E. 965) only so far as it applied to the use of the flag in case of articles which were manufactured and in existence when the statute was passed. As to these, the court held that the statute destroyed existing property rights. This left undecided the broader question of the police power of the legislature to prevent the use of the flag for advertising purposes generally.

A case quite close to this question by way of analogy is that of Com. v. R. I. Sherman Mfg. Co. 189 Mass. 76, 75 N. E. 71, in which a Massachusetts statute making it unlawful to use the arms or the Great Seal of the commonwealth, or any representations thereof, for any advertising or commercial purpose, was held constitutional. The principle of this decision obviously applies with equal force to statutes for the protection of the flag, unless the power of the state is restricted in respect to the flag on the ground that it is exclusively under the protection of the national government. But in the above case of HALTER v. STATE the supreme court of Nebraska squarely repudiates this contention, and refuses to follow the precedents of the Illinois and New York cases. It decides that the state has power to protect the flag against desecration or use for advertising purposes; that this does not infringe the constitutional guaranties of due process of law, or constitute special or class legislation, but that it is a legitimate exercise of the police power. This decision has recently received the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States. Halter v. Nebraska, 205 U. S. 34, 51 L. ed. —, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419. It is therefore now established that state laws of this character do not violate the Federal Constitution. With respect to the question of police power, the court says: "It would be going very far to say that the statute in question had no reasonable connection with the common good, and was not promotive of the peace, order, and well-being of the people."

Messrs. Cooper & Dunn also for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Norris Brown, Attorney General, for the State.

Albert, C., filed the following opinion:

The defendant was convicted of a violation of the statute entitled "An Act to Prevent and Punish the Desecration of the Flag of the United States." Chapter 139, p. 644, Laws 1903 (Cobbey's Anno. Stat. 1903, §§ 2375g et seq.).

It is conclusively established that the defendants were engaged in selling intoxicating liquors at retail, and sold and offered for sale beer contained in bottles, to which was attached a label on which there was printed a representation of the flag of the United States, and that such label was so used to advertise the beer and distinguish it from other products of a like nature. It is admitted that the beer was sold to the defendants by a brewing company in the bottles thus labeled, and that the representations of the flag thereon is a part of the registered trademark of the brewing company. It is now claimed that the statute under which the defendant was convicted is unconstitutional, and consequently that the judgment of conviction must be reversed. The statute is as follows: "Any person who in any manner, for exhibition or display shall place, or cause to be placed, any word, figure, mark, picture, design, drawing, or any advertisement of any nature, upon any flag, standard, color, or ensign, of the United States of America; or shall expose or cause to be exposed to public view any such flag, standard, color, or ensign, upon which shall be printed, painted, or otherwise placed, or to which shall be attached, appended, affixed, or annexed, any word, figure, mark, picture, design, or drawing, or any advertisement of any nature, or who shall expose to public view, manufacture, sell, expose for sale, give away, or have in possession for sale or to give away, or for use for any purpose, any article or substance, being an article of merchandise, or a receptacle of merchandise, upon which shall have been printed, painted, attached, or otherwise placed, a representation of any such flag, standard, color, or ensign, to advertise, call attention to, decorate, mark, or distinguish, the article, or substance on which so placed; or who shall publicly mutilate, deface, defile, or defy, trample upon, or cast contempt, either by words or act, upon, any such flag, standard, color, or ensign,—shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment for not more than thirty days, or both, in the discretion of the court. The words 'flag, color, ensign,' as used in this act, shall include any flag, standard, ensign, or any picture or representation, or either thereof, made of any substance, or represented on any substance, and of any size, evidently purporting to be either of said flag, standard, color, or ensign of the United States of America, or a picture, or a representation of either thereof, upon which shall be shown the colors, the stars, and the stripes, in any number of either thereof, or by which the person seeing the same, without deliberation may believe the same to represent the flag, color, standard, or ensign, of the United States of America. This act shall not apply to any act permitted by the statutes of the United States of America, or by the United States Army and Navy regulations; nor shall it be construed to apply to a newspaper, periodical, book, pamphlet, circular, certificate, diploma, warrant, or commission of appointment to office, ornamental picture, article of jewelry, or stationery for use in correspondence, on any of which shall be printed, painted, or placed said flag, disconnected from any advertisement."

The defendants take the position that the act contravenes § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which prohibits the states from making or enforcing any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or which shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, and the provisions of the state Constitution against special or class legislation. This position is supported by two cases,—Ruhrstrat v. People, 185 Ill. 133, 49 L.R.A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30, 57 N. E. 41, and People ex rel. McPike v. Van De Carr, 178 N. Y. 425, 66 L.R.A. 189, 102 Am. St. Rep. 516, 70 N. E. 965. In each of these cases a statute substantially like the one under consideration was held unconstitutional. The Illinois case rests on three propositions, which, for convenience, we shall consider out of the order in which they are there discussed.

As to the first, namely, that the act is unconstitutional "as depriving a citizen of the United States of the right of exercising a privilege, impliedly, if not expressly, granted to him by the Federal Constitution." little need be said. The right to advertise whisky, beer, tobacco, and other articles of merchandise by the use of the national flag is certainly not the subject of an express constitutional grant, and it can be said to be impliedly granted only in the sense that, like an infinite number of other acts, it is not prohibited. If the fact that an act or course of action is not prohibited by the Federal Constitution gives a citizen of the United States a right which the state is powerless to abridge or restrict, the sphere of state legislation is more circumscribed than has been generally supposed, and our Criminal Code is largely waste paper. A moment's reflection would seem sufficient to show that the proposition is utterly unsound. Nor can we agree with counsel that the Federal government has the exclusive power to regulate the use of the national flag. It is not infrequent that the same act is an offense against both the state and Federal governments. Counterfeiting furnishes an apt illustration. The power "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States" is expressly given to Congress, but the offense is also punishable under the laws of the several states, the validity of which was upheld in Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 416, 12 L. ed. 215.

The second proposition to be noticed is "that the act is also unduly discriminating and partial in its character." This proposition is based on the exceptions to the general provisions of the act. The exceptions enumerated in the Illinois act are fewer than in our own; but we do not think it can fairly be said that in either case they render the act unduly discriminating or partial. Neither act is aimed against any individual or class of individuals, but against certain acts. If it were competent for the legislature to deal with the subject, it was clearly competent for it to define the crime of desecration, and to specify the acts constituting the offense. Every use of the flag not included in such definition or specification would be impliedly excepted from the operation of the act, and it would seem wholly immaterial that the legislature saw fit to make some acts the subject of an express exception, instead of narrowing the definition of the crime or the specification of the acts constituting it in such a way to exclude the acts included in such exception. Besides, there is nothing in the state or Federal Constitution which forbids the classification of subjects for legislation, so long as the classification is not arbitrary. Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Bush, 60 Neb. 116, 82 N. W. 313, and cases cited. There this court held that the statute providing for the taxing of an attorney's fee against a defeated insurance company was valid legislation. See also Rosenbloom v. State, 64 Neb. 344, 57 L.R.A. 922, 89 N. W. 1053; State v. Montgomery, 92 Me. 433, 43 Atl. 13; Ex parte Thornton (C. C.) 4 Hughes, 220, 12 Fed. 538; Davis v. State, 51 Neb. 302, 70 N. W. 984. In this instance the classification does not appear to be an arbitrary, but a most natural, one. It is a matter of common knowledge that the use of the flag for advertising purposes offends the sensibilities of a large portion of our people. The statute is directed against the use of the flag for that purpose, but excepts from its provisions certain uses to which the most sensitive could not object. Without such exception, either express or implied, the statute would be oppressive, if not absurd.

We come now to the remaining proposition on which the Illinois case rests, namely, that "the statute is an infringement upon the personal liberty guaranteed by the state and Federal Constitutions." The court in that case recognizes the right of the state, in the exercise of its police power, to enact such laws as are calculated to promote the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society, although such laws may operate as an infringement upon the personal liberty of the citizen, but holds that such laws must be in fact calculated to promote those objects, or some of them; otherwise, they are an arbitrary restraint on the citizen, and unconstitutional. Such is the generally accepted doctrine. Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 49 L. ed. 937, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, contains a discussion of the police power of the states and an examination of many cases bearing on the subject. After a somewhat lengthy discussion of the doctrine just referred to, the court, in Ruhrstrat v. People, supra, held that the statute was not calculated to promote any of the objects just enumerated, and was therefore unconstitutional and void. Again we find ourselves unable to agree with a court to whose opinions, ordinarily, we attach great weight. Patriotism has ever been regarded as the highest civic virtue, and whatever tends to foster that virtue certainly makes for the common good. That familiarity breeds contempt has the force of a maxim. That contempt or disrespect for an emblem begets a like state of mind toward that for which it stands is a psychological law which underlies the canons against profanation which abound in every system of religious instruction. Such inhibitions against the irreverent use of sacred things are not mere arbitrary fulminations, but are grounded on sound practical considerations and the conviction that such use of the sacred emblems of religion is inimical to the cause of religion itself. The legislation under consideration may be justified under the same principle. The flag is the emblem of national authority. To the citizen it is an object of patriotic adoration, emblematic of all for which his country stands,—her institutions, her achievements, her long roster of heroic dead, the story of her past, the promise of her future; and it is not fitting that it should become associated in his mind with anything less exalted, nor that it should be put to any mean or ignoble use.

Moreover, that the citizen resents any improper use of the flag of his country, and that his resentment is frequently carried to the extent of a breach of the peace, are matters of common knowledge. The state has the undoubted right to legislate in the interests of the public peace. As was said in Updegraph v. Com. 11 Serg. & R. 406; "An offense against the public peace may consist either of an actual breach of the peace, or doing that which tends to provoke and excite others to do it. Within the latter description fall all acts and all attempts to produce disorder, by written, printed, or oral communications, for the purpose of generally weakening those religious and moral restraints, without the aid of which mere legislative provisions would prove ineffectual." The doctrine announced in that case seems peculiarly applicable to the case in hand, and to justify the act in question as a valid exercise of the police power of the state. In People ex rel. McPike v. Van De Carr, 178 N. Y. 425, 66 L.R.A. 189, 102 Am. St. Rep. 516, 70 N. E. 905, the act was not held wholly void, but only in so far as it applies to articles manufactured and in existence when the act went into effect. To that extent it was held unconstitutional as in contravention of the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. If the statute is vulnerable to that objection, it would seem that a large number of our penal statutes, commonly regarded as valid, must fall by the same rule. When our act against taking fish with a seine went into effect, there were doubtless many seines manufactured and in existence. The same may be said of swivel guns, when the act making it unlawful to kill certain wild waterfowl with such guns became a law. But to our knowledge it has never been seriously claimed that either of such acts is unconstitutional and void to the extent that it applies to "articles manufactured and in existence when the act went into effect." By sweeping prohibitory legislation, those engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors were put out of business in the state of Kansas, and property whose chief value consisted in its use in connection with the manufacture and sale of such liquors was rendered practically valueless. The validity of this legislation was assailed on the ground that it operated to deprive those engaged in the traffic in intoxicating liquors of their property without due process of law. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273. Considering that feature of the case, the court said: "Lawful state legislation, in the exercise of the police powers of the state, to prohibit the manufacture and sale within the state of spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage, may be enforced against persons who at the time happen to own property whose chief value consists in its fitness for such manufacturing purposes, without compensating them for the diminution in its value resulting from such prohibitory enactments."

Nor does the fact that the flag was a part of the trademark of the brewing company place the defendants in any more favorable position. To the extent that the said trademark is property, it comes within what has already been said. A patent or trademark puts no restraint upon the state in the exercise of its police power beyond the restraint imposed with respect to property generally. Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 507, 24 L. ed. 1117.

We have gone over the act in the light of excellent briefs on either side, and have reached the conclusion that it is not only a valid piece of legislation, but one well calculated to promote the common weal.

It is therefore recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF TENNESSEE, FOR USE OF FENTRESS COUNTY,

v.

JAMES B. REED et al., Appts.

(116 Tenn. 110, 95 S. W. 809.)

Public fund—deposit in bank—liability of official.

1. Mere inquiry of the general public, or of the business men of the community where a bank does business, as to its solvency and the integrity of its officers, will not absolve a public official from liability for loss of public funds deposited in the institution through its insolvency.

Same—want of capacity.

2. Want of business capacity or familiarity and experience with business affairs

Case Note.—Case required in selecting bank for deposit of public funds:—Owing to the fact that most of the cases hold an officer having charge of public funds to be an insurer of their safety and liable for their loss, except when occasioned by inevitable accident, or by act of a public enemy, the question as to what constitutes due care in selecting a depository for public funds has seldom arisen. This question arises only, if at all, in those cases which impose a less stringent obligation on the officer, and protect him from responsibility for loss due to the failure of the bank, assuming that he exercised due care in selecting the same. Thus, in Wilson v. People, 10 Colo. 199, 22 L.R.A. 449, 41 Am. St. Rep. 243, 34 Pac. 944, the court held that the liability of a clerk of court, for loss of public funds deposited in a bank of reputed and banks will not absolve a public official from liability for loss of public funds deposited in an insolvent bank because thereof. Same—bank director.

3. A public official who is also a director of the bank is bound, before depositing public funds therein, to utilize the opportunities given him by his position as director to ascertain the condition of the bank.

(August 1, 1906.)

APPÉAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals affirming a decree of the Chancery Court for Fentress County in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to hold the official bond of a county trustee liable for loss of public funds committed to his custody. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. H. Roberts, for appellants:

. A deposit of public funds in a bank of undoubted standing and reputation is not negligence or want of proper business prudence or caution on the part of a public officer whose duty it is to preserve them.

State use of Overton County v. Copeland, 96 Tenn. 296, 31 L.R.A. 844, 54 Am. St. Rep. 840, 34 S. W. 427.

Messrs. Smith & Cooper also for appellants.

Messrs. Conatser & Case for appellee.

Shields, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case is brought by the state of Tennessee, for the use of Fentress county, against James B. Reed, county trustee of that county, and others, his sureties upon his official bonds, to recover $2,853.336, on account of county revenues collected, but not accounted for, as required by law, by said Reed.

The defendants, answering, admit the election of Reed as trustee, the execution of the bonds sued on, and the collection of the money which he has not paid over; but they solvency, is governed by the ordinary law of bailment, and that the degree of care to be exercised by such an officer in the selection of a depository is the same which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise in the conduct of his own business. This case was relied on in Gartley v. People, 28 Colo. 227, 64 Pac. 208, in which a similar decision was rendered. See also State use of Overton County v. Copeland, 96 Tenn. 296, 31 L.R.A. 844, 54 Am. St. Rep. 840, 34 S. W. 427, which is sufficiently set out in the above opinion.

On the subject of liability on official bond for loss of money by theft or bank failure, see exhaustive note in 22 L.R.A. 449.

As to liability of executor or administrator for loss of bank deposit, see case note to Knapp v. Jessup, ante, 617.

deny that the county is entitled to a decree against them for it. Their defense is that the defendant Reed deposited the county revenues, as collected by him, to his credit as trustee in the Fentress County Savings Bank, a banking concern then doing business in Jamestown, the county seat of Fentress county, and of good reputation for solvency in that community, in good faith believing, after careful and diligent inquiry and investigation, that the bank was solvent and the county's money safe in its hands; and that while it was so deposited, without fault or negligence upon his part, the bank failed, and a portion of the money, amounting to the sum sued for, became uncollectible, and was lost. They insist that upon these facts the defendant Reed was not liable for the money thus lost, and that they should not be held to account for it.

The court of chancery appeals, upon the hearing before it, found that the defendant Reed did deposit the county revenues collected by him as trustee to his credit as trustee in the Fentress County Savings Bank; that these funds were kept separate from his private or individual money; and that he received no compensation from the bank for keeping his account with it; that the bank and its officers, at the time he opened his account and deposited the money lost, sustained good reputation for solvency and integrity with the business men and citizens of Fentress county, but that the bank, while the defendant had deposited therein to his credit as trustee $3,491.17, failed and assigned, and in this way, after crediting the pro rata paid by the assets of the bank, $2,853.36 of the county's revenue was lost.

That court further finds that the defendant Reed lived in the country about 8 miles from Jamestown; that he had no safe place there to keep and deposit the public money collected by him; and that he was advised by his bondsmen and by business men of the county to deposit it in the Fentress County Savings Bank, which was the only banking institution in the county, and that he did so, in good faith believing the bank solvent and responsible; that said Reed was a man of integrity, but of limited business capacity and experience; that, while not a stockholder, he was one of the directors of the bank, and had access to its books and the right to examine them, and in this way the opportunity to learn its true condition, certainly whether or not it was a safe and proper place for the deposit of the public funds in his hands; but that he made no effort, as director or otherwise, to personally investigate the affairs of the bank and ascertain for himself its solvency or insolvency, and, in fact, gave them no attention and knew nothing about them. It is also found that, for want of capacity and familiarity with such matters, he could not have ascertained the condition of the bank had he attempted a personal examination of its books.

That court, upon this finding of facts, held that the defendant Reed did not exercise that diligence, caution, and prudence which public officers are required to do in the selection of a depository for public funds in their hands, and that, in depositing the money in the Fentress County Savings Bank, he was guilty of negligence, and he and his sureties should be held for such loss, and decreed accordingly. The defendants have appealed, and assigned as error this conclusion, insisting that it is in conflict with the holding of this court in the case of State use of Overton County v. Copeland, 96 Tenn. 296, 31 L.R.A. 844, 54 Am. St. Rep. 840, 34 S. W. 427.

This court did hold in that case that a public officer holds the funds that come into his hands in the discharge of the duties of his office as trustee, to be disposed of as provided by law; that he is not an insurer of the safety of such funds, but is bound only for the exercise of good faith, proper diligence, caution, and prudence in their management and safekeeping. It is further held that it is not negligence or want of proper business prudence and caution to deposit the funds in a bank of undoubted standing and reputation for solvency; and, in case of loss by failure of the bank, the officer would not be held to make it good.

But the facts in this case are widely variant from those found by the court in that, and fall far short of bringing it within the rule there announced and applied. The defendant Reed wholly failed to exercise the diligence, caution, and prudence which the law, as announced in that case, required him to do in selecting a safe and solvent bank in which to deposit the trust funds in his hands, if he desired to make that disposition of them, for it was entirely optional with him; and he was also guilty of culpable negligence in failing to avail himself of all the opportunities and facilities at his command for investigating and ascertaining the condition of the depository selected. Mere inquiry of the general public, or of the business men of the community where the bank does business, who may or may not be interested in it, of the solvency of the institution and the integrity and business qualifications of its officers, is not the diligence and caution required in such cases. There must be an active exercise of the diligence and caution which a prudent man, reasonably conversant with such affairs, brings to bear in the conduct of his own business, to ascertain the true condition and determine whether or not it is a safe place in which to deposit money. The duty to make a thorough investigation of the solvency or insolvency of the bank is an active one, and the officer must use all means reasonably available for such purpose. There must be no perfunctory discharge of this duty, and it must be continued so long as the deposits remain in the bank. Good faith alone is not sufficient to exonerate an officer from a loss sustained in this way. The want of business capacity, or familiarity and experience with business affairs, and with banks, is also unavailing. A public officer and his official sureties not only contract for the integrity and good faith of the officer, but for his capacity and ability to properly discharge the duties incumbent upon him. It is negligence for one to undertake to discharge duties which he knows, or ought to know, he cannot perform for the want of the necessary capacity, ability, and experience.

The defendant Reed, as a director of the Fentress County Savings Bank, had access to its books, and, with ordinary capacity and the exercise of ordinary intelligence, could have ascertained that it was insolvent and an unsafe place for the deposit of the trust funds in his hands. Good faith and a proper exercise of the duties of his trust required him to take advantage of these opportunities, and his failure to do so was negligence.

He has failed to make out a case for exoneration from the results of his own misconduct, and must bear the consequent loss.

Affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA EX
REL. WILLIAM A. ANDERSON, Attorney General, Appt.,
v.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— Va. —, 55 S. E. 572.)

Carrier—rate regulation—mileage books.

A statutory provision requiring railroad companies to sell mileage books at less than the rates regularly charged for transportation is class legislation, and not for the benefit of the whole people, and is therefore void as depriving the corporation of its property without due process of law, and of the equal protection of the laws.

(November 22, 1906.)

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the State Corporation Commission dismissing a petition to compel defendant to comply with the statute requiring the sale of mileage books. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William A. Anderson, Attorney General, for appellant:

The right and power of a state government to prescribe the rates and charges which shall be made by public-service corporations is a primary, fundamental, and essential attribute and prerogative of government.

Case Note.—Validity of statutes requiring issuance of mileage books at reduced rates:—The decision of the United States Supreme Court in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 43 L. ed. 858, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565, against the validity of a statute requiring the issuance of 1,000-mile tickets at reduced rates, having been based upon the fundamental provision 7 L.R.A. of the Federal Constitution which forbids the taking of property without due process of law, and requires the equal protection of the laws, is, of course, binding upon the state courts, and leaves but little opportunity for distinctions based upon the terms of a particular statute. Cardwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the State Corporation Commission denying the na dissenting, and has met with considerable criticism, and, in some instances, has been followed with evident reluctance.

In view of the position taken in this case, the earlier case of Atty. Gen. v. Boston & A. R. Co. 160 Mass. 62, 22 L.R.A. 112, 35 N. E. 252, is perhaps not of much value upon the general question as to the validity of statutes requiring the issuance of mileage tickets. But it is interesting to note that, while the court passed upon a number of constitutional objections to the statutes there involved, and the majority of the court held it unconstitutional for the reason that it required railroads to receive mileage tickets issued by other companies without providing any fund for their redemption, or making them a lien on any tangible property of the issuing company, or putting any limit on the number of those that might be issued or the time within which they must be used, it does not seem to have occurred to either the majority or the minority (including Mr. Justice Holmes, now of the United States Supreme Court) that, even without that feature, the statute would be contrary to the 14th Amendment.

One of the arguments advanced in the Smith Case in support of the validity of the provision requiring the issuance of 1,000-mile tickets at reduced rates was that it would have been within the power of the legislature to reduce the maximum rates for all to the same rate as that prescribed for those who purchased 1,000-mile tickets; and that therefore a partial reduction by means of the discrimination in favor of purchasers of 1,000-mile tickets was also valid. In reply to this argument, the opinion calls attention to the fact that a general maximum rate was fixed by the statute, and suggests that that fact, if it did not create a presumption that a lower rate would be unreasonable, at least tended to repel any inference that a lower rate would be reasonable. The court, however, does not seem to have laid sufficient stress upon this fact to justify the view that it is to be regarded as a limitation of its decision.

The New York court of appeals, in Beardsley v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 230, 56 N. E. 488, in obedience to the decision in the last case, held the New York statute of 1895, requiring the issuance of mileage books, unconstitutional as to corporations existing at the time of its enactment. The majority opinion simply declares the binding effect of the Federal Supreme Court decision, without expressing its approval or disapproval thereof. Vann, J., however, who concurred in the result, took occasion to say that, while he was compelled to yield to the power of the Supreme Court, he did not yield assent to its reasoning.

In Watson v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 32 Misc. 311, 66 N. Y. Supp. 798, upon the authority of the last case, the mileage-book act was held unconstitutional as applied to a corporation in existence prior to the enactment of the statute, and whose charter authorized a maximum charge of 3 cents a mile.

In Purdy v. Erie R. Co. 162 N. Y. 42, 48 L.R.A. 689, 56 N. E. 508, however, the court, while strongly intimating that defendant's objections and exceptions were not sufficient to raise the question that the act was in violation of the due-process-of-law provision, nevertheless discussed the question, and declared that the statute of 1895, requiring the issuance of 1,000-mile tickets at reduced rates, was not in violation of due process of law as applied to a railroad company incorporated after the enactment of the statute; there being nothing in the record then presented to show that defendant had succeeded to the rights and franchises of any company antedating the enactment of the statute. The court, after referring to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Smith Case, and impliedly recognizing that it would be binding so far as a railroad company organized before the prayer of a petition filed on behalf of the commonwealth by the attorney general against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, the object of which was to compel the defendant railroad company to comply with the act of the general assembly, approved March 15, 1906 (Acts 1906, chap. 256, p. 451), requiring all railroads operating in this state to keep on sale at all times mileage books of 500 miles and over at a charge of not more than 2 cents a mile.

The State Corporation Commission has, in a written opinion made a part of the record, after stating how the case arose, set forth in a very satisfactory manner the reasons why the relief asked on behalf of the commonwealth could not be granted, and we therefore adopt its opinion as a part of the opinion of this court.

"The petition states that the regular maximum rate of the defendant company is 3 cents per mile. The company was summoned by the commission to show cause why it should not be required to comply with the said statute, and have penalties imposed upon it for its failure to perform its public duty in this respect. In its defense the company alleges that the act in question is unconstitutional. Several grounds are assigned by the defendant upon which its assertion of the unconstitutionality of the law is based. The two main contentions are:

"(1) That the statute in question is in contravention of the provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it deprives the defendant of its property without due process of law, and without just compensation, and also denies to the defendant the equal protection of the laws.

"(2) That the general assembly of the state, under the provisions of the organic law of the state, has no authority by legislation to prescribe or fix rates for transportation, but that authority to exercise the legislative functions of the state in that respect is conferred exclusively upon the State Corporation Commission.

"The learned attorney general, as the highest law officer of the commonwealth, urged upon the commission that, in this proceeding, it was invested with all the powers, and had imposed upon it all the responsibility, of a court of record. He earnestly contended that the commission not only had the judicial authority to pass upon these constitutional questions, but that it was its manifest duty to do so, in so far as it was necessary to reach a final conclusion. This position of the attorney general was not combatted by the learned counsel for passage of the enactment of the mileage act was concerned, said: "We know of no reason, however, why a railroad company may not agree, upon sufficient consideration, to surrender or transfer any specific pecuniary right. The right to contract as to property is one of the inherent rights of a citizen, of which he cannot be deprived except as to that class of contracts which are condemned in the exercise of the police power, such as usury and the like. People v. Gillion. 109 N. Y. 389, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465, 17 N. E. 343. The same liberty of contract exists in the grant of charters by the legislature. Therefore, a regulation as to the price of transportation, which would be an illegal exaction when sought to be imposed on existing corporations solely by legislative fiat, may, in the case of future corporations, be the mere performance of the obligation of a contract. The authority to construct and operate a railroad is not the natural right of a citizen, but a franchise proceeding from the favor or grant of the state. As a condition of such grant, the legislature might require the company to transport passengers at any prescribed rate of fare; equally, it may require that certain classes of passengers be transported at a particular rate of fare, or that any passenger, under certain circumstances and on compliance with certain requirements, be transported at such rate." It appeared that the corporation involved in this case was organized after the passage of the mileage-book act of 1895, but before its amendment 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the statute of 1896; and the court said that, if the latter statute had increased the burden imposed upon the defendant by the act of 1895, it would, as to such additional burden, have been invalid. The court, however, pointed out that a comparison of the two acts showed that all the modifications effected by the later statute were favorable to the railroad company, and concluded that the later enactment was constitutional and valid in the same cases where the statute of 1895 would be upheld. The doctrine declared in this case was followed in Horton v. Erie R. Co. 65 App. Div. 587, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1018.

Upon a writ of error to review the judgment in the Purdy Case, the United States Supreme Court (Erie R. Co. v. Purdy, 185 U. S. 148, 46 L. ed. 847, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 605) refused to pass upon the question whether the statute, as applied to the corporation in question, violated the provisions of the 14th Amendment, upon the theory that the court of appeals, applying a rule of local practice, had declined to pass upon the question for the reason that it had not been properly raised in the trial court.

The doctrine and distinction declared in the Purdy Case were adhered to in the subsequent case of Minor v. Erie R. Co. 171 N. Y. 566, 64 N. E. 454, and it was held in the latter case that the mileage-book act of 1895 was constitutional as to a corporation originally organized prior to the passage of that act, but reorganized and incorporated thereafter under the provisions of the stock-corthe defendant company, but was conceded to be correct. Indeed, it is no longer open to question. 'In this commonwealth the State Corporation Commission, created by constitutional authority, is the instrumentality through which the state exercises its governmental powers for the regulation and control of public-service corporations. For these purposes, it has been clothed with legislative, judicial, and executive powers,'—was held by the court of appeals of this state in the case of Norfolk & P. R. Co. v. Com. 103 Va. 289, 49 S. E. 39, which went up to that court on appeal from the commission. The Constitution of Virginia, in § 156 (c) [Va. Code 1904, p. CCLII.] provides, as to the commission, that 'in all matters pertaining to the public visitation, regulation, or control of corporations, and within the jurisdiction of the commission, it shall have the powers and authority of a court of record,' etc. This section gives the commission, in the exercise of its judicial functions, authority to administer oaths, compel the attendance of witnesses, enter up and enforce its judgments; and confers upon it other ordinary attributes of a court of general jurisdiction. In all matters, 'within the jurisdiction of the commission,' says the Constitution, employing the word 'jurisdiction' which is appropriately used with reference to a judicial tribunal as distinguished from legislative or administrative authority. The commission, by § 156 (b), has conferred upon it the legislative authority to fix and prescribe rates and classifications, and to make regulations for transportation and transmission companies to the full extent to which that power exists in the state government. But, in the exercise of this legislative power, it cannot make its rates effective, or put its regulations into force, until it has summoned the company or companies to be affected before it. This is done by a notice which affords due process of law to the company. The hearing or investigation upon that notice gives to the final action of the commission the force and effect of a judgment of a judicial tribunal.

"Passing upon the reasonableness of rates and classifications to be prescribed by it, and of regulations, orders, and requirements to be promulgated by it,—in the exercise of its legislative authority,—constitute the principal matters 'within the jurisdiction' of the commission (as a judicial tribunal) as outlined in the Constitution. The general assembly has brought many additional matters within the jurisdiction of the commission.

"In this proceeding the attorney general

poration law for the reorganization of corporations upon the sale of corporate property and franchises, notwithstanding that the old company enjoyed the right to charge a specified fare, and that, by the terms of the stock-corporation act, the new corporation was vested with and entitled to all the rights, privileges, and franchises belonging to the original corporation, "subject to all the provisions, duties, and liabilities imposed by law on such corporations." The majority of the court took the view that the legislature intended to impose upon such new corporation, created for the purpose of taking over the property rights and franchises of an old corporation as a condition of its creation, that it should be subject to the general provisions of law applicable to other corporations of like character. Cullen and Gray, JJ., dissented upon the ground that the intent of the phrase quoted was to subject the reorganized company to all duties and liabilities which the legislature might lawfully impose on corporations as a class, but not to require of it a loss of the property and franchises of the old corporation.

The opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 43 L. ed. 858, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565, lends but little, if any, support to the distinction made by the New York court of appeals between corporations organized before and those organized after the enactment of the statute in question. It will be observed that the former court passed over the objection to the statute based upon the constitutional provision forbidding the impairment of the obligations of contracts, and put its decision squarely upon the provision of the 14th Amendment, already referred to. There is nothing in the opinion or statement of facts which suggests any limitation of the doctrine there laid down to cases in which the corporation affected was incorporated prior to the enactment of the statute in question, nor to except corporations subsequently organized therefrom.

In Purdy v. Erie R. Co. supra, the court, in answer to the objection that the mileage-book statutes were regulations of interstate commerce, and for that reason in conflict with the constitutional provision, held that the statutes must be construed as applying to transportation wholly within the state, and, as so construed, did not infringe the commerce clause. The same position on this point had been previously taken in Dillon v. Erie R. Co. 19 Misc. 116, 43 N. Y. Supp. 320, and Beardsley v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 15 App. Div. 251, 44 N. Y. Supp. 175.

Upon a writ of error in the Purdy Case the United States Supreme Court (Erie R. Co. v. Purdy, supra) held that no Federal question was presented by the decision that the statute did not conflict with the commerce clause, in view of the fact that that decision proceeded on the theory that the statute applied only to domestic transportation.

invokes the jurisdiction of the commission under §§ 16 and 19 of the act approved April 15, 1903 (Laws 1902-1904, pp. 141, 142), and carried into the Code of 1904, at page 714, as § 1313 (a). By that statute the commission is authorized to compel all corporations to perform any public duty or requirement, and to impose fines upon them for failing to do so. This brings within the judicial jurisdiction of the commission the enforcement of all statutes imposing public duties upon public-service corporations. The commission cannot impose a fine upon a corporation without summoning the company before it, hearing what it has to say in its defense, and passing judgment thereon judicially; in other words, giving the company a fair trial as in any other court. To proceed otherwise under this statute would be repugnant to fundamental principles, and would make the statute itself in violation of the Constitution, both of the state and the United States. The jurisdiction of the commission is further enlarged by clause 19 of § 1294 (b) of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 660], being § 19, chapter 2, page 974, of the act concerning public-service corporations. The commission is there given jurisdiction to entertain a petition filed before it complaining of violation of any of the provisions of that act. 'If the grievance complained of be established,' says the legislature in this act, 'the State Corporation Commission, sitting as a court of record, shall have jurisdiction by injunction, etc.' The commission awarded an injunction under this statute against the Virginia Passenger & Power Company restraining it from increasing its rates by discontinuing transfers. See report of State Corporation Commission of 1904, part 1, page 94.

"The commission having summoned the defendant company before it to show cause why a penalty should not be imposed upon it, the commission must hear fairly and pass judicially upon any issues properly raised. It matters not that one of the issues is the unconstitutionality of the act which the commission seeks to enforce. If the act is void, it is a just reason why the company cannot be compelled to comply with it, or be fined for violating it.

"In support of its argument that the act in question here contravenes the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, the company relies chiefly upon the authority of the case of Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 43 L. ed. 858, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565. The Supreme Court of the United States, in that case, held unconstitutional a statute of Michigan requiring railroad companies to keep on sale 1,000-mile books or tickets. The opinion 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

delivered by Mr. Justice Peckham declares that legislation of this character violates the constitutional rights of the railroad companies to due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. The statute provided that the tickets might be required to be issued in the name of the purchaser and his wife and children; the ticket to be valid for two years, and the unused portion then to be redeemed. The court says: 'We cannot regard this exceptional legislation as the exercise of a lesser right which is included in the greater one to fix by statute maximum rates for railroad companies. The latter is a power to make a general rule applicable in all cases and without discrimination in favor of or against any individual. It is the power to declare a general law upon the subject of rates beyond which the company cannot go, but within which it is at liberty to conduct its work in such a manner as may seem to it best suited for its prosperity and success. This is a very different power from that exercised in the passage of this statute. The act is not a general law upon the subject of rates, establishing maximum rates which the company can in no case violate. The legislature, having established such maximum as a general law, now assumes to interfere with the management of the company while conducting its affairs pursuant to, and obeying, the statute regulating rates and charges, and, notwithstanding such rates, it assumes to provide for a discrimination, an exception in favor of those who may desire, and are able to purchase, tickets at what might be called wholesale rates,—a discrimination which operates in favor of the wholesale buyer, leaving the others subject to the general rule. And it assumes to regulate the time in which the tickets purchased shall be valid, and to lengthen it to double the period the railroad company has ever before provided. It thus invades the general right of a company to conduct and manage its own affairs, and compels it to give the use of its property for less than the general rate to those who come within the provisions of the statute; and to that extent it would seem that the statute takes the property of the company without due process of law.'

"The learned judge reasons at length along the same lines. The opinion establishes that the state may prescribe a maximum scale of rates, but it cannot compel a railroad company to contract with any individual or class for carriage at a charge less than the established or regular scale of fares. The reasoning of the learned judge is not entirely and clearly convincing, nor is the conclusion reached by him very satisfactory; and three of the judges dissented. But we are bound by this decision, as it emanates from the highest tribunal in the country. The case has been referred to in several subsequent cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, without criticism or doubt cast upon it. It has also been followed in New York. In that state a statute somewhat similar to the Michigan and Virginia statutes was assailed as unconstitutional in the case of Beardsley v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 230, 56 N. E. 488. The court of appeals of New York refers to the opinion of Justice Peckham on the Michigan statute, and is not disposed to agree with all of its reasoning. But the court, in a brief opinion, concludes that it is bound by this opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States on a question arising under the Federal Constitution, and held the New York statute to be unconstitutional.

"In referring to the case in 173 U. S. 684, 43 L. ed. 858, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566, the attorney general says in his written brief: 'I frankly concede that, unless this case can be distinguished from the Michigan Case, or unless it can be shown that this case is overruled by some other decision or decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Michigan Case must be considered as conclusive of this case, and the Churchman act must, in that event, be held to be unconstitutional.' It is sought to distinguish the Virginia statute from the Michigan statute by pointing out that, in the latter law, the right to purchase the mileage tickets seemed to be confined to married men, and that the law itself was a portion of a general statute by which the legislature had fixed a maximum scale of passenger rates. These differences are incidental, and we do not think that they affect the reasoning by which the conclusion is reached by the Supreme Court of the United States.

"The court says: 'The legislature has the power to secure to the public the services of the corporation for reasonable compensation, so that the public shall be exempted from unreasonable exactions; and it has also the authority to pass such laws as shall tend to secure the safety, convenience, comfort, and health of its patrons and of the public with regard to the railroad. But in all this we find it neither necessary nor appropriate, in order that the legislature may exercise its full right over those corporations, to make such a regulation as this, which discriminates against it and in favor of certain individuals, without any reasonable basis therefor, and which is not the fixing of maximum rates or the exercise of any such power.'

is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and is therefore void, and we have no authority to punish the defendant company for failure to comply with its terms. We are greatly strengthened in this conclusion by a convincing opinion delivered several days ago upon this question by the learned judge of the corporation court of Staunton, in which he reaches a similar result.

"As the conclusion already reached forces us to take no further proceedings in this matter, and so disposes of the whole case, it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the other question raised by the defendant company. The entire lawmaking power of the people of Virginia is vested in their representatives constituting our general assembly, subject only to such limitation as may be placed upon it by the Constitution of the state. Whether the provisions of the Constitution relative to the powers and authority of this commission and vesting in the commission the legislative power to make rates are so worded as to exclude the general assembly from exercising its legislative power in that respect is a question which it is needless for the commission to pass upon, unless it is so presented as to render its adjudication absolutely essential to the decision of the case."

It will be observed that the commission considered that the controlling question in the case is whether or not the act of the general assembly under review, and which we will for convenience refer to as the "Virginia mileage act," is violative of the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by depriving the appellee company of its property or liberty without due process of law, or by depriving it of the equal protection of the laws. The learned attorney general concedes that the case of Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, supra, which we shall speak of for convenience as the "Michigan Case," must be considered as conclusive of this case, unless they can be distinguished, or it can be shown that the Michigan Case is overruled by some other decision or decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Therefore there is but little for us to add to what has been said in the opinion of the State Corporation Commission, supra.

The leading case relied on for the commonwealth is Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, which announced the broad doctrine that a state government has the inherent right to regulate and control railroad companies and other public-service corporations, and to prescribe the rates and charges that they should be allowed to make. In that case, the power of the legislature of Illinois to fix by law the maximum of charges for storage of grain in warehouses in Chicago, and other places in the state, was the question at issue, and, upon the ground that when private property is devoted to public uses it is subject to public regulation, it was held that, under the limitations upon the legislative power of the states imposed by the Constitution of the United States, the legislature of Illinois could fix by law the maximum of charges for the storage of grain in warehouses, at Chicago and other places in the state. A lengthy dissenting opinion was filed by Mr. Justice Field, concurred in by Mr. Justice Strong, taking the ground that the ruling of the majority was subversive of the rights of private property theretofore believed to be protected by constitutional guaranties against legislative interference, and in conflict with the authorities cited in its support; and that the decision of the court gave unrestrained license to legislative will.

By subsequent decisions of the same court, the doctrine laid down in Munn v. Illinois has been frequently and materially modified. Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 462, 702; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804.

With the modifications engrafted upon the rule referred to, the rule itself has been approved in a number of cases down to and including Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 186 U. S. 257, 46 L. ed. 1151, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900; and in those cases decided after the Michigan Case we are unable to find anything that can be construed as overruling that case, or discrediting it in any degree, the fact being that the case was not referred to because the circumstances in those cases, on the one hand, and the Michigan Case on the other, were different, and therefore the language of the decisions different. In the cases modifying the doctrine of Munn v. Illinois, the trend of judicial thought, it may be safely said, is more in harmony with the views expressed in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Field than with the view of the case taken by the majority of the court.

The most important and pertinent modification to be considered in connection with the case under review appears in the Railroad Commission Cases, supra, where the opinion by Chief Justice Waite (who also wrote the opinion in Munn v. Illinois), after reviewing the ruling in Munn v. Illinois, says: "From what has thus been said it is not to be inferred that this power of limitation or regulation is itself without limit. This power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which, in law, amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law."

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, supra, the rule in Munn v. Illinois appears to have been approved by a majority of the court and another very important modification of the rule ingrafted thereon, to the effect that, where a state created a commission and clothed that commission with authority to prescribe rates and charges to be made by railroad companies, the power thus delegated to the commission should not be exercised arbitrarily without giving the railroad companies affected a day in court and opportunity to be heard, and to appear and show the effect of the schedule of rates and charges prescribed by the commission upon them; and that to do this was depriving them of their property without due process of law, and depriving them of the equal protection of the laws.

The other important modifications of the rule are not relevant to the issue in this case, and were announced in a number of cases in which the rule was variously formulated, many of which are exhaustively reviewed by Mr. Justice Harlan in Smyth v. Ames, supra, where that learned judge states the doctrine, as established by the adjudications of the court, as follows: "(1) A railroad corporation is a person within the meaning of the 14th Amendment, declaring that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. (2) A state enactment, or regulations made under the authority of a state enactment, establishing rates for the transportation of persons or property by railroad that will not admit of the carrier earning such compensation as, under all the circumstances, is just to it and to the public, would deprive such carrier of its property without due process of law and deny to it the equal protection of the laws, and would, therefore, be repugnant to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. (3) While rates for the transportation of persons and property within the limits of a state are primarily for its determination, the question whether they are so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the Constitution secures, and therefore without due process of law, cannot be so conclusively determined by the legislature of the state, or by regulations adopted under its authority, that the matter may not become the subject of judicial inquiry."

We are wholly unable to perceive the antagonism claimed, on behalf of the commonwealth, to exist between the cases we have mentioned and a number of others, not necessary to be adverted to, recognizing the rule in Munn v. Illinois with its modifications, and the principle announced in the Michigan Case. The fact is that the last-named case refers to Munn v. Illinois and the cases modifying the rule announced therein, and recognizes the existence of the rule as modified; but, while recognizing the power of the legislature to prescribe maximum charges which may be made by public-service corporations, held that the Michigan mileage statute did not belong to that class of legislation enacted in the exercise of this admitted power, but was a taking of the property of the company without due process of law,—legislation which is prohibited by the 14th Amendment,—and therefore violated the constitutional rights of railroad companies to due process of law, and the equal protection of the laws. It was contended in that case, as in the case here, that, as the legislature would have the power to reduce the maximum charges to the same rate at which the Michigan statute provided for the purchase of 1,000-mile tickets, the railroad company could not be harmed nor its property taken without due process of law when the legislature only reduced the rate in favor of a few citizens instead of all; but the opinion denied the right of the legislature to make such an alteration, upon the ground that to do so might involve a reduction of rates to an amount insufficient to give the remuneration to which the railroad company was legally entitled under the decisions of the court.

It will be observed that, while the Michigan statute required 1,000-mile tickets to be sold by railroad companies for less than the ordinary rates of fare, for use by the purchaser and his wife and children, if named on the ticket, and made them valid for two years after the date of purchase, the Virginia mileage act requires the companies at all times, day and night, at all stations, regular and flag, to keep on sale books of 500 miles and over, and that "it shall be unlawful for any transportation company or corporation operated by steam to charge or collect a greater sum than 2 cents per mile on such mileage books, and such mileage books shall be good and valid for the use of any dependent household member of the family of the party to whom issued, dwelling under the same roof, within one year from the date of same." As it appears to us, the provisions of the two statutes are practically the same, and fall within the purview of the Michigan Case, as the reasoning for holding the one violative of the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States applies as well to the other. As stated in the opinion of the State Corporation Commission above, the incident that the Michigan statute had fixed a maximum scale of passenger rates is mentioned in the Michigan Case, but the conclusion reached was in no way rested upon that incident. On the contrary, the opinion says: "The power of the legislature to enact general laws regarding a company and its affairs does not include the power to compel it to make an exception in favor of some particular class in the community, and to carry the members of that class at a less sum than it has the right to charge for those who are not fortunate enough to be members thereof. This is not a reasonable regulation." And again: "Regulations for maximum rates for present transportation of persons, or property, bear no resemblance to those which assume to provide for the purchase of tickets in quantities at a lower than the general rate, and to provide that they shall be good for years to come. This is not fixing the maximum rates, nor is it proper regulation. It is an illegal and unjustifiable interference with the rights of the company." Clearly the dominant idea running through the whole opinion is that this is class legislation, and is not for the equal benefit of the whole people; therefore the conclusion is irresistible that the same judgment would have been rendered by the court had the legislature of Michigan not fixed a maximum scale of passenger rates.

It is true that the Michigan Case was decided by a divided court, as was the case of Munn v. Illinois and nearly all of the cases sanctioning the doctrine of that case; but, instead of the Michigan Case being discredited by any subsequent decision of the court, in Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. v. Jacobson, 179 U. S. 288, 45 L. ed. 194, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 115, in referring to the power of a state to regulate, etc., railroad companies, the Michigan Case is cited as authority for the proposition of law, that, "while this power of regulation exists, it is also to be remembered that the legislature cannot, under the guise of regulation, interfere with the proper conduct of the business of the railroad corporation in matters which do not fairly belong to the domain of reasonable regulation." And the court adds: "The distinction between this case and that of Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 43 L. ed. 858, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565, is plain,

There we held that the statute in question was not a reasonable regulation of the business of the company; that it was the exercise of a pure, bald, and unmixed power of discrimination in favor of a few of the persons having occasion to travel on the road, permitting them to do so at a less expense than others, provided they could buy a certain number of tickets at one time. It was not legislation for the safety, health, or proper convenience of the public, but an arbitrary enactment in favor of the persons spoken of, who, in the legislative judgment, should be carried at a less expense than the other members of the community, and there was no reasonable ground upon which the legislation could be rested, unless the simple decision of the legislature should be held to constitute such reason."

We have, then, in Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. v. Jacobson, the court's own construction of its decision in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith (the Michigan Case).

In Beardsley v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 230, 56 N. E. 488, holding a New York statute, similar to the Michigan and the Virginia mileage statutes, in conflict with the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, the opinion, while indicating that the court was not disposed to agree with all its reasoning, says: "The Supreme Court of the United States, in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, . . . has practically foreclosed all discussion on the question of the constitutionality of statutes of the character of the one before us."

We fully recognize, as did the court in Beardsley v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. supra, that the decision in the Michigan Case is conclusive upon us on the question of the constitutionality of the statute under consideration, and therefore the judgment of the State Corporation Commission complained of must be affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

PETER ANDERSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ROSEWELL MESSINGER.

(77 C. C. A. 179, 146 Fed. 929.)

Mortgage—assignee—foreclosure—title.

1. The bidding in of the property, by one who has taken an assignment of a mortgage as collateral security, at his own foreclosure sale, gives him a good title to the property, and transfers the trust in favor of his debtor to the proceeds, although such assignor, because not within the jurisdiction, was not made a party to the proceedings; where, in a contract after the sale, assignor and assignee contracted for a settlement, one element of which was that the foreclosure proceedings should not be disturbed.

Will—remainder.

2. A life estate with remainder in succession to the lineal descendants of testator's sons, the surviving son, and testator's brothers and sisters, and not a fee in the sons with executory devises, is created by will giving a moiety of testator's estate to each of his two sons, and continuing: "If either of my sons die without lineal descendants, the one surviving shall take his estate above bequeathed, and, if the survivor dies without lineal descendants, then one half both of the decedent's original portion, as well as one half of the portion taken by survivorship, shall go to" one of testator's brothers, and the other half to his surviving brothers and sisters.

Life estate—power of disposal—enlargement.

3. A life estate in real estate is not enlarged by a power to dispose of the property by will upon reaching twenty-one years of age.

Testamentary trustee—termination of power—quitclaim.

4. A testamentary trustee who is instructed to turn the property over to testator's son upon his reaching majority has no authority, after that event, to release property of the testator held by absolute title, to a debtor of the estate who claims that the property was held merely as security for the debt.

Same—equity of grantee.

5. No equity is created in favor of the assignor of a mortgage, as collateral security for his debt, by his inducing testamentary trustees of the creditor, after their authority has expired, to quitclaim to him the property which the testator had bought in under foreclosure of the mortgage, on the theory that he held the property in trust to secure the debt; although the debtor, in consequence of the agreement for such deed, continues his payments on the original debt, which payments, however, do not much, if any, exceed the amount remaining due after crediting him with the amount of the bid.

Life tenant—prejudice of remainder-man.

6. Life tenants cannot, by their own acts or admissions, defeat or prejudice the rights of the remainder-man.

(June 5, 1906.)

Case Note.—Does assignee of mortgage as collateral security, who forecloses the same and purchases the property, hold the title subject to a trust in favor of the assignor:—Apart from the effect that 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the contract between the parties may have had upon the question, and upon the assumption upon which the case was decided, that the assignor of the mortgage was not served with process in the foreclosure suit, ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lurton, Severens, and Richards, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. R. P. Carey and C. H. Trimble for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Clayton W. Everett and Oliver B. Snider, for defendant in error:

As the failure of issue, and limitation over, provided for in Anderson's will, must have occurred, if at all, at the death of his surviving son, no estate tail was created.

Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590; Hart v. Thompson, 3 B. Mon. 487; Daniel v. Thomson, 14 B. Mon. 663; Abbott v. Essex Co. 18 How. 202, 15 L. ed. 352; Anderson v. Jackson, 16 Johns. 382, 8 Am. Dec. 330; Jordan v. Roach, 32 Miss. 481.

William and James Anderson took, under their father's will, each a fee simple of his original one half; but the share of the one who first died without issue passed over to the surviving brother by way of executory devise.

Gray, 12 Ohio St. 320; Taylor v. Foster, 17 Ohio St. 166; Piatt v. Sinton, 37 Ohio St. 353; Collins v. Collins, 40 Ohio St. 353; Durfee v. Mac-the decision in the foregoing case, that the trust was transferred to the proceeds, and that the assignee held the title to the land itself absolutely and subject to no trust in favor of the assignor, seems to be against the weight of authority. The foreclosure in Slee v. Manhattan Co. 1 Paige, 48, however, was by advertisement under a power of sale, and the case is therefore distinguishable from ANDERSON v. MESSINGER. The court in the former case, however, said that the result would have been the same if the foreclosure had been by suit in equity to which the assignor was not a party. And the doctrine of that case was applied in Hoyt v. Martense, 16 N. Y. 231, holding that, where the assignor and assignee of a mortgage as collateral security joined in a suit to foreclose the same, and the assignee became the purchaser of the mortgaged property at the foreclosure sale, he held the property in trust for the assignor, and subject to the latter's right to redeem the same by the payment of the debt for which the mortgage was pledged. The court said that the object of the action was solely to foreclose the mortgagor's equity of redemption, and had no reference whatever to the right of the assignor to redeem the mortgage by the payment of the principal debt; and that such right of redemption was wholly unaffected by the foreclosure and sale.

The doctrine of these cases was also followed in Dalton v. Smith, 86 N. Y. 176, where the assignee bought at the foreclosure sale, the assignor not being a party. It seems that in this case the assignee, as a part of the contract under which the mortgage was assigned to him, expressly agreed that he would, upon payment of the mortgage, pay the borrower the excess of the principal over and above the amount of the principal loan; but it is not apparent how this agreement could affect the question, since that would be his implied obligation in any event.

So, in Re Gilbert, 104 N. Y. 200, 10 N. E. 148, the court, in applying the doctrine of these cases, held that, where the assignee of a mortgage as collateral security purchased the property under foreclosure in a suit to which the pledgor was not made a party, the land is substituted for the mortgage, and the assignee holds it as security merely, subject to the assignor's right to redeem.

As pointed out in the opinion in the case last cited, the case of Bloomer v. Sturges, 58 N. Y. 168, holding that the title acquired by an assignee as collateral security at a sale of the property under a foreclosure was not subject to a trust in favor of the assignor, is not opposed to the doctrine of these cases, since the decision was upon the ground that the pledgor was made a party, and that his rights were extinguished by the foreclosure decree, which, by its terms, adjudged that the defendants and each of them be forever barred and foreclosed of all right, title, interest, and equity of redemption in the premises.

The opinion in the last case expressed a doubt whether, upon the assumption that an equity does remain in the assignor after the purchase of the property by the assignee, such equity extends to the land itself, or constitutes merely a lien for the definite sum of the debt originally secured by the mortgage. That doubt, however, was dispelled by the opinion in Re Gilbert, supra, expressly holding that the equity extends to the land itself, and that the land is substituted for the mortgage as the subject of the trust in favor of the assignor.

The doctrine that an assignee as collateral security, who forecloses the mortgage and obtains the title, holds the same subject to a trust in favor of the assignor, is also declared in Brown v. Tyler, 8 Gray, 135, 69 Am. Dec. 239; Montague v. Boston & A. R. Co. 124 Mass. 242; and Stevens v. Dedham Inst. for Savings, 129 Mass. 547. In these cases, however, the foreclosure was not by suit, the assignee having obtained the title by seisin and possession under execution; and they are therefore distinguishable from ANDERSON v. MESSINGER.

The court, in Ross v. Barker, 58 Neb. 402, 78 N. W. 730, seems to assume that generally the assignor of a mortgage as collateral security, if not made a party to the fore-

A devise to James Anderson for life or fee simple, with the remainder over if he should die without children, does not create a gift by implication to his children.

Anderson was a trustee for Butler.

The foreclosure proceedings to which Butler was not a party did not extinguish his equity of redemption in the collateral mortgage.

Hoyt v. Martense, 16 N. Y. 231; Slee v. Manhattan Co. 1 Paige, 48; Dalton v.

Smith, 86 N. Y. 176; Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 495; Johnson v. Hart, 3 Johns. Cas. 322.

Mr. H. E. King also for defendant in error.

Severens, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment brought by Anderson, the plaintiff in error, to recover the possession of certain lots in the city of Toledo, Ohio, described in his petition, of which he claims the legal title, and the possession of which, he says, is wrongfully withheld by the defendant. The answer denies the alleged title of the plaintiff, and denies the plaintiff's right to the possession. A stipulation was filed waiving a trial by jury, and consenting to a trial by the court. Upon the trial, proof of all the material facts was made by mutual stipulations which are incorporated in the bill of exceptions. The court rendered judgment for the defendant, the entry reciting that the court "does find the issues of the cause with the defendant." As the facts material to the judgment were agreed, this must mean that the court found the issues of law for the defendant. Wayne County v. Kennicott, 103 U. S. 554, 26 L. ed. 486; Hulitt v. Ohio Valley Nat. Bank, 69 C. C. A. 609, 137 Fed. 461, 465. When closure suit, may elect to regard the title acquired by the assignee at the foreclosure sale as held in trust for him, though in that case, it appearing that the intention was that the assignee should acquire the complete title, it was held that the assignor might affirm the sale and demand credit on the principal debt for the amount bid, less cost and the expenses of the foreclosure, and, if such sum exceeded the aggregate of the principal debt, might recover that excess. The court said that it was unnecessary to decide whether the election by the assignor to affirm the sale would exist in a similar case, where nothing appeared, except the fact of the bid and sale to the assignee,—there being no other circumstances or evidential matters,—to disclose any particular intention.

In Plucker v. Teller, 174 Pa. 529, 52 Am. St. Rep. 825, 34 Atl. 208, the pledgee, who, by the terms of the pledge, was not authorized to foreclose the mortgage, at the request of the pledgeor, and a few days before the principal debt was due, brought suit to foreclose the mortgage, and eventually purchased the property at the sale thereunder, having previously notified the pledgeor that he intended only to bid enough to protect the principal loan, and that, if the pledgeor desired to bid anything above that amount, it would be necessary for him to be on hand himself. The court said that the circumstances relieved the pledgee from any trust in favor of the pledgeor, and put him in a position of an ordinary purchaser at a mortgage sale, and that this feature clearly distinguished the case from Re Gilbert, supra, and other New York cases above cited, and made it more analogous to Bloomer v. Sturges, supra.

In First Nat. Bank v. Ohio Falls Car & Locomotive Works, 20 Fed. 65, the court declared that it was well established that, where a mortgage of real estate has been assigned as collateral security for a debt other than the mortgage debt, and the holder of the collateral forecloses the mortgage without making the assignor a party, and becomes the purchaser under the decree, the sale extinguishes the mortgagor's right of redemption only, and does not otherwise affect the relations of assignor and assignee of the collateral. The court applied this doctrine to an analogous case by holding that, where a pledgee of mortgage bonds assigned them as collateral security for a debt of his own, and the assignee foreclosed against the original pledgeor without joining the original pledgeor, and purchased the bonds himself, he was bound to account to the pledgeor for the bonds or their value, and not merely for the amount bid at the sale.

The court, in Smith v. Bunting, 86 Pa. 116, did not pass upon the question discussed in this note, but merely declared that, upon the assumption that the property was held subject to a trust, the pledgee would be entitled to a judgment for the entire amount of the principal debt since, upon that assumption, the collateral had the facts are agreed, they are the equivalent of facts found by the court; and the question of the propriety of the judgment is, in each case, the same. Wayne County v. Kennicott, supra; Lehnen v. Dickson, 148 U. S. 71, 37 L. ed. 373, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 481; St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485. Some other matters hereafter to be referred to were received in evidence over objections which were incompetent to disturb or affect the ultimate material facts, and could not, therefore, affect the judgment. The case is properly here for review to determine whether the judgment is the one which the facts agreed required.

Each of the parties derives his title from Edward Bissell, a former resident of Toledo. On May 19, 1838, Bissell, claiming to be the owner of the premises, gave his bond to Charles Butler, of New York, for the sum of $21,500, payable one year from that date, with interest at 7 per cent, and, to secure the payment thereof, gave, with his wife, to said Butler, a mortgage on the premises in question. This bond and the mortgage were assigned by Butler, on September 23, 1841, to Henry Anderson, a resident of Holly Springs, Mississippi, to secure the payment of his note to Anderson for the sum of $20,000 and interest thereon; and, for further security, Butler assigned to said Anderson 546 shares of the Erie & Kalamazoo Railroad Company of the par value of $50 per share. Butler having defaulted in the payment of his note, Anderson, on September 19, 1843, filed his bill in chancery in the court of common pleas for Lucas county, Ohio, to foreclose the Bissell mortgage, making Bissell and his wife, Butler, and other parties, defendants. These parties, other than Butler, were served with process. Butler was not served and did not appear. That suit was pursued to a decree which was rendered April 1, 1844, for the sum of $29,139.01. A sale was ordered and a master appointed to conduct it. The mortgaged lands were bid off by Henry Anderson at the price of $6,910. The sale was duly confirmed, and the master was ordered to make the proper deed to the purchaser. At this stage of the proceedings, and on October 4, 1844, an agreement was entered into between Butler and Anderson, which, after reciting the giving of the bond and mortgage by Bissell, the assignment thereof by Butler to Anderson, and the assignment of the 546 shares of railroad stock to secure Butler's note, and the above-stated proceeding for the foreclosure of the mortgage, proceeded as follows:

not been realized, but had only been changed from a mortgage to the premises formerly bound thereby.

The decision in Rice v. Dillingham, 73 Me. 59, is merely to the effect that the pledgeor cannot maintain trover for the mortgage and notes assigned after the mortgage has been foreclosed; and that whatever remedy he has is in equity. The court did not undertake to say whether he did have a remedy in equity.

In Anderson v. Olin, 145 Ill. 168, 34 N. E. 55, the pledgeor's right to redeem after the time allowed by the decree of foreclosure under which the pledgee purchased the land was denied. But in this case the pledgeor was a party to the foreclosure suit, and was served with process, and a decree pro confesso rendered against him by default, providing that, if the premises sold should not be redeemed within a specified time, the defendants should be forever barred and foreclosed of all right and equity of redemption. The court made a special point of the fact that the pledgeor was a party to the foreclosure suit; and it is apparent that the decision rests upon the same ground as that in Bloomer v. Sturges, supra, which is cited in the opinion, and is distinguishable from the other New York cases above cited, holding that the pledgee's title is subject to a trust in favor of the pledgeor where the latter was not a party to the foreclosure suit.

is, however, sustained by Kelly v. Matlock, 85 Cal. 122, 24 Pac. 642, and McArthur v. Magee, 114 Cal. 126, 45 Pac. 1068, declaring, in general terms, that a pledgee who purchases at his own foreclosure sale, in the absence of fraud, takes a free and absolute title unencumbered by a trust in favor of the pledgeor, and is required to account to the latter only for the proceeds realized on the foreclosure sale. This was apparently upon the assumption even that the pledgeor was not a party to the foreclosure suit. In the former case, however, the doctrine was not applied, for the reason that the pledgee did not proceed with the foreclosure to a judgment, but took a deed from the mortgagor in satisfaction of the claim, and satisfied the mortgage of record.

The doctrine of these cases was also recognized in Hoult v. Ramsbottom, 127 Cal. 171, 59 Pac. 587. In that case, however, the court held, for the purpose of protecting the pledgee against liability to account to the pledgeor for the full amount of the bid made by him at the foreclosure sale, that the trust in favor of the pledgeor was transferred to the land, it appearing that the parties had agreed that the foreclosure proceedings should be conducted in the pledgeor's interest, and that the pledgee's agent should bid the amount of the mortgage which was largely in excess of the principal debt for which the mortgage was pledged.

"And, whereas, the said Henry Anderson, at the instance and request of the said Charles Butler, and in consideration of the covenant of the said Charles Butler hereinafter contained, is willing to relinquish and surrender to the said Charles Butler the collateral securities, so assigned as aforesaid, for the payment of said note of $20,000, so far as the same may be done without prejudice or injury to the order obtained for the sale of the said mortgaged premises, and the rights of the said Henry Anderson under the same, and without prejudice to the personal liability of the said Charles Butler to the said Henry Anderson on the principal debt.

"Now, therefore, these presents witness, that in consideration of the premises and for the purpose of giving effect to the same, and said Henry Anderson has on the day of the date hereof executed and delivered a power of attorney to the said Charles Butler, empowering and authorizing him fully and effectually, if he shall see fit to do so, to release and discharge the said Edward Bissell of and from all personal claim, demand, or liability, whatsoever, for or on account of the said bond and mortgage, but without prejudice to the proceedings which have been or may be adopted to effect the sale of the said mortgaged premises; and that the said Henry Anderson has also, by instrument in writing, released and transferred to the said Charles Butler the said 546 shares of Erie & Kalamazoo Railroad Company stock.

"And the said Charles Butler, in consideration of the surrender and relinquishment of the securities, hereby covenants and agrees to and with the said Henry Anderson, that the same shall not be held or construed in any way to affect or impair the liability of him, the said Butler, on the said note for $20,000; and the said Charles Butler also covenants and agrees to and with said Henry Anderson that he, the said Butler, will well and faithfully apply and pay over to the said Henry Anderson on account of the said note, all sums of money or other valuable consideration which he, the said Butler, may receive or derive, by reason of the surrender and relinquishment of the securities aforesaid, by him the said Henry Anderson.

"In testimony whereof the said Henry Anderson and Charles Butler have hereunto respectively set their hands and seals in duplicate this fourth day of October in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-four.

"[Signed]

Henry Anderson.

"Charles Butler."

Thereafter, on November 18, 1844, the master, in pursuance of the above-mentioned decreed and of the sale and the order of confirmation thereof, executed and delivered his deed of conveyance to Anderson, his heirs and assigns, of the premises here in question, and which, as above stated, had been bid off by him. Prior to the date of this last-mentioned agreement between Butler and Anderson, Butler had, on February 22, 1843, obtained a quitclaim deed of these premises from Bissell and wife. But this deed was not recorded until after Anderson's death, nor until October 13, 1849; and it does not appear that the latter ever had notice of it. After the contract of October 4, 1844, Butler made no further payment on his debt to Anderson during the lifetime of the latter, nor to his representatives until October, 1849.

The first question in the case is, What, as the consequence of these proceedings for foreclosure, the sale of the property to Henry Anderson under the decree, and the agreement of October 4, 1844 between him and Butler, was the nature of the title conveyed to Anderson by the master's deed? The contention for the plaintiff is that it conveyed to him the title to the property freed from the encumbrance of the mortgage; and that the price which he paid was properly applicable to the payment pro tanto of Butler's note. For the defendant, it is contended that Anderson, being assignee of the mortgage, and having bid off the property and taken the master's deed to himself, acquired only Bissell's equity of redemption, and held the property thereafter as trustee for Butler and as a continuing security for the payment of the latter's note. It is a well-settled rule of law that, when the owner of securities pledges them to secure the payment of his own debt, he impliedly transfers the right to the remedies which will make the securities available for the payment of his debt in case of his own default. Schleman v. Bowlin, 36 Minn. 198, 30 N. W. 879; Slee v. Manhattan Co. 1 Paige, 48, 78. And there necessarily goes with this power to make the securities available, the incidental power to transfer the assignor's interest in the securities; otherwise the purchaser does not get the property pledged by the securities, but an indefinite interest depending on contingencies over which he has a remote, if any, control, a circumstance which would greatly depreciate the value of the pledge.

There is also another rule of general application, which is that a pledgee, who is a trustee, cannot become the purchaser at his own sale of the pledge. But this rule is not applicable to a judicial sale conducted by an officer appointed by law. Nor, indeed, is such a purchase absolutely void in all circumstances, when the sale is a private sale and the purchaser has an interest to protect. In either of the last-stated instances, the sale would be voidable if the purchaser were guilty of any fraud or other wrongful practice in the transaction; in the first instance, by a refusal of the court to confirm the sale, or by some judicial proceeding to impeach it; and in the latter instance, by such appropriate action, private or judicial, as he should elect to make his objection defective. Richards v. Holmes, 18 How. 143, 15 L. ed. 304; Smith v. Black, 115 U. S. 308, 29 L. ed. 398, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50; Allen v. Gillette, 127 U. S. 589, 32 L. ed. 271, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1331; Pewabic Min. Co. v. Mason, 145 U. S. 349, 38 L. ed. 732, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 887.

In Richards v. Holmes, supra, a deed of trust had been given to secure the payment of a note, which, at the time of the sale under the trust, was held by Harper. The latter authorized the auctioneer to make a bid for him, and, that being the best price offered, the property was struck off to him. Upon a bill filed by a subsequent encumbrancer to redeem, it was contended that the sale under the trust deed was void upon the ground that the beneficiary of the trust could not bid at the trustee's sale, and that the first mortgage continued subject to redemption. But the court, by Mr. Justice Curtis, observing that in fraud appeared, said: "It was for the advantage of these complainants, as subsequent encumbrancers, that this property should sell for the best price which could be obtained. Even improper practices to enhance the price, if any such had been resorted to, could not be complained of by them. It is only some practice to prevent bidding, or procure a sale for less than the property would have otherwise brought, which can be relied on by them to avoid the sale. We have no doubt the creditor, for the satisfaction of whose debt the sale was made, had a right to compete fairly at the sale; but, whether he had or not, his doing so could not be injurious to the complainants." It would have made no difference in that case if the bid had been in the trustee's name, for his act would have inured to his cestui que trust, who was the real party. And the learned justice further said: "And the same remark applies to the trustee. It was his duty to obtain for the property the best price he could by the use of due diligence in a fair sale. It would have been improper for him, in behalf of the creditor, to employ the auctioneer to buy at anything short of that best price. But there was no impropriety in his employing him to bid a particular sum for the creditor, to prevent a sacrifice of the property."

But in any such case the pledgeor may, if he chooses, affirm the sale; and, if he does, the ground of objection is removed. Glidden v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 53 Ohio St. 588, 43 L.R.A. 737, 42 N. E. 995.

If, in the present case, the property had been sold to another party, there could be no doubt that the sale and deed would have carried to the purchaser the title which the mortgagor, Bissell, had when he made the mortgage, and would have transferred any interest which Butler had in the property to the proceeds of the sale. The trust would attach to them. And, to the extent of the sum due on Butler's debt, they would be a satisfaction of it. If there were a surplus, it would belong to Butler. Nor could it make any difference that Anderson bid off the property. The result would be the same. If he paid to the master the amount of his bid, it would be paid back to him on its being brought into court, a formality generally dispensed with by the master's taking the receipt of the creditor for so much of the proceeds as the decree adjudges to be due to him and bringing the balance into court to be paid over to the party entitled. If, as here, the party who might be so entitled was beyond the process of the court, he could come in by petition, and, on showing his right, obtain it. Butler, the assignor, was not served with process. He was a proper, but not an indispensable, party, and he was not within the jurisdiction of the court. The object in making him a party would be to enable him to make any objections which his interest might require and to preclude him from thereafter raising any. But his agreement shows that the debt remained unpaid, and that, knowing the proceedings were pending and without suggesting any objection to them, he stipulated for their completion. The reasons on which a party in interest is allowed to purchase at a judicial sale whereby he must become answerable for his bid are inconsistent with the notion that the proceedings have resulted in nothing more than a continuance of the trust for the same whole debt. We think the legitimate result of the foreclosure proceedings was to transfer the trust to the proceeds of the sale; for, by assigning the Bissell debt and mortgage, Butler must have contemplated that the consequence must be that, upon his default, this transmutation of his interest by foreclosure of the mortgage and the sale of the mortgaged property would be likely to ensue.

We are aware that in Slee v. Manhattan Co. 1 Paige, 48, it was held, in substance, by Chancellor Walworth that, in a case where the assignee of a mortgage becomes the purchaser of the premises at a sale made under a power given by the mortgage, the assignee having become the purchaser at his own sale, there was no transmutation of the interest of the mortgagee; that his interest in the mortgage "remained untouched by that foreclosure," and that the purchaser had acquired thereby only the equity of redemption. The learned chancellor further indicated his opinion that the same consequence would ensue in the case of an assignee of a mortgage bidding in the property at a sale under a decree in a suit brought by him to foreclose the mortgage. This was obiter. But the case has been accepted by the courts of New York as authority for the application of the doctrine to judicial sales, as well as to sales under a power in the mortgage deed. The chancellor, in his opinion, admitted that the authority to execute the power was vested in the assignee "by the mere act of the assigning the legal interest in the mortgage," and that, if the assignee, in the fair execution of the power, had sold and conveyed the premises to a stranger for one half the amount of the debt, the assignor would have been bound to pay the balance of the debt, and would have had no claim to redeem the mortgaged premises from such purchaser; that "he must have understood that the defendants [the assignees] had a right to foreclose under the statute. The premises were advertised and sold with his full knowledge of the facts, and he made no objection that they were not authorized thus to proceed." And the chancellor further says that, if the assignee had foreclosed in chancery, "a stranger purchasing under the decree would unite the legal estate which is in the defendants [the assignors] with the equity of redemption of . . . [the mortgagors] sold under the decree, and thus acquire the whole estate which existed in the mortgagors previous to the giving of their mortgage." But, because the premises were bid off by the assignee (in that case they were sold to a person who was an agent of the assignee, who conveyed them to his principal), the chancellor held that the assignor's interest had not been cut off by the sale. This is opposed to the decision in Richards v. Holmes, supra. There might be good reason for holding in such a case that, if any injury had been done to the assignor in consequence of the assignee's bidding, the former could have elected to disaffirm the sale. But the dictum that the sale to the assignee under a decree would be ineffectual to pass the title of the assignor, and the distinction made between a purchase by the assignee and one made by a stranger, cannot be supported, when it has been admitted that the assignee may bid at the sale. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In such a case the thing sold is not one thing if sold to a stranger, and another thing if sold to an assignee. They were not bidding for different things, and the deed of the master is for the thing sold.

Coming, then, to the agreement of October 4, 1844, it is apparent that Butler knew that Anderson had bid off the property, and he consented that the sale should go on to its consummation. It was not stated that the expected deed should be affected by a trust, and the insistence with which Anderson, by the stipulation of his contract, held on to the benefits of his purchase, is indicative of his understanding in making the agreement, and it was indicative to Butler of Anderson's expectation. The latter relinquished the control of his other securities, and gave Butler the power to discharge Bissell's liability upon his note. It seems singular that Anderson would have practically stripped himself of the control of everything else in the nature of a security to a slow debtor for so large a sum as $29,000 unless he were to gain some substantial advantage under his purchase at the master's sale. And it is noteworthy that in the deeds which Butler obtained from the sons of Henry Anderson after the latter's death, and which deeds will hereafter be more particularly considered, they are moved to recite that Henry Anderson took the title to said lands as security for Butler's debt, and that he died without "having made or executed any declaration in writing of the purpose for which said property was held;" which seems to indicate that such a declaration was due and expected; and the inquiry is pertinent, why, if there was such an understanding, nothing was said about it in the agreement of October 4, 1844. Butler seems to have been very watchful for his own interests; and it seems unlikely that so important a matter should have then been overlooked and not taken care of until several years after Anderson's death, and only developed while the trustees were settling his estate. But the material circumstance, now to be regarded, is that there is no fact agreed, or finding by the court, which imports any qualification of the legal effect of the foreclosure proceedings, the agreement of Butler and Anderson made pending those proceedings, and the master's deed following thereon. We have given detailed exposition of special facts for the reason that it is proposed to fasten a trust upon the deed in question by proof of subsequent transactions, and thereby raise an equity which would entitle the defendant to the possession of the premises notwithstanding it should be held that the plaintiff has the legal title. We think it must be held that at the time of Henry Anderson's death he held the legal title to the lands in question unaffected by any trust in favor of Butler.

On February 28, 1846, Henry Anderson made his will, and on the 3d day of April following he died, being then a resident of Mississippi. He was, at the date of his will and at the time of his death, a widower. He left two children only, William, born February 12, 1828, and James H., born June 25, 1831. The parts of this will which are now material are here set forth:

"I, Henry Anderson, do make and ordain this to be my last will and testament. I declare my domicile to be the town of Holly Springs, Marshall County, State of Mississippi. I revoke the will made by me on the 3d of March, 1837, and all other wills, if any there be.

"Item. I give, devise and bequeath to Peter Anderson, Walter Goodman and Peter W. Lucas all my property, both real and personal, legal and equitable in possession, reversion or remainder, and all claims and demands whatsoever, except such right, title or claim to land, money or choses in action as I may be entitled to as one of the agents of the American Land Company and as one of the stockholders of said company; this property they shall hold in trust, and if one or more of them die, the survivors or survivor shall hold in trust for the following purposes: They shall pay my debts, other than such as may be owing to the American Land Company, out of moneys on hand and such property as may be sold least injurious to my estate. I wish them to collect debts due to me and apply to this purpose. They may, if they think fit, and can, obtain an extension of time on any debt, and they may pledge my property to raise money to pay debts. They may sell for cash or on credit, and if at any time they have funds on hand not required for debts or legacies they may invest the same. They shall have full power to make titles for property sold and to pay charges for preservation, and in all respects have the power of owners, but always as trustees. I have entire confidence in each of them, and therefore give each the power of all, so that each may do separately what all acting together may do, except in making investments; in that I wish all to join. The annual accounts of my said trustees, signed by their respective names, shall be binding on my heirs and shall be conclusively so unless error or fraud be clearly established. I have directed the payment of debts other than what I may owe the American Land Company. I exclude the debts to the company because that is subject to an account with the company, and I do not wish my trustees to make payments before that account is adjusted. The adjustment of that account and the direction and management of the affairs of the company, so far as I have power, right or interest, I place in the hands of Peter Anderson and Walter Goodman, and when they have finally closed it, it shall become a part of the trust created by this article of my will and subject to the control of my said trustees. By saying 'it shall become a part of the trust,' I mean the effects and proceeds that I may be entitled to as stockholder and agent of the company. . . .

"Item. It is my will that when my son William arrives at the age of twenty-one years the trustees of the first and general trust shall deliver to him a settlement of the affairs of the trust, and if my debts are then paid, and as soon as that takes place, they shall put him in possession of one-half of my property, reserving thereout two-fifths parts of said moiety by valuation, which my said trustees shall hold in trust and properly invest and pay over to him at the age of twenty-five years. If my interest in the American Land Company be not brought into the general trust at the time William becomes twenty-one, but is brought in at any time before he arrives at twenty-five, so soon as brought in, two-fifths shall be deducted therefrom and invested and paid over to him at twenty-five, the other three-fifths he shall have as soon as paid in. I find the above does not express my will in this: When I say two-fifths shall be deducted from the interest I may have in the land company for investment, and three-fifths to be paid to him, I mean two-fifths of a moiety shall be deducted and three-fifths of a moiety paid over.

"And it is my will that my said trustees hold and invest and pay over the remaining moiety of my estate to my son James at the respective periods of twenty-one and twenty-five years of age, being governed as to the amounts to be paid at each of the respective periods by the same rules and directions as are above laid down in the bequest to William, and to be governed in all other respects by the regulations laid down concerning the same.

"If either of my sons die without lineal descendants, the one surviving shall take his estate above bequeathed, and, if the survivor dies without lineal descendants, then one-half both of the decedent's original portion, as well as one-half of the portion taken by survivorship, shall go to my brother Peter, the other half to such of my brothers and sisters as may be living at the time of the death of such surviving son. If my brother Peter be not living at the time of the death of my surviving son, so dying without lineal descendants, then the share he would have taken, if living, shall go to his children living at the time of the decease of my said son, and if there be no children surviving, then the share shall go to my other brother and sisters surviving at the time of such decease of my son. I make the following explanation: The limitation over on the death of my surviving son without lineal descendants is intended to take effect if there be no lineal descendants living at the time of the decease of such son. Nothing in the foregoing will shall be construed as to deprive either of my sons disposing of their portions by will on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, respectively. The above limitations over shall give way to the provisions of such wills."

This will was duly probated in Mississippi, and an authenticated copy of the will and of the probate thereof were thereafter duly filed in the probate court of Lucas county, Ohio, where the will was duly admitted to probate and record as a will from another state. The construction of this will of Henry Anderson is the next subject which engages our attention. The particular question is, What did the testator intend by the words of the will: "If either of my sons die without lineal descendants, the one surviving shall take his estate above bequeathed, and, if the survivor die without lineal descendants, then one-half both of the decedent's original portion, as well as one-half of the portion taken by survivorship, shall go to my brother Peter, the other half to such of my brothers and sisters as may be living at the time of the death of such surviving son. If my brother Peter be not living at the time of the death of my surviving son, so dying without lineal descendants, then the share he would have taken, if living, shall go to his children living at the time of the decease of my said son, and if there be no children surviving, then the share shall go to my other brother and sisters surviving at the time of such decease of my son."

The other language of the will is important only as it sheds light upon the testator's meaning by the use of the language quoted. The plaintiff, who is the lineal descendant of the testator's surviving son, James H. Anderson, claims that the testator intended to give to each of his sons a life estate in his moiety with a remainder over to the survivor of the one first dying, in the event of his dying without lineal descendants, and to the survivor a life estate in both moieties with remainder over to the lineal descendants if such should be living at his death, and if not, then to the testator's brother Peter one half and to his other brother and sisters one half, or, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

if Peter should not then be living, to Peter's children, if any, and if there be none, then to the surviving brother and sisters of the testator. If this is correct, the plaintiff took an estate in remainder in both moieties on the death of his father, James H. Anderson. The defendant claims that the testator intended that each of his sons should take a fee simple in one moiety, which would be defeated by his death without lineal descendants, in which event the surviving son should take a fee simple in that moiety which, with the fee simple in his own moiety, would be defeated by his dying without lineal descendants, in which event, the whole estate would go to the testator's brother Peter, etc.; in other words, that each of the two sons of the testator took an estate in fee simple, which would be defeated if the survivor died without lineal descendants, whereupon the testator's brother Peter and the other collateral relatives would take the estate by way of an executory devise.

The rule by which the court will be guided is stated by Chief Justice Marshall in Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68, 75, 76, 8 L. ed. 322, 325, 326, as follows: "The first and great rule in the exposition of wills, to which all other rules must bend, is that the intention of the testator, expressed in his will, shall prevail, provided it be consistent with the rules of law. David v. Stevens, 1 Dougl. K. B. 322; Perrin v. Blake, 1 W. Bl. 672 et seq."

And this statement has been repeated and confirmed in many subsequent cases. Brant v. Virginia Coal & I. Co. 93 U. S. 333, 23 L. ed. 927; Blake v. Hawkins, 96 U. S. 324, 25 L. ed. 141; Giles v. Little, 104 U. S. 296, 26 L. ed. 747; Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 309, 32 L. ed. 142, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1164; Hardenbergh v. Ray, 161 U. S. 126, 38 L. ed. 97, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305; Home for Incurables v. Noble, 172 U. S. 391, 43 L. ed. 489, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 226; Adams v. Cowen, 177 U. S. 475, 44 L. ed. 852, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 668; Robbins v. Smith, 72 Ohio St. 1, 17, 73 N. E. 1051. And, in order to "ascertain the general intent," said the court in Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. 99, 7 L. ed. 617, "words of limitation shall operate as words of purchase, and words of implication shall supply verbal omissions."

Another rule in the construction of wills is that we are to put ourselves in the place of the testator, and search all parts of the will in order to gather his meaning in the use of the words employed in the particular parts of it. If, by so doing, we become convinced in regard to his general purpose, we use that light in preference to arbitrary rules. But, if the testator's meaning cannot be clearly discerned, we are at liberty, and, generally for the sake of certainty in the possession and transmission of estates, required, to apply such rules of construction as have by long usage been approved and used. It often happens that in wills in which the provisions are complex and elaborate, especially in such as are written by testators themselves, implications are seen where the testator has assumed as understood what he has not in terms expressed; and in such case if the implication is clear, it has equal effect as if the purpose had been expressed in words. The relevancy of these observations is found in undertaking to determine what consequences the testator intended when he said, "if either of my sons die without lineal descendants the one surviving shall take his estate above bequeathed, and if the survivor dies without lineal descendants, then" to his collateral relatives. Now, we cannot but think that to the common understanding this language would convey the meaning that in the other alternative—that is, if the sons should leave lineal descendants—it was intended that they should take, and that it was only in the event of their not leaving lineal descendants that the estate should go over to collateral relatives. The reason which gives force to the familiar rule of construction that, the inclusion of one alternative is the exclusion of the other, and vice versa, would tend to confirm the impression. Moreover, the whole paragraph shows beyond doubt that the testator intended to prefer his lineal descendants to the collateral branches of his family. After providing that his sons should take the estate by moieties, his mind went forward to the time of their death. The working of the natural instinct to keep the property in the family becomes evident. He does not say, if either of my sons shall die "without heirs," but without "lineal descendants." He evidently chose his words, and the distinction is clear. It would not comport with his idea that the lineal descendants should take as heirs. Nor did he intend so wide a class. He made a distinct blunder if he discarded the familiar term "heirs" and employed the selection of "lineal descendants" if he had in mind a succession by inheritance, and not by purchase. We are now considering this paragraph as if it stood unaffected by anything else in the will, and we cannot but be much impressed by the considerations which tend to the conclusion that the testator intended that, if the survivor of the sons should die leaving lineal descendants, they should take the remainder.

Then, if this were doubtful, there is a long-established rule of construction of devises in the law of real property, one of such as were referred to in the early part 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of our discussion of this subject, that, when a devise can, without doing violence to the language of the testator, be construed as creating a remainder, it shall not be construed as being an executory devise. 3 Comyns's Dig. 450, Devises, N. 17; Fearn, Contingent Remainders, 393; 6 Cruise's Dig. title 38, chap. 17, § 11; Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Wms' Saund. 380; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 3d ed. 565; 4 Kent, Com. 263; Doe ex dem. Poor v. Considine, 6 Wall. 458, 475, 18 L. ed. 869, 875; Blanchard v. Blanchard, 1 Allen, 223; Moore v. Lyons, 25 Wend. 119, 126; Wolfe v. Van Nostrand, 2 N. Y. 436.

In Purefoy v. Rogers, supra, which has always been regarded as a leading case, the Lord Chief Justice Hale said: "Where a contingency is limited to depend on an estate of freehold which is capable of supporting a remainder, it shall never be construed to be an executory devise, but a contingent remainder only; and not otherwise." And in the note by Patterson and Williams to the sixth edition of Saunders, it is said that "this rule, so laid down by Lord Hale, has been uniformly adhered to ever since." And, upon the matter of construction, Washburn says (2d volume, 506, same edition), citing 2 Cruise's Dig. 203: "The term 'remainder,' it should be observed, is not one of art which it is necessary to employ in creating an estate in expectancy, such as has been described. Any form of expression indicating the intention of the grantor or deviser to do this would be sufficient."

Executory devises were the creation of the judges to effectuate the intention of testators where their purpose could not take effect as the creation of a remainder. A good illustration of this subject would be to suppose that in the present instance the testator had devised to each of his sons, "his heirs and assigns," the moiety, etc., and then in another place had devised the estate over upon the happening of some contingency. The estate going over could not take effect because there could be no remainder of an estate in fee simple. It is therefore construed to be an executory devise which will defeat the fee-simple estate. It is so done because the intent of the testator would be otherwise disappointed. The case of McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 340, 28 L. ed. 1015, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652, is one where both species of estates were created by the will. The testator devised his property to trustees who were to hold it until his children were dead and until his youngest grandchild should be twenty-one years old, whereupon the trustees were to divide and turn it over to his several grandchildren in fee, and, if any of them should have died leaving children, then to the children of such grandchild. As to the grandchildren living at the time of distribution, it was held they took an estate in remainder; but, as to the children of deceased grandchildren, it was held that they took by way of an executory devise. This last result followed because of the death of those grandchildren before the expiration of the precedent estate in the trustees, and therefore a gift to them could not be held to be a remainder. But, to give effect to the probable intention of the testator, it was construed as an executory devise.

The essential conditions on which there can be construed to be a remainder are that there must be a precedent estate which will necessarily terminate at some future time, and there must be nominated a person who will be in esse at the termination of the precedent estate, competent to take the remaining estate. Both estates must be created at the same time and by the same act or instrument; and the one must begin when the other ends. The order and succession of the estates was a requirement of the feudal system in order that there should at all times be someone to perform the obligations due to the sovereign, or his immediate feudatory, from the tenant on account of his tenure. Enough remains of this requirement to support, at least in technical contemplation, the rule as it formerly existed. Now, if these provisions of Anderson's will be held to convey a life estate to the sons with remainder to his lineal descendants, we have the most common form of an estate in remainder. It is not necessary that the remainder-man should be in esse at the time when the will is made or becomes effective by the death of the testator. It is enough if he is in being at the time when the estate vests in possession; that is, at the termination of the particular estate. If the remainder-man is in esse at the death of the testator, the right vests immediately; if not, the right is suspended, but exists, in consideration of law, until he comes into being, whereupon it vests; and in either case the estate will open to let in after-born remainder-men, if any such appear. Doe ex dem. Comberbach v. Perryn, 3 T. R. 484; 3 Comyns's Dig. Estates, B. 13; 4 Kent, Com. 206, note b; McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 340, 380, 28 L. ed. 1015, 1027, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652.

The contention of the defendant rests upon the assumption that the language of the will imports a devise of an estate in fee simple to the sons of the testator, and this assumption would probably be well taken if we looked only to that part of the will which devises the property to them. It is true there is no mention of heirs, but it would in the case supposed be implied that the testator intended to devise the whole estate. But the implication is removed if, from other provisions in the will, it is seen that the testator did not intend to devise an unqualified estate. And it is to be observed that the defendant's contention proposes to cut down the fee simple which the earlier parts of the will are said to devise to the sons, by a condition that the sons shall leave lineal descendants. So, in either construction of the parties, the implication which would arise from the unqualified language of the devise to the sons cannot prevail. The generally accepted rule now is that an unqualified gift in wills to a devisee, without mention of heirs, imports a fee simple absolute; or, if the testator has not so great an interest therein, such an estate as he has. And this rule is incorporated in Ohio Rev. Stat. 1906, § 5970. But this cannot apply here, as we have shown; for, confessedly, the gift was not of a fee simple absolute. The conditions therefore exist for the application of the rule laid down by the lord chief justice, in Purefoy v. Rogers, supra.

The early rule in England was that such an implication as results from such language as is employed in this will would be sufficient to indicate that the testator meant that the lineal descendants of his sons should take an estate in remainder upon the death of the sons. In the early editions of Jarman on Wills, vol. 1, p. 465, the author, in treating of estates by implication in wills, said: "In the application of this principle, one chief topic of controversy has been how far a devise to any person, in the event of the nonexistence or on the decease of another, indicates an intention to make the last-named person a prior object of the testator's bounty. In such cases it is probable that the person whose nonexistence is made the contingency on which the devise over is to fall into possession is placed in this position for the purpose of taking the property in the first instance; and this probability is, of course, greatly strengthened if the devisee is the person on whom the law, in the absence of disposition, would cast the property." And there are several decisions of the courts in this country which have put the same construction upon such language. Shaw v. Hoard, 18 Ohio St. 228; Wetter v. United Hydraulic Cotton Press Co. 75 Ga. 540, where the foregoing passage from Jarman is quoted, Carr v. Green, 2 McCord, L. 75. And Washburn, in his treatise on the Law of Real Property, lays down the rule in accordance with these decisions. He says: "An instance of an estate tail by construction, where there is no direct limitation to the heirs of the donee's body, would be an estate to A with a proviso that, if he shall die without heirs of his body, the estate shall revert to the donor, or go over to one in remainder. Here, it will be perceived, there was no direct limitation to the heirs of A, and it is too plain for doubt that the donor intended the heirs of his body should take it at his decease, for he gives it over, or reserves it, in case he has no such heirs, and only in that contingency." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 3d ed. 87, 6th ed. § 192.

The case of Shaw v. Hoard, supra, is much in point; so like the present that, if a rule of construction be also a rule of law in its application to grants and gifts of real property, and that case is the law in Ohio, we should feel bound to accept it as controlling this question in the present case, if, indeed, we did not agree with it. In that case, the will of the testator contained the following items:

"Item 2. I give and bequeath unto my said wife and daughter all the real estate of which I may be seised at the time of my death, to each one-half.

"Item 4. On the death of either my wife or daughter then the survivor shall have all the property left them by me; and if both die without leaving any heirs of their body, then and in that case, said property shall be given to my wife's brother, David Campbell."

The wife and daughter died leaving another daughter of the mother. It was held that the wife and daughter mentioned in the will took, each, a life estate and that, upon the death of the survivor, the remainder went by implication to the other daughter, the "heir of her body." But it is said that that case is overruled by subsequent decisions of the supreme court of that state. The principal cases which are relied upon in support of this contention are Carter v. Reddish, 32 Ohio St. 1; Piatt v. Sinton, 37 Ohio St. 353; Collins v. Collins, 40 Ohio St. 353; and Durfee v. MacNeil, 58 Ohio St. 238, 50 N. E. 721. In the first of these cases, the judge (Chief Justice Day) who had delivered the opinion of the court in Shaw v. Hoard was a member of the court. No intention to overrule the case of Shaw v. Hoard is indicated, nor is the case mentioned. But Judge Scott, who delivered the opinion, distinguishes a case involving the facts of Shaw v. Hoard. After referring to the cases of Parish v. Ferris, 6 Ohio St. 563, and Niles v. Gray, 12 Ohio St. 320, cases upon which the later decisions referred to rest, he says: "Still, we should have no hesitation in finding, from the language of the will before us, that the testator intended a life estate only for the first devisees, if the sole condition of the limitatation over to the nephews and nieces had been the dying of his children without issue, and without reference to the time when they should so die. But such is not the language of the will." The difference was that the case supposed was the case, in its facts, of Shaw v. Hoard, and of this case, while in the case in which the judge was giving the opinion the devise over was in the contingency of the first devisee's dying within age and without lawful issue. The distinction rests upon the fact that the contingency on which the life estate would terminate was uncertain, for the first devisee might attain the age of twenty-one and have children, in which event there would be no remainder, for both conditions would not happen. And, as we have said, a remainder must depend upon a contingency which must surely happen. Nor do the other cases mention the case of Shaw v. Hoard. It may well be that, its facts having been once distinguished, the court in the later cases thought it unnecessary to repeat the distinction, and decided the cases upon its view of the special facts. However that may be, that court has always adhered to the general rule that the intention of the testator is to be gathered from all parts of the will,—as well from what is expressed as from what is fairly implied. Referring to the other cases which are cited to establish that Shaw v. Hoard has been overruled, we observe that in Piatt v. Sinton, supra, the testator devised "all my property of every description" to Lucinda Piatt, . . . and, in case she should die without any legitimate heirs of her body, then the same property to go over to others named. The court construed "all my property" as "all my estate," and the heirs of the body of Lucinda Piatt were strangers to the blood of the testator. In Collins v. Collins the testator devised a life estate to his wife with remainder to his two sons and their heirs, but that, in the case of the death of either leaving no children, then to the survivor; but, in case of the death of both of the sons leaving no children, then to the testator's heirs. In that case the estate was granted by "clear and decisive words," and the rule laid down in Thornhill v. Hall, 2 Clark & F. 22, was applied, which is that "it is a rule of the courts in construing written instruments that when an interest is given, or an estate conveyed, in one clause of the instrument in clear and decisive terms, such interest or estate cannot be taken away or cut down by raising a doubt upon the extent and meaning and application of a subsequent clause; not by inference therefrom, nor by any subsequent words that are not as clear and decisive as the words of the clause giving that interest or estate."

Moreover, an estate in remainder cannot rest upon an estate in remainder when the latter is given to one and his heirs, for the whole estate is exhausted. In Durfee v. MacNeil, supra, the testator devised all my estate, after defraying expenses, etc., to three persons equally, one of whom was then unborn, and to their heirs forever; and, should the child not be born alive, or should either die without heirs, each one's share should go to the survivor; and in the event that the testator should be without heirs of his body, the legacies to his children should go to his wife. No question arose of the kind here involved. The facts in the case had little or no analogy to the present. There was a clear and decisive gift of an estate in fee simple, and the contingency was that either of the children should die without heirs capable of inheriting. The devise over was held to be an executory devise. Sometimes it is stated by the courts (we are not now referring specially to the Ohio courts) in terms that the implication must be a "necessary" implication; but by this is meant not absolutely necessary, but that it is reasonably necessary in order to carry out the intention of the testator. Inasmuch as the case of Shaw v. Hoard has never been expressly overruled, and its doctrine was in a later case confirmed, even if it should be held that the rule of construction is not settled, this court would decide the question upon its own understanding of the law applicable to it.

Much reliance is placed by counsel for defendant upon the case of Abbott v. Essex Co. 18 How. 202, 15 L. ed. 352, which they claim "is parallel with and conclusive of this case." But this is a misconception. In that case the testator had given to his two sons John and Jacob "all my estate," to use his own words, in a certain described part of his property, real and personal, and then declared that, if either of his said sons should die without any lawful heirs of his own, it should go to the survivor and his heirs. And he charged the payment of certain debts and a legacy for the maintenance of a person named, upon the estates devised. After some preliminary observations, Mr. Justice Grier, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "Our inquiry must be, therefore, from an examination of the whole context of this will: (1) Whether, independent of the second clause, by which the estate is limited over, the sons took an estate in fee simple, or only a life estate; and (2) whether he intended to give over the share of each son to the other on the contingency of his death without issue living at the time of his decease, or upon an indefinite failure of issue." He then proceeds to state the reasons for thinking the testator intended to give a fee-simple estate to each of the sons. The first reason stated was that the testator, in the devise to the sons, had employed the words "my estate" in the property, which the learned justice said had "always been construed to describe not only the lands devised, but the whole interest of the testator in the subject of the devise." And, as to the legacy for maintenance, he points out that it would be defeated by the death of a tenant for life. He further observes that the will stated that the payment of these debts and legacies by the devisees was the consideration for the devises, and that the devisees, by acceptance of the devises, became personally liable to pay the debts and legacies charged upon them. "In such cases," he says, "it is well settled that the devisee takes a fee, without words of inheritance." "On this point, therefore," he says, "we are of opinion that John and Jacob each took a fee in their respective share, or moiety, of the estate delivered to them." None of the reasons on which the conclusion of the court was rested exist in the present case.

If, however, it should be held that the alternative phrases in the will already considered are not sufficient to show that the testator intended the lineal descendants should take a remainder, we should next consider the will upon that assumption. In the English courts the rule upon this subject has been changed by the modern decisions, and its present state is exhibited in the case of Re Rawlins, L. R. 45 Ch. Div. 299, and [1892] A. C. 342. In the court of appeals, Lord Justice Fry stated that the modern rule was inaugurated in Green v. Ward, 1 Russ. Ch. 262, a case decided by Lord Gifford, the master of the rolls, in 1826. That rule is this: That the mere fact that the testator has directed that the estate shall go over to other persons if the first takers shall die without surviving "heirs of his body," "lineal descendants," or other equivalent words, is not a sufficient implication to create a remainder in such "heirs of his body" or other person or class named; but that, if there be other language in the will which supports the implication, and upon the whole the court is satisfied that such was his purpose, it will give the devise effect accordingly. None of the decisions in Ohio or elsewhere have sanctioned a stricter rule than this. It may be observed, in passing, that one cannot help noticing that the English courts carry the practice of applying fixed rules to the construction of devises to an extent which is not generally adopted in this country. This may probably be explained by what was said by Mr. Justice Grier in Abbott v. Essex Co. 18 How. 202, 213, 15 L. ed 352, 355: "If wills were always drawn by counsel learned in the law, it would be highly proper that courts should rigidly adhere to precedents, because every such instrument might justly be presumed to have been drawn with reference to them. But in a country where, from necessity or choice, every man acts as his own scrivener, his will is subject to be perverted by the application of rules of construction of which he was wholly ignorant." But, pursuing the inquiry above suggested, we see that the testator emphasizes the alternative he had stated by adding: "I make the following explanation: The limitation over on the death of my surviving son without lineal descendants is intended to take effect if there be no lineal descendants living at the time of the decease of such son." It is observable that his explanation relates to the death of the surviving son. He plainly intends that the presence of lineal descendants at that time shall block the way to a devise over to the next preferred classes of relatives. And he repeats the designation of "lineal descendants" instead of "heirs." He certainly intended that if such persons were living the estate should go to them in some character, and he gives them a peculiar designation. Then, again, if a fee simple was intended to be vested in the sons, words of inheritance must be implied in the gift to them, as if the gift run to him, his heirs and assigns, in express terms. To be in harmony with this, the defeasance would naturally have been incident to his dying without heirs, and it would follow that the testator used the expression "lineal descendants" as a synonym for "heirs," which we must think an inadmissible proposition. The recent case of Widows' Home v. Lippardt, 70 Ohio St. 261, 71 N. E. 770, is pertinent to this discussion. In that case, the testator, as here, gave his estate to the first taker in general terms; later on he gave him a qualified power of disposition. And the court said: "The clear implication of such a bequest, taking all its parts together, is that B. [the first taker] is to possess a life estate. Here a life estate is implied, and is not expressly created."

The power to dispose of the property was not inconsistent with the gift of a fee simple. It was an incident of such an estate. But the court laid hold of it as an implication that the testator intended only a life estate in the first taker. It certainly was not an absolutely necessary one. It was necessary only for the purpose of giving effect to the apparent intention of the testator.

There is another consideration which must not be ignored. The authorities recognize a more significant purpose in an implication which tends to cut down a larger estate to a life estate where the remainder thereby passes to a person who is in the line of descent, than it would if it were to pass to a stranger. This results from the stronger motive which the testator would have to prefer the former to the latter class. The gift of the power to dispose of the property by will when the sons should reach the age of twenty-one does not enlarge a life estate. Jones v. Shields, 14 Ohio, 359; Baxter v. Bowyer, 19 Ohio St. 490; Stableton v. Ellison, 21 Ohio St. 527; Huston v. Craighead, 23 Ohio St. 198. We are therefore of opinion that the intention of the testator was that the lineal descendants of the surviving son should take an estate in remainder at his decease.

The persons named as trustees accepted their appointments, and they also qualified as executors. William Anderson became of age February 12, 1849, and on October 10th of that year Butler obtained from him an agreement in writing, declaring himself to be an heir at law of Henry Anderson, and that Henry Anderson "held and intended to hold" the premises in question in trust to secure the payment of Butler's note; that said Henry Anderson had died without declaring said trust in writing, and that, being desirous of carrying into effect his father's wishes and intentions, he had "consented to execute and deliver to the said Butler this declaration of the terms and conditions on which he holds the title to the premises above referred to remaining unsold at the date hereof." And Butler therein agreed to pay to the executors the sum due on his note of $20,000 in instalments and at dates therein specified. William died intestate in January, 1850, unmarried and without issue. James Anderson became of age June 25, 1852. But before that time, and on September 16, 1851, Butler obtained from him a like declaration that Henry Anderson held the premises in trust, but that, he having died without having made or executed any declaration thereof, he, James, in order to carry out his father's wishes and intentions, was desirous of making the declaration. But it was therein stipulated that the lands should be held subject to the payment of the principal and interest of the debt due from Butler. On October 1, 1852, there was appended to this document a "memorandum" between Butler and James containing an agreement to change dates of payment of the note, and that the agreement should be taken as supplemental to the agreement to which it was appended. Thereafter, from time to time, Butler made payments to the executors and trustees upon his $20,- 000 note, but the same had not been fully paid at the time when the executors and trustees settled their trust with James H. Anderson and turned over to him the property and effects coming to him under said will, which was some time prior to May 1, 1860. If any more payments were made on said note, they were made to James H. Anderson. The plaintiff is the only son and child of James H. Anderson, and, as has been stated, was born August 27, 1859.

About the 1st of May, 1860, Peter Anderson and Walter Goodman, styling themselves "executors and trustees of Henry Anderson's will," delivered a quitclaim deed of the premises in question to Butler, reciting therein the receipt "of $1 (and other considerations)." The deed recited further that, it "being understood that the above-described premises were conveyed to Henry Anderson in fee, but held by him in his lifetime as a mortgage to secure the payment of a certain sum of money due from Charles Butler, which fact after his death was duly acknowledged under seal of William Anderson and James H. Anderson, his only heirs at law," said first parties covenant, grant, etc. This deed purports to have been made October 1, 1855, and acknowledged October 9, 1855, but, as above stated, it was not delivered until about May 1, 1860. On April 17, 1860, Lucas, the other executor and trustee, but signing as executor, executed, and, on or about May 1, 1860, delivered to Butler, a deed of the same premises in the same form, for a like consideration, and with the same recitals as the deed from Goodman and Peter Anderson. On April 23, 1860, Butler gave a warranty deed of the lands in question to Calvin Bronson, who soon after entered upon the premises, and he and his grantees have since occupied and possessed the same under claim of title through that deed. The defendant holds the title conveyed by the Butler deed to Bronson.

The questions upon the facts occurring since the death of Henry Anderson are, first, whether, assuming the latter to have then had the legal and equitable estates in the land, the deeds from Peter Anderson, Sr., Goodman, and Lucas to Butler conveyed to the latter the legal title which had been in Henry Anderson; or, second, whether their transactions with Butler raised an equity in his favor which, having been transmitted to the defendant, entitles him to the possession of the premises as against the plaintiff. The first question, then, upon this part of the case is whether the trustees had authority under the will to declare the master's deed to Henry Anderson to be a mortgage, and to deed the lands to Butler at the time when this was done. Having regard to the language of the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) testator, there is room for doubt whether the power given to the trustees in respect to the alienation of real estate extended beyond an authority to sell or mortgage the lands of the testator for the purpose of paying debts; that specific power is expressly granted and the general language added might be thought to grant powers incidental to that main purpose. Besides, these deeds of the trustees were not made for the purpose of raising money to pay debts of the estate, but proposed a different object. But we do not decide how this may be. No doubt the rule is that, unless there is, by the terms of its creation, a limitation upon the duration of the trust, it will be held to endure so long as the purposes of the trust require. But when the duration of the trust is expressly limited, the authority of the trustee expires according to the limitation. 1 Perry, Tr. § 316. Says the author: "So, trustees may take only a chattel interest in real estate, although limited to them and their heirs, as when they are to hold in trust only for a short time to pay debts and legacies and to convey it to the cestui que trust when he comes of age, or at a certain time."

And see, among the cases there cited, Goodtitle ex dem. Hayward v. Whitby, 1 Burr. 228; Stanley v. Stanley, 16 Ves. Jr. 491; Pearce v. Savage, 45 Me. 90. And also Powell v. Glenn, 21 Ala. 458; and Smithwick v. Wintersmith, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 380, 14 S. W. 354.

Here the testator directed that the trustees should deliver a settlement of their trust to each of his sons on their reaching the age of twenty-one, respectively, and then put him in possession of one half of the property, except that there might be a reservation of a fraction of the moiety until the sons should respectively arrive at the age of twenty-five, when the remaining part should be turned over to them. James, the youngest of the sons, arrived at the age of twenty-five on June 25, 1856, nearly four years before the trustees deeded the lands to Butler. No account can be taken of the fact that the deeds were prepared in 1855. They had no effect until they were delivered in 1860. It is stated in the brief of counsel that they were in escrow in the meantime; but it is not one of the stipulated facts, nor found by the court; nor, indeed, was there any competent evidence tending to prove such fact. In these circumstances, we think the duration of time for the active duties of the trustees was limited to the time when they were required to make their settlement with the beneficiaries and turn over to them the trust property. This is admitted by counsel for defendants in error, who say in their brief: "The language of the will makes it entirely clear, we think, that the testator contemplated that the trustees should in any event fully perform and discharge their trust by the time the youngest son had reached the age of twenty-five years, and that at this date, at latest, the title of the trustees should cease and determine."

It follows that the deeds to Butler, so far as they are regarded as deeds of the trustees, conveyed no title, for the trust had been extinguished several years before. No judicial act was required to terminate the trust, as would be necessary in the case of an executor. The testator had also appointed executors, whose powers would continue so long as the estate remained unsettled in the probate court, and the continuance of the term of the trust was not necessary. They were the same persons as those created trustees, but their relations to the estate were the same as if they had been different persons. It was not a case where the trust is imposed upon the executors as such. 1 Lewin, Tr. § 206; Herron v. Comstock, 139 Fed. 370, 377, and the cases there cited. The distinction is also referred to by Mr. Justice Gray in McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 340, 377, 28 L. ed. 1015, 1026, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652. When the trust expired the legal title became vested in James H. Anderson. The executors might, in certain circumstances, sell and convey the lands of the testator, as, for instance, to pay debts. But this would require an order of the probate court upon notice to the parties interested.

The second question is whether the transactions between the trustees and Butler were such as to raise an equity in his favor, which, being transmitted to the defendant, entitles him to retain the possession of the land as against the plaintiff's legal title. For, if the defendant has an equity which thus entitles him, the plaintiff cannot recover. It was so held in Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452. To the same effect is Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 582, 25 L. ed. 620. But we are unable to discover any grounds on which it could be claimed that any equity was created for Butler by his transactions with the trustees. It is unnecessary to say he was conscious of wrongdoing, for he may have conceived that the legal effect of the foreclosure proceeding left Henry Anderson in the position of a trustee for him in respect to the lands; but his course was taken entirely in his own interest, and was prejudicial to the estate. The trustees were induced by his representations to treat the master's deed to Henry Anderson as a mortgage, when in fact it was not. The sons were induced by appeals to filial sentiment to make admissions the truth of which was taken on trust, and these admissions were adopted by the trustees as the basis of their dealings with Butler. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The money which he paid to them, as trustees, upon his note was not much, if any, more than was sufficient to pay it after crediting him with the proceeds of the master's sale. He based his action in making the sale of the property upon his supposed success in acquiring it. We desire to make no further comments upon the character of these transactions than the adjudication of the rights of these parties requires; but we cannot realize any basis on which to build up anything more than the strictly legal rights which Butler acquired therefrom. It remains to be observed that if, by Anderson's will, an estate in remainder after the death of his surviving son was given to his lineal descendants, it was beyond the power of the tenants for life to defeat or prejudice the remainder-man by their own acts or admissions. The only way in which the remainder could have been destroyed would have been by the valid exercise of the power given to the trustees by the will. The vigilance with which the court protects the estate in remainder for infants is illustrated by the case of McArthur v. Scott, above referred to, where the will which had created it had been vacated by a decree in a suit brought by an heir at law in which children contemplated by the will as sharers in the remainder, but yet unborn, were not represented, though all the living parties in interest having life estates were. It was held that the devise to those children was unaffected by the decree, and that their respective estates became vested upon the subsequent birth of each. The judgment must be reversed, with costs, and a new trial awarded.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

H. D. KEPLER, Appt.,

v.

C. A. LARSON et al.

(— Iowa, —, 108 N. W. 1033.)

Deed—Shelley's Case.

1. A grant to one of a life estate, habendum to him during his natural life and to the heirs of his body and their assigns in fee simple, conveys to him a fee under

Case Note.—Effect upon rule in Shelley's Case of express prohibition against conveyance or encumbrance of property by life tenant:—In considering the foregoing question, as in all questions arising under the rule in Shelley's Case, it is necessary to bear in mind the variance in the views taken of such rule, which may here be briefly restated.

According to one view, it is to be regarded as a rule of law, applicable in all cases in which the word "heirs" is used in its

the rule in Shelley's Case, notwithstanding the deed also provides that the wife of the life tenant shall have merely the privilege of living on the premises during his life, and neither the life tenant nor his wife shall have any power to convey, or place encumbrances on, the property.

Statute de donis.

2. The statute de donis, being contrary to the spirit of its institutions, has never been in force in Iowa.

Deed—conditional fee—conveyance.

3. If a grant of a life estate to one, habendum to him for life and the heirs of his body and their assigns in fee simple, should not be regarded as vesting a fee in the first taker under the rule in Shelley's Case, it conveys a conditional fee which, in states where the statute de donis is not in force, may, after the birth of a child to the life tenant, be conveyed by him in fee simple.

Same—destruction of remainder.

4. If a grant to one for his natural life, habendum to him for life and then to the heirs of his body and their assigns in fee, should be construed as vesting in him a life estate with remainder to the heirs of his body, after the birth of a child to him a conveyance by the reversioners would not destroy the remainder and vest a fee in the life tenant.

(September 21, 1906.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the District Court for Chickasaw County in defendants' favor in a suit to compel spe-technical sense, and this view is not inconsistent with the doctrine that resort may be had to other expressions in the deed or will for the purpose of determining whether the word was so used, or specific persons were intended; in the latter of which alternatives the rule would not be applicable. But some courts seem to have thought it necessary, in adhering to the view that the rule in Shelley's Case is one of law, to apply it in every instance where the word "heirs" is employed, irrespective of any intention to use the word in a nontechnical sense, which may be gathered from other expressions.

According to the other view, which has found considerable favor in the United States, the rule in Shelley's Case is one of construction, to be taken as interpretative of the meaning of the grantor or testator, in the absence of any expressions indicative of an intention that the first taker should have less than a fee.

The difference in result of these two views is simply this: Under the first view, effect is given to the general intention of the grantor or testator that the first taker shall be the root of succession, the stirps from which future takers shall spring, at the expense of the particular intention to give him merely an estate for life,—or, rather, if the operation of the rule be minutely observed, both intentions are given effect, but the estate for life merges in the greater estate of inheritance, which also vests in the first taker as the root of succession; while, under the second view, effect is given to the particular intention, the heirs taking as contingent remainder-men. In the first case, the inquiry is not, What estate is intended to be given to the ancestor? but, What is the nature of the limitation over? In the second case the inquiry is precisely the reverse. Under the first view, an express prohibition against conveyance or encumbrance by the first taker would be regarded as immaterial, provided the limitation over should be construed as to his heirs qua heirs, while, under the second view, such a prohibition would probably be determinative of the case.

It may also be noted that, under any of the foregoing views except, of course, that which denies room for construction of the word "heirs," the question is affected by the nature of the instrument under consideration. While in deeds subsequent expressions are sometimes rejected as repugnant to the granting clause, in wills regard may be had to all parts for the purpose of determining the effect of a particular clause. Then, too, the presumption that the word "heirs" was used in its technical sense is much harder to overcome in the case of deeds than of wills, for the reason that, while conveyances are usually made with the aid of counsel, wills frequently are not.

In Carradine v. Carradine, 33 Miss. 693, it was held that, where a deed of slaves was made in trust for the donor's stepdaughter, to be held until she should arrive at the age of twenty-one years or should marry, when the possession thereof should be delivered to her, and upon the further trust that thereafter the said trustee "shall see that the said property, and the future increase of said slaves, shall not be sold or disposed of, but shall be preserved for the benefit of the heirs of the body of" the stepdaughter, the trust having become executed upon the delivery of the possession of the slaves to the stepdaughter, she became vested with the absolute title; and that the restriction upon alienation imposed by the trust deed could not prevail against the estate vested by the previous limitations of the deed; the court saying: "It is well settled that, if the import of the previous limitations be such as to vest the absolute estate in the first taker, subsequent restrictions, inconsistent with such an estate, would be void. Thus, it is settled that a limitation to the first taker for his life and no longer; or only for life; or for his life and no longer, and that it shall not be in his power to sell, dispose of, or make way with any part of the premises, and the like,—will not prevent the operation of the rule. 1 Preston, Estates, 365, 366; Hayes ex dem. Foorde v. Foorde, 2 W. Bl. 698; Fearn v. Fearn, Contingent Remainders, 174. Mr. Jarman says: 'Words, however positive and un-sific performance of a contract to loan money. Reversed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Suit in equity for the specific performance of a contract to loan money. Interveners came into the case claiming an interest in the property upon which a mortgage was to be executed, and plaintiff then asked to have his title quieted against them. There was a decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

"Heirs of the body" must be used in a technical sense to vest a fee in plaintiff.

equivocal, expressly negating the ancestor's estate beyond the period of its primary express limitation, will not exclude the rule; for this intention is as clearly indicated by the mere limitation of a life estate as it can be by any additional expressions; and the doctrine, let it be remembered, is a rule of tenure, which is not only independent of, but generally operates to subvert, the intention.' 2 Jarman, Wills, 246."

But in Hubbird v. Goin, 70 C. C. A. 320, 137 Fed. 822, it was held that a deed from a father to his daughter "and children," in which it was provided, "It is expressly agreed by the grantee, in accepting this deed, that she shall not sell, convey, or encumber, or in any manner dispose of, the same, but to retain the same for the use of herself and her children forever,"—did not come within the rule in Shelley's Case, as the term "her children," thus employed, did not indicate inheritance, and were not words of limitation, but were descriptive of the beneficiaries eo nomine to take under the deed; and that, although the provision against alienation was void, it might yet be taken as indicative of the intention of the grantor that the grantee should have only a life estate.

The question under discussion has more frequently arisen in determining the effect of testamentary dispositions; and in Hageman v. Hageman, 129 Ill. 164, 21 N. E. 814, it was held that a devise to testator's sons, of certain property; but said sons "shall neither of them sell or mortgage any of the lots last above mentioned, but the same shall go to their heirs after them,"—vested the fee in the devisees under the rule in Shelley's Case; the court declaring its adherence to the doctrine hereinbefore referred to, that the rule is operative where it appears that the testator used the word "heirs" as indicating the ordinary line of succession; saying: "Its application to the particular case depends not upon the quantity of estate intended to be given to the ancestor, but upon the estate devised to the heir. When the devise is to heirs generally, the rule applies, and is held to conclude L.R.A. (N.S.)

22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 512.

The estate must be limited precisely as it would descend at law.

sively express the intention of the testator, and will necessarily govern and control in determining the estate devised, notwithstanding the expression of an intention on the part of the testator that the ancestor shall take a less estate than the fee."

In Bond v. McNiff, 6 Jones & S. 83 (Affirmed without opinion in 9 Jones & S. 543), it was held that, where a devise which, standing by itself, would have been taken as passing only a life estate, was followed by the statement, "and it is my will and desire that none of the above-mentioned property should be sold or disposed of in any way, but passed to the heirs of my children unencumbered," the latter clause, by force of the rule in Shelley's Case, enlarged the life estate into an absolute fee; nothing being said as to the effect to be given to the provision against sale and encumbrance.

In Doebler's Appeal, 64 Pa. 9, a devise to testator's son, followed by the clause, "but he shall in no wise sell or alienate any of the above-described property, as it is intended that he shall have a life estate only in the same, with remainder over to his heirs in fee," was held to give the son an absolute fee by force of the rule in Shelley's Case; the presumption that the word "heirs" was used in its proper technical sense not being overcome by the other expressions in the devise.

And in McCann v. Barclay, 204 Pa. 214, 53 Atl. 767, it was held that a devise to testator's son, as follows: "The two houses situated on Fourteenth street is a lifetime lease; it cannot be taken from you, nor you cannot spend it, but it is held to insure you something to live on during your lifetime; . . . and at your decease, if you have lawful heirs, then all will fall to them,"—was held to give the first taker a fee under the rule in Shelley's Case.

On the other hand, in Roberts v. Ogbourne, 37 Ala. 174, a bequest "to the heirs of the body of Sarah Bledsoe, . . . she, the said Sarah, to have the use and benefit thereof during her life, but not to sell or dispose thereof," was held not to fall within the rule in Shelley's Case for the reason

The children took a vested remainder as soon as in esse.

Archer v. Jacobs; Brown v. Brown; and Wescott v. Binford,—supra.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In a contract between plaintiff and defendant, defendant undertook to loan plaintiff a sum of money to be secured by mortgage upon a certain tract of land upon condition that plaintiff should furnish an abstract showing that he had fee-simple title to the property proposed to be mortgaged. Pursuant to this contract, plaintiff furnished an abstract of title, which defendant refused to accept, because of certain defects therein, and because plaintiff did not in fact have a fee-simple title. He averred that certain parties, who are now interveners in the case, had an interest in the property, and that plaintiff had nothing but a life estate therein. Interveners, five in number, who are plaintiff's children, filed a petition in which they claimed to own a fee-simple title in the property subject to a life estate in their father. At the bottom of the controversy is a deed in plaintiff's chain of title, from Hugh Kepler and Mary, his wife, of date September 28, 1885, conveying, for an expressed consideration of $5,600, the real property in dispute, the granting clause reading as follows: "Do hereby sell and convey unto the said H. D. Kepler, a life estate in and to the following described premises." The habendum clause contains the following: "To have and to hold the same, with the rights and appurtenances thereunto belonging, to said H. D. Kepler, during his natural life (his wife, if any he may have, to have no other privilege than that of living on the premises for his life, and no longer), and to the heirs of his body and their assigns in fee simple forever. The said H. D. Kepler or his wife, that Sarah Bledsoe was not given the thing itself for life, but the use; and that, even though it should be conceded that she took a technical life estate, and not a mere usufructuary interest, still the rule would not apply; the court being of the opinion that the term "heirs of the body" was intended as descriptive of the children of said Sarah who might be living at the time appointed for the division of the property, it appearing that she had children living at the date of the will.

In Wescott v. Binford, 104 Iowa, 645, 65 Am. St. Rep. 530, 74 N. W. 18, it was held that, where a testator devised property to his children for life, stating in the last paragraph of his will, "my said children are to have the use, rents, and profits of their portion of said lots . . . during the term of their natural lives. They are to have no power to convey or dispose of the same, their respective portions, for a longer period than during their natural lives respectively. At the death of my children aforesaid, their respective portions of said lots . . . descend to their heirs, respectively, said heirs to have absolute title to their respective portions,"—the rule in Shelley's Case, if in force in the state, would not be given such operation as to defeat the intent of the testator, as expressed by the language of his will, that the first takers should have only a life estate.

In Albin v. Parmele, 70 Neb. 740, 98 N. W. 29, 99 N. W. 646, a devise to testator's son, "to have and to hold said land during the term of his natural life, and enjoy the use and proceeds thereof. The fee of the land to pass to his heirs at his death, or 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) at any time before when he shall sell or encumber said land in any manner different than he shall receive it. The intention being to give him a life estate therein without the power to sell or dispose of it,"—was held not to fall within the rule in Shelley's Case. This decision is largely based upon the statute providing that, "in the construction of every instrument creating or conveying, or authorizing or requiring the creation or conveyance of, any real estate, or interest therein, it shall be the duty of the courts of justice to carry into effect the true intent [intent] of the parties so far as such intent . . . is consistent with the rules of law;" which was held to have the effect of leaving the rule in Shelley's Case in force only in a restricted and qualified form; in those instances in which it is not in conflict with the otherwise expressed intention of the instrument.

In Foxwell v. Craddock, 1 Patton & H. (Va.) 250, a devise to testator's son, "to be used by him for his own benefit during his natural life, and at his death, should he leave lawful heirs, to be vested in them in fee simple. But should he die without lawful issue," then over; the testator continuing: "I do hereby distinctly declare and publish that the right hereby given to my son John shall not be construed to vest in him any power to dispose of the property in any way, but that it is only loaned to him during his life, and after his death to be used in the manner above provided for,"—was held not to be within the rule in Shelley's Case, the word "heirs" being evidently used as equivalent to "children."

if any he may have, deriving no power to convey or place any encumbrances of any kind whatsoever on said premises, except the security for the payment thereof, of the same date as these presents." At the time this conveyance was made, H. D. Kepler was twenty-two years old, unmarried, and childless. He immediately took possession of the property under the deed, soon thereafter married, and as a result the five intervening children were born; the first on July 23, 1887. Thereafter plaintiff's wife died, and on March 2, 1889, Hugh Kepler and his wife made another deed to plaintiff of part of the property in dispute, purporting to convey the fee-simple title thereto to the grantee in the deed. Mary Kepler, the wife of Hugh, died, and Hugh thereafter remarried, and by his second wife had five children. Hugh died leaving his second wife and the five children surviving. The widow, by antenuptial contract, released any dower interest she might otherwise have had in her husband's property. From the children of his father by the second marriage, plaintiff has procured deeds to the property in dispute. After the birth of plaintiff's children, he conveyed the property by warranty deed, to one A. C. Pierce; and Pierce almost immediately reconveyed the property to plaintiff by special warranty deed. Plaintiff claims that, under the facts above recited, he held and now holds title absolutely and in fee simple to the real estate he offered as security, is entitled to have the same quieted in him as against interveners, and that he is entitled to a decree of specific performance of his contract for the loan of money by defendant. This contention is based upon two propositions: First, that, under the rule in Shelley's Case, he became the absolute owner in fee simple of the property in dispute in virtue of the deed from Hugh Kepler and Mary Kepler; and, second, that, even if this be not true, he became invested with that title under the conveyances hitherto mentioned,—the remainder being contingent and subject to destruction through conveyances from the owners of the reversion. The rule in Shelley's Case is in force in this state, and the legislature has not seen fit to abrogate it, even after being advised in the most positive terms that it is a part of the common law which came to us as a valuable heritage. The difficulty we shall have with it in the future is in its application to the facts of each individual case. The rule is announced in Doyle v. Andis, 127 Iowa, 36, 69 L.R.A. 953, 102 N. W. 177, to which reference is made. It is also settled that in construing deeds all parts thereof are to be taken into account, and granting clause and habendum read together in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) arriving at the proper interpretation of an instrument. Brown v. Brown, 125 Iowa, 218, 67 L.R.A. 629, 101 N. W. 81.

Going back now to the original deed under which plaintiff claims, we find that the conveyance was to him during his natural life, and to the heirs of his body and their assigns in fee simple forever. If this were all, there could be no doubt of the proposition that the rule in Shelley's Case should control. See Doyle v. Andis, supra; Wilson v. Rusk (Iowa) 103 N. W. 204. Appellees contend, however, that, by reason of the provision relative to the wife's privilege, and the provision in restraint of alienation, the rule does not apply. Where a grantor retains no reversionary interest, a provision in restraint of alienation is void. McCleary v. Ellis, 54 Iowa, 311, 37 Am. Rep. 205, 6 N. W. 571. And this is especially true when applied to conveyances which fall within the rule in Shelley's Case. Doebler's Appeal, 64 Pa. 9; Clarke v. Smith, 49 Md. 106; Carpenter v. Van Olinder, 127 Ill. 42, 2 L.R.A. 455, 11 Am. St. Rep. 92, 19 N. E. 868; Fowler v. Black, 136 Ill. 363, 11 L.R.A. 670, 26 N. E. 596; Van Grutten v. Foxwell, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 745; Pierson v. Lane, 60 Iowa, 60, 14 N. W. 90; 2 Washb. Real Prop. p. 273; Blackwell v. Blackwell, 124 N. C. 269, 32 S. E. 676. This matter is fully discussed in volume 1, pp. 362, 363, of Preston on Estates, wherein he says that "neither the express declaration that the ancestor shall have an estate for his life, and no longer, nor that he shall have only an estate for life in the premises; and that after his death it shall go to his heirs of his body, and, in default of such heirs, vest in the person next in remainder; and that the ancestor shall have no power to defeat the intention of testator; nor that the ancestor shall be tenant for his life, and no longer, and that it shall not be in his power to sell, dispose, or make away with any part of the premises,—will change the word 'heirs,' into a word of purchase." Allen v. Craft, 109 Ind. 476, 58 Am. Rep. 425, 9 N. E. 919; Hageman v. Hageman, 129 Ill. 164, 21 N. E. 814. These cases and others like them seem to hold that the controlling question is the nature of the estate conveyed to the heirs. If the estate is so given that it is to go to every person who can claim as heir of the body of the first taker, the words "heirs of his body" must be considered words of limitation, notwithstanding any restraints which may have been attempted on the power of alienation by the first taker. The majority are of opinion, not only that the rule of Shelley's Case is in force in this state, but that the facts of this case bring it within that rule.

2. But, if wrong in this, and conceding that the conveyance was to H. D. Kepler and to the heirs of his body and their assigns, the estate conveyed was a conditional fee, which, after the birth of a child, who was an heir of his body, if not before, was alienable by the grantee Kepler. Pierson v. Lane, 60 Iowa, 60, 14 N. W. 90; Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. 147; Kirk v. Furguson, 6 Coldw. 479; Simmons v. Augustin, 3 Port. (Ala.) 69; Croxall v. Sherrerd (Doe ex dem. Croxall v. Sherrerd) 5 Wall. 268, 18 L. ed. 572. The statute de donis, which was enacted to meet this situation and for the purpose of entailing estates, is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and has never been in force in this state. Pierson v. Lane, supra. We have no estates tail in this jurisdiction. Instead, we have the conditional fees prevailing before the enactment of the statute de donis. Conceding, arguendo, that the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply, and that the conveyance in question is to Kepler and the heirs of his body, a conditional fee passed thereby, and, after the birth of direct issue, Kepler could convey absolute title, and, by the same token, could mortgage the land. We shall not go into the history of this abstruse subject. Suffice it to say that, as the statute de donis is not in force in this state, the conveyance was either of a fee-simple absolute under the rule in Shelley's Case, or of a conditional fee, if it should be construed as above indicated; and, in either event, Kepler could convey good and perfect title after the birth of a child. Indeed the conveyance was good as against everyone save his grantor, even before the birth of a child. Izard v. Middleton, Bail. Eq. 228. Interveners are in no position to challenge it. Upon this proposition we are all agreed.

3. Of course, if the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply, and it should be held that the conveyance was of but a life estate to Kepler, with remainder over to his children or to the heirs of his body, that remainder was a contingent one, dependent upon the birth of children. Taylor v. Taylor, 118 Iowa, 407, 92 N. W. 71; Zuver v. Lyons, 40 Iowa, 510. Upon the birth of a child or children, the remainder became vested, subject only to be opened by the birth of other children, and from that time forth could not be destroyed by any act of the tenant of the particular estate or of the reversion. Plaintiff did not acquire title from the reversioner until after the birth of his first child, and, if the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply, and the conveyance should be treated as passing a life estate to plaintiff, with remainder over to the heirs of his body, the conveyance to him by the reversioner did not give him a title in fee. Nothing said in Archer v. Jacobs, 125 Iowa, 467, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

101 N. W. 195, runs counter to these views. Indeed, much that is there expressed supports the rules here stated. But we need not speculate upon this aspect of the case. Plaintiff has either a fee-simple absolute under the rule in Shelley's Case, or a conditional fee, alienable because of the birth of issue; and the trial court should have granted him the relief asked, and quieted his title against the interveners. As supporting our conclusions on the whole case, see Coots v. Yewell, 95 Ky. 367, 25 S. W. 597, 26 S. W. 179; Amos v. Amos, 117 Ind. 19, 19 N. E. 539; Ross v. Adams, 28 N. J. L. 160; Doe ex dem. Poor v. Considine, 6 Wall. 458, 18 L. ed. 869; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 223.

The decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded for one in harmony with this opinion.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

W. O. JOHNSON et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

NORTH BALTIMORE BOTTLE GLASS
COMPANY.

(— Kan. —, 88 Pac. 52.)

Sale—delay in delivery—acceptance—waiver of damages.

The mere acceptance of a purchased article after the agreed time of delivery does not constitute a waiver of damages for failure to deliver in time, unless such acceptance is accompanied by other circumstances which manifest an intention on the part of the buyer to waive such damages.

(December 8, 1906.)

Headnote by PORTER, J.

Case Note.—Effect of acceptance of goods as a waiver of damages for delay in delivery:—The earlier cases on this subject are collected in a note to Redlands Orange Growers' Asso. v. Gorman, 54 L.R.A. 718. As there shown, there is considerable conflict of opinion on the point. But the weight of authority is decidedly in favor of the doctrine laid down in JOHNSON v. NORTH BALTIMORE BOTTLE GLASS CO., that the mere acceptance after the time stipulated for delivery does not amount to a waiver of damages for the failure to deliver in time, unless such acceptance is accompanied by other circumstances which manifest an intention on the part of the buyer to waive such damages. This doctrine is recognized and declared in many of the cases cited in the note already referred to, and has been followed in later cases. Thus, in Beyer v. Henry Huber Co. 100 N. Y. Supp. 1029, it was held that acceptance does not necessarily preclude a claim for damages ERROR to the District Court for Cowley County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged breach of contract. Reversed.

Statement by Porter, J.:

This is an action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. The plaintiffs in error were plaintiffs below, and will be referred to as plaintiffs here. They are engaged in the manufacture of soda water at Winfield, Kansas. The defendant is a corporation engaged in the manufacture of glass bottles at Terre Haute, Indiana. On November 30, 1901, through a traveling salesman of defendant, a contract was made by which plaintiffs purchased from defendant 150 gross of soda pop bottles and 900 city boxes, like sample, which were to be delivered on April 1, 1902. The order for these goods was made upon a written blank furnished by defendant. The terms were sixty days, with 2 per cent discount in ten days, prices f. o. b. Winfield. It specified that plaintiffs were to furnish the manufacturers certain designs for the lettering of the bottles and boxes. The order was mailed to defendant by its salesman. Five days later defendant accepted the order in a letter to plaintiffs as follows: "We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your order, placed through our Mr. James, and same has been entered as per copy of order furnished you." On December 4th defendant wrote another letter to plaintiffs, in which it said: "We have your favor of the 4th inst., inclosing sketches for lettering bottles and cases, and we will duplicate these sketches as closely as possible." Matters for delay in the delivery, as distinguished from a defense of an action for the contract price.

So, while acceptance waives defense to an action for the contract price on account of delay in delivery, it does not prevent a counterclaim for damages on account of such delay. Crocker-Wheeler Co. v. Varick Realty Co. 104 App. Div. 568, 94 N. Y. Supp. 23.

The vendee's acceptance after the expiration of the time merely waives his right to rescind, not his right to recoup his damages on account of the delay. Wall v. St. Joseph Artesian Ice & Cold Storage Co. 112 Mo. App. 659, 87 S. W. 574.

While acceptance is evidence from which, in connection with other circumstances, a waiver of a claim for damages may be found, yet, ordinarily speaking, the purchaser may accept the delayed delivery and recoup the damages, if any, in an action by the vendor for the purchase price. Medart Patent Pulley Co. v. Dubuque Turbine & Roller Mill Co. 121 Iowa, 244, 96 N. W. 770. In this case, however, it was held that the vendee had waived its right to avail itself of this rule by voluntarily paying the purchase price after the delay in the delivery, with knowledge of all the material facts bearing upon his right to damages.

In Murmann v. Wissler, 116 Mo. App. 397, 92 S. W. 355, it was declared that acceptance after the expiration of the time for delivery is but prima facie evidence of a waiver of the right to damages on account of delay, and that the question of waiver is therefore in general for the jury. The court, however, doubted whether, under the circumstances of the particular case, there was sufficient evidence to carry the question of waiver to the jury.

The court in O. H. Perry Tie & Lumber Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 264, 40 S. E. 919, recognized the conflict of authority upon the general question as to the effect of acceptance as prima facie a waiver of default as to the time of delivery, but said that it was 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

unnecessary to determine which of the two rules was based upon the better reason, or sustained by the weight of authority, as it was clear that, whether tested by one or the other, there was no waiver in the instant case for the reason that the correspondence and conduct of the parties not only failed to show any intention on the part of the vendee to waive the damages on account of the delay, but, on the contrary, showed that there was no such intention.

The general doctrine that mere acceptance of delivery after the time stipulated does not amount to a waiver of damages for delay is recognized in Poland Paper Co. v. Foote & D. Co. 118 Ga. 458, 45 S. E. 374; but the court also declared the doctrine that a new contract for the purchase and sale of the same article, when fully executed, may be a satisfaction of the original agreement; and applied the latter doctrine by holding that, where goods were shipped after the time stipulated, and the seller stopped the same in transitu, and refused to deliver unless paid in cash, less 4 per cent discount, instead of on the credit originally agreed; and the buyer assented, paid the new price and received the goods, without reserving the right to sue for damages for delay,—full performance and execution of the subsequent contract amounted to a waiver of damages for the delay in delivery.

In E. T. Burrowes Co. v. Rapids Safety Filter Co. 49 Misc. 539, 97 N. Y. Supp. 1048, it was declared generally that, the goods having been accepted long after the stipulated time without objection on the part of the vendee, the latter must be deemed to have waived all objection to the delay in their delivery; but the delay in this case was relied upon to defeat the action for the purchase price, and not by way of recoupment or counterclaim for damages. The decision in Manass-Bruning Shoe Co. v. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. 907, is also merely to the effect that the vendee cannot defeat an action for the purchase price where he accepts a delayed delivery.

then rested until April 5, 1902, when plaintiffs, not hearing anything further, wrote as follows:

Winfield, Kansas, April 5, 1902.
The North Baltimore Bottle Glass Co.,
Terre Haute, Ind.

Gentlemen:—

We wish to know if our bottles have been shipped April 1st, as contracted. We have had no notice to that effect or the contrary, and are becoming rather anxious. We are needing these bottles now, and, in the event you have not shipped them, please use every effort to get them out at once. Please advise us the situation by return mail and oblige,

Yours truly,
W. O. Johnson & Son.

Defendant answered as follows:

Terre Haute, Indiana, April 7th, 1902.
W. O. Johnson & Son, Prop.,
Winfield, Kan.

Gentlemen:—

We are in receipt of your favor of the 5th inst. in regard to the order for bottles placed with our Mr. E. C. James, and in reply would say that from such information as we have been able to procure the amount invested in your business is too small to warrant us in extending the terms of credit wanted. We will be glad to make up bottles, provided you will send us a remittance covering, say, 50 per cent of the order and when making shipment we will attach B/L to our draft for the balance on our account, allowing you the usual 2 per cent cash discount; or, if it is more agreeable to you, you can furnish us with a satisfactory guarantor or indorser of your account. We hope to have your early reply, and trust that you can arrange to give us instructions in accordance with suggestions above outlined.

Yours truly,
North Baltimore Bottle Glass Co.,

On April 9th plaintiffs sent the following telegram to defendant:

Winfield, Kansas, April 9th, '02.
Advise quick earliest possible date you can fill our order as per your letter seventh.
W. O. Johnson.

And the following day they wrote defendant:

Winfield, Kansas, April 10th, 1902.
The North Baltimore Bottle Glass Co.,
Terre Haute, Ind.

Gentlemen:—

We inclose you herewith draft for $400

as per the terms of your letter of April 7th, being 50 per cent or more of the cost of the goods less freight and cash discount. Would urge that you rush this order with all possible haste, as we are in need of these bottles at once. We are very much surprised at the manner in which you have treated this order. The terms of your letter would have been complied with at any time, had you have called our attention to it, and we were very much surprised when we received your letter of the 7th inst., stating that the order had not yet been shipped. We trust, therefore, that you will use every possible effort to get this shipment to us at the earliest possible moment, attaching draft for balance to bill of lading and sending the same to the Cowley County National Bank of Winfield, Kansas, where it will be promptly paid upon receipt of shipment.

Yours truly,
W. O. Johnson & Son.
Enc. N. Y. draft.

Defendant wrote plaintiffs in reply:

Terre Haute, Ind., April 10th, 1902.
W. O. Johnson & Son,
Winfield, Kans.

Gentlemen:—

We are in receipt of your message of the 10th inst. advising that you have sent draft in to-day's mail, and we will get your order out as quickly as possible. We are sending by mail to-day a sample bottle, our style No. 437, which we believe you will find to be the correct size and shape, as explained to our representative, Mr. James. We have your instructions in regard to the lettering wanted on the bottles and printing on the cases, and as soon as you receive our sample we will thank you to examine the same carefully for shape, size, capacity, etc., and wire us at our expense if you find this sample satisfactory. As soon as your reply is received, we will place your order for cases and get the car out as soon as possible.

Yours truly,
The North Baltimore Bottle Glass Co.,
Per C. M. Jackson, Secy.

And again as follows:

Terre Haute, Indiana, April 12th, 1902.
W. O. Johnson & Son,
Winfield, Kans.

Gentlemen:—

We are in receipt of your favor of the 10th inst. inclosing draft for \$400, which amount we have credited to your account and thank you for the remittance. We also have your message of the 12th inst., advising that the shape of our sample bottle is correct. As requested we will increase the length of the body of the bottle $\frac{1}{4}$ " and increase the capacity $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. To make this change will require a new mould, but we will commence work on this at once and will ship the bottles at the earliest possible moment.

Yours truly,
The North Baltimore Bottle Glass Co.,
Per C. M. Jackson, Secy.

This was followed by another letter from defendant, which reads as follows:

Terre Haute, Indiana, April 15th, 1902.
W. O. Johnson & Son,
Winfield, Kans.

Gentlemen:—

We have your favor of the 12th inst. confirming your message of same date, and will use your sample bottle as a guide for the length of our bottles. We believe we understand your instructions fully and will get the bottles out as quickly as possible.

Yours truly,
The North Baltimore Bottle Glass Co.,

Other correspondence passed between the parties with reference to shipment of a portion of the order by freight in order to accommodate plaintiffs, but the foregoing letters are all that have any bearing upon the contract. The bottles and cases were afterwards manufactured and shipped to plaintiffs, and received and accepted by them June 6th, at which time they paid the balance of the purchase price without protest. This action was then commenced to recover damages for failure to deliver the goods according to the contract, and plaintiffs alleged that, by reason of the failure to deliver the goods on April 1st, they had suffered damages. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, to reverse which plaintiffs bring this proceeding in error.

Messrs. Hackney & Lafferty, for plaintiffs in error:

Where the evidence shows the violation or infringement of a legal right, the law will presume damages sufficient to sustain an action.

13 Cyc. Law & Proc. ¶ 2, p. 12.

Messrs. Roberts & Richardson, for defendant in error:

A vendee's acceptance of the property in fulfilment of an executory contract of sale is a waiver of the objection that it was not delivered at the time agreed, unless his acceptance was qualified by a reservation of the right to claim damages caused by 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the delay, of which no evidence was offered by the plaintiffs in this case.

Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Hutchins, 65 Minn. 89, 67 N. W. 807; Bock v. Healy, 8 Daly, 156; Baldwin v. Farnsworth, 10 Me. 414, 25 Am. Dec. 252; Baker v. Henderson, 24 Wis. 509; Fraser v. Ross, 1 Penn. (Del.) 348, 41 Atl. 204; Cummings Harvester Co. v. Sigerson, 63 Kan. 340, 65 Pac. 639.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the contention of plaintiffs that the facts disclosed establish, as a matter of law, that two contracts were entered into between the parties; that there was a breach of the first contract, causing damages to plaintiffs; that afterwards a second contract was made and carried out; and that plaintiffs, by entering into the second, in no manner waived their right to claim damages for the breach of the original contract. On the other hand, it is claimed that the undisputed facts establish, as a matter of law, that there was but one contract, the terms of which were modified by consent of the parties, and that plaintiffs, by consenting to this modification and their acceptance of the goods, thereby waived all claim for damages for failure to deliver under the terms of the original contract. It was the duty of plaintiffs, upon the breach of the contract, to use diligence to procure the goods somewhere, and thus to minimize any damages for which they expected to hold defendant liable. It was so held in Halstead Lumber Co. v. Sutton, 46 Kan. 192, 26 Pac. 444. In that case a mere acceptance of the lumber after the specified time for the delivery was said not to constitute a waiver of a claim for damages caused by the failure to deliver in accordance with the terms of the contract. It appeared that the lumber was of such character as could not be procured in the market at the place of delivery, and that the owners of the buildings for whom it was purchased were daily incurring expense by the failure of the vendor to provide the lumber at the time specified. The court said that, under such circumstances, it was the duty of the vendees to make the injury as light as possible by taking and using the lumber upon its arrival, and that to have returned the lumber would not have lessened the damage which had already accrued, but would have aggravated the injury and enhanced the vendor's liability. In Van Winkle v. Wilkins, 81 Ga. 93, 104, 12 Am. St. Rep. 299, 7 S. E. 644, which was an action to recover the contract price of machinery sold for a cotton-seed-oil mill, the court, in allowing damages resulting from its nondelivery in due time by way of recoupment, notwithstanding the objection that receiving the machinery was a waiver of such damages, said: "As to the damages resulting from delay, these had already been sustained when the mill was received. Its reception, in so far as it affected them at all, could only hinder more from accruing. It certainly could not increase them. There was no inconsistency between reception of the machinery and retention of the claim for damages on account of delay to furnish it by the time stipulated. To hold that there was a waiver by implication would be very unreasonable." It was held error to charge the jury, in an action to recover the purchase price of building material in which defendant counterclaimed damages sustained by reason of nondelivery within the time agreed upon, that they had a right to consider whether the receipt of the goods was not a waiver of any claim for damages. Gaylord v. Karst, 43 N. Y. S. R. 531, 17 N. Y. Supp. 720. In that case the court said that the charge obviously had "no other purport than to instruct the jury that, if they found that defendant consented in April to accept future delivery of the building material which plaintiffs had originally agreed to deliver on the 4th of the previous month, they were at liberty to find further that defendant had thereby waived all claim for damages accruing to him from plaintiffs' default in delivery by the time first appointed; and, as this seems to be in direct conflict with the law as declared by the court of appeals in Ruff v. Rinaldo, 55 N. Y. 864, and McMaster v. State, 108 N. Y. 542, 553, 15 N. E. 417, it is impossible to escape from the conclusion that the charge was erroneous, and the exception thereto well taken. That the defendant was prejudiced by this error is a proposition the validity of which is apparent upon its mere assertion, as the error vitally affected the meritorious consideration by the jury of defendant's counterclaim." In Hansen v. Kirtley, 11 Iowa, 565, it is held that the acceptance of the goods after the time fixed for delivery may be considered by the jury as evidence of a waiver of the damages sustained by the delay, but that its weight must depend upon the circumstances of the case. In the case of Industrial Works v. Mitchell, 114 Mich. 29, 72 N. W. 25, which was an action to recover upon notes given for the purchase price of machinery, defendant sought to recoup damages occasioned by delay in the delivery, and for further delay resulting from defects in the machinery. It was held that the mere acceptance of the machinery by the vendee, without protest, after the time specified, and his appropriation of the same to his own use, and even the giving of notes for the purchase price, did not constitute a waiver of his right to claim damages for the delay. It was said that circumstances often require a vendee to accept the goods after a specified time, or suffer irreparable loss, and that the acceptance in that case amounted to a compulsory one. In McMaster v. State, supra, the court says: "The contention that where there is a breach of contract by one party, and the other thereafter is permitted to perform the same in part, receiving the contract price for such part performance, the injured party thereby waives or releases his right to damages for the breach, has no foundation in reason or authority. It is undoubtedly the rule that, where one party to a contract breaks the same, the other party may stop and refuse further performance. But, instead of doing so, he may perform so far as he is permitted and then claim the damages he has suffered from the breach." In Davis v. Fish, 1 G. Greene, 406, 48 Am. Dec. 387, it is held that the acceptance, without protest, may furnish a strong presumption against a waiver. Redlands Orange Growers' Assn. v. Gorman, 76 Mo. App. 184, Affirmed in 161 Mo. 203, 54 L.R.A. 718, 61 S. W. 820.

We think the rule, as qualified by many of the cases, is correct, that the mere acceptance of the purchased article after the agreed time of delivery does not constitute a waiver of damages for the delay, unless such acceptance is accompanied by other circumstances which manifest an intention on the part of the purchaser to waive such damages. The intention of the parties controls. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 1074, 1162; Ramsey v. Tully, 12 Ill. App. 463; Belcher v. Sellards, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1571, 43 S. W. 676. It is true that in none of the correspondence on the part of plaintiffs, following the refusal of defendant to deliver the goods, is there any intimation of an intention to hold defendant under the original terms of the contract. Nor, on the other hand, is there any intimation that they intended to waive a claim for damages caused by delay. It is also true that the defendant's letter of April 7th did not stop with a refusal to deliver, but contained an offer to go ahead, provided satisfactory terms were made for the payment of the purchase price. Plaintiffs adopted the suggestion, and arranged for satisfactory terms of payment. Whether we call this a modification of the original, or a new contract, is not very important. The time for delivery under the original contract had already expired. There had been a breach of the terms of the contract. All of the evidence which consists of the correspondence between the parties is before us, and we have difficulty in arriving at the same conclusion reached by the trial court in finding for defendant. The court may have erroneously held that the acceptance of the goods was a waiver of any claim for damages for failure to deliver. There is nothing in the additional circumstances which, in view of all that occurred, warrants, in our opinion, the inference that the plaintiffs, by acceding to the demand for cash payment, intended to waive damages for the breach which had already taken place. Having accepted the order and permitted plaintiffs to rest for several months in the assurance that the goods would be delivered at a certain date, defendant, after the time expired, refused to deliver, placing the refusal upon the grounds which, under ordinary diligence in business, should have been discovered and made known to plaintiffs long before. These circumstances seem to make it unreasonable to hold plaintiffs to have waived any actual damages suffered because they consented to the change in the terms of payment and accepted the goods.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial.

All the Justices concur.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

LUCRETIA E. DOAN et al., Appts.,

v.

THE VESTRY OF THE PARISH OF THE ASCENSION OF CARROLL COUNTY et al.

(103 Md. 662, 64 Atl. 314.)

Devise—corporation—misnomer.

1. A misnomer of a corporation will not defeat a devise or bequest to it if its identity is otherwise sufficiently certain.

Case Note.—Effect of provision directing the particular purposes to which property granted or devised to or for the benefit of a religious or charitable organization shall be devoted:—An expression in a deed or devise, as to the purpose to which the property granted or devised is to be put, is susceptible of various constructions. It may be taken as creating a trust, a condition, a covenant, or merely as indicating the motive for the devise or conveyance, according to the presumed intention of the deviser or grantor. The ascertainment of such intention is in a degree aided by the rule that, where it is doubtful whether a condition subsequent is created, the courts incline against such construction; and that the expression of a purpose for which it is intended the granted property shall be used will not be taken as creating a condition subsequent where such purpose will not in-

Trust—identity of legal and beneficial interest.

2. A trust cannot exist where the same person possesses both the legal estate and the beneficial interest.

Same—devise to church.

3. A devise to the vestry of a parish, to be used for such church purposes as the rector of said church shall or may direct, creates no trust, but is for the corporate purposes of the vestry, and vests the absolute title in it.

Will—condition—repugnancy.

4. A provision in a will devising property to the vestry of a parish, that it shall be used for such church purposes as shall be designated by the rector, is void for repugnance to the fee.

(June 16, 1906.)

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Carroll County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stevenson A. Williams, James A. C. Bond, and Francis Neal Parke, for appellants:

If it is apparent from the whole will that a trust was intended to be established, then the uncertainty as to the objects or subjects of that trust will not indicate that there was no intention to raise a trust; but the uncertainty will avoid the trust attempted to be founded.

Pratt v. Sheppard & E. P. Hospital, 88 Md. 627, 42 Atl. 51.

From this confidence reposed in the vestry, that it would carry out the designation of the rector, arises an obligation upon the vestry, denominated a trust.

Church Extension of M. E. Church v. Smith, 56 Md. 396; Maught v. Getzendanner, 65 Md. 537, 57 Am. Rep. 352, 5 Atl. 471;

ure specially to the benefit of the grantor and his assigns, but is in its nature general and public, and where there are no other words indicating an intent that the grant is to be void if the declared purpose is not fulfilled. The following cases are grouped according to the construction given to the provision as to purpose:

In conveyance, as creating trust.

In Alden v. St. Peter's Parish, 158 Ill. 631, 30 L.R.A. 232, 42 N. E. 392, it was held that conveyances made to the rector, church wardens, and vestrymen of an unincorporated religious society, the one providing, "said premises to be used for church purposes only, and not sold or encumbered, and shall revert to the grantors, their heirs and assigns, whenever this condition is broken;" and the other providing, "This conveyance

Gambell v. Trippe, 75 Md. 254, 15 L.R.A. 235, 32 Am. St. Rep. 388, 23 Atl. 461; Saylor v. Plaine, 31 Md. 158, 1 Am. Rep. 34; Sugden's Gilbert, Uses, 175.

The legal and equitable estates are not both given to The Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension.

Bartlett v. Hipkins, 76 Md. 25, 23 Atl. 1089, 24 Atl. 532.

The uses to which the "land and buildings thereon" shall be dedicated by the passing rectors may be within the scope of the corporate powers of the vestry; but it is equally possible that these uses chosen by the rector may not be.

Gambell v. Trippe, supra; Wheeler v. Smith, 9 How. 55, 13 L. ed. 44.

The control and discretion committed to the rector are not repugnant and void conditions. The intention cannot be unconscionably obliterated from the will.

Dolan v. Baltimore, 4 Gill, 304; Trinity M. E. Church, South v. Baker, 91 Md. 574, 46 Atl. 1020.

The courts everywhere recognize the privilege of the settler to prescribe both the objects of the trusts and the manner of its administration.

Glegg, 2 Ambl. 584, note 2; Re Ilminster Free School, 2 De G. & J. 535; Ex parte Blackburne, 1 Jac. & W. 297; Atty. Gen. v. Cumming, 2 Younge & C. Ch. 139; Marsh v. Renton, 99 Mass. 132; Waldo v. Caley, 16 Ves. Jr. 206.

is made upon the express condition and trust that the rents, issues, and profits of the above-described land be devoted to and used for the payment, so far as it may go, of the salary of the rectors of said parish forever, and for no other purpose; and this conveyance is accepted upon the express understanding and agreement that the title hereby conveyed shall immediately revert to and be vested in the party of the first part, his heirs, executors, and administrators, when the income from said land shall be diverted to any other purpose,"—constituted a valid gift in trust for a charitable use.

In Neely v. Hoskins, 84 Me. 386, 24 Atl. 882, a conveyance, for a not inadequate consideration, to a bishop "upon the condition that it shall be forever for the use of" a certain church, was held not to create a condition, but a trust for the benefit of the parish.

In Sohier v. Trinity Church, 109 Mass. 1, it was held that the words in the habendum clause of a deed, "in trust, nevertheless, and upon condition always, that the said edifice, . . . and the land aforesaid whereon it stands, . . . shall from henceforth and forever hereafter be . . . made use of for the public worship of God according to the rubric of the common prayer-book used by the Church of England . . . and for no other use or purpose whatsoever,"—created a trust, and not a condition subsequent; the deed having been given by the church trustees, who held title for the church, to the vestry and wardens and their successors.

And in White v. Rice, 112 Mich. 403, 70 N. W. 1024, a recital in a deed of property for the erection of a church, that said church, when on said site, shall, when not in use by the party of the second part, be open for use to certain other denominations, was held to create a valid trust in favor of the denominations named.

In Mills v. Davison, 54 N. J. Eq. 659, 35 L.R.A. 113, 55 Am. St. Rep. 594, 35 Atl. 1072, it was held that a conveyance, for a nominal consideration, of land on which an Episcopal church had been erected, to an incorporated religious society, and to their successors, "but not to their assigns," with an habendum in these words: "To have and to hold unto the said party of the second part and their successors forever, with this express condition and limitation: That neither the said party of the second part, nor their successors, shall at any time sell, mortgage, or in any way convey, the said land and premises, or any part thereof, and that no building shall be kept, maintained, or erected thereon, except for the purpose of public worship and teaching in accordance with the usages, rites, and ceremonies of the Protestant Episcopal Church,"—created, not a condition subsequent, but a trust for a charitable use; it plainly appearing that the conditions and limitations inserted in the deed were designed and intended to secure and maintain the property donated for the benefit of the religious society, and not for the advantage of the grantors personally.

In Sellers Chapel M. E. Church's Petition, 139 Pa. 61, 11 L.R.A. 282, 21 Atl. 145, and Strong v. Doty, 32 Wis. 381, it was held that a conveyance to trustees in trust that they "shall erect and build, or cause to be erected and built, a house or place of worship for the use of the members" of a certain denomination, did not create a conditional estate, but only a trust for a charitable use.

In Brown v. Caldwell, 23 W. Va. 187, 48 Am. Rep. 376, a conveyance for an adequate consideration "for the following uses and trusts, to wit: That the said John Brown [the grantee], his heirs and assigns, shall at all times permit all the white religious societies of Christians, and the members of such societies, to use the aforesaid acre of land as a common burying ground, and for no other purpose, unless it be for erecting thereon a house for public Christian worship,"—was held not to be upon a condition subsequent, there being no apt or proper words to create a condition, no clause of re-entry or forfeiture, and the use declared not being for the benefit of the grantor or his heirs or assigns, but a trust which is void for want of certainty of the beneficiaries.

The trust is void because its object is unascertained and indefinite.

A trust is the right of a person to the beneficial enjoyment of property, the legal title of which is in another.

1 Lewin, Tr. 8th ed. 91; Missionary Soc.

In devise, as creating trust.

In Elliot's Appeal, 74 Conn. 586, 51 Atl. 558, a devise of property to a church society "for the purpose of erecting a chapel thereon" was held to create a valid charitable trust.

In Littell v. Wallace, 80 Ky. 252, a devise to the trustees of a certain church, and to their successors forever in fee simple, "to be used, occupied, and enjoyed by the church aforesaid and their minister as a parsonage," was held to give the trustees a fee-simple title to the property in trust for the church.

In Halsey v. Convention of Protestant Episcopal Church, 75 Md. 275, 23 Atl. 781, a devise to a diocesan body corporate, of property "to be held as a place for a church school for boys," was held to create a valid charitable trust.

In conveyance, as creating condition.

In Eldridge v. See Yup Co. 17 Cal. 44, the words "for the use of a Chinese church, or a place of religious worship or moral instruction," in the habendum of a deed given for a valuable consideration, were held not to create a trust, since no intention appears to make the grantee a trustee, but a limitation upon the use, which, being repugnant to the estate granted by the premises, was void.

In Nelson v. Solomon, 112 Ga. 188, 37 S. E. 404, a deed conveying a described lot and building to an organized church, declaring that "the intention of this conveyance is to restrict the use of said lot and building to use of a place of worship for the Baptist denomination;" and also that, "in case a majority of the members should wish to sell this property and buy and build in another place, they have the right,"—was held to be upon conditions the compliance with which was essential to a lawful sale of the property by the church.

In Board of Education v. First Baptist Church, 63 Ill. 204, it was held that, where a deed to church trustees provided that the property should be used for church purposes only, but, when it ceased to be so used, that the grantees might acquire an absolute title by paying to grantor an additional sum, if any condition was created thereby it was a condition subsequent, which might be discharged by payment or tender of the sum stipulated.

In Tomlin v. Blunt, 31 Ill. App. 234, it was held that the stipulation in a deed to trustees of a church and to their successors in office "for church purposes," that the church building "is to be open, at all times when not used by the Baptist denomination, to all evangelical orders of Christians," created a condition which was not invalid for repugnance to the grant.

In Scott v. Stipe, 12 Ind. 74, a grant to the trustees of a church and their successors, in consideration of the respect of the grantors for the institution of Christianity, and that the said church might have a suitable place for erecting a house of worship, was held to be upon a condition subsequent, which was violated by a sale of the property and its use for secular purposes.

In Reed v. Stouffer, 56 Md. 236, it was held that a conveyance to trustees for a religious society, of land to be thereafter used as a burial ground for the members of such society, and for no other purposes whatever, was upon condition, although a valuable consideration was paid for the grant; and that the property would revert to the heirs of the grantor upon its diversion to other uses.

In Second Universalist Soc. v. Dugan, 65 Md. 460, 5 Atl. 415, a deed, habendum "for and to the use of and purpose following,—to say, for the use of the society of Christian people called Quakers, inhabiting and dwelling in and near the town and the county of Baltimore, . . . to inclose and keep the same for a burying place, . . . and also to erect or build a meeting house for the same society,"—was construed as conveying the property for the expressed purposes only.

In Austin v. Cambridgeport Parish, 21 Pick. 215, a deed to a religious corporation in con-

v. Humphreys, 91 Md. 131, 80 Am. St. Rep. 432, 46 Atl. 320; Pratt v. Sheppard & E. P. Hospital, 88 Md. 610, 42 Atl. 51; Williams v. Baptist Church, 92 Md. 497, 54 L.R.A. 427, 48 Atl. 930.

A gift to a corporation capable of taking, to be used for its corporate purposes, does not create a trust.

Woman's Foreign Missionary Soc. v. Mitchell, 93 Md. 199, 53 L.R.A. 711, 48 Atl. 737; Erhardt v. Baltimore Monthly Meeting of Friends, 93 Md. 669, 49 Atl. 561; Bennett v. Baltimore Humane Impartial Soc. 91 Md. 10, 46 Atl. 888; Trinity M. E. Church, South v. Baker, 91 Md. 539, 46 Atl. 1020; Barnum v. Baltimore, 62 Md. 275, 50 Am. Rep. 219; Hanson v. Little Sisters of the Poor, 79 Md. 434, 32 L.R.A. 293, 32 Atl.

1052; Eutaw Place Baptist Church v. Shively, 67 Md. 493, 1 Am. St. Rep. 412, 10 Atl. 244; Halsey v. Convention of Protestant Episcopal Church, 75 Md. 275, 23 Atl. 781; Domestic & Foreign Missionary Soc. v. Gaither, 62 Fed. 422.

A naked collateral power, antagonistic to the fee, is void.

2 Perry, Tr. 5th ed. § 744.

Pearce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the circuit court for Carroll county, in an action of ejectment brought by Lucretia E. Doan, George L. Van Bibber, and others against The Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension of Carroll County, a body corporate of the sideration of $1, "provided always, and this grant is on this express condition," that the property should be held for the support of ministers who should be settled to preach in a certain meeting house, and void in default of the appropriation of its rents and profits to such use, was said to be clearly on a condition subsequent.

In Upington v. Corrigan, 151 N. Y. 143, 37 L.R.A. 794, 45 N. E. 359, a deed to an ecclesiastic, the habendum clause of which contained a condition that the grantee should consecrate, or cause to be consecrated, the said property for the purpose of erecting a church building; and should, within a reasonable time, erect, or cause to be erected, such building,—was held to be upon a condition subsequent, the breach of which would entitle the grantor or his heirs to re-enter.

In Erwin v. Hurd, 13 Abb. N. C. 91, a deed to the trustees of a religious society, with habendum, for the use and purpose of maintaining upon the premises a place of worship upon the express condition that, if the said premises should be left vacant for the space of two successive years, then they should revert to the grantors, was held to convey a title subject to be divested by non-performance of the condition.

And in Branch v. Wesleyan Cemetery Asso. 11 Ohio C. C. 185, it was held that a deed to church trustees, containing a provision that, should the land cease to be occupied for church purposes and as a place of divine worship, the grant should cease and determine, vested in the trustees an estate in fee, subject to be divested only by breach of condition.

In devise, as creating condition, or conditional limitation.

In General Assembly of Presby. Church v. Alexander, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 391, 46 S. W. 503, it was held that a devise to the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, of certain property "as a place of worship in perpetuity," was upon a condition, which was violated by a sale of the property.

But in St. Luke's Church's Appeal, 1 Walk. (Pa.) 283, where a devise was made to a church "for the sole use and benefit of said church, and not to be disposed of; and if at any time the same shall be directly or indirectly disposed of, then this devise shall be void;" with devise over to other persons in that event,—it was held that the devise over on the contingency of alienation was void for remoteness; and the provision against alienation was also void as a restriction on the fee.

So, also, in Church in Brattle Square v. Grant, 3 Gray, 142, 63 Am. Dec. 725, a devise of a house and land to deacons and their successors forever "upon this express condition and limitation,"—that a minister shall constantly reside in the house, and that, if it is not improved for this use only, then the bequest shall be void and the premises revert and the estate be given to a named person,—was held to create a conditional limitation, and not a condition subsequent, which being void for remoteness, the first taker had an absolute estate in fee.

In conveyance, as creating covenant.

But in Carroll County Academy v. Galatin Academy Co. 104 Ky. 621, 47 S. W. 617, a deed to the trustees of an academy, habendum, "unto said parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns, forever, on condition and in trust that they shall erect and put up a suitable building or buildings for a high school or seminary of learning; and that same shall always be devoted to school purposes, whether retained by said association or be passed into the hands of others,"—was construed as containing a covenant, and not a condition subsequent; there being no language importing that the grant should be void in case the purpose for which the land was conveyed was not carried out, or reserving to the grantor in that event the right to re-enter.

In conveyance, as indicating motive or recognizing contemplated use.

There is also a class of cases in which the state of Maryland, and The Order of the Holy Cross of Westminster, Maryland, also a body corporate of the state of Maryland, to recover thirteen undivided eighteenths of a parcel of land lying in Westminster, in Carroll county, Maryland, and fully described in the declaration. The case was tried below without a jury on an agreed statement of facts, providing that, if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, then the court should enter judgment accordingly with 1 cent damages and costs; but, if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, then judgment should be entered for the defendants, with costs, reserving the right of appeal to either party. It appears from the statement of facts: (1) That Lucretia E. Van Bibber, being seised in fee of the parcel of land described in the declaration under a valid conveyance thereof, erected certain buildings thereon, and, on September 25, 1892, conveyed said land and buildings to the defendant, The Order of the Holy Cross of Westminster, Maryland, so long as it should use said land and buildings for the corporate purposes mentioned in its certificate of incorporation, with a proviso that, if it should cease to use the same for such corporate purposes, then the title thereto should revert to and vest in the said Lucretia E. Van Bibber, her heirs and assigns. (2) That the said The Order of the Holy Cross of Westminster, Maryland, without ever obtaining the sanction of the legislaexpression of purpose to which the land granted or devised is to be put is taken merely as indicating the motive of the grantor or deviser, or a recognition by him of a contemplated use.

Thus, in Downen v. Rayburn, 214 Ill. 342, 73 N. E. 364, a deed to trustees of a church, of property "to be used as a church location," was held not to restrict the title; it not being stated in the deed that the premises were conveyed upon condition that they were to be used as a church location, and there being no provision for a re-entry by the grantor in case of a breach.

In Episcopal City Mission v. Appleton, 117 Mass. 326, it was held that a deed of land given for a nominal consideration to a religious society "upon and subject to a condition" that it should be held for religious worship, was held not to be on a condition subsequent, where it also provided that no building should be erected on a certain portion until the adjoining owner should cease to keep open a contiguous strip, or the premises should cease to be a chapel; but that, when it was unfit for such use, it might be sold.

In Farnham v. Thompson, 34 Minn. 331, 57 Am. Rep. 59, 26 N. W. 9, it was held that a conveyance of land to a religious corporation, "for the purpose of erecting a church thereon" only, was not upon condition subsequent.

In Methodist Protestant Church v. Laws, 7 Ohio C. C. 211, it was held that, where property was conveyed to a church corporation "for a place of burial, and for other purposes," there being no words indicating that the grant should be void and the property revert if the declared purpose should not be carried out, the grantee took a fee-simple title.

In Brendle v. German Reformed Congregation, 33 Pa. 415, it was held that, where property was conveyed in fee simple to certain persons, who executed a declaration of trust setting forth that the land was granted to them by direction and appointment of the members of a certain church, and stating that they held the same in trust for the benefit, use, and behoof of the poor of said 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

church, and for a place to erect a house for religious worship and a place to bury the dead, the congregation, in its corporate capacity, held the entire title, the foregoing declaration simply recognizing the uses for which by law they might hold the land.

In Rankin Regular Baptist Church v. Edwards, 204 Pa. 216, 53 Atl. 770, it was held that no condition subsequent was created by the use, in the habendum of a deed to a church corporation, of the words "for mission school purposes;" there being no provision in the deed that a building should be erected upon the lot, and be used exclusively for such purposes, and no provision for reverter in case of the nonuser of the ground for the purposes named.

In Shaarai Shomayim v. Moss, 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 356, it was held that no condition subsequent was created in a deed conveying certain premises "forever in trust for the society of Jews settled and about Lancaster, to have and to hold the same as a burying ground;" but that the conveyance passed a fee simple absolute.

In devise, as indicating motive or contemplated use.

In Erhardt v. Baltimore Monthly Meeting of Friends, 93 Md. 669, 49 Atl. 561, a devise to a religious corporation in trust for the purpose of applying the income for the use of the school under the control of such corporation was held valid as a gift to the corporation; the purpose expressed being within the scope of its corporate functions, and the devise therefore not being objectionable as creating a trust for unascertained beneficiaries.

In Lane v. Eaton, 69 Minn. 141, 38 L.R.A. 669, 65 Am. St. Rep. 559, 31 N. W. 1031, a residuary devise to a church "absolutely, to be used by said church in aiding the cause of home and foreign missions equally," was sustained as a gift for a corporate purpose, although, considered as a devise in trust, it would not be valid for want of an ascertained beneficiary.

So, also, in Preston v. Howk, 3 App. Div. 43, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1079 (Affirmed without ture of Maryland to said conveyance, entered into possession of said land and buildings upon the execution and delivery of said conveyance, and continued to use the same for its corporate purposes until April 24, 1905, when it finally abandoned the user thereof for its corporate purposes. (3) That the said Lucretia E. Van Bibber died February 8, 1896, leaving a last will and testament duly executed and admitted to probate by the orphans' court of Carroll county, whereby, amongst other things, she devised as follows: "Whereas, I have heretofore, by deed dated September 25, 1892, granted and conveyed a parcel of land containing one acre, one rood and four perches of land more or less to The Order of the Holy Cross of Westminster, Maryland (a body corporate of the state of Maryland), subject to the following condition, 'that, in the event said Order of the Holy Cross should at any time hereafter abandon said premises for the uses in its certificate of incorporation mentioned, then in that event said land and premises with the buildings and improvements thereon shall revert to me, my heirs and assigns, as appears by said deed; and desiring to provide for the disposal of said property in the event of the abandonment and the reversion of the same, as in said deed set forth, I give and devise said land in said deed described and thereby conveyed, to the Vestry of Ascension Church, Ascension Parish, in Westminster, Carroll county, Maryland, to be used for such church purposes as the rector of said church shall or may direct, it being my purpose and desire that the said land and buildings thereon shall be under the control of the rector of the Ascension church, and shall be used for such church work as he may deem for the best interest of Ascension church." (4) That, upon the abandonment of said land and buildings as aforesaid, the said Order of the Holy Cross of Westminster, Maryland, surrendered and delivered the actual possession of said land and buildings to the Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension of Carroll County, one of the defendants, which accepted said delivery and possession, and entered upon said lands and buildings and now holds the same, and has ever since rented the same by the direction and with the consent of the rector of said church; the money derived therefrom being used for the purposes of the Ascension church, it now and always being the only church within the territorial limits of said parish, and there being but one Ascension church, and but one Ascension parish in Carroll county, embracing the town of Westminster. (5) That since the institution of this suit, at the first session of the legislature after the abandonment of said premises by the said Order of the Holy Cross, the legislature gave its sanction and consent to the devise now in question in the will of said Lucretia E. Van Bibber. And (6) that, if said devise is not valid and effective, then the plaintiffs are entitled to thirteen undivided eighteenthths of said land and premises.

It will be seen that the corporate name and title of "The Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension of Carroll County" is not correctly given in Miss Van Bibber's will; it being there called "The Vestry of Ascension Church, Ascension Parish, in Westminster, in Carroll county, Md." It is too well settled, however, to admit of question, that the misnomer of a corporation will not defeat a devise or bequest to it if its identity is otherwise sufficiently certain. As was said in Woman's Foreign Missionary Soc. v. Mitchell, 93 Md. 203, 53 L.R.A. 711, 48 Atl. 739: "When it is clear who was intended to take, the accidental miscalling of the beneficiary's name will not invalidate the gift." And again, in Reilly v. Union Protestant Infirmary, 87 Md. 668, 40 Atl. 894, it was said: "The name is simply descriptive of the legatee. The name is no more the legatee than is the name of an individual the individual himself." It is too obvious for argument, upon reference to the agreed statement of facts, that the beneficiary was intended to be "The Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension of Carroll County," and we understand that this is practically opinion in 154 N. Y. 734, 49 N. E. 1103), it was held that a residuary legacy to trustees of a church, "to be used by them to help defray the expense of preaching the Gospel in said church from year to year," was a gift for a corporate purpose, and did not create a trust.

In Griffitts v. Cope, 17 Pa. 96, a devise of property to the trustees of a religious society, "there to build a meeting house upon, if the members of that meeting shall agree to build a meeting house there, but not else," was held to carry a fee simple; it being presumed that, by that declaration, the deviser meant merely to recognize the purpose for which a religious society is allowed to hold land.

No objection appears to have been made in DOAN v. PARISH OF THE ASCENSION to the validity of the devise to the defendant upon the ground that the estate of the testatrix in the property in question was not devisable. That a possibility of reverter upon breach of a condition subsequent is neither descendible nor devisable, but that such breach may be taken advantage of only by the grantor or by his heirs as representatives of the grantor, has, however, been held in Upington v. Corrigan, 151 N. Y. 143, 37 L.R.A. 794, 45 N. E. 359.

conceded by the appellants. Neither is it denied that Miss Van Bibber had the power and right to devise this property; and the sole question presented is whether, under a proper construction of the language, the devise is valid or void. The plaintiffs assert that this devise creates a trust in its subject-matter, and that the trust thus created is void, because its objects are not ascertained, and also because, even if ascertained, it is a perpetuity; while the defendants contend that the devise is of a fee-simple estate, to the Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension, and not a trust, and that the only construction of the subsequent clause relating to the control of the said land and buildings by the rector of the parish is that it is an attempt to ingraft upon the fee a naked collateral power to cut down the fee, to which the law will not permit effect to be given. Mr. Hill, in his work on Trustees, (4th Am. ed.) *44, says: "Before the relation of trustee can be constituted, there must necessarily exist: (1) A subject-matter for a proper trust; (2) a person competent to create the trust; (3) one capable of holding property as trustee; and (4) a person for whose benefit the trust property may be held, who is known by the somewhat barbarous appellation of 'cestui que trust.'" In the case at bar the land and buildings devised are proper subject-matter for a trust. The deviser is competent to create a trust, and the devisee is capable of taking and holding property as a trustee. But there must still be found within the terms of the devise a cestui que trust. On page 55, Mr. Hill says: "The legal owner of property is prima facie entitled to its beneficial enjoyment, and, in order to convert him into a trustee, there must be a sufficient indication of the intention of the parties that he should hold the estate for the benefit of others." To effect this conversion there must be a proper declaration of the trust, for "it is not the legal conveyance, or transfer of the property, but the declaration of the trust, that operates in the creation of the trustee." Id. p. 64.

It is apparent, therefore, that, wherever a trust is alleged to be created by any instrument or instruments, there must be a separation of the legal estate from the beneficial enjoyment, and that a trust cannot exist where the same person possesses both. As expressed by Mr. Lewin in his work on Trusts, vol. 1, p. 14 (1st Am. ed.): A trust "is a confidence reposed in some other than the cestui que trust, for which the cestui que trust has no remedy but by subpoena in chancery; . . . for, as a man cannot sue a subpoena against himself, he cannot be said to hold upon trust for himself. If the legal and equitable interests happen to meet in the same person, the equitable is forever merged in the legal." Mr. Lewin is equally explicit as to the necessity of a proper declaration of trust, saying, upon page 83: "It is essential to the creation of a trust that there should be the intention of creating a trust; and therefore, if, upon a consideration of all the circumstances, the court is of opinion that the settler did not mean to create a trust, the court will not impute a trust where none in fact was contemplated." In Bennett v. Baltimore Humane Impartial Soc. 91 Md. 19, 45 Atl. 889, this court said: "Whilst no set form of words is required to create a trust, if there be an intention to create one, still there must be a manifestation on the face of the will of such an intention before a trust will be declared. The particular circumstances which denote such an intention are necessarily variant; but . . . it may be generally affirmed that where there is a gift to one for the use of another, or where the legatee or devisee is clearly designed to have no beneficial interest in the property given to him, a trust for the benefit of someone was intended to be created; and this conclusion would result either from the words used, or from the legal effect of the instrument itself. In the one case there would be an express declaration of a trust, in the other there would be a trust by construction; but in both it is essential that there should be an intention to create a trust, or none will arise."

It is obvious that there is in this will no express declaration of any trust, and, if any can be declared to exist, it must rest upon implication derived from the language of the will; and it is contended by the plaintiffs that the words following the devise to the vestry, viz., "to be used for such church purposes as the rector of such church shall or may direct, it being my purpose and desire that the said land and buildings thereon shall be under the control of the rector of the Ascension church, and shall be used for such church work as he may deem for the best interest of Ascension church," creates a trust for indefinite purposes or beneficiaries. Let us see, then, what is meant by the "church purposes" and "church work" which is here referred to. If there were anything in this will to justify the conclusion that Miss Van Bibber meant thereby general or diocesan missions, or any of the charitable or religious objects which the Christian church at large is concerned in, there might be ground for holding that The Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension of Carroll County was not designed to take the beneficial interest in the property devised to it, and was only designed to be the administrator of its benefits to these indefinite beneficiaries; but this intention must be deduced from some rational and substantial analysis of the will, and not from abstract speculation merely. If the contention of the plaintiffs is to prevail, they will defeat the intention of the testatrix that they should in no event have this particular property; and, as was said in Bennett v. Baltimore Humane Impartial Soc. supra: "Courts are not, or ought not to be, astute in searching for a construction which nullifies a will, if there are other equally reasonable interpretations which uphold it."

In Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law, vol. 2, p. 1755, the word "church" is said to be derived from the two Green words kurion oikos; the house of the Lord, and this plainly appears in the Scotch word "kirk." Its primary meaning, as given in the Century Dictionary, is: "An edifice or a place of assemblage . . . for Christian worship." Several secondary meanings are there given, conforming to different contexts in which the word is used, among which are the following: An "organized body of Christians belonging to the same city, diocese, province . . . as the Church at Corinth, the Syrian Church,"—and: "A body of Christians worshipping in a particular church edifice or constituting one congregation." It is in this latter sense that the word is used in Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1888, art. 23, § 206, which provides for incorporating religious societies or congregations generally; and which authorizes them to take and hold property and "to use or lease, mortgage, or sell and convey the same in such manner as they may judge most conducive to the interest of their respective churches, societies, or congregations." It is used in the same sense in the act of 1798, chap. 24, which provides specially for the incorporation of vestries for each of the parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this state. In § 29 of that act it is declared that "no vestry shall sell, alien, or transfer any of their estates, or property belonging to their church or churches without the consent of at least five of their body (of which number the rector shall always be one), together with the consent of both the church wardens." And in § 9 of the same act it is provided that the vestry of each parish, for the time being, shall have an estate in fee simple in all lands and other property belonging to them, and "shall manage and direct all such property as they may think most advantageous to the interest of the parishioners." In the case of Weld v. May, 9 Cush. 181, the word "church," it was contended, meant an indefinite aggregation of persons; but the court said: "As commonly used in our law, it is synonymous with 'parish' . . . and designates an incorporated society." The references above made to Code, art. 23, and the act of 1798, chap. 24, are sufficient to show that, as the word is used in the law of Maryland, it is synonymous with the corporate entity holding the title to its property. The devise in this will is to "The Vestry of Ascension Church, Ascension Parish in Westminster, Carroll County, Maryland;" and when she added, "to be used for such church work or church purposes as the rector of said church may deem for the best interests of the Ascension church," it is, we think, obvious, in the light of what we have said as to the meaning of the word "church," that she meant parish purposes and parish work; that is, the purposes and work of The Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension of Carroll County, or for the corporate work and purposes of the vestry of that parish. This purpose would be sufficiently clear if the last clause in the devise had been omitted; but it is distinctly asserted and emphasized in that clause where the "church work" previously mentioned is declared to be such as the rector should deem best, not for the interest of the church at large, but of Ascension church. In Domestic & Foreign Missionary Soc. v. Gaither, 62 Fed. 422, there was a bequest of $5,000 to the society above named, with a request and desire that it be applied to domestic missions. Judge Morris said: This society "has for its immediate object two purposes,—one domestic, the other foreign, missions. . . . It would seem, therefore, that money given to the corporation, as this legacy was, is not to be held by it upon any trust, but is to be expended by it in the missionary work which it carries on within the United States. . . . This is not a case in which there is a trust, or trustee or cestui que trust. It is a direct expenditure by a corporation for the very object for which it was created. It is therefore not within the ruling in the case of Church Extension of M. E. Church v. Smith, 56 Md. 362, and is even stronger . . . than the case of Eutaw Place Baptist Church v. Shively, 67 Md. 493, 1 Am. St. Rep. 412, 10 Atl. 244, in which that court sustained the validity of the bequest as being for one of the corporate uses of the donee." So, in Looks Case, 26 N. Y. S. R. 745, 7 N. Y. Supp. 298, a bequest to the American Bible Society, to be used for the promulgation of the Holy Bible, was held to be a gift limited to the very use for which the donee was incorporated, and not a trust for an indefinite beneficiary.

Holding, as we do, that the purposes and uses for which she desired this property to be used were the corporate purposes of the donee, it is immaterial that she wished the rector to determine for which of these corporate uses it should be employed, or whether this was determined by the rector or by the vestry. Inasmuch as the whole beneficial interest in the property is given to the Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension, the true reading of the will is that the estate given is not an estate given in trust, but one devised to the corporation for its general and corporate purposes. Bennett v. Baltimore Humane Impartial Soc. 91 Md. 19, 45 Atl. 889; Woman's Foreign Missionary Soc. v. Mitchell, 93 Md. 203, 53 L.R.A. 711, 48 Atl. 730. The legal estate and beneficial interest being thus vested in the defendant, the estate it takes is an absolute fee simple. The rector has neither estate nor interest in the subject of the devise, and the power which the testatrix desired to be exercised by him, of designating the particular corporate uses to which it should be applied, was not to be exercised for his own benefit or that of another, but for that of the vestry alone. It is therefore a naked collateral power repugnant to the fee devised to the vestry, and for that reason void. As was said in Smith v. Clark, 10 Md. 194: No interest in terms is attempted to be reserved or carved out of the land for any other person, the enjoyment of the whole estate being the benefit intended by the testator there to be conferred upon the devisee; but he attempted to do that which the law will not permit him to do, namely, to prescribe the mode by which this benefit of property, during all time, was to be enjoyed by the devisee, which would be wholly inconsistent with a fee-simple interest, as well as public policy.

For the reasons assigned, the judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs to the appellees above and below.

K. Aldrach, the petitioner herein, filed her affidavit and petition in this court praying for a writ of mandate, wherein she states, in substance, the following facts: That on the 6th day of December, 1905, she duly filed her complaint against William F. Aldrach, her husband, in the district court of Salt Lake county, Utah, in which, as appears therefrom, she alleged the necessary facts which entitled her to a decree of divorce upon the grounds of wilful desertion and for wilful failure to support. She alleged her residence as being and having continued to be in Utah ever since her marriage to said Aldrach, and that she and said Aldrach were married in Utah, and were husband and wife. She further sets forth in her petition all the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the district court aforesaid in an action for divorce granted upon what is generally known as "constructive service." It further appears that due service by publication was had in conformity to the law of this state, that the defendant in said action for divorce failed to appear therein, and that C. W. Morse, the judge of said district court, the respondent herein, upon a hearing of said

tion whether, under the doctrine of the Haddock Case and other cases decided by the United States Supreme Court, a decree of divorce rendered in the action would be entitled to recognition in other states under the full-faith-and-credit clause of the Federal Constitution. For reasons stated at length in a note in 59 L.R.A. 135 et seq., that assumption seems to the present annotator to be perfectly logical and well founded in reason, and to afford a practical way of escape from the confusion, theoretical and practical, in which the whole subject has become involved. It must be conceded, however, that very little direct authority for this view is to be found in cases dealing directly with the jurisdiction in divorce, although it seems to be a logical deduction from the general doctrine established in Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, that a judgment in personam on constructive service against a nonresident is contrary to due process of law and void, even in the state where rendered. While it is true that Justice Field, who wrote the opinion in that case, suggested that a divorce suit by a resident against a nonresident might not fall within the doctrine there laid down, that suggestion was obiter, and was based upon the idea that a divorce suit is a suit in rem, and not in personam. If, however, as it seems to be assumed in the Haddock Case and is clearly held in the New York cases, a suit for a divorce is not a suit in rem, the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff seems to be clearly applicable, assuming, farther, that the constitutional provision as to due process of law applies to a divorce suit. If this position could be maintained, it is apparent that, as soon as it has been determined by the United States Supreme Court that a divorce upon constructive service under a certain state of facts is not entitled to recognition in another state under the full-faith-and-credit clause, it would follow that such a divorce would not be valid even in the state where granted; and hence, that a court of that state ought not to assume jurisdiction to grant it. Conversely, under this theory, if that court should decide, even upon direct appeal from a decree of divorce rendered by a state court, that the latter court had jurisdiction upon a given state of facts, it would follow that such decree would be entitled to recognition in other states under the full-faith-and-credit provision. In this view, therefore, upon any given state of facts, there would be theoretically no change of matrimonial status as a party to a divorce decree passes from one state to another, and no practical diversity after the jurisdiction on that state of facts had been passed upon by the United States Supreme Court, either upon a direct appeal from the decree of divorce, or from the decree of another state refusing to recognize that decree. In other words, under this theory, the same criterion of jurisdiction would be applied whether the validity of the decree in the state where rendered, or in another state, was involved. The difficulty, however, in establishing this theory, is very great from the standpoint of authority, for the reason that the very courts which go the farthest in refusing to recognize a decree of divorce rendered in another state against a nonresident upon constructive service very generally concede the validity of such decree in the state where rendered, and themselves assume jurisdiction to grant a domestic decree under exactly the same circumstances. This is notably true of the New York courts; and the Haddock Case itself seems to countenance this position, as it appears to be conceded, at least in the prevailing opinion,—although the point was not directly involved,—that the decree of divorce there involved was valid in Connecticut where it was granted, although the courts of New York were not obliged to recognize it under the full-faith-and-credit clause.

Assuming, however, for the purposes of the argument, the soundness of the premise apparently assumed by the Utah court,—that is, that the question whether the local court ought to take jurisdiction depended upon the question whether a decree, if rendered, would be entitled to recognition in other states under the full-faith-and-credit clause,—there is considerable doubt as to the correctness of its conclusion, tested by the Haddock Case and the case of Atherton v. Atherton, 181 U. S. 155, 45 L. ed. 794, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544. It will be remembered that in the Atherton Case the suit was brought by the husband in Kentucky, where both parties were domiciled prior to the cause, duly made and filed findings of fact and conclusions of law, in substance as follows: That the defendant in said action, William F. Aldrach, was duly served with summons by publication; that the petitioner and Aldrach were married at Salt Lake City, Utah, on the 24th day of May, 1893, and are husband and wife; that the petitioner, plaintiff in said action, had been and was an actual bona fide resident of Salt Lake City for more than one year immediately preceding the commencement of said action; that the petitioner and said Aldrach cohabited together as husband and wife, and lived here and had their marriage domicil in the state of Utah until September, 1904, when said Aldrach wilfully, and without cause or excuse, deserted and abandoned the petitioner, and continues to wilfully and without cause so to do; further, that said Aldrach, being able so to do, has wilfully neglected to provide for petitioner and her child, the fruit of said marriage, the necessities of life, and continues to neglect to so provide for her and said child. As conclusions of law the said court found that the petitioner, plaintiff in said action, is entitled to a decree of divorce, but con-time the wife left her husband and went to New York. It is somewhat difficult to determine from the opinion in that case whether the decision that the New York courts were bound to recognize the Kentucky decree, which was rendered on constructive service against the wife, proceeded upon the assumption and hypothesis that the wife was still constructively domiciled in Kentucky at the time the decree in that state was rendered, or upon the assumption that, although she may have subsequently acquired a valid separate domicil, yet that Kentucky was the domicil of both parties up to the time of the separation. The phrase "matrimonial domicil," employed in the opinion, might embrace either hypothesis. Upon the whole, however, and in spite of the recital in the statement of facts preceding the opinion, that the New York court found that the wife, prior to the Kentucky suit, had acquired a separate domicil in New York, the opinion seems to sustain the view that the decision was rendered upon the hypothesis that the wife, although out of Kentucky at the time, was still constructively domiciled therein, and that she had not acquired a separate legal domicil in New York; and this view of the ground of the decision in that case seems to be corroborated by the opinion in the Haddock Case.

In this view of the decision in the Atherton Case, it is apparent, as pointed out in the able brief of the amici curiæ in STATE EX REL. ALDRACH v. MORSE, that there is a vital difference whether, as in the Atherton Case, the suit is by the husband against the wife, or, as in the ALDRACH CASE, by the wife against the husband. In the former case the husband's domicil remains the constructive domicil of the wife, assuming that she was not justified in leaving him, even though she is actually residing in another state; whereas in the latter case, while the fact that the husband abandoned the wife without cause may prevent her domicil from following his, and enable her to retain or acquire a separate domicil, it certainly does not prevent the husband from acquiring a separate domicil.

The former case therefore falls within the exception—covering cases where the defendant, though absent at the time of the decree, was legally domiciled in the state where the divorce was granted—which even 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the New York courts make to the general doctrine denying recognition to a divorce granted in another state upon constructive service. See Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 217, 28 Am. Rep. 129, and other cases cited in 59 L.R.A. 163. The reason that the New York court of appeals refused to recognize the Kentucky decree in the Atherton Case was that the trial court expressly found that Mrs. Atherton (the defendant) had acquired a separate domicil in New York before the Kentucky decree. A case, however, in which the wife was plaintiff, would not fall within that exception for the reason that the husband does not take the wife's domicil, even if the circumstances are such that she can acquire or retain a separate domicil.

If, however, it were to be assumed that the decision in the Atherton Case proceeded upon the assumption that Mrs. Atherton had acquired a separate domicil in New York before the Kentucky decree was granted, and rested upon the ground that Kentucky was the last common matrimonial domicil of the parties, it would—even upon the assumption that the same criterion of jurisdiction is to be applied whether it is a question of taking jurisdiction in a domestic suit or of passing upon the validity of a decree rendered in a sister state—sustain the assumption of jurisdiction on the facts presented in STATE EX REL. ALDRACH v. MORSE.

And it may be remarked, in this connection, that there is a class of cases which, without admitting or denying under all circumstances the extraterritorial effect of a divorce rendered against a nonresident upon constructive service, apparently concede it such effect when, as in STATE EX REL. ALDRACH v. MORSE, the last common matrimonial domicil of the parties prior to their separation was in the state where the decree was rendered, notwithstanding that, prior to the commencement of the suit, one of them may have acquired a separate domicil in another state. That seems to be the principle deducible from the Pennsylvania cases,—both those involving the jurisdiction of a domestic court upon constructive service, and those involving the recognition of a decree of divorce rendered in another state upon such service. See note in 59 L.R.A. 159.

cludes, further, inasmuch as said Aldrach did not appear in said action for divorce, and was served with process by publication only, while being absent from the state of Utah, that therefore the district court had not acquired jurisdiction of said Aldrach; and upon that ground alone refused to grant petitioner the decree of divorce. It further appears from the record in said case that said Aldrach was a nonresident of the state of Utah at and prior to the time said action for divorce was commenced, and was a resident of the territory of Arizona. The foregoing is a mere skeleton or outline of the facts stated in the petition upon which the petitioner prayed that the Honorable C. W. Morse, as judge of said district court, be required to show cause to this court why a peremptory writ of mandate should not issue against him requiring him to assume jurisdiction of said action for divorce and enter a decree in favor of the petitioner upon the findings of fact and conclusions of law made and signed by him in said case. The petition is duly verified, and, upon being presented to this court, the then chief justice issued an alternative writ of mandate directed to the respondent herein, of which he duly admitted service, and in due time filed his answer thereto, in which he practically admits all the facts stated in said petition, but states that he is advised that, in virtue of a decision in the case of Haddock v. Haddock, rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States, 201 U. S. 562, 50 L. ed. 867, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525, an enforceable decree of divorce could not be rendered in a case where the service upon an absent defendant therein was by publication only, and no appearance by him was made in the case; and that upon that ground alone he refused to render a decree of divorce in the action aforesaid. The applicant will be designated "petitioner," and the judge will be styled "respondent" in this opinion.

The only question for solution upon the foregoing facts is, Should the respondent be required to assume jurisdiction of the divorce action, and, in view of the findings of fact and conclusions of law made and filed by him, as judge of the district court of Salt Lake county, proceed to a completion of said action by granting a final decree of divorce to the petitioner? It seems to us there is but one answer possible to the foregoing proposition, which must be in the affirmative. Every essential element necessary under our law, both substantive and of procedure, is present in the divorce proceeding to entitle the petitioner to a decree of divorce. Neither do we think that the case of Haddock v. Haddock, supra, can possibly be applied so that a different result could be reached. As we read that case, the one essential to confer jurisdiction upon a state court in divorce proceedings is what is denominated in that case "domicil of matrimony," and that such domicil must be within the state where the action is planted, and be with the party bringing the action. If such a domicil exists, then the state courts have full power to sever the marital relations upon constructive service in cases where statutory residence and a cause for divorce coexist.

As we view it, the pith of the whole matter is stated in Haddock v. Haddock, supra, at page 570 of 201 U. S., page 870 of 50 L. ed., page 527 of 26 Sup. Ct. Rep., where Mr. Justice White, speaking for the majority of the court, says: "Where the domicil of matrimony was in a particular state, and the husband abandons his wife and goes into another state, in order to avoid his marital obligations, such other state to which the husband has wrongfully fled does not, in the nature of things, become a new domicil of matrimony, and therefore is not to be treated as the actual or constructive domicil of the wife. Hence, the place where the wife was domiciled when so abandoned constitutes her legal domicil until a new actual domicil be by her elsewhere acquired." It is further said, at page 571 of 201 U. S., page 870 of 50 L. ed., page 528 of 26 Sup. Ct. Rep.: "So, also, it is settled that, where the domicil of a husband is in a particular state, and that state is also the domicil of matrimony, the courts of such state, having jurisdiction over the husband, may, in virtue of the duty of the wife to be at the matrimonial domicil, disregard an unjustifiable absence therefrom, and treat the wife as having her domicil in the state of the matrimonial domicil for the purpose of the dissolution of the marriage, and, as a result, have power to render a judgment dissolving the marriage, which will be binding, upon both parties and will be entitled to recognition in all other states by virtue of the full-faith-and-credit clause." If, therefore, the abandonment of the wife by the husband does not affect the domicil of matrimony, and it is this domicil that confers jurisdiction and empowers the state courts to dissolve the marriage relation as to both parties, and such a dissolution, when made, is binding upon all the states, under the full-faith-and-credit clause of the Federal Constitution, how can we avoid a conclusion in this case adverse to the petitioner? Can it reasonably be contended that the husband may obtain a dissolution binding upon all in a case where the wife deserts him, but the wife may not do so when the husband abandons the wife? This would be contending not only for an illogical, but to our minds an absurd, result. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the quotations above given, clearly points out that the fiction that the domicile of the husband is that of the wife does not apply where, as in this case, the husband has wrongfully abandoned the wife. In such a case the husband cannot draw to himself, by virtue of that fiction, the domicile of the wife; but the matrimonial—that is, the jurisdictional—domicile remains with the wife, and within the state of that domicile. In fact, this is just what is decided in the Haddock Case, as we understand it.

We remark here, as it seems to us from a close analysis of the decision in the Haddock Case, that the matters therein really decided, which at first blush seem somewhat revolutionary, as regards divorces granted on constructive service, are after all more apparent than real. The whole difficulty arises out of the fact that both bench and bar have assumed the law to be a certain way in divorce proceedings, in the absence of an authoritative declaration, which is now made for the first time by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Haddock Case. The rule established in that case, as we understand it, may, for want of a better statement, perhaps, be formulated as follows: Divorces may be granted by state courts upon constructive service where statutory cause and residence coexist, which become binding upon the parties, the courts of all states, and upon all persons: (1) In cases like the one at bar, where the parties are residents of the state at the time of the marriage, and thus establish a domicile of matrimony in that state, and the complaining party continues this domicile up to the time of the action. (2) In all cases where the parties are married out of the state, but come to reside in the state afterwards and recognize the marriage relation within the state, and thus establish a domicile of matrimony therein, and the party bringing the action continues this marital domicile up to the time of bringing the action. (3) In all cases where a statutory cause and residence coexist where personal service is had. We are not now concerned with the question of whether the courts in this state should grant divorces in cases falling within the third class, above stated, upon merely constructive service, or whether they should give force and effect to decrees of divorce when granted by courts other than the courts of this state. That is a question not presented by this record, and we are therefore not authorized to decide 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) it. It can best be determined when it is presented in the proper way.

In view of the facts presented in this case, and the law applicable thereto, we are convinced that the respondent should have granted the petitioner a decree of divorce dissolving the marital relations existing between her and her husband, and we so hold.

In concluding this opinion, we desire to make our acknowledgments to Messrs. S. R. Thurman, C. C. Dey, and A. L. Hoppaugh, whom we requested to act as friends of the court in this case, and who in that capacity have rendered us valuable service in presenting the questions involved.

It is therefore ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate be, and the same is hereby, granted, requiring respondent to assume jurisdiction of the case of Emma K. Aldrach (the petitioner herein) v. William F. Aldrach (her husband), and that the respondent vacate the conclusion of law that the district court of Salt Lake county has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant in said action, and that he substitute therefor a conclusion of law in conformity with the law as stated in this opinion, and that he enter a decree of divorce dissolving the marriage relation existing between the petitioner herein and her husband, the defendant in said action, and grant her the relief prayed for in accordance with the findings of fact made by him in said action, and the conclusion of law as modified, as hereinbefore stated.

It is not deemed necessary to issue a peremptory writ in this case,—not for the present at least,—as the respondent will, undoubtedly, act on request, upon being advised of the views expressed in this opinion, or upon being served with a copy thereof. Neither party to recover any costs in this court.

Writ allowed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

H. D. FRUEAUFF.

Municipal corporation—ordinance—trading stamps.

1. An ordinance forbidding merchants to give out trading stamps in their business is

Note.—Validity of legislation regulating or forbidding the use of trading stamps is not authorized by constitutional and statutory provisions making lotteries and gift enterprises unlawful.

Same—arbitrary definition.

2. A municipal council cannot, by arbitrarily defining the giving out of trading stamps as a gift enterprise, bring it within the statutory prohibition of such enterprises.

(January 7, 1907.)

ERROR to the County Court for the City and County of Denver to review a judgment in favor of defendant in a proceeding against him for violation of a municipal ordinance. Affirmed.

Statement by Goddard, J.:

The defendant in error, a merchant carrying on a legitimate business in the city of Denver, was charged with violating ordinance No. 62 of the series of 1904 entitled "A Bill for an Ordinance to Prohibit Gift Enterprises, Defining the Same, and Providing Penalties for the Violations of Said Ordinance," which said ordinance is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation to engage in, aid, abet, or patronize any 'gift enterprise,' as herein defined.

"Sec. 2. A 'gift enterprise,' as herein employed, is defined to be and shall include the selling, giving, presenting, or distributing of any stamp, trading stamp, coupon, or other device which shall entitle the purchaser of property, goods, wares, or merchandise to demand or receive from any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation other than the vendor any article, property, goods, wares, merchandise, or money other than that actually sold to the purchaser; or the delivery to any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation, by any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation other than the vendor of any article, property, goods, wares, merchandise, or money other than that actually sold, upon presentation of any such stamp, trading stamp, coupon, or other device; or the issuing, selling, giving, or distributing to any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation, of any stamps, trading stamp, coupon, or other device by any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation engaged in any trade, business, or profession, with the promise, express or implied, that he, they, or it will give to the person presenting to him, them, or it such stamp, trading stamp, coupon, or other device any money, or anything of value, without receiving from such person the value thereof, or make to any such person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation any concession or preference in any way on account of the presentation of such stamp, trading stamp, coupon, or other device; or the distributing or presenting by any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation engaged in any trade, business, or profession, to any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation dealing with him, them, or it any such stamp, trading stamp, coupon, or other device in consideration of any article or thing purchased of, or any service performed by, him, them, or it; or the selling or offering for sale of any real estate or article of merchandise of any description whatever, or any ticket of admission to any exhibition or performance or other place of amusement, with a promise, expressed or implied, to give or bestow, or in any manner hold out the promise of the gift or bestowal of, any article or thing for or in consideration of a purchase by any person, persons, partnership, association, or corporation, of any treated in the subject note in 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 588.

Since the publication of that note it has been held, in O'Keeffe v. Somerville, 190 Mass. 110, 112 Am. St. Rep. 316, 76 N. E. 457, that a statute providing that persons selling or giving trading stamps in connection with the sale of articles entitling the holders to receive articles other than those so sold shall pay an excise tax for carrying on such business, equivalent to 3 per cent of the gross receipts from the sale of the articles so sold, and from the trading stamps given or delivered in connection therewith,—is unconstitutional, since the right to conduct a business in the manner prescribed in the statute cannot be regarded as a "commodity," within the provision of the Constitution empowering the legislature to impose and levy reasonable duties and excises upon any produce, goods, wares, merchandise, and commodities.

But in Gamble v. Montgomery (Ala.) 39 So. 353, also decided since that note, it was held that a municipal ordinance which imposed an occupation tax of $400 upon merchants issuing trading stamps, and only $24 on merchants whose capital in business is the same, but who do not issue trading stamps, was not invalid because of the discrimination. It was also held in this case that the tax of $400 would not be held so unreasonable or prohibitive as to render the statute invalid, it appearing that the stamps issued are not available unless and until $500 worth have been accumulated, and it not appearing how many of the stamps have been redeemed. The report of the case does not show the amount of the stock carried or the total amount for sale of stamps, although it is stated that that was shown by the bill of exceptions.

other article or thing, whether the object shall be for individual gain, or for any other purpose; and the term 'gift enterprise' shall also include the premium stamp, periodical ticket, trading stamp, and similar schemes and devices wherein, by means of stamps, checks, tickets, or other device, certain merchants, manufacturers, and their customers are exploited.

"Sec. 3. Whoever shall violate any provision of this ordinance shall for each offense, on conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction, pay a fine of not less than one hundred dollars ($100.00) or more than three hundred dollars ($300.00), or be imprisoned in the common jail of the city and county of Denver for a term of not less than thirty (30) days or more than ninety (90) days, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

The case was tried to the court upon an agreed statement of facts, which, so far as necessary to a decision of the case, is as follows:

"(2) That the Sperry & Hutchinson Company is a corporation organized under the law of the state of New Jersey, and doing business in the city and county of Denver, in the state of Colorado.

"(3) That the defendant, at all of the times hereinafter mentioned, was, and now is, a resident of the city and county of Denver, and engaged in a mercantile business in the city and county of Denver, and selling and disposing of goods, wares, and merchandise at retail and otherwise, and is carrying on a large business.

"(4) That heretofore the said the Sperry & Hutchinson Company and the said H. D. Frueauff entered into a memorandum of agreement which is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Memorandum of Agreement.

"This agreement, made the — day of —, 190—, by and between the Sperry & Hutchinson Company, a corporation of the state of New Jersey (hereinafter called the Company), party of the first part, and —, a —, of —, doing a general — business at — street, —, state of —, party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That, in consideration of the mutual promises and agreements hereinafter contained, said parties agree as follows:

"Said company agrees to advertise in the directory in its trading-stamp books distributed in the city or town of —, the name, business, and aforesaid business address of the party of the second part; to deliver to the people of said city or town said books, and explain to them how to use the same; to maintain a store for the purpose of redeeming its trading stamps when issued in the regular way by the party of the second part, and others duly authorized to issue the same; to keep on exhibition in said store goods and merchandise with which to redeem said stamps when presented in said books in lots of nine hundred and ninety (990) stamps, and according to law, collected in the manner prescribed and subject to the conditions in said books, and to use its best endeavors to promote the cash sales and trade of the party of the second part.

"The party of the second part agrees to order and receive from said company its green trading stamps in lots of not less than — pads per lot, each pad containing five thousand (5,000) stamps, and to pay upon delivery thereof the sum of — dollars per pad, for the use of said stamps as an advertising medium; and agrees to supply said stamps from the aforesaid business address as an inducement for cash trade to all persons who pay cash for purchases; to give out said stamps as follows, and not otherwise to dispose of the same without the prior consent in writing of said company, viz.: To give to each customer one stamp for each and every ten cents represented in the retail price of merchandise for which cash is paid by said customer.

"Said party of the second part also agrees to display signs furnished by said company which read, 'We Give S. & H. Green Trading Stamps,' or otherwise, in the windows and other prominent places about its stores, and agrees not to procure said stamps in any way except direct from said company, either during the term of this contract or at any time; and also agrees to mention favorably the use of said stamps in all newspaper and other advertisements published by or for it; and not to use any other coupons, trading stamps, or similar device during the term of this contract, and not to join in any combination of merchants for the purpose of discontinuing the use of said company's trading stamps.

"It is mutually agreed between the parties hereto that the property in and title to said stamps and signs shall remain in the said company, and shall not in any event pass to the party of the second part, or any other person, firm, or corporation, and that this agreement shall remain in force for one year from the date of its execution, and shall be considered renewed for an equal period from year to year, unless written notice to the contrary be given by either party to the other at least thirty (30) days prior to the yearly periods of expiration; and, provided such notice be given by said company, said company may thereafter omit from its directory and advertisements the name of the party of the second part.

"It is mutually understood and agreed that this contract is made for the benefit of the public as well as of the parties hereto, and subject to legislative restriction. . . .

"That, in accordance with the provisions of said contract, the said H. D. Frueauff did order and receive from the Sperry & Hutchinson Company pad or pads of green trading stamps, each pad containing not less than 5,000 stamps, as in said contract provided, and has for some months last past and is now engaged in supplying and giving out to customers said green trading stamps, in the following manner, to wit: To each customer one stamp for each and every 10 cents represented in retail price of merchandise for which cash is paid by said customer, and that on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1904, the said defendant was thus engaged, and did give out green trading stamps to each customer who called for the same, one stamp for each and every 10 cents represented in retail price of merchandise for which cash was paid, not only to one, but to numerous, customers of the said defendant's place of business on said day; and the said defendant has not disposed of the green trading stamps so purchased from said Sperry & Hutchinson Company in any other manner; and the said defendant has also displayed, and is now displaying, and did display on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1904, signs reading, 'We give S. & H. green trading stamps,' in the window and other prominent places about his store, and has not used any other coupons or trading stamps or similar device than those mentioned in said contract. That the property in and title to said stamps so purchased as aforesaid by the said defendant from the Sperry & Hutchinson Company has at all times remained, and does now remain, in the said company, according to the terms of said contract. That prior to, at the time of, and since the making of the said contract, the said the Sperry & Hutchinson Company have distributed a book containing nine hundred and ninety (990) blank spaces, in which green trading stamps could be pasted, and containing a notice and explanation and other writing, said distribution being made in various homes, places of business, and other places in and about the city and county of Denver. That the notice contained in the said book is as follows:

" 'This book and the trading stamps which are issued by the undersigned are so issued, and are received by you, pursuant to certain restrictions concerning their use contained in the written contracts made for your benefit between the undersigned and the merchants from whom you receive the same. Neither the books nor the stamps are sold to you or the merchant, the title thereto being expressly reserved in the undersigned. They are merely loaned to you. The only right which you acquire in said stamps is to paste them in books like this and present them to us for redemption. You must not dispose of them, or make any other use of them without our consent in writing. We will in every case, where application is made to the undersigned, give you permission to turn over your stamps to any other bona fide collector of "S. & H." green trading stamps; but, if the stamps or the books are transferred without our consent, we reserve the right to restrain their use by, or take them from, other parties. It is to your interest that you fill the book, and personally derive the benefit and advantage of exchanging it for your choice of the many useful and valuable articles supplied by us.

" 'These stamps, when received by you, must be pasted in the book, as that is a method we have adopted for the purpose of preventing their further use as an advertising medium.'

"That the explanation in said book is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

" 'The object of green trading stamps is to enable the merchants who give them to sell their goods for cash instead of upon credit. By paying cash, therefore, you will be entitled to green trading stamps, one stamp for each 10 cents represented in a purchase; that is to say, the number of stamps you receive will be equal to the number of times "ten" is contained in the amount of your cash purchase.

" 'Thus green trading stamps are a benefit to both buyer and seller. The merchant saves the inevitable losses through bad accounts. He gets his money promptly, is enabled to discount his bills, and, having the cash, can buy cheaper than upon credit.

" 'By paying cash you are equally benefited. You, also, can buy cheaper. You can also obtain a discount—in the way of green trading stamps—which may be taken to our store and exchanged for an endless variety of goods.

" 'By exerting just a little care in trading where green trading stamps are given, it takes but a short time to fill a book with them (33 pages, 30 stamps on a page). The result is that, with no greater expenditure for your needs, perhaps less, you gradually accumulate a great many things, useful and ornamental, which have cost you absolutely nothing, but which you otherwise would not have possessed unless you had paid cash for them.

" 'See back page of cover for partial list of goods given for green trading stamps.

" 'The better way for you to do is to call at our local branch store and see for yourself. Make all the inquiries you desire. We sell nothing,—everything in our store is given in exchange for green trading stamps only. The attendants there have nothing to do but to show you goods and answer questions.'

"That one of said books is hereto attached, marked 'exhibit A,' and made a part hereof, and is the same kind of a book as issued to John Jones, a customer of the said defendant, to whom stamps were given on the said 10th day of December, A. D. 1904.

"On the fourth page of cover of book is the following.

" 'For many years we have made a study of the public's requirements. It is not necessary to say that we understand the importance of supplying you, so nearly as possible, with just what you desire. Nor to say that the immense quantity of goods purchased by us each year naturally places at our disposal the wares of the best manufacturers and designers in every part of the world. These facts you already understand. Be assured that, if you collect green trading stamps, you cannot fail to obtain something in exchange for them that will thoroughly satisfy you.

" 'It is hardly possible for us to enumerate, on this page, the entire line of goods which can be had in exchange for green trading stamps. Among them, however, are the following, viz

" 'Furniture, art squares, rugs, lace curtains, bookcases, vases, jardinières, onyx tables, clocks, watches, opera glasses, china, cut glass, musical instruments, lamps, carving sets, knives, forks, spoons, anything and everything in silverware, etc., etc.,

" 'Yours very respectfully,

" 'The Sperry & Hutchinson Co.'

"That the stamps so ordered and received from the Sperry & Hutchinson Company by the defendant, and used and given to the said John Jones on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1904, have no value in themselves, and that neither the book nor the stamps are the property of the defendant, and the rights of the customer receiving such stamps are defined and restricted by the 'notice' on the inside of the cover of exhibit A. That the said customers of the defendant could not take said stamps to the said Sperry & Hutchinson Company in lots of less than 990, and then only when pasted in said books, and have them redeemed, and that they are only redeemable when 990 have been received and pasted in said book, and that the said Sperry & Hutchinson Company do not and will not redeem from the 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

customers of the said defendant said green trading stamps, or any of them, unless 990 are presented and are pasted in said book. That some of said books are never filled or presented for redemption. That the said stamps consist of gummed paper, about the size of a postage stamp, the face bearing the name of said company and also the words 'green trading stamp.' Samples of, said stamps are hereto attached and made a part hereof. That the said Sperry & Hutchinson Company maintains a store at 1630 Stout street, in the city and county of Denver, where various articles of merchandise are exhibited and kept. That said articles of merchandise are marked 'One Book,' 'Two Books,' or any other number, as the case may be, which means that said article is given in redemption for the number of books marked upon the tag fastened to said article of merchandise, and the customer has an option or right of selection among said articles, when books of stamps are presented for redemption. That said contracts between the Sperry & Hutchinson Company are only made with a limited number of merchants in the same class or line of business; that is to say, stamps are not ordered or used by all of the merchants engaged in any particular class of business, but only certain ones so engaged therein, with whom the said Sperry & Hutchinson Company elect to contract. That the said stamps are given to merchants contracting with the said Sperry & Hutchinson Company at the price agreed upon by contract, this price being almost without exception $4.75 per 1,000, in thousand lots, and $4 per 1,000 in lots of 15,000. That the said Sperry & Hutchinson Company do not sell said articles of merchandise or premiums kept in their said store for cash or on credit, but they are only disposed of in redemption of said green trading stamps.

"(5) That on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1904, and succeeding days thereafter, and until the present time, the said contract between the Sperry & Hutchinson Company and the said defendant was in full force, and the said defendant had on hand a large number of stamps purchased under the provisions of said contract from said Sperry & Hutchinson, and on said dates gave and disposed of a large number of stamps to its patrons and customers, and among them to John Jones, on the said 10th day of December, A. D. 1904, and the said John Jones had in his possession one of said books in which stamps given to him by the defendant were pasted, and on said dates the said defendant was conducting his business and giving away trading stamps, and the said Sperry & Hutchinson Company were redeeming said stamps and carrying on their business in the manner and way hereinbefore set forth. That the Sperry & Hutchinson Company maintains stores and carries on its business in the same manner as hereinbefore set forth in other cities and states of the United States, and that stamps issued in Denver are redeemable at any store of said Sperry & Hutchinson Company at any place where it carries on said business, and that stamps issued at any other of the places where it carries on business are redeemable here under like terms as stamps issued here."

The county court adjudged that the ordinance "violates the Constitution of the state of Colorado and of the United States, and is absolutely void and of no effect," and defendant was discharged. To this judgment, the city and county of Denver prosecutes this writ of error.

Messrs. Milton Smith, D. L. Webb, and H. A. Lindsley, for plaintiff in error:

In states wherein the constitutional provision is tantamount to ours the courts have found no trouble in sustaining a law prohibiting a gift enterprise "of any nature" or "for any purpose," where it is not necessary to show an element of chance, but merely a gift enterprise in operation.

Goddard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this record has been considered by several of the ablest courts in this country, and has, with few exceptions, been determined adversely to the contention of the plaintiff in error. Not only has the character of legislation embodied in the ordinance in question been generally condemned, but the particular business aimed at therein has been held immune from interference under the police power of the state or municipality. The proposition announced in these cases is that legislation which purports to have been enacted to protect the public health, public morals, and public safety, and which has no real or substantial relation to those objects, is a palpable invasion of the rights guaranteed to individuals by the Federal and state Constitutions; that the legislature may not arbitrarily interfere with private business and impose unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations under the guise of protecting the public interests; and that its determination as to what is within its police power is subject to the supervision of the courts. In State v. Dalton the court had under consideration a statute which, like the ordinance before us, prohibited the use of trading stamps; and the violation of the statute upon which the prosecution was predicated was for giving and distributing with certain merchandise sold the same kind of stamps issued and redeemable in the same manner and by the same parties, to wit, the Sperry & Hutchinson Company, named in this case. In that case, after discussing the police power, and citing numerous authorities, the court concluded that the statute before it did not fall within the police power of the legislature, and was clearly an unlawful interference with a private right, because it did not look to, or in any manner concern, the public health, public safety, or the public morals, and said: "In this connection it is pertinent to observe that it is not enough to warrant the state in absolutely prohibiting a given business that it is conducted by methods which do not meet with general approval. There must be something in the methods employed which renders it injurious to the public in some one of the ways before mentioned, in order to warrant the state in interfering therewith. Nor is it enough to bring a given business within the prohibitory power of the state, that it is so conducted as to seriously interfere with, or even destroy, the business of others." After discussing the question whether the transaction there under consideration involved any element of lottery, and the method of carrying on the business which the act prohibited, the court concluded: "The element of chance, which is the basal principle of every scheme in the nature of a lottery, is wholly wanting." And, in speaking of the act there in question, the learned writer of the opinion used this language: "The act, as we construe it, prohibits a person from selling a given article, and at the same time, and as a part of the transaction, giving to the purchaser a stamp, coupon, or other device which will entitle him to receive from some third person some other well-defined article in addition to the one sold. This is equivalent to declaring that it is illegal for a man to give away one article as a premium to the buyer for having purchased another. . . . We think it is clear that such a prohibition is an unwarranted interference with the individual liberty which is guaranteed to every citizen both by our state Constitution and also by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States." And, in finally summing up, he says: "What we do decide is that the statute in question is so broad as to interfere with the right of an individual to deal with his own property in his own way; that is to say, to make such contracts regarding the sale and disposition thereof as he shall see fit, so long as he observes the rule that each one shall so use and enjoy his own property as not to injure that of another person, and, also, the further rule that his use of it shall not be injurious to the community; and hence is not a valid exercise of the legislative power."

In Young v. Com. a similar statute which inhibited the same transaction complained of here was considered. Harrison, J., after speaking in detail as to the manner in which the business of the Sperry & Hutchinson Company was conducted, said: "We can find nothing in the contract between the Sperry & Hutchinson Company and the defendant, nor the transactions with customers in pursuance of such contract, that is not a legitimate exercise of one's right to prosecute his business in his own way. As already said, 'it appears to be simply one of the many devices fallen upon in these days of sharp competition between tradespeople' to attract customers, or to induce those who have bought once to buy again, and in this respect is as innocent as any other of the many forms of advertising."

In Winston v. Beeson the court had under consideration the question as to whether dealers in trading stamps came within the provisions of an ordinance taxing gift enterprises, the business there under consideration being that of the Sperry & Hutchinson Company; in other words, whether their business, in the manner in which it was conducted, constituted a gift enterprise in the sense that those words were used in the charter. After an able and elaborate discussion as to what was meant by the term "gift enterprise," and concluding that, as generally defined and understood, it constituted "a scheme for the division and distribution of certain articles of property, to be determined by chance among those who have taken shares in the scheme," citing Black's Law Dictionary, p. 539, Bouvier's Law Dictionary, vol. 1, p. 884, Anderson's Law Dictionary, p. 488, and Lohman v. State, 81 Ind. 17, as approving that definition,—the court, speaking by Walker, J., said: "From the definitions we have already given of a lottery or scheme for the disposition or distribution of prizes or property by chance, it appears that three things must concur in order to constitute it: (1) There must be the purchase of a right; (2) the right must be a contingent one to receive something greater than that which is purchased; and (3) the contingent right must depend upon a lot or chance. We have not been able to discover any one of these elements in the plan devised by the defendant company for the conduct of its business. The right to have the stamps redeemed depends upon no contingency, chance, or lot whatsoever; the person receiving the stamps upon the purchase of goods is not in any degree deprived of his choice or will. Indeed, by the contract he is given full and free exercise of his choice and will. The right of selection among the articles kept by the stamp company, in its store is expressly given, and the stamp collector may choose the best or the most valuable, or such a one as may be most useful to him or pleasing to his taste, as he may be minded. The articles are all publicly exhibited, and, before the purchases are made or the stamps collected, any person proposing to buy and to receive the stamps from the merchant has free access to the store, where he may see and examine the goods from which his selection may be made. There is therefore no uncertainty as to the nature, character, or value of the premium, if we may so call it, with which the stamps will be redeemed. The fact that the stamps are redeemed at a place other than the one where they are issued certainly does not introduce into the scheme any element of chance. We can discern no practical difference between this arrangement of the parties and one by which the merchant agrees to discount his bills where cash is paid by his customer at the time of the purchase; and the giving of stamps redeemable at a store of another in goods to be selected by the holder, instead of an actual discount by the merchant, does not, in law, vary the case or change the real and substantial character of the transaction. The plan as outlined in the verdict [being the same as set out in the statement of facts in this case] seems to be one for advertising the merchant's business and his wares, and enabling him to sell his goods for cash instead of on time. This, it must be conceded, is an advantage to him. It is also a benefit to the customer, who practically receives a discount, and who will buy more cautiously and judiciously if he pays cash, and will spend only according to his means."

We quote thus fully from the opinion of the learned judge in that case because it is a fair, lucid, and correct statement of the trading-stamp business as conducted by the Sperry & Hutchinson Company as it is set out in the agreed statement of facts in this case, and gives a clear understanding of the character of the business sought to be inhibited by the ordinance before us, and shows that the element of chance is wholly lacking.

Counsel for plaintiff in error attempt to distinguish the case before us from the foregoing cases upon the ground that our Constitution provides: "The general assembly shall have no power to authorize lotteries or gift enterprises for any purpose, and shall pass laws to prohibit the sale of lottery or gift-enterprise tickets in this state." Const. art. 18, § 2. And § 2927, Mills's Anno. Stat. enacts that "it shall not be lawful hereafter for any person, persons, association of persons, or corporation, to engage in or otherwise promote any lottery or gift enterprise of any nature, or for any purpose whatsoever;" and making it a misdemeanor to knowingly engage in, or in any wise promote, any lottery or gift enterprise. It is contended that these provisions are broad enough to include "gift enterprises" of any nature, whether they involve the element of chance or not, and therefore justify the adoption of the ordinance in dispute. We do not think the term "gift enterprise," as used in the foregoing provisions, is susceptible of this construction. Associated as these words are in both Constitution and statute with the word "lottery," they involve, as that term does, the element of chance or hazard, and necessarily mean that character of "enterprises" which appeals to the gambling instinct, and tends to debauch public morals. This being so, there is no warrant for saying that the transaction sought to be prohibited by the ordinance under consideration comes within the category of "gift enterprises" contemplated by the Constitution or statute; and it is equally clear that the city council cannot, by arbitrarily defining the business of the trading-stamp company as such, bring it within the class of inhibited enterprises, and, under the guise of the exercise of its police power, prohibit the carrying on of that which we have seen is a legitimate business. The case of Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 512, is relied on by plaintiff in error as authorizing the legislation in question. While it is true that the decision in that case is ostensibly predicated upon the fact that the statute there considered furnished a definition of a "gift enterprise," and that it was therefore unnecessary to declare that the acts proved in the case constituted a lottery or gift enterprise, as those words were commonly used, or that the element of chance operated intentionally or directly in the scheme of the trading-stamp company, which was the same as that herein set forth, yet it will be seen that, in his reasoning, the writer of the opinion laid great stress upon the fact that the scheme there involved, according to his notion, was "the exploitation of nothing more or less than a cunning device" and

"one of the most shrewdly planned of the many devices to obtain something for nothing;" that they (the trading company) had "intervened in the legitimate business carried on in the District of Columbia between seller and buyer, not for the advantage of either, but to prey upon both," evidently regarding the scheme in itself as inimical to public morals and detrimental to the public welfare, and, while disclaiming the necessity of undertaking to specify the particular conditions in which the act under consideration might or might not apply to actual merchants in the ordinary course of competitive business, or to determine just what character of inducements by way of gift or premium may or may not be held out to purchasers at the time and as a part of their purchase, used this significant language: "That it was not intended to apply to ordinary discounts for cash, or in proportion to amounts of purchases when made by the merchant himself to his customers, may be regarded as certain; and the exercise of such power would doubtless be denied if expressly attempted. Nor can it, with reason, be said to apply to bona fide co-operative associations and the like. It is possible, also, that it might not be operative in a case where the sale of a lawful article is accompanied by a gift of something specific and certain, not attended with any element of chance, and where the gift is not the real object of the sale." It is apparent that the learned judge was of the opinion that the statute would be inoperative if it intended to apply to, and include within its definition of, "gift enterprises," a transaction involving the sale of a lawful article accompanied by a gift of something specific and certain, not accompanied by the element of chance. In other words, it is very probable that, if he had taken the same view of the business carried on by the trading-stamp company as was adopted in all of the cases above cited, wherein the same transaction was investigated, his conclusion would have been in accord with that reached in those cases. If the decision in that case is to be construed as announcing the doctrine that a legislative declaration that a business, lawful in itself, is a "gift enterprise," and is thereby rendered unlawful regardless of the fact that it wholly lacks the essential element of chance, it is at variance with the uniform current of authority; and if, as we understand it, the conclusion therein reached was because the scheme under consideration was, in the opinion of the court, obnoxious to public morals or detrimental to the public welfare, we decline to follow it, because it is directly opposed to the conclusion reached as to its character in all the cases in which the business of the trading-stamp company has been under investigation. Humes v. Ft. Smith (C. C.) 93 Fed. 857, is similar to, and follows, the Lansburgh Case. We find no other case which, when carefully considered, supports the position assumed by plaintiff in error in this case. In the view we take of the scheme of the trading-stamp company, as described in the agreed statement of facts, we are clearly of the opinion that the ordinance prohibiting it cannot be sustained, and the court below properly discharged the defendant, and its judgment will be affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

MUSCOGEE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

EAGLE & PHENIX MILLS.

(126 Ga. 210, 54 S. E. 1028.)

Covenant running with land.

1. To constitute a covenant running with the land, the covenant must have relation to the interest or estate granted, and the act to be done must concern the interest created or conveyed. A covenant running with the land relates directly to the land, and follows it into the hands of assignees. A personal covenant does not do so.

Water power—contract rights—covenant.

2. Where land abutting on a river and including its bed, in which river there was an undeveloped water power, was divided by a city into water lots which were respectively numbered, beginning with that lying furthest north, and the lots bearing even numbers were sold; and in the deed it was provided that the purchaser should build above or opposite lot No. 1 a dam with a canal or race of the character described, which canal or race should extend through the other lots; and where the deed also contained the covenant, "Said lots of even numbers and their improvements, and no other property whatsoever, to be forever liable for the payment of any damage which said city, or person or persons, or

Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

Note.—The authorities upon the question of water rights as appurtenances to mills are collected in a note to Cox v. Howell, 58 L.R.A. 487. See also the subsequent case of Murray v. Briggs, 29 Wash. 245, 69 Pac. 765, holding that a power constructed by owners of and always in connection with a mill which is dependent on it, is appurtenant to it, notwithstanding a portion of the water may be applied to irrigation purposes.

company of persons, to whom they may sell or convey any one or more of said lots of odd numbers may sustain by reason of the failure to complete said race or canal, or to keep the same and said dam in good repair,"—held, that the covenant quoted was one running with the land.

Implied grant.

3. Grants by implication are not favored.

Water power—merger.

4. Where the legislature authorized the city of Columbus to lay off water lots on the Chattahoochee river, and to dispose of them by sale or lease "for such times, and on such terms as they deemed for the interest of the city;" and where subsequently, all the water lots having been acquired by certain persons, the legislature incorporated four persons and their associates and successors as the water-lot company, conferring upon them in the charter full power "to have, hold, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain to them and their successors, lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects, of whatsoever kind, nature, or quality the same may be, and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien, or dispose of;" and provided that the "death of one or more of the directors, or parties in interest, shall at no time, or in any case, prevent, or hinder, or delay a sale or sales of the said lots, or any of them, or an interest therein, by the survivors, in the name of the corporation,"—held, that there was no legislative restriction which prevented a merger of rights running in favor of some of the lots for the benefit of others, when all became the property of one person, although before the incorporation.

Same—contract rights—restriction.

5. Nor did the action of the legislature so operate as to restrict the right of the owner of all the lots, or the corporation which it created, from making covenants or stipulations as to the rights which purchasers under them should have in regard to the amount of water or power to be used by them respectively; nor so as to require that each purchaser from such common owner should be entitled to one-nineteenth part of the water afforded by the river (19 of the lots being involved in the present controversy).

Covenant—extinguishment.

6. As a general rule, a covenant in a deed of land, restricting the mode of its use, and inserted for the benefit of adjoining land of the grantor, will be extinguished by the subsequent vesting in one person of the title to both tracts of land.

Same—merger—proof.

7. If two estates in the same property united in the same person in the same capacity, and it is contended that no merger took place, the person making such contention, if entitled so to do, must allege and prove facts negating the existence of such merger.

Grant—appurtenance.

8. One who grants a thing is deemed, also, to grant that within his ownership, without which the grant itself would be of no effect. But this rule applies only to such things as are incident to the grant and directly necessary to the enjoyment of the thing granted.

Same—water power.

9. If the right to use power from a dam has been acquired and affixed to a particular mill or parcel of real estate, it will pass by a grant of the property, with appurtenances. But, if the power was not an appurtenance of the property at the time of the grant, it will not pass as such, although the grantor had a right to make use of the power at that time.

Same—creation of appurtenances.

10. A grant of property will carry with it actual existing appurtenances, but will not create any appurtenances.

Same—pleading.

11. The allegations of the present petition fail to show such an existing appurtenance or necessary incident at the time of the grant under which the plaintiff claims as to bring the case within the rule stated above. Moreover, it seeks to determine what a person claiming to be a remote grantee from the holder of the entire title acquired, not so much by grants which the latter made, as by those which he received.

(August 13, 1906.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Muscogee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to establish certain water rights. Reversed.

Statement by Lumpkin, J.:

The Eagle & Phenix Mills filed its petition against the Muscogee Manufacturing Company, alleging substantially as follows: The state of Georgia, being the original owner of all the land in the Coweta Reserve in Muscogee county, in the year 1828 set aside 1,200 acres for a town to be called Columbus, caused the tract to be divided into streets, lots, and commons, and offered lots for sale. The tract had for its western boundary the line indicated by high-water mark on the western bank of the Chattahoochee river, being the line that separates the states of Georgia and Alabama, so that the land set apart for the town embraced the entire river. See Dawson's Compilation, 132, 470, 474. At a point within the town for a length of four blocks there was a marked descent from the natural flow of the river, which was known as "Coweta Falls." The land on the east bank of the river, not being available for either residence or business lots, was not divided into separate lots until, by the act of 1840 (Acts 1840, p. 187), the legislature authorized the mayor and council of Columbus to define Bay street and to lay off water lots fronting on that street, to extend them across the river, and to sell or lease them on such terms as might be deemed best for the interest of the city. In 1841 the city council passed a resolution stating the terms on which the water lots were to be sold. In December of that year the city granted to John H. Howard and Josephus Echols, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, all the even-numbered lots beginning with No. 2 and ending with No. 36; each being 72 feet wide. The consideration recited in the deed was $1,000 and the performance on the part of the grantees, "of the conditions hereinafter named, and for and in consideration of their bond made to said mayor and council of the city of Columbus bearing date the 13th day of June in the year aforesaid, requiring under a penalty the performance of said condition." The deed contained the following: "The said John H. Howard and Josephus Echols shall erect a suitable and sufficient and well-constructed dam across the Chattahoochee river, terminating in the eastern bank thereof, at any point on or above lot No. 1, in the aforesaid plan, plat, and survey designated, and below the north common lots, so that when said river is at its usual height five head of water may be obtained on said lot No. 1, and an increase had [the resolution of council says "an increased head"] on each of the lots below it (for the purpose of propelling machinery) by an almost level canal or race; and to construct and form a safe and well-constructed canal or race, extending from said dam through all of said lots; said dam to be so high, and said canal or race to be so capacious, that when said river falls to the lowest height at which it usually stands in very dry weather, all the water of said river may, as it runs down, pass through said canal or race; and keep said dam and race forever in good repair. Said lots of even numbers and their improvements, and no other property whatsoever, to be forever liable for the payment of any damage which said city, or any person or persons, or company of persons, to whom they may sell and convey any one or more of said lots of odd numbers, may sustain by reason of a failure to complete said race or canal, or to keep the same and said dam in good repair; and to commence in good faith and not evasively the erection of said dam and the construction of said race or canal within twelve months from the 29th day of June in the year aforesaid; and to have said dam completed and said canal or race so far completed that said five head of water may be obtained on said lot number one, and available for propelling machinery, within twenty-seven months from the date hereof; and to fully complete said canal or race within five years from the date and year last aforesaid; and, in the event of a failure to erect said dam and said race within the time limited, said lots of even numbers shall revert to said mayor and council." In 1843 the city conveyed to John H. Howard, for the expressed consideration of $5,000, all the odd-numbered lots, including numbers 1 to 37. The deed contained the following clause: "To have and to hold the right and title and interest which the said party of the first part has in and to said bargained lots and premises, together with all and singular the rights, members, and appurtenances and privileges thereunto in any wise belonging to or appertaining, so far as the same are now vested in and belonging to the said party of the first part, to him the said John H. Howard, his heirs and assigns, forever in fee simple." And also the following: "It is hereby covenanted and agreed between the parties that the said John H. Howard, his heirs and assigns, shall improve one or more of said lots, by the erection of machinery to be propelled by water, within four years from the date hereof, and that all the conditions, limitations, restrictions, and provisions of a deed made by the said party of the first part to John H. Howard and Josephus Echols, bearing date in December in the year 1841, for the lots of even numbers in said plan and survey, and shall be and are hereby made a part and parcel of the conveyance, and shall be binding upon the parties hereto, to all intents and purposes, as if the survey were herein specifically set forth." It provided for a basin at a point on some of the lots, and that the canal or race specified in the deed to Howard and Echols should terminate at this basin, and another canal or race should commence at that point and extend through the lots below it. Thus only the lots from 1 to 19 are now involved. It was also provided that the lots conveyed by this deed should revert to the city upon the same conditions as the lots of even numbers previously conveyed; and also if John H. Howard should refuse or fail to perform his contract as in this deed set out. To the change in the conditions Echols, one of the grantees of water lots of even numbers, assented in writing; and on April 21, 1845, Echols sold and conveyed all his interest in the water lots of even numbers to Howard, thus vesting the title to all the water lots in him. The Muscogee Manufacturing Company, through a number of mesne conveyances, is the successor in title of John H. Howard as to water lot No. 1. In accordance with the covenants and conditions under which he held title, John H. Howard constructed a wooden dam and canal so as to give 5 feet head of water to lot No. 1 when the river was at its usual height, and completed it in the year 1847, and then proceeded to erect a cotton mill on that lot. This dam becoming inefficient by lapse of time, the successors in title of Howard and Echols in the year 1857 constructed a new wooden dam extending across the river to a point opposite lot No. 13, and also a new retaining wall extending from lot No. 1 south to lot No. 20. This dam was replaced substantially in the same location by a wooden dam constructed in 1868. Subsequently to this time the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company was organized, and by purchase acquired title to all the water lots from No. 2 to No. 19, inclusive. In 1882, at its own expense, it constructed a stone dam immediately below the dam of 1868. In 1869 the defendant acquired title to lot No. 1, added to the buildings and improvements thereon and to the machinery employed, and operated such machinery by water power drawn from the river. Its predecessors in title first acquired the water power under the original dam constructed in 1847, and subsequently under those built in 1857 and 1868. When the defendant went into possession of lot No. 1, it operated its machinery with water power furnished by the last-mentioned dam; and when it was replaced by the dam of 1882 the defendant used water furnished thereby. The Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company, being the owners of lots Nos. 2 to 19, inclusive, did not maintain the division of the water power into 18 parts, but the power to which each lot separately would be entitled if divided was concentrated in such manner that the best results could be obtained and distributed to other localities along the aggregate area of its lots, so that the power to which it was entitled as the owner of 18 lots was not confined by an arbitrary division to each lot. In accordance with this plan, it built its factory and other buildings. Plaintiff is the successor of the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company. When the flow of the river is normal or above normal opposite the water lots, ample power is afforded to operate plaintiff's machinery without regard to the amount of water power used by the defendant on its lot No. 1; but when the flow of the river, on account of prevailing droughts or other causes, is lessened from its usual or normal amount, if the defendant takes from the canal or basin opposite lot No. 1 more water than it is entitled to have in the just proportion fixed by the original conveyance, the operation of the machinery of the plaintiff on its lots below No. 1 is seriously affected and great loss is occasioned to it.

instances of this character are cited. The defendant claims the right to take from the canal or basin opposite its lot as much water as is necessary to operate the machinery of its mills located thereon. The plaintiff contends that the defendant is entitled only to use one nineteenth of the whole power generated by a 5-foot head of water made by the entire flow of the river when at its usual height or normal condition, or less than one nineteenth; and that there should be a diminution of the head of water on lot No. 1 in proportion to the diminution of the flow of the river below its normal state, and an increase of the head of water on lot No. 1 in proportion to an increase of the flow of the river above its normal state. Plaintiff prayed for an injunction and damages. The defendant demurred to the petition. The demurrer was overruled, and it excepted.

Mr. Charlton E. Battle also for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's petition does not rest upon the general law of riparian rights, but upon contractual rights. It claims that there were certain covenants running with the land, embraced in the deeds from the mayor and council of Columbus to John H. Howard and Josephus Echols and to John H. Howard. In the deed to Howard and Echols, executed in 1841, conveying the lots of even numbers, there was an agreement or covenant that the grantees should erect a suitable and sufficient dam across the river at a point on or above lot No. 1, "so that when said river is at its usual height 5 feet head of water may be obtained on lot No. 1, and an increase had [in the resolutions of the municipal council the expression is, and an increased head] on each of the lots below it (for the purpose of propelling machinery) by an almost level canal or race; and to construct a firm and safe and well-constructed canal or race extending from said dam through all of said lots; said dam to be so high, and said canal or race to be so capacious, that when said river falls to the lowest height at which it usually stands in very dry weather, all the water of said river may, as it runs down, pass through said canal or race; and keep said dam or race forever in good repair." The deed also provided that the grantees should commence the erection of the dam and the construction of the race within twelve months, and have the dam completed and the canal or race so far completed that "a 5-feet head of water" might be obtained on lot No. 1, available for propelling machinery, within twenty-seven months from the date of the deed, and that the canal or race should be fully completed within five years; and there was a condition subsequent that, in the event of a failure to construct the dam and race within the time limited, the lots so conveyed should revert to the mayor and council. The resolutions of the council also required that a bond should be given conditioned for the completion of the dam and the construction of the canal or race to lot No. 1 within the time named. It is evident that, relatively to them, what they wished to have guaranteed was that a dam and race of a certain character should be constructed within a certain time. They did not require that manufactories should be built, or improvements or machinery should be placed, upon any of the lots; but they doubtless took it for granted that the building of a dam and race would be followed by the construction of some character of machinery. They also retained the title to the odd-numbered lots, which it was most probably believed could be sold to persons who would wish to utilize them after the construction of the dam and race. It is alleged in the petition that they were constructed in accordance with the covenants, and it does not appear that the municipal authorities ever complained. So far, therefore, as that portion of the agreement directly affecting the mayor and council is concerned, we need not give it further consideration.

There was also this covenant: "Said lots of even numbers and their improvements, and no other property whatsoever, to be forever liable for the payment of any damage which said city, or any person or persons, or company of persons, to whom they may sell and convey any one or more of said lots of odd numbers, may sustain by reason of a failure to complete said race or canal, or to keep the same and said dam in good repair." This contained a covenant running with the land. Howard Mfg. Co. v. Water Lot Co. 53 Ga. 689; Colquitt v. Howard, 11 Ga. 568. As to the distinction between a personal covenant and one running with the land, see Spencer's Case, 5 Coke, 16, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 174; Wilcox v. Kehoe, 124 Ga. 484, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 466, 52 S. E. 896; Atlanta, K. & N. R. Co. v. McKinney, 124 Ga. 929, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436, 110 Am. St. Rep. 215, 53 S. E. 701; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 190, p. 158; Atlanta Consol. Street R. Co. v. Jackson, 108 Ga. 638, 34 S. E. 184. We are not prepared to hold, however, that the covenant relied on can be extended by implication to the limits claimed by the plaintiff. Grants by implication are not favored. Civil Code 1895, § 3675 (7); McDonough v. Martin, 88 Ga. 680, 681, 18 L.R.A. 343, 16 S. E. 59; 3 Farnham, Waters, § 774; Hoard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 123 U. S. 222, 31 L. ed. 130, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 74; Wabash & E. Canal v. Brett, 25 Ind. 410; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. 8 Wall. 276, 19 L. ed. 349. The rule as to appurtenances and necessary incidents will be considered later. Controversies growing out of these water lots have been several times before this court, and the plaintiff in error contends that the decisions are authority for the claims now asserted by it. But an examination of those decisions will show that they were not based on a construction of the original deeds to Howard and Echols and to Howard, but involved deeds made by subsequent holders of some of the water lots and the particular provisions in them. See Colquitt v. Howard, 11 Ga. 556; Water Lot Co. v. Leonard, 30 Ga. 577; Howard Mfg. Co. v. Water Lot Co. 53 Ga. 689; Moses v. Eagle & P. Mfg. Co. 62 Ga. 455.

It is contended that, under the general scheme evidenced by the acts of the legislature and the action of the municipal council, each water lot was impressed with rights as claimed in the petition. It will be observed, however, that the act of 1840 authorized the municipal authorities of Columbus to dispose of the water lots by sale or lease, "for such time and on such terms as they may deem for the interest of said city." Thus the terms on which such disposition might be made were not fixed by the legislature, but left entirely to the mayor and council. The charter granted by the legislature will be mentioned later. The mayor and council first conveyed the lots bearing even numbers to Howard and Echols, and the deed included a covenant running with the land, as already stated. Subsequently they conveyed the lots bearing odd numbers to Howard. Later Echols conveyed all of his interest to Howard, and all of the lots became the property of the latter. Thus the title and the covenant running with the land both found their way into the hands of the same person; so that it may be said that some of his lots were encumbered with a covenant for the benefit of others of his lots. He stood practically in the situation of both covenantor and covenantee. If he violated the covenant in favor of some of his property, other parts of his property were liable for the breach. As the owner of the whole, in case of a breach of the covenant, he would have been both plaintiff and defendant in its enforcement. What was the result of such a condition? In Post v. Weil, 115 N. Y. 361, 5 L.R.A. 422, 12 Am. St. Rep. 809, 22 N. E. 145, it is said: "A covenant in a deed of land restricting the mode of its use, and inserted for the benefit of adjoining land of the grantor, will be extinguished by the subsequent vesting in one person of the title to both tracts of land." Bouvier (Law Dictionary, word "Merger," subtitle "Of rights") says: "Rights are said to be merged when the same person who is bound to pay is also entitled to receive. This is more properly called a confusion of rights, or extinguishment." See also Rawle, Covenants, 5th ed. § 223; Sibley v. Beard, 5 Ga. 550; Fields v. Willingham, 49 Ga. 344; Willis v. McGough, 56 Ga. 198; Civil Code 1895, § 3106; Goodell v. Bennett, 22 Wis. 565; Brown v. Metz, 33 Ill. 339, 85 Am. Dec. 277; Silverman v. Loomis, 104 Ill. 137; Waterbury v. Head, 12 N. Y. S. R. 361. Analogous to this principle is the rule that, by the union of the dominant and servient estates in one person, the easement is extinguished. On this subject, in Washburn on Easements, 4th ed. 684 (*517), it is said: "As no one can be said to use one part of his own estate adversely to another part, the proposition is universally true that, if the owner of one of the estates, whether dominant or servient, becomes the owner of the other, the servitude which one owes to the other is merged in such ownership, and thereby extinguished." On page 685 (*518) it is said: But, where there is a union of an absolute title to and possession of the dominant and servient estates in the same person, it operates to extinguish any such easement absolutely and forever, for the single reason that no man can have an easement in his own land." See also Hathorn v. Stinson, 10 Me. 224, 25 Am. Dec. 228; Hall v. Lawrence, 2 R. I. 218, 57 Am. Dec. 715; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. 273. It is contended that a merger does not take place where the person holding two estates intends that it shall not do so. The Civil Code of 1895 declares as follows (§ 3106): "If two estates in the same property unite in the same person in his individual capacity, the less estate is merged in the greater." § 3107: "As a general rule a party cannot hold a lien on his own property; but the owner of property subject to a lien created or imposed against the property by another may protect himself by purchasing the lien for levy on other property, or to hold it as a claim against the person liable to pay the same." In Knowles v. Lawton, 18 Ga. 476, 63 Am. Dec. 290, it was held that, "if the holder of the equity of redemption takes an assignment of the mortgage which is in the process of foreclosure, and goes on with the suit of foreclosure, his intention, it is to be presumed, is that the equity of redemption shall not merge in the legal estate; and therefore the equity of redemption does not merge in the legal estate." This decision was rendered prior to the adoption of the Code; but the principle that a merger of an equity of redemption into a legal estate may be prevented,—and whether it occurs depends to a considerable extent on the intention of the person in whom the two estates meet,—has been carried forward into decisions rendered since the Code went into effect. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

See Marshall v. Dixon, 82 Ga. 436, 9 S. E. 167; Ferris v. Van Ingen, 110 Ga. 111, 35 S. E. 347 (where it was held that the intention that there should be no merger was a necessary deduction from the writings themselves); Coleman & B. Co. v. Rice, 115 Ga. 510, 42 S. E. 5. But, "if two estates in the same property unite in the same person in the same capacity, the lesser estate is merged in the greater, unless there is a manifest intention that such merger shall not take place." Goodell v. Hall, 112 Ga. 435, 37 S. E. 725; Jackson v. Tift, 15 Ga. 557; Woodside v. Lippold, 113 Ga. 877, 84 Am. St. Rep. 287, 39 S. E. 400; Clay v. Banks, 71 Ga. 363; Luquire v. Lee, 121 Ga. 633, 49 S. E. 834. And, where it is manifest that the person in whom the two estates meet intends that the merger shall take place, it cannot be defeated by other parties. Wilder v. Holland, 102 Ga. 46, 29 S. E. 134. In its petition the plaintiff shows that it practically deals with its property upon this basis, so far as there may rest upon some of its lots a covenant for the benefit of others; for it alleges that it is the owner of the entire power which would belong to each of the 18 lots held by it, and it employs this power, not upon the respective lots, but concentrated at different points upon the entire property, as it deems best; thus claiming the right, as the owner of 18 lots, to deal with them as it pleases in respect to the matter of water power inter sese. If it may do so, why had not Howard the same right while all the lots belonged to him? We perceive nothing in the petition to show that he intended that there should not be a merger, or what the French law, borrowing from the civil law, terms "a confusion." Under the original deed to Howard and Echols it was provided that the dam should be built terminating at any point on or above lot No. 1. It appears that the original dam was constructed at that point, but the later dams have all been built lower down the stream; that of 1857 being at a point opposite lot No. 13, and the present dam, which was erected by the predecessor of the plaintiff, being still somewhat further down. It appears, therefore, that the successors in title of Howard, including the plaintiff, have not felt themselves to be bound literally by the terms of the original deed,—at least so far as the location of the dam is concerned. Howard, while owning all the lots, first built a cotton mill on lot No. 1. In conveying the other lots he certainly could have made a reservation as to the amount of water to be used by his own mill; and, even if it should be conceded that there was an original covenant providing that lot No. 1 should only enjoy the use of one-nineteenth part of the water power or less, there is nothing to indicate that he intended to keep this restriction open and prevent a merger, so as to limit the use of water by himself in his own mill as against persons buying lots from him further down the stream. What covenants or restrictions he actually made would appear from his deed; but there is an entire silence in the petition on that subject. We do not mean to say that it was impossible to prevent a merger in Howard, or to carry forward the covenants in the deeds from the city. In a case involving a somewhat similar question (White v. Amsden, 67 Vt. 1, 30 Atl. 972), it was held, under the facts and the practical dealings between the parties, that there was no merger, or, at least, that certain by-laws antedating the union of the estates were carried forward into subsequent conveyances. See also Simmons v. Cloonan, 81 N. Y. 557; Albee v. Huntley, 56 Vt. 454. But, if the plaintiff relied on the claim that no merger or extinguishment took place when title to all the lots was united in Howard, it carried the burden of alleging facts which would negative such a merger. There is no allegation of any such fact, no statement of the provisions or covenants in deeds made by Howard, and none as to what plaintiff's own deeds contained. It does not even appear whether he first conveyed lot No. 1 or those of higher numbers. So far as the facts are alleged, they tend to support the theory of merger rather than to oppose it. As to the claim that there was a legislative intent to preserve the status of these lots, respectively, as originally laid out and sold by the city, the grant of authority to the city has already been mentioned. It may also be noted that on December 27, 1845, the legislature incorporated Howard and others as owners of the water lots, under the name of the Water Lot Company of the City of Columbus, "in order to conduct their affairs and carry on their operations with greater facility." The incorporators were made able and capable in law "to have, hold, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain to them and their successors, lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects, of whatsoever kind, nature, or quality the same may be, and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien, or dispose of;" and it was provided that the "death of one or more of the directors, or parties in interest, shall at no time, or in any case, prevent, or hinder, or delay a sale or sales of the said lots, or any of them, or an interest therein, by the survivors, in the name of the corporation." Acts 1845, p. 123. The italics are ours. This charter was amended on November 16, 1866; and, among other things, it was declared that the president and directors should "manage the entire business of the corporation in such manner as they shall deem most expedient to develop the water power owned by said company," and that "all deeds or contracts made by or with the Water Lot Company as heretofore organized shall be of like force and effect as though made under this amended charter." Acts 1866, p. 211. The putting of this property in the hands of a corporation with these broad powers indicates no legislative intention to place restrictions upon the use of water by the owners of different lots otherwise than as might be agreed on between the company and purchasers.

The petition before us is drawn with much skill and ability; but a careful analysis will disclose that it rests on an erroneous basis. It sets out what were the conveyances prior to the union of the title to the entire property in Howard, and then assumes that he should or must have conveyed land on the same terms as to the right to use water. It merely alleges that he built a mill on lot No. 1, and that by means conveyances this lot passed to the defendant; and, as to the other lots, it alleges that, subsequently to the construction of the dam in 1868, the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company was organized, and, "by purchase, acquired title to all the water lots from No. 2 to No. 19, inclusive, . . . and being successors in title to John H. Howard and Josephus Echols, and being bound by the covenants and agreements set out in the original deeds of conveyance to Howard and Echols," it constructed a stone dam, and also that the plaintiff "is the immediate successor in title of the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company, that it owns water lots from No. 2 to No. 19, inclusive." When Howard became the owner of the entire property, including the water power, it is perfectly clear that he was not obliged to sell at all, either the whole or any part of it. He could have retained all of the property and utilized it as he deemed best. The requirement in the deed to him was that he should improve one or more of the lots within four years by erecting machinery to be propelled by water. If he sold off some of the property, no reason is apparent why he could not have provided in his conveyance the extent of the right to use water which the purchaser should have; and, if he did so, the purchaser would take subject to such restrictions. Suppose, for instance, he had thought that more than one-nineteenth part of the water power was necessary for the operation of the mill, why could he not have reserved what he considered necessary, or have limited the amount of water to be used by his grantee?

And, if he did so, can it be contended that the grantee would be entitled to more than the conveyance included? The real question to be determined is, not what Howard might have conveyed, or even what he should have conveyed, but, What did he convey, and what did the plaintiff acquire under the conveyance or conveyances made by him or his successors? To attempt to hold that the plaintiff acquired certain rights, including the right to use one-nineteenth part of the water which the river or the pond resulting from the dam afforded, under the conveyances from Howard, without reference to those conveyances themselves, either alone or in connection with the previous conveyances and attendant circumstances, would be little more than a guess in the dark. In effect, what we are asked to do by this petition is to determine that the plaintiff, as holder under a chain of conveyances beginning with Howard, acquired certain rights and privileges, without any reference to what Howard in fact conveyed, but by reference to the deeds under which he acquired the entire property. In other words, to declare what rights Howard's remote grantees acquired, not by considering the grants from him, but solely the grants to him. As an illustration of the great difference in rights which may have arisen according to the provisions contained in the deeds intervening between Howard and the present plaintiff, two cases only need be cited. Thus, in Water Lot Co. v. Leonard, 30 Ga. 560, 572, the covenant in the deed then under construction provided that the vendor would "so finish all the eyes in the canal or reservoir as to furnish and contain in said canal water in sufficient quantity to propel the machinery placed and erected on lot No. 11, by Leonard." It was held that the true interpretation of the deed was that, if the canal was completed and the eyes or gates at its mouth were so finished or constructed as to permit the water from the river to flow freely and without interruption into the canal, and the balance of the eyes so finished as to prevent the escape of the water from it, except as it was intended that it should, and the race or wasteway was blasted out (except as to blasting out the race opposite to lots Nos. 11 and 12, which the grantee was to do), then the canal would furnish and contain sufficient water to propel the machinery; but "there was no covenant against great drought or unusual and excessive low stages of the water in the river." Again in Moses v. Eagle & P. Mfg. Co. 62 Ga. 455, an execution in favor of Leonard against the Water Lot Company was levied on certain of the water lots, and a claim was interposed by the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company, which the present petition alleges was the immediate predecessor in title of the plaintiff. It was held that the deed under which the claimant asserted title did not convey an absolute estate in fee to the entire water lots therein referred to, but only up to a certain line, with an easement to use the water beyond it, leaving the fee in the grantor to the remainder of the river bed up to the Alabama line. These deeds are not set out in the record or before us in the present case, but the decisions are cited to show how different may be the rights of the present plaintiff according to the conveyances under which it holds, and that it is not sufficient to establish those rights to merely show what was contained in the deeds antedating the ownership of the entire property by Howard. In Gray v. Saco Water Power Co. 85 Me. 526, 27 Atl. 455, it was said: "Water rights acquired by grant, and not by ownership of the soil through which the water flows, depend upon the intention of the parties as expressed in the deed taken, in connection with their situation and the subject-matter of their transaction at the time of the conveyance."

In further illustration of this subject, it is said in 3 Farnham on Waters, § 753, page 2274. "The power which may be developed is dependent upon the height of the volume of water above the point of discharge, which is termed the head, and upon the amount which is available for use, which is usually measured by what will pass through an aperture of given dimensions." In Gray v. Saco Water Power Co. 85 Me. 528, 27 Atl. 455, it is said: "Grants and reservations relating to water and water power are various in their nature and effect. Some refer to a certain extent of water power sufficient for the propulsion of a specific mill or machinery. Warner v. Cushman, 82 Me. 168, 19 Atl. 159; Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 177, 66 Am. Dec. 219; Covel v. Hart, 56 Me. 518; Elliot v. Shepherd, 25 Me. 371. Some to a quantity of water to be restricted to a specific purpose. Deshon v. Porter, 38 Me. 293. Others to 'such a quantity of water as the grantor or his predecessor has been accustomed to use.' Avon Mfg. Co. v. Andrews, 30 Conn. 476. Still others to such a quantity of water as will flow through a gate of specific dimensions under a specific head of water. Bardwell v. Ames, 22 Pick. 333; Tourtellot v. Phelps, 4 Gray, 373. 'Head' is a well-known material factor in determining the quantity of water which will pass through a given aperture in a given time. Eubanks, Hydraulics, 38; Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Hill, 15 Wall. 94, 102, 21 L. ed. 64, 68." Various other forms of expression are also used in such grants. Sometimes the amount of water to be taken is referred to as so many square inches of water, referring to the size of the aperture. If the grant measures the water right by the aperture merely, it has been held that it will not prevent a change of the head under which the water is delivered. Gray v. Saco Water Power Co. supra. And it has also been declared that, although a conveyance of a mill site and the right to a certain number of inches of water describes the lot by metes and bounds, and fixes the river boundary of the lot at low-water mark, this does not limit the head of the water power so as to prevent the grantee from excavating his tailrace below the then low-water mark. Forrest Mill Co. v. Cedar Falls Mill Co. 103 Iowa, 619, 72 N. W. 1076. Where the description is by the head and aperture or gate method, it is evident that both the head and the size of the aperture enter into a determination of the amount of water taken; and, if a grant specifying the size of the opening or gate does not place a limitation upon a change of head, it may well be doubted whether a specification of the head alone acts also as a limitation upon the size of the aperture or gate,—at least unless the size of such opening operates to destroy the head stipulated for.

Perhaps we might content ourselves with stopping at this point; but, as certain other questions have been urged in argument, it is not inappropriate that we should refer briefly to some of them. It is contended that the petition shows the plaintiff to be entitled to the rights asserted by it under the principle that whoever grants a thing is deemed also to grant that without which the grant itself would be of no effect. This principle is undoubtedly sound and well established. Familiar illustrations of its application are where a man, having a close surrounded with his land, grants the close, the grantee shall have a way over the land as incident to the grant; and if one grants the fish in his pond, this includes the power to come upon the banks and fish for them; and, where minerals are granted, it is presumed that they are to be enjoyed, and that the power to get them is also granted as a necessary incident. The rule, however, applies only to such things as are incident to the grant and directly necessary to the enjoyment of the thing granted. So, a way of necessity is limited by the necessity for it, and ceases with the termination of such necessity; and one to whom the fish in a pond has been granted, while having the right to take the fish by hooks, nets, or other devices, would not have the right to cut the banks of the pond for the purpose of draining it, and thus taking the fish. Broom, Legal Maxims, 7th Eng. ed. 357, 360. In the present case the plaintiff alleges that it is in possession of valuable water power, and "at such times as the flow of the river is in a normal condition and above, opposite to the water lots, that ample power is afforded it to operate its machinery on the water lots it owns, without regard to the amount of water power used by the defendant on its lot No. 1," and that it is only under abnormal conditions, occasioned by continued droughts, that it is affected. The allegations of the petition fail to show distinctly what Howard conveyed or what the plaintiff acquired by conveyances under him, and fail affirmatively to allege that the flow of water for which the plaintiff now contends was a necessary incident to any grant from Howard. Closely akin to, and to some extent overlapping, the principle above referred to is another which it is urged applies to this case, namely, that the grant of real estate includes a grant of existing appurtenances and easements. In Wheeldon v. Burrows, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 31, 49, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 853, Thesiger, L. J., in a case involving the rights of the parties to the grant of part of a tenement, said: "I think that two propositions may be stated as what I may call the general rules governing cases of this kind. The first of these rules is that, on the grant by the owner of a tenement of part of that tenement as it is then used and enjoyed, there will pass to the grantee all those continuous and apparent easements (by which, of course, I mean quasi easements); or, in other words, all those easements which are necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property granted, and which have been and are at the time of the grant used by the owners of the entirety for the benefit of the part granted." In a note to Mason v. Horton, 48 Am. St. Rep. 817, on page 821, the rule (or that branch of it applicable to a grant by an owner of the entire property) is thus stated: "Where the owner of an estate imposes upon one part an apparent and obvious servitude in favor of another, and at the time of the severance of ownership such servitude is in use, and is reasonably necessary for the fair enjoyment of the other, then, whether the severance is by voluntary alienation or by judicial proceedings, the use is continued by operation of the law." In 3 Farnham on Waters, § 747, page 2207, it is said: "If the right to use power from a dam has been acquired and affixed to a particular mill or parcel of real estate, it will pass by a grant of the property of the grantor with 'appurtenances.' But, if the power was not an appurtenance of the property at the time of the grant, it will not pass as such, although the grantor had a right to make use of the power at the time of the grant. A mere grant of the property will not create any appurtenances." See also, on this subject, United States v. Appleton, 1 Sumn. 492, Fed. Cas. No. 14,463; Pray v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. 38 N. H. 442; Forrest Mill. Co. v. Cedar Falls Mill. Co. supra; Towaliga Falls Power Co. v. McElroy, 124 Ga. 1014, 53 S. E. 682; Hathorn v. Stinson, 10 Me. 224, 25 Am. Dec. 228; Gayetty v. Bethune, 14 Mass. 49, 7 Am. Dec. 190; Dexter Sulphite Pulp & Paper Co. v. Frontenac Paper Co. 20 Misc. 442, 46 N. Y. Supp. 363.

It is contended that easements and things appurtenant pass by deed, though the word "appurtenances" may not be used, including what is in use for the land as an incident or appurtenance at the time of the conveyance. See Devlin, Deeds, 2d ed. § 363; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 522, note 1; 14 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1184; Gould, Waters, 3d ed. §§ 306, 307; 3 Farnham, Waters, §§ 777, 778. The difficulty with the petition under consideration is that it does not measure up to the rules on which the plaintiff relies. The allegations of the petition fail to show such an existing appurtenance or necessary incident at the time that Howard conveyed the lots now claimed by the plaintiff, or, indeed, at any time when a conveyance was made under which the plaintiff claims, as to meet the requirements of the rules of law invoked.

We do not deem it necessary to enter into a discussion of riparian rights which may be acquired by owners of land bordering upon artificial channels, nor the partition of water powers owned in common; nor of rights which may be acquired in connection with manufactories located upon a canal or system for supplying water created by authority of the legislature. Augusta v. Lombard, 93 Ga. 284, 20 S. E. 312. The case made does not require it.

Viewed in the light of the principle above discussed, the plaintiff's petition does not show that it has the right alleged by it, and it was therefore demurrable. It is only necessary to add that the allegations as to damages are entirely too general and indefinite, if the petition could otherwise withstand the demurrer. It seeks not only injunction, but a recovery of damages. But its allegations on that subject are wanting in sufficient specification.

Judgment reversed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ROY ALDRICH, Plff. in Err.,

v.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

(224 Ill. 622, 79 N. E. 964.)

Larceny—fraud.

1. The rule that, if the owner of goods parts with both the possession and title to another, not expecting their return or disposition in accordance with his directions, the one receiving them is not guilty of larceny, although he procures them by fraud, does not apply where the property is obtained from a transportation company having custody of it merely as bailee, by one wrongfully claiming title to it.

Same—delivery of possession.

2. The mere turning over by a transportation company, upon the mistaken supposition that he is entitled to its possession, of baggage to one claiming it, is not such a consent to the latter's possession as will prevent his being liable for larceny in case he has not such right.

Same—transposition of baggage checks.

3. One who wrongfully obtains from a transportation company possession of baggage to which he is not entitled, by placing the wrong check on it with intent to appropriate it to his own use, is guilty of larceny.

(December 22, 1906.)

Case Note.—Larceny; effect of consent of bailee, agent, or servant to taking of property: —In Queen v. Prince, L. R. 1 C. C. 150, it was held that, where the servant is intrusted with the possession of the goods for a special purpose, and has no authority to part with the property in the goods, except for that special purpose, the person who, by fraud, obtains the property from the servant, is guilty of larceny; but, where the servant has a general authority to conduct the business and to part with the property, the person obtaining the goods by fraud would not be guilty of larceny.

This appears to be the general rule governing cases where the taker obtains the goods from the bailee, agent, or servant by fraud or deceit.

Thus, in Rex v. Jackson, 1 Moody, C. C. 119, where a pawnbroker's servant, who had general authority to act in his business, delivered up a pledge to the pawnbroker, on receiving a parcel from the latter which he supposed contained diamonds he had just seen in the pawnbroker's possession in a similar package, when in fact it contained stones of very little value, it was held that, because the servant, who had a general authority from the master, parted with the property and ownership, the prisoner was not guilty of larceny.

In Shipply v. People, 86 N. Y. 375, 40 Am. Rep. 551, it was held that, where the owner of goods placed them in the hands of ERROR to the Criminal Court for Cook County to review a judgment convicting defendant of larceny. Affirmed.

Statement by Vickers, J.:

The record in this case brings up for review the judgment of conviction of Roy Aldrich for the crime of larceny.

The facts developed on the trial were, in substance, as follows: In July, 1905, Miss Flora May Barr checked her trunk at Grand Haven, Michigan, for Chicago, and took passage on one of the steamships belonging to the Goodrich Transportation Company. She left Grand Haven about 9:15 on the evening of July 10th, and arrived at Chicago about 8 o'clock on the morning of the 11th. At Chicago Miss Barr gave the check for her trunk to a transfer company, with instructions to transfer it to the Burlington depot and recheck it to Oakland, Cal., which was done. Miss Barr saw the baggageman attach the check to her trunk at Grand Haven, where she received a duplicate check, but she did not see the trunk again before leaving Chicago for Oakland. Upon her arrival at Oakland she gave her trunk check to a transfer company, with instructions to deliver the trunk to her at the place where she intended to stop. When the trunk was brought to her she at once discovered that it was not her trunk. She refused to receive the trunk, although it had a check attached to it corresponding to the one which she had received for her trunk at Chicago. The trunk which was sent to Oakland was a zinc-covered trunk with an oval top, while Miss Barr's trunk was a canvas-covered trunk and of a different shape. Miss Barr's trunk contained bean expressman or public carrier with directions to deliver them to defendant on receiving pay therefor, and the defendant, knowing that it was only by payment of money that he would be entitled to the goods, nevertheless received them from the expressman and sent him back to the owner with a worthless check, he was guilty of larceny. It appeared that the expressman acted in good faith, believing that he had authority to deliver the goods for the check.

In Queen v. Stewart, 1 Cox, C. C. 174, the facts were very similar to those in the preceding case, and the ruling was the same.

And so it was held in Rex v. Small, 8 Car. & P. 46, and Reg. v. Webb, 5 Cox, C. C. 154, where the servant who was sent with the goods was instructed to deliver them for cash, and the accused accepted them, giving counterfeit money to the servant, who believed the same to be good.

In Reg. v. Robins, Dears. C. C. 418, it was held that the prisoner was properly convicted of larceny where, by a false statement, he induced the servant who had the care of the property to allow him to remove a part of it, which he carried away and appropriated to his own use.

In Reg. v. Little, 10 Cox, C. C. 559, where goods were intrusted to a cartman for delivery to a certain person, but he delivered them to another person, who claimed to be the consignee, and who appropriated them to his own use, it was held that the latter person was guilty of larceny.

Where fraud on the part of the taker does not appear, and it does appear that he honestly believed that the owner's agent had authority to consent to the taking, the felonious intent necessary to sustain a conviction is wanting.

Thus, in Fetkenhauer v. State, 112 Wis. 491, 88 N. W. 294, it was held that, if the overseer of the farm from which the accused took the property gave him permission to take it and convert it to his own use, and he honestly believed that the overseer had authority to give such permission, and he took and used it in pursuance of such permission, then there was no felonious intent. In this case the defendant swore that he had the permission of the overseer, and the overseer would not swear that he had not given such permission, and there was no evidence that he was acting as an accessory.

And in Heskey v. State, 18 Tex. App. 275, where defendant proved that he took and used the property publicly, after being told to take it, by one who professed to be the agent of the owner and who promised to procure and send him a bill of sale for it, and that he wrote the professed agent for the bill of sale, it was held that the trial court should have charged the jury that, whether or not the party professing to be agent had authority to sell the property, if the defendant really believed that he did have, the jury should acquit.

But where the taker had reason to know that the bailee or servant had no authority to consent to the taking, he cannot defend on the ground that he actually had such consent.

Thus, in State v. McCarty, 17 Minn. 76, Gil. 54; it was held that, if the property was taken without the consent of the owner, the taking involved a trespass notwithstanding a servant who had the custody thereof consented to the taking. In this case the accused probably knew that the servant had no authority to give consent, and the servant was probably guilty of embezzlement.

In Oakley v. State, 40 Ala. 372, it was held that the consent of the bailee to the larceny or asportation of the chattels bailed to him cannot take away from the transaction its character of larceny, unless it was given by the authority of the owner. In this case there was no actual delivery by the bailee, but he probably knew that the property was going to be stolen.

As to the effect of the owner's intentional facilitating the taking, see case note to Topolewski v. State, ante, 756.

tween $300 and $400 worth of wearing apparel and other articles of value which she intended to take with her on her summer trip to California, while the trunk which was brought to her at Oakland was afterwards found to contain nothing except waste paper and rubbish. She immediately notified the Goodrich Transportation Company of the loss of her trunk, and shipped the empty trunk back to Chicago. The Goodrich Transportation Company instituted a search for the missing trunk. About a week or ten days after Miss Barr passed through Chicago an unknown man appeared at the baggage room of the Goodrich Transportation Company in Chicago with two trunks, bought a ticket and checked the trunks to Milwaukee. The servants of the transportation company, in handling the two trunks, discovered that they were apparently empty,—at least they were very light. It was also noticed that both of these trunks had the locks broken and that they were fastened with ropes or straps. When the boat arrived at Milwaukee plaintiff in error presented two checks and demanded the two trunks. The employees in charge of the boat, suspecting that this transaction might not be all right, refused to deliver the trunks to Aldrich in Milwaukee, but agreed to recheck them for him back to Chicago, which they did. The trunks were not called for after their return to Chicago for several days. Finally plaintiff in error presented checks and demanded the two trunks. The transportation company again refused to deliver the trunks to plaintiff in error. Plaintiff in error called a second time and demanded the trunks, and threatened legal proceedings unless they were delivered to him. In the meantime one of the trunks had been positively identified as Miss Barr's lost trunk. It was afterwards learned that a man by the name of Frank Bushre had hauled the two empty trunks from a room occupied by plaintiff in error in a house at 128 Dearborn avenue, Chicago. It is also shown that plaintiff in error and a woman known as "Daisy Dean" occupied the room from which the trunks were obtained by Bushre. Plaintiff in error was then arrested on a charge of larceny of the Barr trunk and its contents. In the room occupied by plaintiff in error and the woman were found substantially all of the articles which Miss Barr had packed in her trunk in Grand Haven, Michigan, and these articles were afterwards identified by her as her property. There was also found in this room a large quantity of other goods of various description, among other things, two tickets from Grand Haven to Chicago which had never been used.

The theory of the prosecution is that plaintiff in error, somewhere between Grand Haven and Chicago, transferred the check from the zinc-covered trunk to Miss Barr's trunk and from her trunk to the zinc-covered trunk, and that the plaintiff in error secured possession of Miss Barr's trunk by having the duplicate of the check that was originally attached to the zinc-covered trunk. Plaintiff in error denies all connection with the theft, and claims that he bought the stolen trunk, together with another large trunk, from a man by the name of Doc. Lebey. His explanation as to how he obtained possession of the lost trunk is not corroborated by any testimony in the record, or by facts and circumstances.

The indictment charged the plaintiff in error with feloniously stealing one trunk and various articles of personal property, the personal goods and property of the Goodrich Transportation Company, a corporation of the state of Wisconsin. The jury found plaintiff in error guilty, and found the value of the property stolen to be $230. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were made and severally overruled, and plaintiff in error was sentenced to an indeterminate term of imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Messrs. Cantwell & Erbstein and Charles P. R. Macaulay, for the plaintiff in error:

Where a party intends to divest himself of all further interest, and, in pursuance of such intention, delivers property to another, the person receiving it cannot be convicted of larceny, although the transfer is induced by the fraud of the latter and with a purpose to steal the property.

Mr. Howard O. Sprogle, with Messrs. W. H. Stead, Attorney General, John J. Healy, and John R. Newcomer, for the People:

Obtaining possession of property by trick, with the present purpose and intention of stealing the same, is larceny.

560, 562; Clark, Crim. Law, p. 257; Johnson v. People, 113 Ill. 99; Stinson v. People, 43 Ill. 397; Welsh v. People, 17 Ill. 339; Zink v. People, 77 N. Y. 114, 33 Am. Rep. 589; Quinn v. People, 123 Ill. 333, 15 N. E. 46.

Vickers, J, delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The court instructed the jury, as a matter of law, that, if one obtains property from the owner or custodian thereof by some sort of a trick or device, for the purpose of stealing and converting the same to his own use, he will be guilty of larceny. Error is assigned upon the giving of this instruction. The contention of plaintiff in error is that, if the property was obtained with the consent of the transportation company, it would not amount to larceny, even though such consent was obtained by means of a trick or device and with the intention of stealing the same.

It is an established rule of the common law relating to the offense of larceny that, if the owner of the goods alleged to have been stolen parts with both the possession and the title of the goods to the alleged thief, not expecting the goods to be returned to the owner or to be disposed of in accordance with his directions, then neither the taking nor the conversion amounts to larceny; and this is true even where the owner is induced to part with the title and possession through the fraud and misrepresentation of the alleged thief. If, however, the owner merely parts with the possession and retains the title, expecting and intending that the goods shall be returned to him or disposed of in some particular manner agreed upon, in such case the subsequent felonious conversion of the property by the alleged thief will relate back and make the taking and conversion a larceny. Welsh v. People, 17 Ill. 339; Stinson v. People, 43 Ill. 397; Murphy v. People, 104 Ill. 528; Johnson v. People, 113 Ill. 99; Quinn v. People, 123 Ill. 333, 15 N. E. 46; Doss v. People, 158 Ill. 660, 49 Am. St. Rep. 180, 41 N. E. 1093; Steward v. People, 173 Ill. 464, 64 Am. St. Rep. 133, 50 N. E. 1056; Bergman v. People, 177 Ill. 244, 52 N. E. 363.

The doctrine illustrated and applied in the above cases is based on the rule of the common law that every larceny includes a trespass; and, since the alleged thief could not commit a trespass on property in his possession and respecting which the owner had parted with the possession and title, such property could not be the subject of larceny by the fraudulent possessor. The above rule does not, in our opinion, have any application to the case at bar, for the reason that the Goodrich Transportation Company held the trunk and its contents merely as bailee of the rightful owner, of which plaintiff in error must, upon the theory of the prosecution, be presumed to have had notice, and therefore such transportation company had no authority to consent to the title passing, with the possession, to plaintiff in error. But, even it could be held that the corporation could have given such consent by its proper officers, it certainly cannot be said that the mere act of its servants in turning over the trunk to plaintiff in error upon the mistaken supposition that he was entitled to the possession thereof would amount to such a consent as is necessary to bring the case within the rule contended for by plaintiff in error. In McClain on Criminal Law, vol. 1, § 558, it is said: "The fact that the servant, in whose possession the property is, consents to its taking, will not prevent the act being larceny, he having no authority to consent, and the wrongdoer being aware of that fact." State v. McCarty, 17 Minn. 76, Gil. 54; People v. Griswold, 64 Mich. 722, 31 N. W. 809; State v. Edwards, 36 Mo. 394. It seems clear, on principle, that, if property is obtained from an infant or an insane person, who is legally disqualified from giving consent, with the felonious intent to steal the same, such consent could not be availed of as a defense to a charge of larceny. The same principle ought to apply to bailees whose interest in the property is known to the alleged thief.

In our opinion the case at bar is not controlled by the principle contended for by the plaintiff in error. The case comes within the rule laid down in Com. v. Barry, 125 Mass. 390. This case, in all of its essential facts, is like the case at bar. The charge was for the larceny of a trunk, and the offense was committed by the shifting of checks, as is alleged in the case at bar. In disposing of the case, the court said: "It does not appear that the question whether there was an asportation at or before the changing of the checks was raised at the trial. . . . An asportation at that precise time was unimportant. The real question was whether the defendant then, feloniously and with an intent to steal, set in motion an innocent agency by which the trunk and contents were to be removed from the possession of the true owner and put into the defendant's possession, and, by means of such agency, effected the purpose. . . . 'There is no occasion that the carrying away be by the hand of the party accused, for, if he procured an innocent agent to take the property,' by means of which he became possessed of it, 'he will himself be a principal offender.' 3 Chitty, Crim. Law. 925. It is held to be a larceny 'if a person intending to steal my horse take out a replevin and thereby have the horse delivered to him by the sheriff, or, if one intending to rifle my goods, get possession from the sheriff by virtue of a judgment obtained without any the least color or title, upon false affidavits, etc.; in which cases the making use of legal process is so far from extenuating, that it highly aggravates, the offense by the abuse put on the law in making it serve the purposes of oppression and injustice.' 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 33, § 8; 1 Hale, P. C. 507."

It will thus be seen that an asportation may be effected by means of innocent human agency as well as mechanical agency, or by the offender's own hands. One may effect an asportation of personal property so as to be guilty of larceny by attaching a gas pipe to the pipes of the company, and thus draw the gas into his house, and consuming it without its passing through the meter. Clark & M. Crimes, p. 446, and cases cited in note; Woods v. People, 222 Ill. 293, 78 N. E. 607. From these cases, the law appears to be well settled that where, with the intent to steal, the wrongdoer employs or sets in motion any agency, either animate or inanimate, with the design of effecting a transfer of the possession of the goods of another to him in order that he may feloniously convert and steal them, the larceny will be complete, if, in pursuance of such agency, the goods come into the hands of the thief and he feloniously converts them to his own use; and in such case a conviction may be had upon a common-law indictment charging a felonious taking and carrying away of such goods. If, in the case at bar, the plaintiff shifted the checks on the trunks, by means of which the servants of the transportation company were innocently led to further the criminal purpose by delivering the trunk in question to the accused, who received and converted the same to his own use; and, if there was in the mind of the plaintiff in error a felonious intent to steal this property pervading the entire scheme and attending every step of it,—then he is guilty of larceny; and the instruction under consideration, as applied to such a state of facts, is a correct statement of the law and there was no error in giving it to the jury.

2. Instruction No. 2, given on behalf of the people, contains the same principle of law as No. 1, and the objections thereto are disposed of by the foregoing discussion of the first instruction.

Instruction No. 3 relates to the count in the indictment charging plaintiff in error with receiving stolen property. Since the jury acquitted plaintiff in error of this charge, we need not consider the exception to this instruction.

3. Instruction No. 7, given for the people, is also excepted to. That instruction is as follows: "The court instructs the jury, as a matter of law, that in this state the accused is permitted to testify in his own behalf; that when he does so testify he at once becomes the same as any other witness, and his credibility is to be tested by, and subjected to, the same tests as are legally applied to any other witness; and, in determining the degree of credibility that shall be accorded to his testimony, the jury have a right to take into consideration the fact that he is interested in the result of this prosecution, as well as his demeanor and conduct upon the witness stand; and the jury are also to take into consideration the fact, if such is the fact, that he has been contradicted by other credible witnesses. And the court further instructs the jury, that if, after considering all the evidence in this case, they find that the accused, or any other witness, has wilfully and corruptly testified falsely to any fact material to the issue in this case, they have the right to entirely disregard his testimony, excepting in so far as his testimony is corroborated by other evidence or facts and circumstances in evidence."

The objection to this instruction, as stated by plaintiff in error in his brief, is that it is erroneous in informing the jury that, if they found that any witness had committed perjury, they had a right to disregard the testimony of the defendant. This argument is based on the assumption that the pronoun "his," in the third line from the bottom of the instruction, refers to the defendant only, and not to the defendant "or any other witness." This construction is as illogical as it is ungrammatical. The language of the instruction does not mean that the jury should disregard the defendant's testimony if some other witness had wilfully and corruptly testified falsely to some material fact in issue; and we cannot believe that anyone with intelligence enough to serve on a jury would understand the instruction as announcing a rule so unreasonable and absurd.

Other objections to the instructions given, as well as the exceptions to the refusal of the court to give some and to the modification of other of the instructions of plaintiff in error, have all received our careful consideration, and we have reached the conclusion that no error exists for which the judgment below should be reversed. Accordingly, the judgment below should be and is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

STEPHEN W. REYNOLDS et al.

v.

SUPREME COUNCIL OF THE ROYAL ARCANUM.

(192 Mass. 150, 78 N. E. 129.)

Benefit society—by-laws—amendments.

1. A mutual-benefit society has power to amend its by-laws so as to increase the assessments on its members, where the existing rate has proved inadequate, under charter authority to provide for the payment of a certain death benefit, to be secured by assessment, and to provide for the amendment of its by-laws.

Case Note.—Right of mutual-benefit society to increase rates:—While there is more or less conflict of authority as to the right of a mutual-benefit association to increase its charges for life insurance, it may be considered to be well settled that, if the policy is issued upon the express condition that the holder thereof shall be bound by all laws, rules, and regulations of the society in force at the time he becomes a member, or which may thereafter be enacted; or if the member, in his application, has expressly agreed to such condition,—he cannot afterwards complain of any change in the manner or amount of his assessments, merely upon the ground that such change increases the cost of his insurance, and is, for that reason, a breach of the contract.

Accordingly, in Gaut v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 121 Fed. 403, it was held that the holder of a policy issued by such society, containing such condition, could not refuse to pay an assessment thereon and recover damages as for breach of contract, because the company had changed its methods and graduated its assessments according to the age of the policy holder when each assessment was made, instead of basing them upon his age when his policy was issued, where the company's charter gave it the power to change the rate of assessment from time to time, and there was no showing that the increase was fraudulent or unnecessary; even though the change increased the assessments to such an extent as to render them prohibitive as to members of long standing who aimed to continue in the society. Here there were no express words in the contract of insurance giving the insured the right to have any assessment made as of the age when he became a member. Nor was it deemed material that he had been assessed at that age for twelve years; the court declaring it to be the company's right to do that, and to abandon such method at any time. To quote from the opinion: "It was not a construction by the company of their contract with the plaintiff; but it was a method chosen, by which the company hoped to make its business attractive, and so attractive that it might last as a rule of assessment always, no doubt; but when the time came that it was confronted with changed conditions, and confronted with the fact that it did not have enough money to pay constantly increasing losses, it was within the province of their contract, and strictly within its provisions, and wholly within the competency of the charter, for the company to devise a means by which these assessments could be increased; and then, likewise, under the terms of the contract and the charter, it was permissible to have changed the method or proportion of assessments from the age of entry to the age attained at the time the assessment was made."

Same—increasing assessment—violation of contract.

3. Raising the rate of assessment on a member of a mutual-benefit society by change of by-laws does not impair his contract, where the by-laws to which he agreed required him to conform to the laws then in force, or which might thereafter be adopted.

And such an agreement on the part of a member was held in Fullenwider v. Supreme Council, R. L. 180 Ill. 621, 72 Am. St. Rep. 239, 54 N. E. 485, to deprive him of any vested right to have the rate of assessment remain unchanged as fixed by a by-law in force when he became a member. It was said that the express recognition which the member made in his contract with the society, of the latter's power to make new by-laws, was necessarily a recognition of the right to repeal or amend those theretofore made; and that, while the court strongly disavored any alteration or change in an insurance contract without the consent of the insured, "yet, where the contract does reserve to the corporation the right, from time to time, to amend its rules or by-laws, and binds the assured to compliance with such rules or by-laws, and such provision is expressly assented to in writing by the assured, it cannot be said that it would be an extraordinary power to make such change, and such a contract would not meet with disfavor from the courts."

To the same effect is Messer v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 180 Mass. 321, 62 N. E. 252, in which it appeared that the certificate of membership was issued on such condition, and was altogether silent in regard to the rates to be paid; and that at the time of its issue the association had no statutory authority to make assessments upon its members at other than a fixed changes in the by-laws of the defendant society. Bill dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Moorfield Storey and John P. Leahy, for plaintiffs:

By-laws which alter, or change, or affect the essential terms or conditions of the contract itself are ultra vires, and inoperative and void, without the express consent of the members. By-laws making certificates void in the event of suicide do not affect certificates issued before their passage.

Fargo v. Supreme Tent, K. of M. 96 App. Div. 491, 89 N. Y. Supp. 65; Weber v. Supreme Tent, K. of M. 172 N. Y. 490, 92 Am. St. Rep. 753, 65 N. E. 258; Sautter v. Supreme Conclave I. O. of H. 72 N. J. L. 325, 62 Atl. 529.

rate, the same for all members, regardless of age. It further appeared that statutes were afterwards enacted which gave the association authority to levy assessments at different rates according to the age of the member. It was held that the association had the power to collect such assessments from members who had joined before the enactment of such statutes. The court said that the mode of making assessments under the earlier statutes and as provided in the original laws of the society was simply a detail in the management of the business of the order, which it might change at any time.

Such condition was also contained in the policy sued upon in Conner v. Supreme Commandery Golden Cross (Tenn.) 97 S. W. 306, in which it was held that a change in the society's laws, whereby all members were to be assessed at their attained age instead of on the basis of the age at which they entered the order, was not unreasonable as to the insured, and did not violate his vested rights, nor breach his contract, though it raised his assessment from $52.08 to $144 per year.

The same result was reached in Miller v. National Council, K. & L. of S. 69 Kan. 234, 76 Pac. 830, in which it was held that the change in the by-laws of a fraternal beneficiary association, whereby all level rate members were required to pay a graduated rate as of the age when admitted, was valid and binding, which increased the rates to such members, where the certificate contained the express condition that the insured should in every particular, while a member of the order, comply with all the laws, rules, and requirements thereof, and the member, in his application for membership, agreed to abide by all its rules and regulations if accepted as a member; though the certificate of membership in question did not contain the specific provision to abide by all laws to be thereafter enacted. This decision proceeds upon the ground that this condition was equivalent to a consent upon the member's part, not only to comply with the laws then in force, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where the member was engaged in an occupation at the time of entrance, which was afterwards prohibited by amendment to the by-laws, the subsequent by-law cannot affect his contract without his consent.

but also to comply with all reasonable rules and regulations which might thereafter be made in the interest of the association. The opinion in this case is a complete reversal of the same court's position upon the first hearing of this same case, 73 Pac. 88, where it was held that the by-laws and constitution as in existence at the time of the application, together with the application and the certificate of membership, constituted the contract between the parties, and that the same could not be altered without the consent of both parties; and that therefore the change in question was beyond the power of the society.

On the other hand, in Covenant Mut. Life Asso. v. Kentner, 188 Ill. 431, 58 N. E. 966, it was held that, unless there was an express agreement that a member should be bound by future by-laws varying or modifying his contract, he was not so bound, and that therefore an assessment which increased the rate of insurance to him would be invalid without his consent, and that his refusal to pay the same would work no forfeiture of his contract; though the court admitted that the by-laws of the association existing at the time the member entered the association were a part of the contract, and that the contract was to be construed with reference to them.

So, in Covenant Mut. Life Asso. v. Tuttle, 87 Ill. App. 309, it was held that a provision in a certificate that the application for membership and the certificate should constitute the complete and only contract between the certificate holder and the association excluded any idea that the by-laws of the association were to be looked to as a part of the contract, and that, even if it were conceded that the by-laws in force when the certificate was issued entered into and became a part of the contract, it was only those then in existence, and the society had no right, by amending or repealing any of them without the consent of the certificate holder, and in the absence of any such right reserved in the contract, to impose new conditions or burdens affecting the contract to his injury, or, by a new provision passed after making the contract, to forfeit his rights under it; and that the refusal of a certificate holder to pay an assessment largely in excess of any previous assessment would not avoid his certificate, even though such holder had paid former assessments which were also in excess of the original contract rate.

And this principle was carried still further in Pearson v. Knight Templars & M. Indemnity Co. 114 Mo. App. 283, 89 S. W. 588, in which it was held that a mutual beneficiary life association could not nullify a contract of insurance without the express assent of the member insured, and, if a change was made, whereby his assessments were materially increased contrary to his contract, he could recover the excess, though in his application he agreed to abide by the constitution and rules as they then were, or might thereafter be constitutionally changed. The court said that the cost of the member's insurance was measured chiefly by the number and amount of the assessments that the company might make upon him for the payment of death losses, and that the increase in amount of each of these assessments necessarily increased the cost of his insurance, and that, for this reason, the change objected to materially modified his contract.

To the same effect is Wright v. Knights of Maccabees, 48 Misc. 558, 95 N. Y. Supp. 996, where a mutual beneficiary association was denied the right, under the power reserved in the contract of insurance, to amend its laws, and, under the member's agreement to conform to subsequent laws, to increase the amount of a member's assessments, without his consent, though such proposed increase was necessary to keep the association solvent.

Even if the policy or certificate of membership, or other contract of insurance entered into by a mutual benefit society, by whatever name called, contains a table purporting to show the amounts to which its members would be subjected at a given age, such table is not binding on the company, and affords no protection to the unwary member who trusts to its figures as representing the maximum amount for which he can be assessed. Thus, in Haydel v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 44 C. C. A. 169, 104 Fed. 718, Affirming 98 Fed. 200, it was held that such table was merely a memorandum showing how assessments were to be apportioned as between persons of different ages, and the probable amount of the assessments as then foreseen and estimated, and was not an agreement between the insured and the insurer binding the latter not to make assessments in a sum greater than therein shown, which, in the opinion of the court, would divest the company's directors of the power plainly conferred upon them by the company's charter, to make such assessments as might at any time be found necessary to meet death losses. The reasons given by the court for its conclusion were as follows: First, the company was a mutual one, operating on the assessment plan; second, the rate indicated by the table was so far below the usual cost of insurance as to compel the court to believe that the insured did not himself regard the table as a binding contract on the part of the company to furnish insurance at the rate therein specified regardless of its actual experience; third, that, if a fixed or level rate of assessment was contemplated, it was more likely to be embraced as a stipulation in the body of the contract, instead of being indorsed in the form of a memorandum on the back of the policy; lastly, the policy holder had paid numerous assessments in excess of that shown by the table, and his final refusal to pay the one in question was based on grounds other than that the company lacked the power to make such assessments.

And in Barbot v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 100 Ga. 681, 28 S. E. 498, it was held that it was not the purpose of a table of assessment rates to fix a limitation upon the amount of the gross assessment that might be levied against a member, but only to afford a guide, after such gross amount had been ascertained, for its equitable and fair apportionment among the members, graduated according to age. Here the constitution and by-laws of the association were expressly made a part of the contract of insurance, and those instruments provided that assessments should be made for such sum as the executive committee might deem sufficient to meet existing death claims, and that the same was to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each.

To the same effect is Crosby v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 38 Misc. 708, 78 N. Y. Supp. 237, in which it was held that an assessment insurance association had a right to make an assessment for a death benefit at the rate of the member's attained age, instead of at the rate of his age of entry, where the certificate of membership provided that assessments should be made at such rates, according to age, as the directors might establish, and made the constitution and by-laws a part of the contract, and those instruments provided that assessments should be apportioned among the members in accordance with the rates found in a table annexed to the certificate.

But, if the attempted increase of assessments is plainly contrary to the express terms of the contract of insurance, or is made for a purpose not contemplated thereby, the member will not be required to pay such increased assessments in order to preserve his rights. Accordingly, it was held in Benjamin v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 146 Cal. 34, 79 Pac. 517, that assessments levied by a co-operative life insurance association were void, and imposed no liability upon a member for payment thereof, and could not affect his rights under his policy, where it appeared that he was one of the older members, whom the association placed in a class by themselves, by which arrangement they were required to pay according to the attained age of each at the date of the assessment, while of the other members other classes were established who were to be assessed as of the age of their entry into the association: upon the ground that such classification, being solely for the purpose of levying an increased rate of as-essment upon such older members, was an inequitable and arbitrary discrimination against them. Here it appeared that the certificate of membership and policy of insurance provided that assessments should be made upon the entire membership of the association, the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member, and that the contract should be subject to all the provisions and stipulations contained in the constitution and by-laws of the association and the amendments thereto, and these provided that the apportionment should be according to the rates shown in the certificate, though they also empowered the board of directors to adopt such other rules and regulations as they might deem for the interest of the association, and were by their express terms subject to revision and amendment.

So, in Ebert v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 81 Minn. 116, 83 N. W. 506, 834, 84 N. W. 457, it was held that, while the board of directors of a corporation organized for the purpose of conducting life insurance upon the co-operative or assessment plan had authority to change the rates of assessments from time to time to meet the death losses and expenses, if the apportionment was equitable, they could not, in the absence of any authority in the contract of insurance, arbitrarily place all members who joined prior to a certain year in a class by themselves and advance the ages of their assessments from year to year, while all members joining after that date were assessed as of the age of their entry; that such discrimination against the old and in favor of the new members was not an equitable distribution of the increasing cost of carrying the older members, and was not contemplated by the terms of their contracts.

And the same result was reached in Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 126 N. C. 971, 54 L.R.A. 605, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699, 36 S. E. 352, 128 N. C. 465, 54 L.R.A. 609, 83 Am. St. Rep. 703, 39 S. E. 55, in which it appeared that the certificate of membership provided that assessments should be made upon the entire membership for such sum as the executive committee might deem sufficient, the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member, as set out in a table indorsed on the certificate. Afterwards the association placed in a separate class all members who entered prior to a certain date, and required them to pay on the basis of the age attained by each at the date of each assessment, while other members continued to be assessed as of their age of entry, with the result that such older members were assessed at a higher amount than if the entire membership were assessed at the rates of their attained ages. The call which the plaintiff refused to pay was larger in amount than it would have been had all the members been assessed at their full attained ages. It was held that such assessment was in violation of the association's constitution, and excessive and invalid. Here it was evident that, if this change was binding upon the older members, they would eventually be forced out of the company by the constantly increasing assessments.

The same principles were applied in Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Baldwin, 49 Ill. App. 203, in which it was held that, so long as assessments were made according to the certificate of membership, the certificate holder was bound to pay them, and that a failure to do so would work a forfeiture; but that the directors of the association issuing the same could not, without the member's consent, change his contract of insurance; and that if, in making assessments, more was called for and collected than was authorized by the contract, the excess would stand to his credit, and his failure to pay an assessment would not avoid his certificate if the amount overpaid by him on previous assessments was more than the amount of the unpaid assessment. Here the certificate provided that the application for membership and the certificate itself constituted the complete and only contract between the member and the society, and that the certificate holder should pay such assessments, not exceeding a specified sum, as were necessary to meet death claims; and the directors adopted a by-law under which assessments were made in excess of the amount required for such purposes, and the insured paid all of them except the one assessed just before his death.

And in Margesson v. Massachusetts Ben. Asso. 165 Mass. 262, 42 N. E. 1132, it was held that the failure on the part of a member of a beneficiary association to pay an assessment of an amount larger than the maximum amount specified in his contract of insurance under a call for "mortality and disability purposes" and for "contingent liabilities" worked no forfeiture of the contract, where the contract itself required the member to pay a specified sum annually, and, upon the death of a brother member, an additional assessment of another specified sum if required, and no more; though the member had paid earlier calls "for mortuary and disability purposes."

And in Hicks v. Northwestern Aid Asso. (Tenn.) 96 S. W. 962, in which it appeared that the policy of insurance issued by the association provided that, if any unexpected emergency should arise whereby the mortuary and reserve fund should become exhausted, "then, and in such case only," the policy holder should be liable for such further assessment as might be necessary to meet such emergency and maintain the solvency of the company, it was held that the company had no power, under the contract, to increase the rate of existing insurance except in the case of the specified emergency, and that the insured's refusal to pay an assessment at a higher rate than the maximum called for by his policy, arbitrarily made by the company without his consent, would not work a forfeiture of his policy.

So, in Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. v. Taylor, 99 Va. 208, 37 S. E. 854, it was held, under a policy providing that the rate of assessment might be changed each five years to correspond with the actual mortality experience of the insurer, a beneficiary association could change its rates as to different ages in accordance with the results of its experience; but that an increase in the rate of assessments which did not correspond with such experience was unauthorized, and a member's failure to pay an increased assessment under such circumstances would not forfeit his rights under his policy.

The Federal court refused to interfere with the system inaugurated by the defendant society in REYNOLDS v. SUPREME COUNCIL, R. A., and out of which grew the litigation involved in that case, and, in Gaines v. Supreme Council, R. A. 140 Fed. 978, held that the society's action in thus changing its system of assessments was not so clearly in violation of the contract rights of its older members, whose rates were thereby increased, as to authorize a court in another jurisdiction to enjoin the association from making such assessments.

In Seymour v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 14 Misc. 151, 35 N. Y. Supp. 793, a preliminary injunction was refused to a member of a co-operative life insurance company to enjoin the enforcement of assessments in excess of the amount named in his certificate of membership, where it appeared that the company's constitution gave its directors power to fix the amount of the assessments, and the assessments objected to were a result of a change of policy suggested by the superintendent of the state insurance department, and the member had paid similar assessments without objection; upon the ground that the plaintiff had not shown that his right was of such a clear character as to entitle him to the relief sought, in advance of a trial upon the merits.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity to set aside certain changes in the defendant's by-laws which affect the rights of certificate holders.

The defendant is a fraternal beneficiary association, organized under the laws of Massachusetts in 1877, and now subject to the provisions of Rev. Laws, chap. 119, and the acts in amendment thereof. The plaintiffs are certificate holders, who bring this bill for themselves and in behalf of others. From the time of its organization the defendant issued certificates to members, agreeing to pay to a designated beneficiary a sum not exceeding a certain number of dollars on the death of the member, upon compliance by him with certain conditions therein stated. The by-laws provided that the death benefit should be for a definite amount, and payments of these definite amounts have always been made. The words "not exceeding" are inserted in the certificate to meet the possibility of a single full assessment not being equal to the amount stated. This limitation of the payment to the amount of an assessment, except when there is an emergency fund, was expressly called for by Stat. 1899, chap. 442, § 11, p. 471, which is now found in Rev. Laws, chap. 119, § 6. Until 1898 the assessments paid by members, from which the death benefits were derived, were certain sums dependent upon the age of the member at the time of receiving his certificate, which sums remained the same as the years went by. These sums were paid to meet assessments as members died, and the amount for the first year would equal the cost to the corporation of the insurance of these members. But, as the members grew older, the risk of their death increased; and as their payments remained constant, and as there was at no time a payment of any surplus beyond the amount required to meet losses, the payments by members of long standing were not nearly enough to equal the cost of their insurance to the corporation. So 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the only way in which the amounts required to meet losses could be obtained was from the payments made by new members.

In 1898 the by-laws were amended so as largely to increase the payments to be made by all members, and to require the payments monthly. These amendments went into effect on August 1, 1898, and it appears by the agreed facts that no objection thereto has ever been made by any member of the order. These payments, while much larger than those required by the original by-laws, were upon the same relative basis; that is, the increase upon all was in the same proportion, and they were all determined by the age of the member when he received his certificate, and were not to be afterwards changed as a member grew older.

When these amendments were made it was thought that the increase would provide for the future payments called for by the certificates, and that an adequate emergency fund would be created from this income. Under these amendments there was a surplus in 1898 from the excess of receipts above payments amounting to more than $455,000, and afterwards there was annually a steadily diminishing surplus from the same cause to and including the year 1903. In the year 1904 the payments exceeded the receipts, and there was a deficit of $271,540.50.

Before the session of the supreme council in May, 1905, the executive committee caused mortality tables of the order to be prepared, and made extended investigations and studies with the aid of competent actuaries, to devise some method, through a change of by-laws, which should enable the corporation to meet its obligations to members. The actuaries prepared for them new tables, each the mathematical equivalent of the others, the first being the regular rates, and three others optional alternatives. These were founded upon the payment by the order of the maximum value of each certificate, and the payment by the members of a rate adequate, without further modification or additional assessment, to pay the certificate at the maturity thereof. It is agreed that "competent actuaries would testify, and the case may be taken as though they had testified, that the old plan of assessments was faulty, according to the assumptions made by actuaries, and that the order could not meet the maximum face of its certificates permanently under it; that upon their assumptions a change was expedient or necessary; that the plans proposed, and adopted were mathematically correct; that, if the members paid the amounts fixed in these tables, the order could continue to pay the maximum face value of its certificates at their maturity; that such amounts are no higher than necessary for this purpose, and that they fairly and equitably apportion among the members their contributions to the widows' and orphans' benefit fund, taking into consideration their age and risk." "The plaintiffs do not controvert this evidence in this case, but reserve the right to discuss its materiality, the basis and theories upon which it rests, and its application to this case." On January 1, 1905, the members of the corporation were 305,083 in number, and they held benefit certificates amounting to $680,848,000.

Under these conditions, the changes recommended by the actuaries were adopted by an amendment of the by-laws by an almost unanimous vote of the members of the supreme council, and the question is whether the changes are legal and binding upon the members.

From the facts agreed, it is plain that a great corporation, managing and controlling important financial interests for hundreds of thousands of families, was conducting its business upon unsound principles, which, if followed without change, would ultimately lead to financial ruin. The first question is, Was the change adopted in excess of the defendant's corporate powers, or in violation of the statute governing such corporations? The statutes authorize the adoption of by-laws declaring "the manner in which . . . the purposes of its incorporation may be accomplished." Rev. Laws, chap. 125, § 6; Id., chap. 119, § 2. These by-laws may prescribe the "assessments and benefits in case of disability or death, and the conditions upon which the same shall be paid, . . . the method of the amendment of the by-laws, and such other provisions as the corporation may determine." Rev. Laws, chap. 119, § 2. Such a corporation "may make provision for the payment of benefits in case of death, or disability, or both. The funds from which the payment of such benefits shall be made shall be derived only from assessments collected from the members. . . . Such provisions, funds, assessments, and payments shall be as required in the by-laws of the corporation." Rev. Laws, chap. 119, § 6.

Plainly the statute contemplates that such corporations shall have power to establish by their by-laws a system of giving death benefits which shall be sound and equitable, and founded on principles which can reasonably be expected to furnish proper security for the performance of their contracts with members. The power to make proper changes in these particulars by amendment of the by-laws from time to time is expressly given.

There is no ground for the contention that it is a violation of the statute, or of the defendant's chartered rights, to provide for such assessments as will be likely to insure the payment of the sums named in the certificates. The statute expressly authorizes, not only a death fund amounting to three full assessments upon the members, but also the accumulation of an emergency fund amounting to 5 per cent upon the face-value of all outstanding benefit certificates. The emergency fund is to be invested in safe securities, and all of these are to be deposited with the treasurer of the commonwealth. Rev. Laws, chap. 119, § 7. As the promise to pay the beneficiary is binding upon the corporation, it ought to make adequate provision to obtain the means of payment. Newhall v. Supreme Council A. L. of H. 181 Mass. 111, 63 N. E. 1.

The objection that the amendments are illegal by reason of the division of the members into classes cannot prevail. There is no objection to a classification of members according to age, and it would be unjust to disregard age in determining the rates that different persons shall pay for death benefits in an association of this kind.

The distinctive features of such organizations remain since the adoption of the amendments as well as before. The fraternal plan, with mutuality and without profit, distinguishes the work of such an association from a commercial enterprise. It is a charitable and benevolent organization, with a limitation of membership to a special class, and a limitation upon the choice of beneficiaries. It is not allowed to employ paid agents in soliciting or procuring business, except within very narrow limits prescribed by the statutes. Rev. Laws, chap. 119, § 16. Looking to the nature and purposes of fraternal beneficiary corporations, we see nothing in the amendments at variance with the law. It cannot have been intended that such corporations should be limited to a method of assessment that would be sure to bring about their early dissolution.

Another question is whether the amendments are in violation of the contract rights of members. It is stated in the record that "the agreements between the plaintiff and the defendant concerning assessments and benefits are not contained in any one specific instrument, but are found in the application for membership, the benefit certificate, the laws of Massachusetts constituting the charter, and the constitution and laws of the order." If there were no express stipulation in regard to the by-laws in the application for membership or in the certificates, all members of such a corporation would be bound by by-laws regularly made or amended. Durfee v. Old Colony & F. River R. Co. 5 Allen, 230, 242; Pain v. Société St. Jean Baptiste, 172 Mass. 319, 70 Am. St. Rep. 287, 52 N. E. 502; Oliver v. Hopkins, 144 Mass. 175, 10 N. E. 776; Spilman v. Supreme Council, H. C. 157 Mass. 128, 31 N. E. 776; Wright v. Minnesota Mut. L. Ins. Co. 193 U. S. 657, 48 L. ed. 832, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 549; Supreme Lodge, K. of P. v. Knight, 117 Ind. 489, 3 L.R.A. 409. 20 N. E. 479.

Every member of this corporation, at the time of joining it, enters into an express agreement to "conform to and abide by the constitution, laws, rules, and usages of the said council and order, now in force or which may hereafter be adopted by the same." The benefit certificates promise payment out of the widows' and orphans' fund only on condition that the member complies in the future "with the laws, rules, and regulations now governing the said council and fund, or that may hereafter be enacted by the supreme council to govern the said council and fund," etc. Here in the contract is full authority to amend the laws, rules, and regulations.

In regard to a similar provision under which a mutual fire insurance company changed its by-laws, so as to increase the assessments upon certain policy holders, the Supreme Court of the United States uses this language: "The liability of the members of this institution is of a twofold nature. It results both from an obligation to conform to the laws of their own making as members of the body politic, and from a particular assumption or declaration which every individual signs on becoming a member. The latter is remarkably comprehensive. 'We will abide by, observe, and adhere to the constitution, rules, and regulations which are already established, or may hereafter be established, by a majority of the insured . . . or which are or may hereafter be established by the president and directors of the society.' . . . As to what is contended to be a material alteration in their charter, we consider it merely as a new arrangement or distribution of their funds, and, whether just or unjust, reasonable or unreasonable, beneficial or otherwise, to all concerned, was certainly a mere matter of speculation, proper for the consideration of the society, and which no individual is at liberty to complain of, as he is bound to consider it as his own individual act. Every member, in fact, stands in the peculiar situation of being a party on both sides, insurer and insured. Certainly the general submission which they have signed will cover their liability to submit to this alteration." Korn v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 6 Cranch, 192, 3 L. ed. 195. This part of the present case is covered in principle by the decisions of this court in Messer v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 180 Mass. 321, 62 N. E. 252, and Pain v. Société St. Jean Baptiste, 172 Mass. 319, 70 Am. St. Rep. 287, 52 N. E. 502, in which cases changes similar to those made by the defendant were upheld under like contracts. The same general doctrine has been stated in many cases in other courts. Wright v. Minnesota Mut. L. Ins. Co. supra; Fullenwider v. Supreme Council, R. L. 73 Ill. App. 321, 180 Ill. 621, 72 Am. St. Rep. 239, 54 N. E. 485; Bartram v. Supreme Council, R. A. 6 Ont. W. R. 404; Gaines v. Supreme Council, R. A. 140 Fed. 978; Fugure v. Mutual Soc. of St. Joseph, 46 Vt. 362; Supreme Lodge, K. of P. v. Knight, supra; Haydel v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 44 C. C. A. 169, 104 Fed. 718; Gaut v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 121 Fed. 403, 409; Richmond v. Supreme Lodge O. of M. P. 100 Mo. App. 8, 71 S. W. 736; Barbot v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 100 Ga. 681, 28 S. E. 498; Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. v. Taylor, 99 Va. 208, 37 S. E. 854.

There are many cases in which it is held that the amount expressly promised to be paid in a certificate like those issued by the defendant cannot be cut down by an amendment of the by-laws. Newhall v. Supreme Council A. L. of H. 181 Mass. 111, 63 N. E. 1; Langan v. Supreme Council A. L. of H. 174 N. Y. 266, 66 N. E. 932; Supreme Council A. L. of H. v. Getz, 50 C. C. A. 153, 112 Fed. 119. But in many of these, as in the case from this court last cited, a distinction is made between the express stipulation of the corporation to pay a certain sum and other provisions relating to the methods of the corporation, and the duties of the certificate holders, which properly may be a subject for regulation by by-laws, even though they affect the rights of the parties under their contract. The assessments to be paid for death benefits in this case are provided for by the by-laws, while the promise in writing to pay a certain sum to a particular person is, as to that person, a matter outside of those corporate rules which may be expected to be changed by an amendment of the by-laws. This promise, on one side, is set over against the promise of the member on the other. The promise of the member is to do what may be called for by the by-laws then existing or that may afterwards be adopted. The promise of the corporation is stated expressly, without mention of the by-laws. The member occupies a dual position, as an insurer and the insured. As one of the association agreeing to provide for the payments that may become due to members, he agrees to be subject to the by-laws. As the insured person to whom a particular sum of money is promised, he has a right to stand on the terms of the promise.

That the duties of members, prescribed by the by-laws, remain subject to modification when a power of amendment is reserved, has often been decided. Loeffler v. Modern Woodmen, 100 Wis. 79, 75 N. W. 1012; Langnecker v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 111 Wis. 279, 55 L.R.A. 185, 87 Am. St. Rep. 860, 87 N. W. 293; Lawson v. Hewell, 118 Cal. 613, 49 L.R.A. 400, 50 Pac. 763; Gilmore v. Knights of Columbus, 77 Conn. 58, 58 Atl. 223; Ellerbe v. Faust, 119 Mo. 653, 25 L.R.A. 149, 25 S. W. 390.

Most of the cases relied on by the plaintiffs, when rightly analyzed, turn on the distinction between an attempted amendment of the by-laws directly affecting the promise to the certificate holder as an insured person, and an amendment affecting his duties as a member of the corporation, bound to perform his part in providing means, or otherwise, as one of the association of insurers. Hale v. Equitable Aid Union, 108 Pa. 377, 31 Atl. 1066; Fargo v. Supreme Tent, K. of M. 90 App. Div. 491, 89 N. Y. Supp. 65; Weber v. Supreme Tent, K. of M. 172 N. Y. 490, 92 Am. St. Rep. 753, 65 N. On principle and on the weight of authority, we are of opinion that there is nothing in this contract that prevents the corporation from amending its by-laws in a reasonable way, to accomplish the purposes for which it was organized, even though the change increases the payments to be made by certificate holders. Such changes necessarily involve some hardship to certain individual members, but the corporation, under the law, should do that which will bring the greatest good to the greatest number. The members who complain of its action are those who have had the benefit of insurance for themselves and their families for many years, at very much less than the cost of their insurance to the corporation. They have had the good fortune to survive, and therefore their contracts have brought them no money, but all the time they have had the stipulated security against the risk of death. If now they are called upon to pay for future insurance no more than its cost to the corporation, they ought not to think it unjust.

Bill dismissed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION, Plff. in Err.,

v.

THOMAS FERRENBACH, Exr. of Jacob Lambert, Deceased.

(75 C. C. A. 304, 144 Fed. 342.)

Second appeal—questions open.

1. A question once decided by the court of appeals will not be re-examined when the case again comes before that court upon the same facts and under the same conditions.

Insurance—wrongful cancellation—damages.

2. The amount of premiums paid, with interest, is not the measure of damages for

Case Note.—Measure of damages for wrongful cancellation of policy issued on assessment plan:—If the compensation for the injury done to the insured from the wrongful cancellation of his policy is to be the guide, and the award of damage is, in the language of the foregoing opinion, to "be precisely commensurate with the risk, neither more nor less," the above case undoubtedly enunciates the only proper and logical rule for the measure of damages resulting from such wrongful cancellation of a policy of life insurance issued upon the assessment plan, where the assessments levied upon the insured from time to time represent, or purport so to do, the actual cost to the insurer the wrongful cancelation for alleged non-payment of premiums of a life-insurance policy issued on the assessment plan.

Same.

3. The measure of damages for wrongful cancelation, for alleged nonpayment of premiums, of an assessment insurance policy upon the life of one who at the time of cancelation is no longer an insurable risk, is the amount of the policy, less cost of carrying it to maturity had it remained in force, all amounts entering into the calculation to be calculated upon the basis of the legal rate of interest as of the date of cancelation.

(March 20, 1906.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful cancelation of a life-insurance policy. Reversed on condition.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

of carrying the risk. If the insured is in such a state of health as to be unable to secure insurance in any other company, and the risk has attached, and he has had the benefit of the protection of the insurance while carrying the policy, it would seem that there could be no other adequate measure of damages than the value of his policy at the time of its cancelation. The reason, if not the weight, of authority would seem to support this rule, though the cases applying the same are few in number.

The fundamental principle involved in this rule received the approval of the Minnesota supreme court in Ebert v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 81 Minn. 116, 83 N. W. 506, 834, 84 N. W. 457, where it was held that the proper measure of damages in such cases would be the value of the policy at the date of its cancelation, though that tribunal expressly refrained from committing itself as to the precise method of estimating such value. To quote from the opinion: "Plaintiff can only recover such damages as naturally result from the act complained of. He had the benefit of several years' insurance, and that was a consideration for the money he paid. If death had occurred during that period, the beneficiary of the policy could have enforced payment. There are decisions to the effect that the measure of damages in such a case is the amount of the premiums paid, but the weight of authority is against that proposition. The sounder rule is that the damages are to be measured by the position the parties occupied at the time of cancelation. If at that time plaintiff's health had become impaired to such an extent as made it impossible to secure other insurance, the extent of his damages would be different than if new insurance could be had. If he could at that time have taken out other insurance in a similar company, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. George Burnham, Jr., with Messrs. Jones, Jones, & Hocker, for plaintiff in error:

The premiums paid, with interest, are not the true measure of damages.

the measure of damages would be the difference between the cost of such new insurance for the term of his natural life, according to the mortuary tables, and the cost of carrying the canceled policy for such term, according to the rates established by the 1889 tables, as of the age of entry. But, if his health had become impaired, and new insurance could not have been procured, then the measure of damages would seem to be the present value of such a policy as of the date of death, according to the mortuary tables, less the estimated cost of carrying the same from the date of cancelation at his then age."

To the same effect is Langan v. American Legion of Honor, 34 Misc. 629, 70 N. Y. Supp. 663, Reversed upon other grounds in 174 N. Y. 266, 68 N. E. 932, where the measure of damages was held to be the present value of the policy, less the present value of the assessments which the insured would have had to pay under his contract of insurance, had it remained in force.

This rule seems, also, to have the support of the Wisconsin supreme court, for, in Merrick v. Northwestern Nat. L. Ins. Co. 124 Wis. 221, 109 Am. St. Rep. 931, 102 N. W. 593, it was held that a beneficiary might, during the life of the insured, recover the value of the policy at the time of its wrongful cancelation by the insurer, and the language quoted by the court from New York cases involving policies issued on the level premium plan would seem to indicate that it considered the loss to be the face value of the policy less what it would cost to carry it by payment of premiums during the insured's expectancy of life.

Plain and reasonable as this doctrine would seem to be, there are numerous cases which apply an altogether different rule as to the measure of damages for the wrongful the company has paid nothing, and the plaintiff has received nothing." The foregoing case was followed, and the recovery of premiums allowed for the wrongful cancellation of an assessment policy, in the following cases; but the question as to what was the proper measure of damages does not seem to have been raised, and it was not discussed by the court: Supreme Council, A. L. H. v. Daix, 64 C. C. A. 435, 130 Fed. 101, Affirming 127 Fed. 374; Lippincott v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 130 Fed. 483, Reversed on other grounds in *69 L.R.A. 803, 67 C. C. The rule enunciated by the Black Case was also recognized, but plaintiff's recovery was denied on other grounds, in Clymer v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 138 Fed. 470; while in Blakely v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. 143 Fed. 619, the recovery of the amount of the assessments was permitted, but the right of the insured to recover interest thereon was denied. So, in People's Mut. Ins. Fund v. Bricken, 92 Ky. 297, 17 S. W. 625, a recovery of premiums was permitted upon the cancellation of an assessment policy by the insurer, but there was no discussion of the question, and no authorities were cited in support of the court's conclusion. That such is the established measure of damages for the wrongful cancellation of such a policy in other jurisdictions appears from the following cases, where recovery of the assessments paid by the insured, with the interest from the date of the payments, was permitted, without any discussion of the question: Dickey v. Covenant Mut. Life Assn. 82 Mo. App. 372 (though the plaintiff's petition prayed for the recovery of the value of his policy at the time the

Hook, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the second appearance of this cause in this court. When it was first tried in the circuit court, a verdict was directed in favor of the association, upon the ground that the policy of insurance had been lawfully declared to be forfeited for the failure of the insured to pay a premium when due, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The judgment was reversed, and it was held that the position of the association was untenable. Ferrenbach v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 59 C. C. A. 307, 121 Fed. 945. The facts of the case appear in the opinion reported as above, and we need not again recite them further than to say that the forfeiture was declared during the lifetime of Lambert, the insured. The action was brought by Lambert, and upon his death during its pendency it was revived in the name of Ferrenbach, as executor. The petition is in two counts; the first seeks a recovery of all premiums paid, with interest added, and the second asks generally for damages in the sum of $5,000 for wrongful forfeiture. In the second trial the circuit court directed a verdict in favor of the executor for the full amount of the premiums paid, and interest thereon.

The association now contends: First, that, under the conceded facts in the case, which are the same as at the first trial, it lawfully declared a forfeiture of the policy, and the plaintiff is therefore not entitled to recover; second, that, even if its first position be not sustained, the measure of damages applied by the circuit court, and which controlled the verdict of the jury, is not the correct one.

The law of this case, so far as it concerns the right of the association to forfeit the policy, was announced by this court upon the return of the first writ of error, and we will not re-examine the question when the cause again comes before us upon the same facts and under the same conditions.

association canceled it); Puschman v. Hartford Life & Annuity Ins. Co. 92 Mo. App. 640; Lovick v. Providence Life Asso. 110 N. C. 93, 14 S. E. 506; Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 126 N. C. 971, 54 L.R.A. 605, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699, 36 S. E. 352, Rehearing denied in 128 N. C. 465, 54 L.R.A. 609, 83 Am. St. Rep. 703, 39 S. E. 55; Gwaltney v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. 132 N. C. 925, 44 S. E. 659; Supreme Council, A. L. of H. v. Batte, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 456, 76 S. W. 629; and True v. Bankers' Life Asso. 78 Wis. 287, 47 N. W. 520.

The same measure of damages seems to have been adopted in Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. v. Taylor, 99 Va. 208, 37 S. E. 854, for in that case the court said that the insured could "elect to consider the policy at an end and to bring an action to recover the just value of the policy;" citing 2 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 376, where the clause just quoted also appears immediately followed by these words: "In which case, the measure of damages is the amount of the premiums paid, with interest on each, from the time it was made."

But this principle was denied in Keyser v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 60 App. Div. 297, 70 N. Y. Supp. 32, and it was said that, while the insured was entitled to recover the damages sustained by the can-celation of his policy of insurance, upon no principle would he, under such circumstances, be entitled to recover the amount that he had paid during the years that he had been a member of defendant's society, but that he would be entitled to, and the rule of damages was held to be, the cost of replacing the policy on the same terms in a sound company at the time of its cancellation. The court said that the insured had received from the defendant association the benefit of an insurance upon his life while the contract was in force. "If he had died during these seventeen years the company would have been obliged to pay to the beneficiary the amount named in the certificate or policy; and at least to the extent of the reasonable value of that insurance during this period the defendant was entitled to retain the amount that it had received." Of course, no criticism can justly be made of this rule if the insured is in such health as to be able to get other insurance.

Whether or not the same rules as to the measure of damages would apply to the wrongful cancellation of a policy of life insurance issued on the level-premium plan is not within the scope of this note, which is confined to cases involving policies issued on the assessment plan.

Guarantee Co. of N. A. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 59 C. C. A. 376, 124 Fed. 170.

As to the measure of damages: The judgment now under review is for all premiums paid by Lambert between the time his policy was issued and the time of its wrongful cancellation, with interest. The word "premiums" is used in aid of brevity, and it includes the admission fee and all annual dues and mortuary assessments. The peculiar features of this case withdraw it from the operation of the rules which most frequently find application. In a policy issued upon what is termed the level-premium plan, the insured has an equity arising from an excess of premiums paid above the current cost of insurance to the company. Under such a plan, the natural premiums for the respective years, which steadily and progressively increase as the insured advances in age, are so adjusted and averaged among the years of his expectancy of life that they become flat or level, the same in amount in the beginning as at the end. In such a case it is apparent that the earlier level premiums contain an appreciable excess over the actual cost of insurance, which decreases, however, with the progress of the years. So it is said that in a level-premium policy the insured has an equity, the excess of payment above cost of insurance, which constitutes an element of damage resulting from wrongful cancellation. Such was the policy in the case of Lovell v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 264, 28 L. ed. 423, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390. But the Lambert policy is of an entirely different character. It was issued upon the assessment plan, and each year's premiums represented the actual current cost to the association of carrying the insurance risk. There was no excess over cost out of which an equity or value could arise. Mutual Reserve L. Ins. Co. v. Roth, 59 C. C. A. 63, 122 Fed. 853.

Modern times have witnessed the addition of many new features to policies of life insurance, resulting in premiums of greater amount and consequently in an increased equity or value in the policies themselves; and the particular rules for ascertaining the loss sustained by policy holders through the wrongful cancellation of their policies must vary as the characters of the policies themselves vary. In some cases much may also depend upon the physical condition of the insured, whether he remains an insurable risk or not, and whether insurance of like character and value to that canceled can be obtained in some other responsible company, and what the cost may be. But in every case of this character the dominant idea is compensation,—reimbursement for the actual loss sustained,—and the measure of recovery which fits nearest and most closely thereto is the one that should be adopted. The award should be precisely commensurate with the injury suffered, neither more nor less. Dow v. Humbert, 91 U. S. 294, 299, 23 L. ed. 368, 369.

There are presented in the case at bar all the data essential for an accurate ascertainment of the damage sustained. We have the character of the policy and its date and amount; the dates and amounts of all premium payments to the association during the sixteen years in which the policy was in force; the date of the breach of contract by the association; the physical condition of the insured at the time of such breach and the fact that he was not then an insurable risk, and that he could not then obtain insurance elsewhere; the date of his subsequent death; and, finally, the amounts and dates of maturity of all premiums he would have been required to pay to the association between the time of the cancellation of his policy and the time of his death, had the policy continued in force. And the question is, What rule of admeasurement of damage sustained by the wrongful cancellation should be adopted to give just, full, and adequate compensation, and nothing more or less?

It should be observed that the asserted ground of forfeiture,—failure to pay a premium when due,—is not one that struck at the validity of the policy at the date of its issue. It is not claimed that the policy was void from its inception because of fraud or other reason. Its validity when issued was recognized, and continued so for sixteen years. During all of that period the insured received benefit from his payments and enjoyed the protection afforded by the policy. It was at the end of that period that the association repudiated the further existence of its obligation. Again, it should be observed that both parties have treated the policy as having been terminated on May 1, 1899; the insured claiming that it was then wrongfully done, and the association that it was done rightfully. The action being for damages, the time as of which they should be ascertained is the day the wrong was done and the damage inflicted.

There are quite a number of authorities which announce the rule applied by the circuit court in the case at bar, and allow a recovery of all of the premiums paid by the insured prior to the time of the wrongful cancellation. Supreme Council, A. L. H. v. Black, 59 C. C. A. 414, 123 Fed. 650; Supreme Council, A. L. H. v. Daix, 64 C. C. A. 435, 130 Fed. 101; Van Werden v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 99 Iowa, 621, 68 N. W. 892; People's Mut. Ins. Fund v. Bricken, 92 Ky. 297, 17 S. W. 625; American L. Ins. Co. v. McAden, 109 Pa. 399, 1 Atl. 256; Union

Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Pottker, 33 Ohio St. 459, 31 Am. Rep. 555; Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Garmany, 74 Ga. 51; Thompson v. New York L. Ins. Co. 21 Or. 466, 28 Pac. 628; Braswell v. American L. Ins. Co. 75 N. C. 8; Lovick v. Providence Life Assn. 110 N. C. 93, 14 S. E. 506; Burrus v. Life Ins. Co. 124 N. C. 9, 32 S. E. 323; Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 126 N. C. 971, 54 L.R.A. 605, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699, 36 S. E. 352; McKee v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 28 Mo. 383, 75 Am. Dec. 129; McCall v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 9 W. Va. 237, 27 Am. Rep. 558; Niblack, Ben. Soc. § 280.

Some of these proceed upon the assumption that, prior to the time of wrongful cancelation, the insured or beneficiary never received any benefit from the policy, and, on the other hand, that the insurance company gave nothing of value for the premiums paid to it. There is involved in this a misconception of the theory and business of life insurance. Not only is the protection of insurance of actual, positive value while it endures, but the cost to the insurer of carrying the risk can be ascertained almost to a mathematical certainty. There is no more reason for saying that an insured has nothing of value until he dies, than there is for saying that one is not benefited by a policy of fire insurance unless his house is destroyed by fire. An insurance company that conducts its business upon the plan that the assumption of a risk costs it nothing before death of the insured will likely meet with speedy and disastrous insolvency.

Once conceding value in insurance protection to the insured, and also cost to the association in carrying the risk, the recovery of all of the premiums paid for such protection is obviously inadmissible. In this aspect the case is analogous to one in which a gas company has contracted to furnish gas to a householder for a period of years. Surely no one would contend that a breach by the company of its contract would authorize a recovery by the consumer of rates paid in the past. Suppose one is let into the possession of a house under a contract of lease, with a purchase clause, providing that he should pay to the owner $15 per month for a specified term of years, of which $10 should be considered as rental, and the remaining $5 with interest accumulations as applicable to a fixed purchase price which would be satisfied by the monthly payments if made during the entire period. Could it reasonably be said that, if the lessor wrongfully canceled the contract and resumed possession, the lessee, upon electing to sue for damages instead of for specific performance, could recover the entire amount of payments made by him, notwithstanding he had peaceably enjoyed the use and occupancy of the premises for the period during which his payments were made? It seems to us that such questions should be viewed from an entirely different standpoint.

The rule in North Carolina, announced in Braswell v. American L. Ins. Co. supra, is that "the measure of damage would be the amount necessary to enable the plaintiff to obtain another policy, if so minded, which, of course, would be much higher in respect to the premium, inasmuch as he is several years older than he was when he first obtained the policy; but the case need not be complicated by this consideration, as the plaintiff is content to take back his money with interest, and be quits of all further connection with defendants."

The first part of this quotation announces the proper rule in some cases, especially where the insured is able to obtain other insurance; but the observation concerning the recovery of the premiums does not seem to us to sustain any legal or definite relation to the measure first announced. What a plaintiff would be content to receive should not be established as a legal measure of damage in any case. The premiums paid and interest might be altogether inadequate to compensate, and again they might be largely in excess of full compensation, and naturally that measure would be rejected by the plaintiff in the former case and accepted in the latter, if he were given the choice. A measure of damage is a rule of law, and should not be determined by the option or self-interest of a party to a controversy.

There are several reasons which we think demonstrate that the rule of the above cases is inadmissible, bearing in mind that the end desired is compensation to the insured for loss sustained, and not the punishment of the company. Under some circumstances, such a rule would work great injustice to the insured, and, under others, great injustice to the insurer. An example of the former would be presented if the insured, having paid but one year's premium upon a policy issued for his entire life, should become so affected with disease that he could not procure insurance elsewhere. It would be manifestly unjust to restrict his recovery for a wrongful cancelation of his policy to the amount of the single premium paid. On the other hand, if a policy upon the assessment plan has endured for many years, the assessments or premiums might, with interest, aggregate a sum largely in excess of the principal sum of the policy. It is true that the injured party may have a choice of remedies,—an action for damages, or a suit to prevent a wrongful cancelation; and he might thereby be enabled to protect himself against an inadequate admeasurement of his loss. The illustrations show, however, that the rule is not a true one. When the insured elects to sue for damages, he should not be given a choice of measurements leading to widely different results. There are other authorities which are fully in harmony with the views we have expressed, and which reject the rule allowing a recovery of all premiums paid. Lovell v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 264, 28 L. ed. 423, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Statham, 93 U. S. 24, 23 L. ed. 789; Ebert v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 81 Minn. 116, 83 N. W. 506, 834, 84 N. In the Lovell Case, supra, Mr. Justice Bradley, in speaking of the complainant's claim, said: "He demands a return of all the premiums paid by him, with interest, less the amount of his premium note; and that said note shall be delivered up to be canceled. But we do not think that he is entitled to a return of the full amount of his premiums paid. He had the benefit of insurance upon his life for five years, and the value of that insurance should be deducted from the aggregate amount of his payments."

In some of the cases sustaining a recovery for all of the premiums paid, the Lovell Case was distinguished and held inapplicable. Counsel also seek to distinguish it from the case at bar. But the fact remains that there was in that case a wrongful cancellation of the policy by the company, and the insured, as is the case here, regarded it as terminated, and sued for damages. We regard the doctrine there announced as precluding a recovery, for the wrongful cancellation of a policy, of that portion of the premiums paid which represents the actual cost of the insurance during the years of its uncontested validity. It is true that the policy there involved was of the level premium character, but it is also true that that portion of the premiums paid by Lovell which was excluded by the Supreme Court from the recovery is precisely like all of the premiums paid by Lambert. Recovery of the part of the premiums representing the cost to the company of carrying the risk was denied Lovell, because he had received the benefit thereof. If the contention now made is admitted, this anomalous result will ensue: If an insured has paid, as Lambert did, premiums representing only the actual cost of the insurance, he may, upon wrongful cancellation of his policy, recover all of the premiums so paid; but, if the premiums included, as in the Lovell Case, an excess over actual cost, he can recover only such excess.

At the time his policy was canceled Lambert was seventy-two years of age, a paralytic, and unable to obtain other insurance in any responsible company. For this reason, the method adopted in some cases for estimating damages by ascertaining the increased cost of insurance obtained elsewhere cannot be employed. And, as his policy had no net value, the measure of recovery in the Lovell Case cannot be used. But the insurance was for the term of Lambert's life, and he had a right to have it remain in force subject to the continued payment of the premiums.

In view of all the special circumstances of the case, the character of the policy, the physical condition of the insured, and the absence of any measure promising more accurate compensatory results, we are of opinion that the recovery should be for the amount of the policy, less the cost of carrying it to maturity had it remained in force; all amounts entering into the calculation to be valued upon a 6 per cent basis as of May 1, 1899, the date of cancellation. Lambert died January 25, 1902, before the trial of his action, but had he lived evidence would have been admissible to show the life expectancy of a man of that age and so afflicted. And it is presumable that such evidence would have established the very fact which afterwards appeared. At any rate, death has solved all uncertainty. The policy was for $5,000 and was payable at death. Upon a 6 per cent basis, the value of that sum on May 1, 1899, the day of the wrongful act of the association, was $4,295.55. The various premiums that would have been paid, had the policy remained in force, similarly discounted and brought back from their respective due dates, aggregate $1,822.25.

The difference between these sums, with interest from May 1, 1899, when the damage was sustained, to October 17, 1904, when the judgment was rendered, aggregating $3,283.70, is the proper amount of recovery. The judgment entered was for $4,495.49.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, unless the defendant in error, by a proper remittitur filed in the Circuit Court, shall remit from the judgment there entered the sum of $1,211.79 with interest accrued upon the amount so remitted since the date of the judgment, and shall also file a certified transcript of such remittitur in this court within forty days from the filing of this opinion. If such remittitur and transcript be filed, the judgment as so reduced will be affirmed, at the cost of the defendant in error.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

MINNIE WILLIAMS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
SLEEPY HOLLOW MINING COMPANY.

(— Colo. —, 86 Pac. 337.)

Trial—directing verdict.

1. A question of negligence cannot be taken from the jury, although the facts are not disputed, if they are such that from them different minds might honestly draw different conclusions.

Mine owner—care with respect to safety of mine.

2. A mine owner, upon learning of the existence of water in a neighboring mine in such quantities as to be dangerous to his employees, is bound to make such investigation as would suggest itself to one using ordinary care and prudence, and, upon learning that there is danger of his mine becoming flooded, to make such provision for the safety of his employees as would occur to a person of ordinary prudence, or inform his employees of the impending danger.

Trial—contributory negligence—question for jury.

3. It is only in the clearest cases that the court can take from the jury a question of contributory negligence.

Same—knowledge.

4. The burden of showing lack of knowledge or information on the part of a mine employee killed by the flooding of the mine, of conditions in an adjoining mine which were likely to result in such flooding, does not rest upon one seeking to recover for his death, but the mine owner has the burden of showing such knowledge; and therefore the court cannot direct a verdict for defendant merely because the evidence tending to show absence of knowledge is not conclusive.

Note.—A search has failed to disclose any other cases involving the specific question as to the duty of a master to guard his servants against dangers originating from conditions on neighboring property. A question somewhat analogous sometimes arises in cases where a railroad company fails to fence its tracks, and, in consequence, live

Same—question for jury.

5. The jury must determine whether or not an employee in a mine, knowing of water in a neighboring mine, knew, or ought to have known, the danger to himself therefrom.

Evidence—unsafe condition of mine.

6. Evidence of lack of ladders and bulkheads where they should have been in a mine in which an employee was drowned by an inrush of water cannot be excluded in an action for his death merely because he knew of their absence, unless he had knowledge of the danger arising from the presence of the water in an adjoining mine in connection with the absence of such appliances.

Same.

7. Evidence of absence of ladders and bulkheads at places where they should have been in a mine is admissible, in an action against the mine owner for the death of an employee drowned by the flooding of a mine through an adjoining one, as tending to show that, if the defendant knew of the danger from the water, he failed to use reasonable precautions for the safety of his employees.

Same—stenographer's transcript.

8. A stenographer's transcript of testimony given by witnesses at a former trial who have since died is not admissible in the absence of any evidence that the evidence was correctly transcribed, other than the certificate of the stenographer.

ERROR to the District Court for Gilpin County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's husband. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clinton Reed, H. A. Hicks, and J. Warner Mills, for plaintiff in error:

The sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence is something the court had no jurisdiction to decide.

stock enter thereon and derail a train, injuring an employee. Cases of this kind, however, generally turn upon the general question as to the duty of a railroad company to fence its tracks, and not, as in the above case, upon the duty of the master to guard against specific danger, and are, therefore, of little value on the latter point.

Greeley v. Foster, 32 Colo. 292, 75 Pac. 351; Poorman Silver Mines v. Devling (Colo.) 81 Pac. 252.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant was the owner of the Sleepy Hollow mine, situate in Gilpin county. The shaft was about 625 feet deep. The Americus mine, with a shaft about 500 feet deep, joined the Sleepy Hollow on the west. The Mabee-Fisk mine, with a shaft more than 700 feet deep, joined the Americus on the west. The owners of the Americus ran a level, known as the "390-foot level," eastward into the territory of the Sleepy Hollow. The Americus also ran a level, known as the 490-foot level, westward to within about 50 feet of the Mabee-Fisk line and opposite the point on the Mabee-Fisk property where the ore had been stoped out to the line between the Americus and the Mabee-Fisk, leaving 50 feet between the end of the 490-foot Americus level and this stoped ground. There had been a level known as the "Fraser drift" run from the Mabee-Fisk property to the eastward, extending into the Americus property at a point below the Americus level, running parallel with it. A body of ore had been taken from this Fraser drift upon the Americus property, so that the distance between the upper portion of the stope from which the ore was taken to the bottom of the Americus tunnel was only about 4 feet, and the character of this rock in the intervening space appears to have been loose, veinous matter. The defendant made an upraise from its 400-foot level to connect with the end of the 390-foot level of the Americus which extended into the Sleepy Hollow property, so that the Sleepy Hollow and the Americus mines were connected at a point about 400 feet from the surface of the ground, and the Americus and Mabee-Fisk properties were connected with the exception of the few feet of veinous matter lying between the Fraser drift and the 490-foot level of the Americus property. The Mabee-Fisk mine became filled with water. The superintendent and manager of defendant company was warned of the presence of this water, and he caused his foreman and one of the employees, Williams by name, who was a brother of decedent, to visit the Mabee-Fisk shaft for the purpose of determining the extent to which it was filled with water. This foreman and Williams went down the Mabee-Fisk shaft to the Fraser drift and at that time found that the water was some 16 feet below the drift. They saw the Fraser drift, but made no investigation as to how far it extended eastward. The water continued to rise in the Mabee-Fisk shaft and the superintendent of that property continued to inform the superintendent of the Sleepy Hollow property of the extent of the water. This continued from time to time until the water in the Mabee-Fisk shaft had reached a point about 200 feet above the Americus 490-foot level, at the place where there were only a few feet of rock between that level and the Fraser drift. At about 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

this time the superintendent of defendant was again cautioned by the superintendent of the Mabee-Fisk property, and was told by such superintendent that the defendant's employees would be drowned shortly unless some precautions were taken. In none of these conversations was there any mention made of the fact that the Fraser drift extended into the Americus property, and had been stoped out so closely to the Americus 490-foot level. It appears that this defendant's superintendent rested under the belief that there were 50 feet of matter between the Mabee-Fisk property and the Americus, so that the water would have to break through this 50 feet of stone before it could reach the Americus property, and before it could reach defendant's employees. It nowhere appears in the testimony that defendant's agents knew that the Fraser drift had extended into the Americus property. It does appear, however, that Carbis, defendant's foreman, who went into the Mabee-Fisk shaft for the purpose of measuring the water, saw the Fraser drift, and saw that it extended in the direction of the Americus property, but made no investigation to determine its extent. Williams, the deceased, talked with his brother, who was defendant's timber boss,—that is, had charge of the timbering in defendant's property,—and told him that he had heard at Black Hawk, a town nearby, that the lives of employees in the Sleepy Hollow property were in danger by reason of this water. The brother did not think so, because of the distance existing, as he supposed, between the Americus workings and the Mabee-Fisk workings. A few days after this conversation the water broke through from the Fraser drift, running through the Americus property and into the Sleepy Hollow property, and Williams was drowned. This action was brought by Minnie Williams, the widow of deceased. At the trial, after plaintiff had proved the foregoing facts, the trial court directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and in doing so stated that before plaintiff could recover she would have to prove that there was danger; that it was known to the defendant; that it was not known to deceased; and that defendant had not warned the deceased of this danger; that, if there is a failure or want of proof upon either of these conditions, then a verdict should be directed for the defendant. A writ of error was prosecuted, assigning the direction of the verdict as error, as well as some other alleged errors occurring in the course of the trial.

We cannot say that, as a matter of law, the defendant was or was not negligent in failing to make such examination of the adjoining premises as would lead it to a full understanding of existing conditions. There is no dispute as to the facts in this case, but it is over the conclusions to be drawn from the facts that the controversy arises; and it is the rule in this state that, if the facts are such that honest men might honestly differ as to the conclusions to be drawn therefrom, then the matter should be left to the jury. Empson Packing Co. v. Vaughn, 27 Colo. 71, 59 Pac. 749; Solly v. Clayton, 12 Colo. 33, 20 Pac. 351; Colorado C. R. Co. v. Martin, 7 Colo. 599, 4 Pac. 1118. The same rule is announced by the United States Supreme Court in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 665, 21 L. ed. 749, wherein it is held that, even though the facts are not disputed, but are such that different minds might honestly draw different conclusions from them, the case must be left to the jury for their determination. Negligence in a particular case is generally a matter for the jury to determine, and it is always so when the measure of duty is ordinary and reasonable care. In such cases the standard of duty is variable. Cunningham v. Union P. R. Co. 4 Utah, 206, 7 Pac. 795; West Chester & P. R. Co. v. McElwee, 67 Pa. 315.

Defendant seems to argue that, because the water was located at some distance from this property, and was an extraneous cause of danger, defendant was under no obligation to make an investigation as to the extent of this danger. To this we cannot agree as a legal proposition. The employer must exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which the employee may perform the services required of him. It is his duty to use diligence to keep his place in reasonably safe condition so that the servant may not be exposed to unnecessary risks. The care and diligence required differ as circumstances differ, but in all cases it is such as a reasonably prudent man would exercise under like circumstances in order to protect the persons of his employees from destruction or injury. A far higher degree of care is necessary in the case of an employer whose employees are far underground with but scant means of escape in case of danger than where the employees are not subject to unseen dangers, or are in such a position that escape may be readily effected. The master is bound to use such care as circumstances demand from a reasonably prudent man. If he fails to do so, he is negligent. In actions like the present one, questions of negligence are for the jury. The ordinary care which the parties are to use in the discharge of their respective duties so varies with the situation of the parties, their knowledge or means of knowledge, the surrounding circumstances of each particular case, the measurement of which depends so much upon the knowledge and experience of practical men in practical affairs, that it has long been the policy of the law to submit the question of reasonable care to the judgment of a jury. It is only when the facts are undisputed, and are such that reasonable men can honestly draw but one conclusion from them that the court should consider the question of negligence one of law, and not of fact. Union P. R. Co. v. Jarvi, 3 C. C. A. 433, 10 U. S. App. 439, 53 Fed. 68. It is the duty of the master to furnish a safe place in which the servant is to perform his labor. It must not alone be safe from such dangers as are patent, but also from such as are latent; not alone from those in the place, but from such extraneous matters as menace its safety, and which could be ascertained upon reasonable inquiry.

Appellee, knowing of the existence of the water in the neighboring mine in such quantities as to become dangerous to its employees, was in justice bound to make such investigations as would suggest themselves to one using ordinary care and prudence; and if, upon making such investigation, it learned that there was danger of the mine becoming flooded, it then became its duty to make such provision for the safety of its employees as would occur to a person of ordinary prudence, or to inform the employees of the impending danger so that they might assume the risk or waive the negligence of the master. The standard of duty in cases of this character is variable. It cannot be determined as a matter of law what is, and what is not, a compliance with the duty of one who is bound to exercise ordinary care under the circumstances. What may be negligence under some circumstances and conditions may not be under others. It is not a fact to be testified to, but can only be inferred from the res gesta,—from the facts given in evidence; hence it may generally be said to be a conclusion of fact to be drawn by the jury upon proper instructions from the court. It is always so where the conclusion is fairly debatable, or rests in doubt. It is only where there is an entire absence of testimony tending to establish the case that a nonsuit may properly be ordered or a verdict directed. Langhoff v. Milwaukee & P. du Ch. R. Co. 19 Wis. 489; Dorsey v. Phillips & C. Constr. Co. 42 Wis. 600. In the case of Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 120, it was said by Chief Justice Cooley: "The case, however, must be a very clear one which would justify the court in taking upon itself this responsibility; for, when the judge decides that a want of due care is not shown, he necessarily fixes in his own mind the standard of ordinary prudence, and, measuring the plaintiff's conduct by that, turns him out of court upon his opinion of what a reasonably prudent man ought to have done under the circumstances. He thus makes his own opinion of what would be generally regarded as prudence a definite rule of law. It is quite possible that, if the same question of prudence were submitted to a jury collected from the different occupations of society, and perhaps better competent to judge of the common opinion, he might find them differing with him as to the ordinary standard of proper care. The next judge trying a similar case may also be of a different opinion, and, because the case is not clear, hold that to be a question of fact which the first has ruled to be one of law. Indeed, I think the cases are not so numerous as has been sometimes supposed in which a judge could feel at liberty to take the question of the plaintiff's negligence away from the jury. The judge, it is said in one case, is not bound to submit to a jury the propriety of a particular course, when it is perfectly notorious that all prudent men conduct their own affairs differently. The uniformity of the conduct of business men becomes a rule of law. But, while there is any uncertainty, it remains a matter of fact for the consideration of the jury. Briggs v. Taylor, 28 Vt. 183. The difficulty in these cases of negligent injuries is that it very seldom happens that injuries are repeated under the same circumstances; and, therefore, no common standard of conduct by prudent men becomes fixed or known. In North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Heileman, 49 Pa. 63, 88 Am. Dec. 482, it is said: "That what constitutes negligence in a particular case is generally a question for the jury, and not for the court, is undoubtedly true, because negligence is want of ordinary care. To determine whether there has been any involves, therefore, two inquiries: First, What would have been ordinary care under the circumstances? and second, whether the conduct of the person charged with negligence came up to that standard. In most cases the standard is variable, and it must be found by a jury. But when the standard is fixed—when the measure of the duty is defined by the law—entire omission to perform it is negligence. In such a case the jury have but one of these inquiries to make. They have only to find whether he upon whom the duty rests has performed it. If he has not, the law fixes the character of his failure and pronounces it negligence." The facts in this case being such that reasonable men might honestly disagree on the question as to whether or not the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to exercise ordinary care 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) and prudence, it should have been submitted to the jury.

It is also contended by defendant in error that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. The foregoing reasoning to a large extent applies to the doctrine of contributory negligence. It is only in the clearest cases that the court should usurp the functions of the jury in determining questions of negligence or contributory negligence. Moffatt v. Tenney, 17 Colo. 191, 30 Pac. 348. The record in this case does not disclose such a state of affairs as would warrant us in saying, as a matter of law, that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence.

We now come to the proposition as to whether or not it must affirmatively appear from the plaintiff's testimony that deceased did not know of the existence of the danger, and that it must affirmatively appear from plaintiff's testimony that defendant had not informed the deceased of the impending danger. The doctrine announced by the learned judge who tried this case below is supported by eminent authority. It is reasoned that the negligence of the employer does not alone consist in failing to provide a safe place, but that the negligence consists in providing an unsafe place in which the employee shall work without being informed as to the danger. The doctrine as laid down by Wood on Master and Servant, § 808, is that a servant, in order to recover, is called upon to establish three propositions: First, that the appliance was defective; second, that the master had notice thereof, or knowledge, or ought to have had; third, that the servant did not know of the defect. In Bailey on Master's Liability for Injuries to Servant, at page 112, note 1, it is said: "To show negligence in the master, it must appear that the danger was such that the plaintiff would not be presumed to know it, and that the master did not give him information of it." The doctrine as laid down by these two authors appears to be the rule adopted in the following cases: Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Woodward, 9 Ind. App. 169, 36 N. E. 442; Lynch v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. 8 Ind. App. 516, 36 N. E. 46. There are many more Indiana cases to the same effect. While the earlier ones regarded the employee's knowledge of a defect as an element of contributory negligence, the latter case fixed it as an independent factor of plaintiff's case, the want of which must be alleged and proved, separate and distinct from one of contributory negligence. The same rule appears to have been adopted in Missouri: Musick v. Jacob Dold Packing Co. 58 Mo. App. 322, and cases there cited. Also in West Virginia: Johnson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co.

36 W. Va. 77, 14 S. E. 432. On the other hand, it is said in 14 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, at page 844, that the burden of proving that an injured servant had knowledge of an obstruction or defect is on the employer. This rule is adopted in the following cases: Hulehan v. Green Bay, W. & St. P. R. Co. 68 Wis. 520, 32 N. W. 529; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Royall, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 86, 43 S. W. 815, and cases cited; Alexander v. Central Lumber & Mill Co. 104 Cal. 533, 38 Pac. 410; Connolly v. Waltham, 156 Mass. 370, 31 N. E. 302; Thompson v. Great Northern R. Co. 70 Minn. 219, 72 N. W. 962; Lexington & C. C. Min. Co. v. Stephens, 104 Ky. 502, 47 S. W. 321. In Magee v. North Pacific Coast R. Co. 78 Cal. 430, 12 Am. St. Rep. 69, 21 Pac. 114, it is said: "A complaint for such injuries need not state that the defects causing the accident were unknown to plaintiff, as such fact is matter of defense."

In Greenleaf v. Illinois C. R. Co. 29 Iowa, 46, 14 Am. Rep. 181, it is said: "If it is claimed that the injured employee also knew it [of the danger], this knowledge by the employee, and that the service was commenced or continued with such knowledge by him, must be shown by defendant. The burden in such cases is put upon the employee, but he is not bound to show, in the first instance, his lack of knowledge." In Balhoff v. Michigan C. R. Co. 106 Mich. 606, 65 N. W. 594, it is said: "The intestate's actual knowledge can neither be proved nor disproved conclusively, as he is dead. All that is left is to show the surroundings, and from them we cannot say that he knew, or ought to have known, that there was a low place in the track at that point. He may have known it. We might, perhaps, say that he probably did know it; but it would still be for the jury to determine the fact." In Dallemand v. Saalfeldt, 175 Ill. 310, 48 L.R.A. 753, 67 Am. St. Rep. 214, 51 N. E. 645, it is said: "In an action to recover for injuries received by using an appliance, the burden is on the master to show that the servant knew the danger incident to its use. Where the servant shows that the injury he received was in consequence of an increased risk,—one not ordinarily incident to the employment,—growing out of the master's negligence, the burden of proof is upon the master to show that the servant knew of, and understood, the increased dangers." Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 424, citing Cooley on Torts, 661. So, in Lee v. Reliance Mills Co. 21 R. I. 322, 43 Atl. 536, it was held that, where an employee was injured by reason of defective machinery, the fact that plaintiff knew of the danger and continued to work without objection, assuming the risk, was a matter of 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) defense. In Buckley v. Port Henry Iron Ore Co. 17 N. Y. S. R. 436, 2 N. Y. Supp. 133, it was held that no negligence was imputed to the deceased, except that he knew all about the mine and took the risk. It was held that deceased only assumed such risk as is usual to mining, and not such as the mine owner might have avoided by proper inspection. It was for the jury to determine whether the deceased came to his death from the risks which he assumed, or from those which the defendant should have protected him against. It is thus seen that the weight of authority upon where the burden of proof lies as to the knowledge or lack of knowledge of the employee as to latent dangers is that, it is upon the defendant. We therefore think that in this particular case the court went too far in taking the question away from the jury. The question of assumption of the risk and knowledge or lack of knowledge of the deceased should have been left to the determination of the jury under appropriate instructions.

There was some evidence which tended to show that the deceased knew of the existence of the water, but as to whether he knew, or ought to have known, all of the conditions connected with the existence of this water which together produced the danger, is a matter which should have been determined by the jury as a matter of fact, and not by the court as a matter of law.

There are two other questions raised by the plaintiff in error which are not material to the determination of this case, but, inasmuch as it may be retried, we will allude to them. Error is assigned because evidence of the lack of ladders and bulkheads, at places where plaintiff contends they should have been, was excluded. This was error. The rule is, if a servant, knowing the hazard of the employment and the manner in which the business is conducted, is injured while employed in such business, he cannot maintain an action against the master on account of such injury merely because he may be able to show that there was a safer mode in which the business might have been conducted, and if it had been conducted in that manner he would not have been injured. Naylor v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 53 Wis. 664, 11 N. W. 24; Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. 113 Mass. 396. In order to justify the court in excluding this testimony it would have to appear affirmatively that deceased had knowledge of the danger occasioned by the presence of the water as well as the absence of ladders and bulkheads. The rejected testimony was admissible for the purpose of showing that if it is found that defendant knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, of the existence of danger, it further neglected to exercise reasonable care to make the place ordinarily safe.

It appears that this is the second trial of this action, and at the former trial testimony of witnesses was taken by a stenographer and by him reduced to writing, and certified to as correct. At the time of the last trial some of those witnesses were dead, and some were absent. The plaintiff offered to prove by the transcript made by the stenographer the testimony given by deceased and absent witnesses at the previous trial. There was no proof that the testimony was correctly taken or correctly transcribed, or that the paper offered was a correct copy of the testimony of the witnesses as actually given, other than the certificate of the stenographer. This offer was rejected. There was no error in the ruling of the court in this respect. It is true that in Emerson v. Burnett, 11 Colo. App. 86, 52 Pac. 752, a transcript of the testimony taken by the stenographer was permitted to be used; but in that case it was agreed that the testimony had been correctly transcribed. In this case it was not agreed that the testimony was correctly transcribed. In Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Myers, 25 C. C. A. 486, 49 U. S. App. 279, 80 Fed. 365, the transcript was admitted, but in that case it was confessedly correct. The cases which hold that the transcript of the testimony at a previous trial may be introduced in a subsequent trial are those where the stenographer is called and testifies to the accuracy of the transcript, where the testimony has been preserved by a bill of exceptions, settled by the trial court, or where it is agreed by the parties that the transcript is correct. We have been unable to find any authority for the admission of testimony of this character when the verity of the transcript has not been determined.

For the above reasons, the judgment of the District Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGIA RAILWAY & ELECTRIC COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

BLANCHE McALLISTER.

(126 Ga. 447, 54 S. E. 957.)

Street car—negligent calling of street—injury of passenger.

1. The negligent conduct of a street-car 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

conductor in calling a street crossing before his car had arrived at the street announced, thereby inducing a lady passenger to alight, at night and during a severe rain storm, at a strange place remote from her destination, is to be regarded as the proximate cause of injuries sustained by reason of her slipping and falling upon a curbstone which she was unable to see, because of the darkness, while endeavoring with due care to make her way homeward along a street with which she was unfamiliar.

(a) The passenger was under no legal duty to apply for shelter at houses in the vicinity of the place where she was induced to alight from the car, rather than attempt to reach her destination on foot over a highway which was in a reasonably safe condition for travel by pedestrians.

(b) If she could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered that she was invited by the conductor to disembark at a point short of her destination, she was entitled to recover damages because of illness brought about by exposure to the weather after leaving the car; the burden being upon her to show that her illness was caused by such exposure, rather than by other causes for which the defendant company was not responsible.

Same—presumption of negligence.

2. In such case, no presumption of negligence is raised by law against the defendant from the bare fact that the plaintiff sustained an injury, and the burden rests upon the plaintiff to prove the allegations of fact upon which she relies for a recovery.

(August 13, 1906.)

Headnotes by EVANS, J.

Case Note.—What injuries may be deemed the proximate result of discharging passenger at improper place, or one not his destination:—This note does not include cases where the passenger was ejected or compelled to leave the train on account of a collision or other accident. It is limited to those in which the passenger was expressly or impliedly invited to alight at a point other than his destination, or at an unsafe place; nor have cases in which the decisions turned on the question of contributory negligence been included.

The general principles in relation to the proximate cause of injuries are well settled by the authorities. The difficulties encountered by the courts arise in applying them to the varied facts of each particular case.

The authorities all declare that, if an injury results from the negligent act of a wrongdoer, that act will be deemed the proximate cause, unless the consequences were so unnatural and unusual that they could not have been foreseen and provided against by the highest practicable care. Thus, the fall of a passenger through an unguarded opening in a platform approaching the station, which was unlighted and not generally used because of the existence of another ERROR to the City Court of Atlanta to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Rosser & Brandon and Walter T. Colquitt, for plaintiff in error:

The fall was not the proximate cause of alighting from the car before the destination was reached.

Augusta R. Co. v. Glover, 92 Ga. 133, 18 S. E. 406; Macon R. & Light Co. v. Vining, 120 Ga. 513, 48 S. E. 232; Macon v. Dykes, 103 Ga. 848, 31 S. E. 443.

The street car company is under no duty to keep the sidewalk or street in proper repair. The negligence of the city in not properly repairing its streets is the predominating cause of the fall.

Perry v. Central R. Co. 66 Ga. 746.

The act of a street car company in negligently carrying a passenger one block beyond her destination has been held not to be the proximate cause of the injury sustained by her from a fall on an icy sidewalk while returning to the point of original destination.

Haley v. St. Louis Transit Co. 179 Mo. 30, 64 L.R.A. 295, 77 S. W. 731; Wood's Mayne, Damages, § 53, p. 72; Conway v. Lewiston & A. Horse R. Co. 90 Me. 199, 38 Atl. 110; Central R. Co. v. Dorsey, 116 Ga. 719, 42 S. E. 1024; Macon v. Dykes, 103 Ga. 847, 31 S. E. 443; Central R. Co. v. Price, 106 Ga. 176, 43 L.R.A. 402, 71 Am. St. Rep.

walk which she was unable to see, was a contingency which might have been foreseen, and was proximately due to the negligence of the railroad company. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas, 119 Ind. 583, 6 L.R.A. 193, 21 N. E. 968.

That a child six years of age, accompanied by her father, was taken to a station next beyond her destination, was not the proximate cause of injuries sustained by her, when she broke away from her father and ran in front of a train, the approach of which frightened her, since this was a result which could not have been anticipated (Benson v. Central P. R. Co. 98 Cal. 45, 32 Pac. 809); nor was the discharge of a passenger at a point a mile from his destination the proximate cause of his subsequently being assaulted and robbed by two footpads, which could not have been reasonably expected (Atkinson v. Pacific R. Co. 90 Mo. App. 489); nor was the discharge of a young woman passenger, about seventeen years of age, at a point preceding her destination, the proximate cause of a criminal assault upon her by a man who left the train when she did (Sira v. Wabash R. Co. 115 Mo. 127, 37 Am. St. Rep. 386, 21 S. W. 905); nor was erroneous information by a ticket agent as to train connections the proximate cause of delay and inconvenience suffered by a female passenger who was compelled to procure a buggy in which she rode to her destination, in a rain storm, over a rough road, and who became ill from the exposure and jolting of the vehicle, and suffered a miscarriage; since these consequences could not have been foreseen or anticipated by the agent (Fowlkes v. Southern R. Co. 96 Va. 742, 32 S. E. 464).

Injuries resulting from pure accident cannot be reasonably anticipated, and, where this element intervenes, the carrier's preceding negligence is not considered the real or proximate cause of the injury. Thus, injuries sustained by one carried some distance past a station on a dark night, and who, being misinformed as to the exact location at which he alighted, fell into a cattle guard while walking along the track, were not the proximate result of being carried L.R.A.(N.S.)

ried past the station, or of the erroneous information given him, where he knew of the existence of the cattle guard and was watching for it, but fell into it because misled by visual deception combined with an accidental slipping of the foot (Lewis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 54 Mich. 55, 52 Am. Rep. 790, 19 N. W. 744); nor was the sudden stopping of a train after it had run past a station the proximate cause of an injury sustained by a passenger waiting to alight, whose hand was caught in the car door, which closed violently when the train stopped (Hardwick v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 85 Ga. 507, 11 S. E. 832); nor was the failure to stop a street car at the crossing the proximate cause of an injury sustained by a passenger from stepping on a rolling stone as she alighted (Conway v. Lewiston & A. Horse R. Co. 90 Me. 199, 38 Atl. 110); nor of an injury sustained by a passenger who sprained the muscles of her leg in stepping upon a slight embankment in the unmade street, and which presented a horizontal, but not entirely smooth, surface (Lynch v. St. Louis Transit Co. 102 Mo. App. 630, 77 S. W. 100); nor of the fall of a passenger on a slippery pavement while attempting to return to the point where he should have been permitted to leave the car (Haley v. St. Louis Transit Co. 179 Mo. 30, 64 L.R.A. 295, 77 S. W. 731).

No difficulty arises in determining whether a negligent act is the proximate cause of an injury, when the damage directly follows the wrong; when they are so proximately cotemporaneous that no time or occasion is afforded for the operation of another instrumentality. The perplexing cases are those where there is an intervening cause, or several causes contributing to the result. Generally in such case the law will attribute the injury to the last cause, if it is independent of the original act or conduct of the defendant. If the intervening causes are merely incidental, having been set in motion by the first cause, and are not new and independent forces sufficient of themselves to cause the disaster, the law passes these, and traces the injury to the wrongful act which puts them in operation.

Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Arnold, 80 Ala. 600, 2 So. 337.

If the result of an injury is such as might have been expected to occur in the ordinary or natural course of events, the carrier is not relieved from responsibility, although there may have been some intervening agency contributing to the result, as where a passenger permitted to alight from a train which ran by the station and was stopped at night on a trestle bridge fell to the bed of the stream beneath and sustained a concussion of the brain, which confined him to his bed and so depressed his system that he contracted malarial fever, which resulted in a hemorrhage, from which he died. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Buck, 96 Ind. 346, 49 Am. Rep. 168.

Calling a station, opening the car doors, and stopping a train while yet 40 rods from the station, are the proximate cause of an injury sustained by a passenger who, while attempting to alight, is thrown to the ground by a sudden jerking of the train. Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Worthington, 30 Ind. App. 663, 96 Am. St. Rep. 355, 65 N. E. 557, rehearing denied, in 30 Ind. App. 660, 66 N. E. 478. So, the cause of an injury sustained by a passenger accompanying stock on a freight train, who, on being told they were at a certain station, started to alight, and was thrown by a jerk of the train off the car steps, and fell 30 feet from a trestle on which the train was standing, was the negligence of the carrier. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Downing, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 643, 41 S. W. 190.

The act of some person is often an intervening agency. It has been held that the negligence of a railroad company in carrying a passenger beyond the point of her destination was not the proximate cause of an injury sustained by her from the explosion of a defective kerosene lamp at the hotel to which she had been taken by the conductor, who agreed to pay her expenses until she could be carried back to her station in the morning (Central R. Co. v. Price, 106 Ga. 176, 43 L.R.A. 402, 71 Am. St. Rep. 246, 32 S. E. 77); nor of an injury sustained by a passenger in alighting from the train after it had stopped half a mile beyond her station, due to the fact that she jumped from the car steps at the suggestion of a fellow passenger (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Woods, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 462, 28 S. W. 416); nor of an injury sustained by a child which, at the request of its mother, was put off the train by someone, while it was in motion (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Beckworth, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 153, 32 S. W. 347).

But where a female passenger, accompanied by her infant child, attempted to disembark without assistance from a train late at night, and handed her child to one standing upon the unlighted platform of the station, who followed along with the child as the train began to move, and, encountering a truck left on the platform, dropped the child, which was crippled by the train, the negligence of the carrier was held to be the proximate cause of the injury, in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Calhoun (Okla.) 89 Pac. 207. In this case the court considered that the direct and proximate cause of the injury was the presence of the truck, which the servants of the railway company negligently permitted to remain upon the platform; that, had the platform been free from obstruction, or had it been lighted so that passengers could have observed the obstruction by the exercise of reasonable care, the accident would have been avoided.

An injury sustained by one who left a train when erroneously informed by a brakeman that they had reached a point where refreshments were served, and who after the prompt departure of the train was left in darkness, and, while under the guidance of a railroad employee, who failed to warn him, fell down the step leading from the platform on which he had left the train, was due to the negligent direction of the brakeman as the sole cause of the injury (Laub v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 118 Mo. App. 488, 94 S. W. 550); and the proximate cause of an injury sustained by a passenger in alighting at night from a train which stopped short of the station, and who was precipitated into a ditch or ravine along the track at that point, when the brakeman, who was assisting her to alight, fell, was the negligence of the company rather than the fault of the brakeman, which was but an incident in the chain of causation (Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Holsapple, 12 Ind. App. 301, 38 N. E. 1107).

Failure to provide a reasonably safe place in which to alight from a train is the proximate cause of an injury to a passenger required to alight at a steep embankment after the train runs past the station, and who slips down the declivity into the ditch at its foot (Minor v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 21 App. Div. 307, 47 N. Y. Supp. 307); and of an injury sustained by a female passenger permitted to leave the train at night, at a point beyond her destination, and who falls into a ditch while attempting to reach the highway, and seriously injures her foot and ankle (Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Smith [Tex. Civ. App.] 32 S. W. 710); also of an injury sustained by a female passenger laboring under the disability of an artificial limb, who is permitted to step down some 20 inches upon the frozen ground without warning, although she expects to step upon the platform (Kral v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 71 Minn. 422, 74 N. W. 166); and of an injury suffered by a woman allowed to step down 3 feet from the lower step of the car, at an unlighted place, away from the station platform (Ellis v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 120 Wis. 645, 98 N. W. 942); also of an injury sustained by a passenger discharged on a narrow strip of ground between the tracks of the carrier and those of another company, and who is struck by an engine as he starts to leave the premises (Chicago Terminal Transfer R. Co. v. Schmelling, 197 Ill. 619, 64 N. E. 714); and of an injury sustained by a passenger permitted to alight during a snowstorm, near a side track, instead of upon the station platform, and who falls when he steps upon a snow-covered rail (Mensing v. Michigan C. R. Co. 117 Mich. 606, 76 N. W. 98); as well as of an injury sustained by a shipper of stock, who is led to suppose that he is at the regular station, and is permitted to alight at night, without warning of danger, at a point where he falls into an uncovered waterway be- 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

between the tracks (Griffith v. Missouri P. R. Co. 98 Mo. 188, 11 S. W. 559); also of an injury suffered by a woman carried about 80 rods beyond the station, and who, while attempting to walk back along the tracks, which is the only practicable route, falls into a cattle pit (New York C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Doane, 115 Ind. 435, 1 L.R.A. 157, 7 Am. St. Rep. 451, 17 N. E. 913); and of an injury sustained by one carried past his destination about one fourth of a mile, on a dark, rainy night; and who falls through a bridge while attempting to reach the station (Indianapolis & E. R. Co. v. Barnes, 35 Ind. App. 485, 74 N. E. 583); so of an injury received by one carried some 300 yards beyond his destination, at a late hour, on a dark night, who falls through a trestle while attempting to walk back to the station (Winkler v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 21 Mo. App. 99); also of an injury sustained by a passenger permitted to alight on a dark night at a coal trestle, some 500 feet from the station, and who falls over a cross sill at the end of a coal shed and breaks his leg (Burnham v. Wabash Western R. Co. 91 Mich. 523, 52 N. W. 14).

Illness or physical suffering.

In a leading English case, Hobbs v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. 111, 11 Moak, Eng. Rep. 181, it was held that one who, with his wife and two children, was left by a train, which had taken a branch other than that on which his destination was located, at a point some 5 miles distant, where he was unable to procure a conveyance or accommodations, so that the party were compelled to walk to their destination in a drizzling rain, may recover for the inconvenience thereby caused, but not for the resulting illness to the wife due to cold and exposure.

But this case was disapproved in Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 54 Wis. 342, 41 Am. Rep. 41, 11 N. W. 356, 911, where the negligence of a carrier in setting down in the nighttime in the country, at a place 3 miles short of his destination, a passenger accompanied by his child and by his wife, 21 Mo. App. 99; Pecos & N. T. R. Co. v. Williams, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 100, 78 S. W. 5.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff below, Mrs. Blanche McAllister, brought a suit for damages against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company, setting forth in her petition the following allegations of fact respecting the manner in which she received a personal injury for which she sought to hold the company responsible: On February 14, 1903, she boarded one of the company's cars at Riverside about 8 o'clock at night, and paid her fare to Atlanta. The night was dark and stormy. Desiring to leave the car at the nearest point to her home, she requested the conductor to stop the car for her when it should arrive at Thurmond street. After a time the conductor called out that street and beckoned to plaintiff to notify her to alight. Upon leaving the car the plaintiff found the night to be bewilderingly dark, the rain was falling heavily, and for some moments she could see nothing. After the car had sped away, she found to her horror that she was not at Thurmond street crossing, and she did not know where she was. The intense darkness and blinding rain which was blown against her by powerful gusts of wind, bewildered her. She did not know on what street she was nor what direction to take, but managed to reach the sidewalk, and then undertook to grope her who was pregnant, was held the proximate cause of the subsequent illness and miscarriage of the wife, due to exhaustion caused by walking along the track to their destination. These cases are distinguishable on the ground that the first was tried as an action upon contract, and the latter as an action in tort, in which the wrongdoer is liable for all injuries resulting directly from the wrongful act, whether they could or could not have been foreseen by him. This would seem to be the better rule, since this class of cases, in all their essential features, are actions for tortious misconduct.

A carrier's failure to stop at a station, and permitting two female passengers to alight at a point 3 miles beyond their destination, are the proximate cause of illness resulting from the walk which they are compelled to take (Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Biddle, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1363, 34 S. W. 904); and negligently discharging a passenger at an intermediate station may be deemed the proximate cause of suffering and sickness due to exposure during a buggy ride at night back to her point of destination (Pittsburgh C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Klitch, 11 Ind. App. 290, 37 N. E. 560); and of discomfort, inconvenience, and sickness suffered by a woman passenger accompanied by two children, who is negligently left off from a train at night, 2 miles from her proper destination, which she attempts to reach with the aid of strangers, but, the conveyance procured breaking down, she is compelled to walk most of the distance over muddy roads, which brings back a bronchial affection with which she has been afflicted (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hartnett [Tex. Civ. App.] 34 S. W. 1057); and of pneumonia contracted by one carried 3 miles beyond his destination without his consent, and required to leave the train at a water tank in the darkness of the early morning in inclement weather (International & G. N. R. Co. v. Terry, 62 Tex. 380, 50 Am. Rep. 529); also of neuralgia contracted by a middle-aged woman, thinly clad, who is carried past her station to another, on a dark night, and compelled to take a train at a very early hour in the morning to return to her destination 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

(Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Hennessey, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 316, 49 S. W. 917).

It is the duty of a passenger discharged at a point other than his destination, to minimize his damage; and an injury which he might have averted will not be deemed the proximate result of the carrier's negligent act. Thus, the hardship and illness resulting to a woman from a journey on foot on a hot day, in the rain and over a rough mountain road, for about 11 miles, was not the proximate result of the failure of the railway company to permit her to alight at a station at which the train was not scheduled to stop, where the conductor offered to let her off at the station preceding it, from whence she might have proceeded on the following local train, but she preferred to go to the station beyond, where her sister lived, whom she did not find at home upon her arrival, thereby necessitating the long walk undertaken by her (Carter v. Southern R. Co. [S. C.] 55 S. E. 771); nor was sickness suffered by a passenger left about dark on a rainy evening, at an intermediate station a few miles from her destination, due to the negligence of the carrier, where she walked to her destination and suffered exposure to the elements, when there were places near at hand where she could have been cared for during the night (Childs v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 77 Hun, 539, 28 N. Y. Supp. 894); nor was physical suffering sustained by a woman accompanied by an infant child and a daughter fourteen years of age, in walking 2 miles on a cold night and after having been carried to the station next beyond her destination, the proximate result of the carrier's negligence, where she chose to walk rather than to seek comfortable quarters at the place where she left the train (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cole, 66 Tex. 562, 1 S. W. 629); nor was the recurring illness of a convalescent female passenger, who was carried 500 yards beyond the depot, and had to walk back from that point, when due to her walking home from the station after declining the assistance of friends. (Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Head [Tex. Civ. App.] 15 S. W. 504).

way in the direction in which she supposed she should go, guided only by the sense of touch along the fronts of the houses. The street was deserted, and her cries for help brought no succor. She was not enabled to keep her way, because of the impenetrable darkness, and at a street crossing she fell upon the curbing and struck the lower part of her back and side with such force as to be for a time unable to rise. When able to continue her wanderings, she proceeded along the street until she came within call of a police officer, who accompanied her until she got within sight of a light near her home. From the exposure to the storm she contracted a severe illness, and the injuries sustained by her fall are of a permanent character. She was herself faultless and the injuries sustained were proximately caused by the wanton carelessness and indifference of the company's conductor in putting plaintiff off the car a long distance from her destination and into a rain storm. By demurrer the defendant company presented the contention that the plaintiff's petition disclosed that the alleged negligent act of its conductor was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's fall and resultant injuries. The court ruled to the contrary. The case was tried on its merits, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The company's motion for a new trial was denied.

1. Taking as true the assertion of the plaintiff that she was without fault, her injuries are directly traceable to the negligence of the company's conductor in inducing her to alight from the car at a street crossing far removed from the point near her home at which she had signified her wish to have the car stopped for her. Macon R. & Light Co. v. Vining, 120 Ga. 511, 48 S. E. 232. It was naturally to be expected that the plaintiff, after being put off at a strange place, in the dark and during a severe storm, should seek a place of refuge or undertake to make her way home; and, though the streets of the city may have been free from any dangerous defects, yet if the plaintiff, while acting with due caution, suddenly stepped off a curbstone, which on account of the darkness she was unable to see, and stumbled or slipped and fell, her injuries are to be regarded as proximately flowing from the default of the company in placing her in a situation where she was forced to make her journey homeward through the storm, subjecting herself to all the hazards which a prudent pedestrian who might undertake to grope his way in the darkness along a street with which he was unfamiliar would necessarily Nor was the act of a carrier in setting down from an omnibus on a main street of the city, during the daytime and at a point about a mile from her home, a young woman in good health and warmly clad, and accompanied with an intimate friend, the proximate cause of an injury to her health resulting from a cold contracted by her in walking home, where the point at which she was left was on the line of a street railway which passed close to her residence. Francis v. St. Louis Transfer Co. 5 Mo. App. 7.

Fright or mental suffering.

Fright occasioned by the loud talking of negroes, who, for a time, followed a woman carried past her destination at night, was not considered a proximate result of the carrier's tortious act, in Central R. Co. v. Dorsey, 116 Ga. 719, 42 S. E. 1024, in view of Ga. Civ. Code, § 3912, declaring that, if contingent circumstances preponderate largely in causing the injurious effect, such damages are too remote.

And in Chicago, R. I. & T. R. Co. v. Boyles, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 522, 33 S. W. 247, mental suffering endured by a woman carried past her destination to the next station, and who was thereby prevented from going on to another point on that day, at which she expected to meet her father and to obtain medical treatment for her sick child, of which facts the carrier had no knowledge, was not regarded as a direct result of the breach by the carrier of its contract.

But where the fright or mental suffering leads to sickness or impairment of health, it may be regarded as a proximate result of the carrier's negligence, as where a female passenger, encumbered by a baby and valise, was carried some 300 yards beyond the station, and permitted to alight at a point where there were no lights and amid surroundings well calculated to cause her fright (Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. McKenzie [Tex. Civ. App.] 41 S. W. 831); and where a passenger in poor health, carried half a mile beyond his station on a dark night, had to crawl over two trestles in going back to the station, and while on one of them was frightened by an approaching train, and contracted a severe cold and cough from the exposure and the dampness of the ground (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mansell [Tex. Civ. App.] 23 S. W. 549); also where a female passenger left with her four small children at a point 600 yards from the station about 5 o'clock in the morning of a cold day in December, suffered physical pain from the cold and walk, and mental anguish from her embarrassing situation (Fordyce v. Dillingham [Tex. Civ. App.] 23 S. W. 550); so a woman carried 3 miles beyond her destination and compelled to walk back may recover for mental suffering as well as for illness proximately caused by the carrier's negligence (Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Biddle, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1363, 34 S. W. 904).

encounter. The court therefore properly declined to sustain the defendant's demurrer. The evidence introduced by the plaintiff tended to show that she fell under the circumstances alleged, notwithstanding she was at the time exercising all possible caution. The defendant company complains that the trial judge, instead of instructing the jury that the plaintiff's fall was not the natural and proximate result of the negligent act of its conductor in causing her to alight at the wrong place, submitted to the jury the question whether or not the alleged negligence of the conductor was the proximate cause of her injuries. The charge of the court was as favorable to the company as it had any right to expect. The court properly declined to instruct the jury, at the defendant's request, that "if, at the place where Mrs. McAllister alighted from the car, there were lighted stores or houses in which she could have taken shelter; and if, instead of so taking shelter, she chose to go on immediately home, even though she may have fallen on her way home,—the defendant would not be liable for the effects, if any, produced by such fall." Certainly the court would not have been warranted in holding, as matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in undertaking to make her way home, instead of seeking temporary shelter in some lighted store or house in the immediate vicinity. It was not per se negligence for the plaintiff to attempt to travel through the storm along a street which was in a reasonably safe condition for pedestrians, nor did she owe the railway company any legal duty to seek the hospitality of strangers under the circumstances. The liability of the defendant depended, of course, upon whether its conductor did in fact call Thurmond street before the car reached the point where the plaintiff wished to alight. The charge of the court fully covered the contention of the defendant that Thurmond street was not called by the conductor, and that the plaintiff must have misunderstood him and alighted under the mistaken belief that he had announced the arrival of the car at that street. As to whether or not she could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered that the car was not at Thurmond street, counsel for the company concedes that its written request to charge on this subject was sufficiently covered by the instructions which the court, of its own motion, gave to the jury. It appeared that during the day the plaintiff had pursued her calling as a canvasser, and had been exposed to the prevailing inclement weather. The court undertook to state to the jury

Question for jury.

What is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury, and not a question of science or legal knowledge, and is to be determined as a fact in view of the circumstances of the particular case. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. McKenzie, supra.

The question whether the negligence of the railroad company was the proximate cause of an injury has been held one of fact for the jury, where a carrier announced the name of a station, and opened the doors of the car without giving any information that the first stop would be at a crossing instead of the station, and a passenger carrying a bundle and valise went upon the steps of the car, which were slippery by reason of snow and ice, and fell by reason of fright or dizziness when the train started to pull up to the station (Larson v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 85 Minn. 387, 88 N. W. 994); also whether carrying a twelve-year-old girl past her destination was the proximate cause of injuries sustained by her in falling through a cattle guard on her way back to the station (Rawlings v. Wabash R. Co. 97 Mo. App. 511, 71 S. W. 535); and whether the injury sustained by one of two female passengers who were requested to alight from the train at a considerable distance from the depot, and fell into a cattle guard, which they failed to see in the dark, was due to her own fall, or to an effort to aid her companion (Kreuziger v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 73 Wis. 158, 40 N. W. 657); or whether the injuries sustained by a female passenger carried past her destination at night, received by falling while trying to walk back along the track to the station, were the proximate consequence of the carrier's negligence (Case v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 191 Pa. 450, 43 Atl. 319); or whether the injury sustained by a man sixty-seven years of age was referable to the wrongful act of the carrier as a proximate cause in discharging him from a freight train $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from the station, towards which he proceeded, and, in alighting from a flat car on which he had climbed in order to cross a railroad bridge, broke his leg (Adams v. Missouri P. R. Co. 100 Mo. 555, 12 S. W. 637, 13 S. W. 509); also whether the increased sickness of a girl eight years of age, ill at the time, who was carried more than a mile beyond her destination and there dismissed in a strange place, with 20 pounds of baggage, and who, in great distress of mind and body, walked back to the station, was the proximate consequence of being carried past her station (East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Lockhart, 79 Ala. 315); and whether the illness and eventual death of an old man carried several hundred yards beyond the station on a dark and rainy night, and compelled to walk home along muddy roads, which greatly exhausted him, was due to the negligence of the railroad company (Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mask, 64 Miss. 738, 2 So. 360).

N. W. R. Co. 73 Wis. 158, 40 N. W. 657); or whether the injuries sustained by a female passenger carried past her destination at night, received by falling while trying to walk back along the track to the station, were the proximate consequence of the carrier's negligence (Case v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 191 Pa. 450, 43 Atl. 319); or whether the injury sustained by a man sixty-seven years of age was referable to the wrongful act of the carrier as a proximate cause in discharging him from a freight train $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from the station, towards which he proceeded, and, in alighting from a flat car on which he had climbed in order to cross a railroad bridge, broke his leg (Adams v. Missouri P. R. Co. 100 Mo. 555, 12 S. W. 637, 13 S. W. 509); also whether the increased sickness of a girl eight years of age, ill at the time, who was carried more than a mile beyond her destination and there dismissed in a strange place, with 20 pounds of baggage, and who, in great distress of mind and body, walked back to the station, was the proximate consequence of being carried past her station (East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Lockhart, 79 Ala. 315); and whether the illness and eventual death of an old man carried several hundred yards beyond the station on a dark and rainy night, and compelled to walk home along muddy roads, which greatly exhausted him, was due to the negligence of the railroad company (Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mask, 64 Miss. 738, 2 So. 360).

the familiar rule of law that the company could not be held responsible save for the consequences of the negligent act of its conductor of which the plaintiff complained, and that she could not recover because of her illness unless it was brought about by exposure to the weather to which she was subjected after alighting from the car. In this connection, the defendant submitted two pertinent requests to charge, adjusted to the theory that, after the plaintiff had been exposed during the day and her clothing had become more or less wet, she was at night induced to leave the car far from her home during a heavy rain storm. These requests should have been given, as the instructions which the court gave to the jury were framed upon the primary contention of the defendant that the rain had ceased before the plaintiff got off the car, and that her illness was caused by exposure to the weather during the day and prior to the time she became a passenger.

2. The plaintiff relied upon her testimony alone to sustain her claim that the company's conductor had caused her to alight from the car before it reached Thurmond street. The company introduced a number of its conductors, including all who ran on schedules maintained during the period within which the occurrence testified to by the plaintiff could have taken place, each of whom swore he had no knowledge of the occurrence, and did not at the request of any lady passenger undertake to call out Thurmond street, or by mistake announce that street before his car arrived at that crossing. The case was not, therefore, one necessarily calling for a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and she was not entitled to recover unless she successfully carried the burden of proving the act of negligence alleged in her petition. The trial judge, just before concluding his charge, instructed the jury as follows: "If the plaintiff shows that she was injured by the operations of a car of the defendant, as she alleges in her declaration, then the law would raise the presumption that the defendant was negligent, and the duty would be upon the defendant either to show that it was not negligent, or else that she could, by ordinary care on her part, have avoided the consequences to herself of the defendant's negligence, if that appears, or else that her injuries were due to some other cause than the negligence of the defendant, if she was injured. If the company shows such a state of facts to you, that would be a reply to the presumption, and it would be removed." This instruction was wholly inapplicable to the facts of this case. In such a case, no presumption of negligence can arise against the defendant company. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Flaherty, 110 Ga. 335, 35 S. E. 677. To erroneously charge to the contrary is cause for setting aside the verdict. Atlanta R. & Power Co. v. Johnson, 120 Ga. 911, 48 S. E. 389. Let the plaintiff carry the burden which the law imposes upon her as a condition precedent to recovery.

Judgment reversed.

ARROR to the Superior Court for Chatham County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract to purchase corn. Reversed.

Statement by Atkinson, J.:

Miller & Sons sued Mendel, alleging that on February 4, 1904, the defendant gave to the plaintiffs, through their agent at Savannah, Georgia, an order for one car load of No. 2 white corn in sacks, and, on February 18, 1904, the plaintiffs shipped the corn to the defendant, charging therefor $369, and the corn arrived in Savannah on February 23, 1904. It was shipped, "Order notify Jonas Mendel." A draft for the purchase money was attached to the bill of lading. The effect of this was to make the purchase money payable on the arrival of the corn, which is the usual method of shipment in grain transactions. When the corn arrived at Savannah the defendant was notified, and he caused an inspection of the grain to be made by the official inspector of the Savannah board of trade, and the grain was classed as No. 2 white corn, and the defendant notified of this fact. Notwithstanding this, the defendant delayed payment of the draft, requesting that it be held for later payment. During this delay the corn remained on the wharves at Savannah, and was exposed to dampness arising from the river and the fogs prevalent at that season; all of which was known to defendant. The plaintiffs, expecting each day that the defendant would comply with his agreement to pay and remove the corn, permitted it to remain on the wharves, but would not have done this had not the defendant assured the plaintiffs that payment would be made in a short while; and the defendant knew that the reason why the plaintiffs permitted the corn to remain on the wharves was his repeated promises to pay the draft, and take possession of the corn. The corn could not be removed by the plaintiffs without great trouble and expense, as they had no warehouse in Savannah; all of which was known to the defendant. On April 7, 1904, the defendant notified the plaintiffs that he would not pay 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the draft and accept the corn. At the time of this notice the corn, through exposure to dampness, had deteriorated in value. On May 10, 1904, the plaintiffs elected to sell the corn, as agent of the defendant, and recover the difference between the contract price and the price of the resale. Notice to this effect was given to the defendant, and his consent requested that the corn be sold, and the amount realized be held subject to any judgment which the plaintiffs might obtain against the defendant. The defendant consented that the corn be sold to the best advantage for the benefit of all concerned, but this consent was given without prejudice to any rights of the defendant. On May 31, 1904, having secured bids from every grain dealer in Savannah who cared to submit a bid, the plaintiffs sold the corn to the highest bidder for $200.20. This amount being deducted from the amount of the purchase money leaves the defendant due the plaintiffs $168.80, as damages. The defendant is indebted to plaintiffs the further sum of $12, storage charges paid to the transportation company owning the wharves. The defendant demurred to the petition generally, and on the ground that it did not set forth the correct measure of damages, that it did not show what the market price of the corn was on the day the defendant should have received the corn or rejected it, and that it did not show the difference in price between the contract price and market price on the day the defendant should have received it. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted pendente lite. The defendant filed an answer, which in effect denied all the allegations imposing liability upon him, and especially pleaded that the plaintiffs shipped him a car of corn, but it did not come up to the specifications of the order; also that the corn was not of the kind, character, or quality ordered, and for this reason he rejected it. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount sued for. A motion for a new trial was overruled. Error is assigned upon the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, and upon the exceptions pendente lite.

Messrs. Twiggs & Oliver, for defendants in error.

Atkinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. When one sells goods to another, and the vendee refuses to take and pay for the same, the vendor has three remedies: He may retain the goods and recover the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery; he may sell the property, acting for this purpose as the agent of the vendee, and recover the difference between the contract price and the price of resale; or he may store and retain the goods for the vendee, and sue for the entire price. Civil Code 1895, § 3531. If the vendor elects to take the second remedy and resell, due notice of the intention to resell must be given to vendee. It is not necessary that this notice should contain information as to the time and place of sale, but there must be a notice of the intention to sell for the benefit of the vendee. If, after such notice, a sale is properly made, and the goods bring less than the contract price, the vendee is conclusively bound by the resale and the amount realized by it. Davis Sulphur Ore Co. v. Atlanta Guano Co. 109 Ga. 607, 34 S. E. 1011. The remedies above referred to, each and all of them, are available even in a case where the goods are shipped to be paid for on delivery, and where payment of a draft is a condition precedent to the delivery of the goods by the carrier to the purchaser. McCord v. Laidley, 87 Ga. 221, 13 S. E. 509. See also, in this connection, Seaboard Lumber Co. v. Cornelia Planing Mill Co. 122 Ga. 370, 50 S. E. 121. The demurrer was properly overruled.

2. The contract was for the sale of corn of a certain quality. The corn was to be shipped, and to be paid for before delivery; that is, the vendor retained the title until the corn had been paid for. If the corn was of the quality ordered, the vendee was bound to pay the purchase price on demand, and accept the corn when offered. There is no conflict in the evidence as to the terms upon which the corn was sold, or as to the quality of corn to be delivered. There is a conflict as to the time of delivery, and also a conflict as to what transpired between the defendant and the agent of the plaintiffs after the corn reached Savannah. The agent of the plaintiffs testified that the corn was purchased for prompt delivery, which, as explained by him, meant that the corn should be shipped at any time within fifteen days. He also testified that the contract was made under the rules of the Savannah board of trade, and one of the rules of that board was that prompt delivery meant shipment and delivery within five days. The defendant testified that the corn was bought for immediate shipment. Under the rule of the Savannah board of trade, this meant shipment within two days. But the defendant denied that the contract was made under the rules of the board of trade. There was no special plea setting up that the goods were not promptly shipped, the only special defense pleaded being that the corn which reached Savannah was not of the quality ordered. Under the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to determine whether, under the averments of the petition and the general denial by the answer, the question of whether the failure to ship in due time, as contended by the defendant, was available as a defense. For the purposes of this case, it will be conceded that the corn was shipped in due time. There is little or no conflict in the evidence as to the condition of the corn at the time it reached Savannah, and that it was then of the character and quality ordered. There is also little or no conflict with the evidence that at the time of resale it had deteriorated in value, and that this had been brought about by the fact that it had remained upon the wharf in Savannah, subject to the action of the moist atmosphere resulting from the proximity to the river and fogs.

If the corn was not of the quality ordered, of course, the defendant was not bound to accept it at any time. If the corn was of the quality ordered, the defendant was bound to accept and pay for it on demand. The plaintiffs had the right, after due notice of nonacceptance, to treat the corn as the property of the vendee, sell it, and charge the vendee with the difference between the contract price and the price of resale. But, in order to exercise this right and bind the defendant by the price at resale, it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to exercise due care in preserving the corn in the condition it was at the time it reached Savannah, until a resale was made. If the plaintiffs allowed a condition of affairs to continue which would cause a deterioration in the value of the corn, and which it could have prevented by the exercise of due care, the defendant could not be held responsible for the deterioration in value, unless the failure of the plaintiffs to exercise due care resulted from the conduct of the defendant. Whether the corn being allowed to remain on the wharf in Savannah was due to the conduct of the defendant is a question about which the evidence is conflicting. Evidence for the plaintiffs authorized a finding that the defendant, upon notice that the corn had arrived in Savannah, asked for a delay of a few days before paying the draft and accepting the corn, and that the defendant's conduct was such, from time to time, as to leave the impression that the draft might be paid any day, and the corn accepted. The defendant denied that he was responsible at all for the delay in removing the corn from the wharf. The jury were authorized to find, as stated, that the delay in removing the corn was due to the dilatory method adopted by the defendant in reference to the payment of the draft. If this is the truth of the case, it would not lie in the mouth of the defendant to claim that he should not be charged upon the basis of the value of the corn at the time it was received in Savannah, when the delay and deterioration was the direct result of his conduct. On the other hand, if the truth of the case was that the defendant promptly refused to accept the corn and the failure to remove it from the wharf resulted in its deterioration in value, the defendant would not be responsible for this deterioration, if it should appear that the plaintiffs, in the exercise of ordinary diligence, should have removed it to a place of deposit where such deterioration would not have taken place. The defendant may have given an untenable reason for refusing the corn; that is, that the corn was not shipped promptly; but without reference to this, pending the period that elapsed from the time the corn reached Savannah to the date of resale, the vendor was under obligation to exercise due care in the preservation of the corn until it could be resold. We do not think that the charge of the court distinctly submitted this issue to the jury, and some of the exceptions to the charge as given were well taken, for the reason that the instructions as given excluded this issue from the consideration of the jury.

3. Some of the instructions of the judge which are assigned as error submitted to the jury the question of delivery in cases of sale, explaining the difference between actual and constructive delivery, etc. We have been unable to find any evidence which authorized the submission of this issue to the jury. There was no delivery, either actual or constructive, as we apprehend the evidence. It is true that there was a rule of the Savannah board of trade, which was in evidence, as follows: "Number of lay days allowed after arrival of goods before rejecting or accepting, five days after being discharged from car or vessel, as case may be." But we do not think it a proper construction of this rule that a delay of more than five days before accepting or rejecting would, after a lapse of that time, amount to a constructive delivery of the goods. Other portions of the charge upon which error was assigned contained instructions upon what would be the law in the event that there had been a change of the contract to an ordinary sale of goods. We do not see any evidence authorizing an instruction upon this subject. As we apprehend the evidence, a jury would not be authorized to find that there had been any change in the terms of the contract. The plaintiffs steadfastly maintained their position as a seller of goods with the purchase price payable before delivery. The defendant, with equal vigor, maintained that he was not bound to receive the goods, because they were not of the quality ordered, and that they were not shipped in due time. In addition to this, there was nothing in the plaintiffs' petition to authorize a recovery on any other theory than that the goods were shipped with title reserved, purchase price to be paid on demand before delivery. The submission of these two issues to the jury, which it seems to us was entirely unauthorized by the evidence, was prejudicial to the defendant; and a reversal of the judgment must result. In reference to those assignments of error which complain of the judge allowing certain evidence in rebuttal, which should have been offered in chief, we only have to say that these fall within the rule that the judgment will not be reversed on this ground, unless a manifest abuse of discretion appears, which is not true in this case.

TOWN OF BANGOR et al., Appts.,

v.

BAY CITY TRACTION & ELECTRIC COMPANY.

(— Mich. —, 110 N. W. 490.)

Equity—street railway—removal of tracks.

1. Equity has jurisdiction of a bill to require the removal from a public highway

Case Note.—The effect of acquiescence or consent by a town or municipality to construction or use of a railroad in street or highway to estop it from objecting thereto:—That the principle of estoppel

Street railway—estoppel to object to.

2. Municipal authorities cannot become estopped to require the removal from a street of the rails of a street railway by standing by and seeing the rails laid without objection.

(February 5, 1907.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Bay County in defendant's favor in a suit to require the removal of rails from a street of the corporation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pierce & Kinnane, for appellants:

The encroachment statute does not apply in this case.

will be applied to municipal corporations in reference to ordinary contracts, which do not relate to such property as streets, highways, public parks, and other property held in trust by them for the benefit of the people, is clear. As applied to property of the class mentioned, however, the decisions of the courts are in conflict, some of them holding that the only way that any rights can be acquired in such property is by such action on the part of the officers of a municipality as complies with the statute which authorizes such contracts. Another line of authorities recognizes no distinction between the ordinary contracts of a municipality and contracts relating to what may be termed "trust" property. Accordingly, it has been held by these last-mentioned decisions that a municipality or township may be estopped to object to the operation of a railroad along its streets and highways by the acquiescence of its officers.

Such was the holding in the case of Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & Transit Co. 164 Ill. 224, 35 L.R.A. 281, 45 N. E. 430, where the officers of a municipality had acquiesced for a period of upwards of twenty years in the construction and operation of a railroad along certain streets in that municipality, and the company had, in obedience to the commands of the municipal authorities, expended considerable sums of money in improvements at the street crossings in constructing and repairing culverts, planking the crossings, erecting and maintaining safety gates and electric lights, constructing plank and cement walks, and other improvements beneficial to the general public and to the municipality, as well as to the railroad itself. Because of these facts, it was held that the municipality was estopped from questioning the right of said railroad company to use such streets, and from directing the removal of the railroad therefrom.

The same principle was announced in the case of Pembroke Twp. v. Canada C. R. Co. 3 Ont. Rep. 503, but in this case the company had been given the right by statutory enactment to construct its road along the streets and highways of municipalities with 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

their consent. The municipality, besides raising no objection to the construction of the railroad along its streets and highways, by resolution, required the railroad company to fill up ditches on both sides of its track and have proper crossings put down at the cross streets. The company conformed to these requirements. This acquiescence on the part of the officers of the municipality, and the resolution in question, were held to amount to the consent required by statute.

And in the case of Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 89 Pa. 210, where the legislature of the state had given a railroad company the right to use and occupy streets in the city of Philadelphia by and with the consent of the common council, and the surveyors of the city approved the plan for the construction of such railroad along the streets of said city, and such road was constructed and operated by a double track for about seven years, after which the double track was torn up and removed and a single track laid and used for upwards of ten years, it was held that the municipality was estopped from objecting to the use of such streets by said railroad company, and that said company had the right to take up its single track and lay and use a double track in said streets.

And the same principle was applied in the case of Spokane Street R. Co. v. Spokane Falls, 6 Wash. 521, 33 Pac. 1072, in which case the city council had, by ordinance, authorized said company to lay its tracks along certain streets. It, however, with the knowledge of the city officials, laid its tracks along other streets not mentioned in said ordinance, and the road was assessed by the city for this very property. This was held to estop the city from claiming that it did not consent to the construction of such railroad.

And in the cases of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 25, and Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 91 Ill. 251, where the officers of the municipality had acquiesced in the use of certain of its streets by a railroad company, and had levied taxes upon its property on said streets, they were held estopped to claim that they had not consented to such use of the streets by said railroad company.

So, also, it was held in the case of City R. Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 166 U. S. 557, 41 L. ed. 1114, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 653, where, by an invalid ordinance, the franchise of a railroad company was extended for a period of twenty years, with the knowledge upon the part of the municipality that such extension was going to be used as a basis for negotiating a loan for said railroad company, that such city, having the power to grant the extension, was estopped from denying the validity of the ordinance upon the ground that it was without legal consideration.

In Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. 56 Fed. 867, it was held that an ordinance extending the time of a franchise to a railroad company was invalid, and conferred no rights upon the railroad company; and the facts that such extension ordinance was accepted and acquiesced in by both parties for a period of ten years, and that, on the faith thereof, the railroad company expended large sums of money in the improvement of its tracks on said streets, did not alter the rule. The decision of this case, however, was based upon the fact that the municipality did not have the power to grant the extension in question.

To the same effect is Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. 60 Fed. 161.

The doctrine of BANGOR v. BAY CITY TRACTION & ELECTRIC CO. was declared and applied in the case of Morris & E. R. Co. v. Newark, 10 N. J. Eq. 352, in which case the railroad company, without any complaint on the part of the city of Newark, laid its tracks along certain of the streets in that municipality, improved the same, and expended large sums of money thereon. It was not claimed by the railroad company that they had either a parol or written consent from such municipality to the occupancy of its streets. Under this state of facts, it was held that such acquiescence did not amount to a license; neither could there be any fraud inferred from the fact that the city did not interfere, but 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

stood by in silence while the railroad company expended its moneys in the construction of this road upon a public street.

The principle of estoppel as applied to the acquiescence or consent of a municipal corporation to the use of its streets by a railroad company has been denied in many cases upon the theory that such consent or acquiescence is beyond the power of such corporation, of which fact the railroad company is charged with notice, and therefore cannot, by reason thereof, gain any rights to such streets as it may use in reliance upon such consent. This principle was applied in the case of Rice v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 30 Ill. App. 481, in which case a railroad company laid its tracks along a highway, with the consent of the commissioners of highways, and with an understanding with such commissioners that, in consideration thereof, said railroad company would be at its own expense to build another highway in lieu of the one so used by the railroad company. Such agreement was held to be beyond the power of said commissioners, and the fact that said company had expended large sums of money in reliance upon it was held not to amount to an estoppel as against the township.

And where a railroad company was authorized by a legislative enactment to use certain streets in the city of New York for its tracks, by and with the consent of that city; and such railroad company did not use such streets as provided by this law, but did construct its tracks in a different manner, but with the consent of such city,—these facts were held not to estop the city from annulling the ordinance by which such rights had been conferred upon the company. People v. New York & H. R. Co. 45 Barb. 73.

And in the two cases of Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. supra, it was held that a municipality, by an invalid ordinance, could not estop itself, or confer any rights upon a railroad company, even though such ordinance was acted upon by such company, where such municipality did not have the power to make the contract, as attempted by such ordinance.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant purchased a street railway constructed in a highway, within the township of Bangor, in Bay county. It files this bill alleging that the railway was built without the consent, and against the repeated protests, of the township authorities, and has been so maintained and operated ever since. It prays the removal of the road. A hearing was had upon the merits, on pleadings and proofs taken in open court, and the bill was dismissed upon the ground that the court of chancery has no jurisdiction in such a case, unless given by statute; that the only statute upon which jurisdiction can be predicated

And the fact that a railroad company began to construct its tracks upon a public street, and expended large sums of money in reliance upon a consent to the use of the street by the municipality, which consent was void, was held to confer no right to such street upon such railroad company. Underground R. Co. v. New York, 116 Fed. 952.

So, also, in the case of St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Belleville, 122 Ill. 376, 12 N. E. 680, where a committee of the common council and the city attorney consented to the exclusive use of a certain street in said city by said railroad company; and the city, by an invalid ordinance, had offered such rights, and, in reliance upon such conduct, promises, and ordinance, the company constructed and operated its tracks on the streets of said city,—these facts were held not to estop the city from removing said company and its tracks from said street, on the theory that such railroad company was charged with notice of the invalidity of said ordinance and the want of authority of such city attorney and such committee.

And in Denver & S. R. Co. v. Denver City R. Co. 2 Colo. 673, it was held that the construction and operation of a railroad on the streets of a city without a valid ordinance authorizing the same amounted to a public nuisance.

And in Pennsylvania it is held that consent given by a municipality to a railroad company to construct its tracks on a public street will confer no rights upon such railroad company, unless it first has legislative authority. Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co. 27 Pa. 339, 67 Am. Dec. 471.

And the same rule was declared in the case of Kavanagh v. Mobile & G. R. Co. 78 Ga. 271, 2 S. E. 636, where a municipality attempted to confer upon a railroad company the right to use a street without a legal vote of the inhabitants of such municipality, as provided by law.

So, also, in the case of Logansport R. Co. v. Logansport, 114 Fed. 688, where the city sought by ordinance to repeal an ordinance by which it attempted to grant the perpetual use of a street to a railroad company, upon a proceeding by the railroad company to restrain the city from enforcing its repealing ordinance, it was held that the original ordinance was beyond the power of the city to enact; and that, therefore, it was not to be estopped or prevented thereby from repealing the same, and depriving such railroad company of the rights thereby granted it.

And in Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 506, 67 Am. Dec. 186, it was held that, as it was not within the power of a municipality to confer upon a railroad company the right to use a street, it could not, therefore, be estopped by the conduct of any of its officers.

So, also, in the case of Ashland v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 105 Wis. 398, 80 N. W. 1101, the fact that a railroad company had expended considerable money in reliance upon an agreement by a city to vacate a certain street and allow such railroad company the use of the same, which agreement was ultra vires as to such city, will not estop the city from claiming said street.

And, where a city, by ordinance, authorized and empowered a railroad company to construct and operate its tracks upon all the streets and alleys of said city, and also such streets and alleys as might thereafter be opened for a given period, it was held that it had no authority to surrender its control over its streets, or to tie up its hands by an exclusive contract, so as to preclude a subsequent council from exercising the trust vested in it over its streets for the benefit of the public. Florida C. & is Comp. Laws, § 433, and that such statute applies only where an encroachment is shown, that this statute was not intended to modify the rule that, where the law affords a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, such remedy should be sought, instead of a remedy in equity; and that an adequate legal remedy is provided by Comp. Laws, §§ 4121-4126. As a further ground, the learned circuit judge said that the case was within the rule followed in the cases of Lebanon Twp. v. Burch, 78 Mich. 641, 44 N. W. 148, and Greenfield Twp. v. Norton, 111 Mich. 53, 69 N. W. 95.

We infer from the defendant's brief that the testimony sustains the bill upon the point that the railway was built without obtaining authority from the township in the way pointed out by statute, but defendant seems to rely on an estoppel, based on the acquiescence of the officers of the township, or failure to take steps to prevent the construction of the railway.

P. R. Co. v. Ocala Street & Suburban R. Co. 39 Fla. 306, 22 So. 692.

And it is also held that, where a city had consented to the use of a street by a railway company, which consent both the railroad company and the city had recognized as a license, the fact that thereafter the railroad company made extensive and lasting improvements upon such street, and held possession of the same for over forty-five years without objection from such city, did not estop the city from exercising its right to revoke the license originally granted to said railroad company. Cleveland v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 93 Fed. 113.

Neither will the fact that a city has granted to a railroad company a general consent to occupy all the streets of the city for railway purposes take away from it the right, before the railroad constructs a railway on an unoccupied street, to require it to obtain the consent of the common council of said city to location, survey, and construction. Citizens' Street R. Co. v. City R. Co. 64 Fed. 647.

And where a railway company constructs its tracks on the streets of a city in accordance with an agreement with such city, and it afterwards abandons such tracks, such original consent upon the part of the city will not estop it from conferring upon another company the right to use such street without first taking any steps at law to forfeit the right granted to the first company. Galveston City R. Co. v. Galveston City Street R. Co. 63 Tex. 529.

Neither will the fact that a city has consented to the use of certain streets by a railway company for the carrying of passengers prevent it from restraining such railroad company from using said streets in the transportation of freight. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. v. Kirkwood, 159 Mo. 239, 53 L.R.A. 300, 60 S. W. 110. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The testimony shows that the construction of the railway began in 1889. The highway commissioner was informed that work was being done in the highway, and a meeting of the township board was held soon after to consider what should be done, and the board looked over the premises where the work was being done. The record of this meeting shows:

"Before calling the meeting to order the board proceeded to examine the highway between sections 9 and 10, town 14 north, range 5 east, pursuant to the request of the highway commissioner of the township of Bangor, and ascertaining the following facts, viz.: The West Bay City Railway Company is constructing a street railway on the highway running north and south between said sections, using dirt from near the center of the highway for the construction of said railway, and grading on the east side of said highway, and whereas said railroad proposes to secure lands

The principle of estoppel has also been applied where a railroad company has held possession of a street in a city for the period required by the statute of limitations to gain title to property by adverse possession. Such was the case of New Castle v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 155 Ind. 18, 57 N. E. 516, in which state the municipalities have the authority to allow railroad companies to lay their tracks upon streets and highways, which use, however, must not destroy or unreasonably impair the use of the streets by the general public. The railroad company constructed its tracks along a street of such municipality without its consent, but without objection on its part. It had, however, used this street for railway purposes for upwards of twenty years, and, while the court found no estoppel by conduct, no concealment or misrepresentation upon the part of the town, nor any other elements of estoppel, yet, it held that the railroad company had gained the right to use the street by prescription, and that if, in the first instance, the use of the street was unlawful and subject to revocation, yet it had now become irrevocable by reason of the expenditures of such railroad company with the knowledge of the municipality.

But it has also been held that a railway company cannot, by the use of a portion of a street for any length of time, thereby gain an absolute ownership of that portion of the street. Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Ross, 47 Ind. 25.

As to effect of consent or acquiescence to estop an abutting owner to complain of the construction of a track in the street, see the case note to Wolfard v. Fisher, ante, 991. As to estoppel of municipality to complain of encroachments upon street by improvements made by abutting property owners, see case note to Oliver v. Synhorst, ante, 243.

on the west side of the said highway to widen the highway, and the people adjoining said highway are satisfied, therefore it is

"Resolved, that the board take no action at the present, and leave the consideration for some future date.

"Carried."

The supervisor had some talk with officers of the company, and was informed that it was its intention to buy as much land on the west side of the highway as it was using of the highway on the east side, and to widen the highway to that extent, and this project was talked over at the meeting. Action was purposely deferred to see if that should be done. The railway company proceeded to complete the railway. It neither bought the land, nor widened the street. The township officers complained several times about the condition of the highway, but could get nothing done. The township board took no further action until some years after. In June, 1902, notice was served by the township authorities on the receivers of the railway company demanding a removal of the road from the highway, for reasons enumerated in the notice. On August 14, 1902, Mr. Weadock, the managing receiver of the railway company, and in charge and control of the business of the company, had some negotiations with the township officers upon his application, and was present at one or more meetings of the township board, and these negotiations resulted in the granting of a franchise for a railroad along the highway in question, to the United Traction Company, its successors and assigns, upon terms and conditions stated therein. The record of the township treats this as an application of the Bay Cities Consolidated Street Car Company "for a franchise of its road through Bangor township, on the east side of the line between sections 9 and 10 and 3 and 4." The record states the fact of the arrival of Mr. Weadock, the examination of the premises upon the question of a proposed doubling of the track, and that Mr. Weadock paid the expenses of the meeting. The record of August 16, 1902, shows a meeting on that date, and an adjournment of the meeting to August 20th, "to meet Mr Weadock, the receiver." The record of the meeting held on August 20th is significant. It states that the township board met on that date pursuant to adjournment, to consider the terms and conditions on which "a franchise might be granted to the United Traction Company, formerly known as the 'Bay Cities Consolidated Street Railway Company' running its cars on the line of the highway" (describing it). It continues: "This road was first built in 1899, by Fisher, Aplin, & McGill without acquiring any right to lay their track in the highway. The first mile was then an established highway, and the second mile was private property; and now, when the township had entered an action to oust them, they apply for a franchise." It shows that Weadock, receiver, and E. S. Dimmock, general manager, were present representing the United Traction Company, and that Mr. Weadock presented "the request of his company" for a franchise for thirty years and a right to lay a single or a double track, and to charge a 5-cent fare on these 2 miles. The substance of the negotiations follows. Again, Mr. Weadock paid the costs of the meeting, and the franchise was agreed upon and was entered in the record. At that time it was contemplated that the road would soon be sold at receiver's sale, and the purpose of asking for the franchise was understood to be to give the purchaser a franchise under which it could operate the road, and it was given in the name of a company not then in existence, to avoid giving another later, it being expected that it would be transferred to such company as should purchase the road. The road was sold to the Bay Cities United Traction Company, a company organized for the purpose of purchasing it, and this franchise was assigned to it, without any consideration, other than reimbursing the receiver for the expense incurred in procuring it. The Bay Cities United Traction Company was afterwards consolidated with the Traction & Power Company, under the statute, taking the name of the Bay City Traction & Electric Company. It is said that, either before or after such consolidation, it was determined not to operate the road under this franchise, and the new company has refused to comply with its terms.

The points relied on by defendant seem to be: (1) That the court has no jurisdiction of this cause, because there is an adequate remedy at law, if complainant's claim is valid. (2) That it is estopped from asking the relief sought, because of the acquiescence of its officers in the building and maintenance of the road, it being contended, also, that the proceedings of 1902 have no force as against this defendant. A railway which is built in a highway without authority of law is not rightfully there, and the public has a right to have it removed, whether it be called an encroachment, an obstruction, or a nuisance. Defendants appear to contend that this is neither an obstruction nor a nuisance, for the reason that we have held that the use of public highways, by street railway companies, is a legitimate use of the highway, and does not create an additional servitude upon the land of the adjoining proprietor, and that it must, therefore, be an encroachment or a trespass; if the former, not the subject of equitable relief, and, if the latter, waived by the conduct of the officers. While a railroad lawfully constructed on a highway, and rightfully there, cannot be held to be an unlawful obstruction of, or encroachment upon, the highway, it is an obstruction in the sense that any structure or new use may be an obstruction to its use by the public generally to a greater or less extent. Thus, in the case of Atty. Gen. v. Bay State Brick Co. 115 Mass. 431, it was held that a track laid across the highway by the owner of lands adjacent, by the consent of the township authorities, might be an obstruction, and, if the surveyors should so determine (the surveyors being public officers authorized to determine such questions), a court of equity would not review their action, notwithstanding the consent of the township authorities. The inference deducible is that, though the person who built the track owned the fee of the highway, and might use it so long as his use did not interfere with the public use (though they reserved that question), when it should appear, as matter of repair, that the railway interfered with public travel and the proper use of the highway, it was an obstruction. The case contains an intimation that such tracks might be considered inconsistent with the use of the public, but, as already said, that question was not decided. This defendant was not an adjacent landowner, and has no color of right to occupy the street, except such as the statutes then in force conferred, and, in building its line, placed an obstruction in the way, of which the township authorities had a right to complain and to take measures to remove; and we hesitate to say that it may not have been a nuisance which they might ask equity to abate, for we think that it does not follow, from the recognition of a lawful street railroad as a proper adjunct to a highway, that an unlawfully constructed one cannot be a nuisance. See Elliott, Roads & Streets, §§ 644, 802, and cases cited. If it is so claimed, equity has jurisdiction to try the question, and the township may bring the suit, as we held in Merritt Twp. v. Harp, 131 Mich. 174, 91 N. W. 156. The cases of Lebanon Twp. v. Burch, 78 Mich. 641, 44 N. W. 148, and Greenfield Twp. v. Norton, 111 Mich. 53, 69 N. W. 95, upon which defendant rests its contention that equity is not the proper forum to seek redress in a case of this kind, were cases of encroachment, by adjacent proprietors. The opinion in the former case indicates that the court was considering cases where the landowner seeks to extend his adjacent occupancy beyond the highway line, and the discussion applied to cases where the proceeding is to settle highway lines, cases there said to be peculiarly within the jurisdiction of highway officers, and in which class of cases it was held there was no occasion for resort to equity, unless, possibly, under some peculiar circumstances which cannot generally exist. See also Grand Rapids v. Hughes, 15 Mich. 54, defining encroachment. The case of Greenfield Twp. v. Norton, supra, was a similar case, a barn being erected partly in the highway. We are of the opinion that, if this cause can be said to be within the general rule stated in those cases, it is also within the exception suggested; and that equity may entertain a bill to determine and enforce the rights of the parties.

The defendant's alleged estoppel cannot be sustained. If private persons can create easements by estoppel, under our statute of frauds, and our decisions; or if a license may be implied from the acquiescence of a private person, who stands by and sees, without protest, his land used for a railway,—the same cannot be said of township officers, who have no authority except such as the statute gives; and, if it could be, the testimony does not justify such a finding. See Goose River Bank v. Willow Lake School Twp. 1 N. D. 26, 26 Am. St. Rep. 605, 44 N. W. 1002. We must hold that the only authority that the defendant has is traceable to the action of the board in 1902, and it must submit to a decree in accordance with the prayer of complainant's bill, unless, within thirty days after service of a copy of this opinion, it file an election to take a decree adjudging such relief, conditioned upon its failure to accept and comply with the terms imposed by the township board in said resolution or franchise. The complainant will recover costs of both courts.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

RE WILL OF ELIJAH POPE.

(139 N. C. 484, 52 S. E. 235.)

Will—attestation.

A proper attestation of a will by a witness is effected, the other requirements

Case Note.—Does ability to write invalidate signature made by mark or by aid of other person guiding the pen: — It is declared in 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, 14th being present, if he holds the end of the pen while it is guided by another in the writing of his name; and it is immaterial that such aid is not necessary because the witness can write.

(November 15, 1905.)

APPEAL by proponent from a judgment of the Superior Court for Iredell County in favor of contestants in a proceeding to determine the validity of a writing propounded as the will of Elijah Pope, deceased. Reversed.

The witness whose signature was disputed testified that testator was her father, and that he asked her to sign the will. It appeared that she asked the other attesting witness to write her name, and that he complied, but she testified: "I had hand on the pen. I signed it. Nobody held my hand. When I signed it I was standing at Martin's [the other attesting witness's] back. He had the pen. I held the pen at the end. In this way my name was put to the will."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. L. C. Caldwell and Z. V. Long, for appellant:

A signature of a witness's own name, when his hand is guided by another, is sufficient.

Chase v. Kittredge, 11 Allen, 49, 87 Am. Dec. 694; Simmons v. Leonard, 91 Tenn. 183, 30 Am. St. Rep. 875, 18 S. W. 290; 1 Wms.

ed. § 674, that a signature by mark is now held sufficient, even though the testator was able to write; and that the signature may be made by another person guiding his hand with his consent. The same doctrine is declared in 1 Jarman, Wills, 69.

The first case that seems to have passed on this question is that of Baker v. Denning, 8 Ad. & El. 94, reported as Taylor v. Denning, 3 Nev. & P. 228, also reported in 1 W. W. & H. 148, and 2 Jur. 775. In this case, holding that a mark is a sufficient signature to a will though the testator could write, one of the judges said that to hold otherwise would throw upon the court a strange inquiry in all cases of marksmen as to whether they could write or not.

The same doctrine is declared in Main v. Ryder, 84 Pa. 217, under the Pennsylvania act of 1848, where it appeared that the testator knew how to write. Dicta to the same effect are found in Finlay v. Prescott, 104 Wis. 617, 47 L.R.A. 695, 80 N. W. 930, and St. Louis Hospital Asso. v. Williams, 19 Mo. 609; but in these cases that question was not involved, and in the latter it appeared that the testator was too ill to write. Likewise, in Bailey v. Bailey, 35 Ala. 687, the same rule is declared, though in that case it did not appear whether the testator could write or not.

In Brown v. Butchers' & D. Bank, 6 Hill, 443, 41 Am. Dec. 755, the figures 1, 2, 8, in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Exrs. 146; Campbell v. Logan, 2 Bradf. 90. Where a witness joins in the physical act of attesting, it is sufficient.

Riley v. Riley, 36 Ala. 496.

The name of a witness to a will may be written in his presence, and by his authority, and is a valid attestation.

Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 52 Am. Dec. 102; Pridgen v. Pridgen, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 280; Smythe v. Irick, 46 S. C. 299, 32 L.R.A. 77, 57 Am. St. Rep. 684, 24 S. E. 69.

Messrs. J. B. Connelly and R. B. McLaughlin for appellees.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The point which the parties desired and intended to present, and which the record does present, is thus stated in the case on appeal: "The only question is as to the attestation of the will by one of the subscribing witnesses, C. L. Pope; her name appearing thereon in the normal handwriting of the other subscribing witness, M. L. Miller, and nothing appearing on the face of the paper to show that Miller had authority to sign her name, or that the subscription is not in her handwriting, except from the evidence which is set forth in the case." On that question the court is of opinion that there was error in the ruling of the judge below; and on the testimony presented, if believed by the jury, the paper dorsed by a person with a lead pencil on the back of a note, without writing his name, were held to constitute a valid indorsement if he wrote them as a substitute for his name.

Several cases have sustained signatures made by mark, or otherwise than by writing one's own name, when the person could actually write, but without the court's seeming to attach any special importance to that fact.

Thus, in Den ex dem. Stevens v. Vancleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 262, Fed. Cas. No. 13,412, a signature to a will, made by the aid of another person guiding the testator's hand, was held valid. It appeared that he could write; but this fact was not discussed. So, in Flannery's Will, 24 Pa. 502, a signature by mark, made to a will by one who knew how to write, was held good; but his ability to write was not discussed by the court.

In Carroll v. McGee, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 13, a signature made by holding a pen which another person guided was held good; but it did not appear whether the signer could write or not.

The fact that a person knows how to write seems to be immaterial if for any reason he is unable to do so. It is stated in Watson v. Pipes, 32 Miss. 451, in a case where a testator's hand was guided by another, that this is good whether his incapacity to write was due to ignorance, or writing was properly proved as the last will and testament of Elijah Pope. In construing the statute as to written wills, with witnesses, it is accepted law that the witness must subscribe his name to the paper writing animo testandi, in the presence of the testator, and after the testator has himself signed the same. Ragland v. Huntingdon, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 563; Re Cox, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 321; Chase v. Kittredge, 11 Allen, 49, 87 Am. Dec. 687. And it has been long established that the witness may properly subscribe by making his mark. Pridgen v. Pridgen, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 259; Devereux v. McMahon, 108 N. C. 134, 12 L.R.A. 205, 12 S. E. 902. Some of the courts have also decided that the witness may subscribe by causing a third person to write the name of the witness in his presence and that of the testator, and without such witness taking any physical part in the act. Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 52 Am. Dec. 102; Smythe v. Irick, 46 S. C. 299, 32 L.R.A. 77, 57 Am. St. Rep. 684, 24 S. E. 69. And the courts of New Hampshire, Kentucky, Kansas, and some recent decisions in New York are to the same effect. There is strong authority to the contrary. Riley v. Riley, 36 Ala. 496; Simmons v. Leonard, 91 Tenn. 183, 30 Am. St. Rep. 875, 18 S. W. 280; McFarland v. Bush, 94 Tenn. 538, 27 L.R.A. 662, 45 Am. St. Rep. 760, 29 S. W. 899; Horton v. Johnson, 18 Ga. 396. Our own court does not seem to have passed on this question directly, and it is not necessary to do so in the case before us; for the evidence is to the effect that Candace Pope held the pen during the entire time her name was being written. The witness took part in the physical act of writing her name animo testandi in the presence of the testator, at his request, and thus fulfils every requirement for an effectual subscribing witness to a will. Such requirement is stated by an approved writer as follows: "A person, to become a subscribing witness to a will, must sign his name, or make his mark, or do some physical act, toward affixing or recognizing his name, which he intends as a subscription." Martindale, Conv. 2d ed. p. 554. And in Underhill on Wills, vol. 1, p. 274, it is said that not only a mark with the name of the witness attached, but anything that the witness shall write with intent that it shall stand for his name, shall be a valid signing by him. It has also been held that, if the witness puts his name to the paper animo testandi, he may subscribe by affixing his initials, and his hand may be even guided by another. If the witness can effectually subscribe in the many modes suggested, it would seem that he could do so when he holds the pen while his entire name and full signature is written.

The only reason suggested against the validity of this attestation is the fact that the was caused by accident or disease. The same was held where one's hand was aided because it was unsteady from palsy. Vandruft v. Rinehart, 29 Pa. 232. Likewise, in Long v. Zook, 13 Pa. 400, where the testator's right hand was disabled, though he knew how to write; and in Re Field, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 753, where the testator was so badly paralyzed that he had lost the use of speech, and almost of his limbs. Similar decisions are those where the incapacity was because of illness. Wilson v. Beddard, 12 Sim. 28; Cozzen's Will, 61 Pa. 196.

On the other hand, the prerogative court, in Re Kileher, 6 Notes of Cases, 15, declined administration under a will where the names of attesting witnesses who could write were written by another, while they merely touched the top of the pen. Yet the court did not expressly declare that such a signature would not in any case be good where the persons could write, but regarded it as a suspicious fact that their names were signed in this way while they were fairly written to an affidavit, and when it further appeared that the widow asking for administration with this will annexed was thereby proceeding to disinherit herself, and get only a shilling. It seems that the decision was based on the fact of the suspicious circumstances taken all together. The court said: "I cannot decree administration with this will annexed under the circumstances 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) without a great deal more explanation than appears on the face of the paper."

One Pennsylvania case also seems to be out of harmony with the majority of the decisions. This is Cavett's Appeal, 8 Watts & S. 21, 42 Am. Dec. 262. Under a statute in general terms providing that a will shall be signed by a testator at the end, or by some person in his presence and by his express direction, the court held, in accordance with comments of commissioners, who had revised the statute, that the right to sign by mark, and have some other person write his name, was limited to testator's inability to sign by his own hand. The court, while admitting that this was not explicitly declared by the statute, held that it should be so construed, as it was not a supposable case that the legislature meant to subvert a wholesome principle of the law of evidence under which the writing of the person himself was better evidence of authenticity than that of anyone else; but the authority of this case in that state is abrogated by later cases under which the other Pennsylvania cases, above cited, were decided.

The authorities are well nigh unanimous, therefore, in support of the decision of the above reported North Carolina case of RE POPE.

On the subject of signature by mark generally, see note to Re Guilfoyle, 22 L.R.A. 370.

witness was able to write herself, and it is contended that this kind of signature is only sanctioned when the witness is unable to write, or, at most, when temporarily disabled. But the authorities do not support this position. As a matter of fact, in most cases where the witness has been permitted to subscribe in this way, he was unable to write; but this fact was not regarded as essential, and should not be controlling. One principal purpose in requiring the attestation of wills is to surround the testator with witnesses who are charged with the present duty of noting his condition and mental capacity. Another is to insure the identity of the instrument, and to prevent the fraudulent substitution of another document at the time of its execution. Taking part in some physical act in the presence of the testator by which the name of the witness is affixed to the instrument animo testandi is the essential feature of the requirement. Re Cox, supra. It is always desirable that a witness who can write his name should be selected, and that he should write the signature in his own hand; but this is a matter of convenience in the probate of the paper, more particularly in case of the death of the witness, and does not bear with special force on the act of execution,—the res gesta. Thus, in Harrison v. Elvin, 3 Ad. & El. N. S. 117, where it was urged upon the court that only a witness who could write should be allowed as a subscribing witness, because otherwise the signature could not be proved after his death, Lord Denman rejected the suggestion as controlling, saying that this was only an inconvenience and likely to arise in any kind of an attestation. It is not of the first importance, therefore, whether the witness could or could not write, and the authorities are to the effect that to become an effectual subscribing witness by making a mark, or in the other ways suggested, it is not necessary to show as a prerequisite that the witness was unable to write. In Martindale, on Conveyancing, § 190, it is said: "It may be observed that it is not necessary that the party should write his own name; his mark is sufficient, though he be able to write." In 3 Washburn on Real Property, 286, we find it stated as follows: "Affixing a mark by the grantor against his name, though written by another, is a signing, although it do not appear that he could not write his own name." These authorities are cited with approval in Devereux v. McMahon, 108 N. C. 142, 144, 12 L.R.A. 205, 12 S. E. 902. In 1 Williams on Executors, 134, it is said that the decisions on the construction of the statute of frauds appear to make it clear that in case of the witness, as well as the testator, the subscription by mark is sufficient, notwithstanding the witness is able to write. In Jesse v. Parker, supra, it is not stated that the witness could not write; and in Smythe v. Irick, supra, it expressly appears that the witness could write, and it was held that this fact did not affect the principle. It will be noted that these two last cases are from courts which maintain the position that a subscription can be made without any physical or manual act by the witness at all; but they are apt as authorities on the position now being maintained. The point is expressly decided against the position of the caveators in Baker v. Dening, 8 Ad. & El. 94. The witness Candace Pope having taken part in the physical act of writing her name as witness, and this having been done animo testandi, at the request of the testator, and in his presence, the court is of opinion that she is an effectual subscribing witness to the will, and that this result is not affected by the fact that such witness was, at the time, able to write her own name.

There was error in the ruling of the court, and a new trial is awarded.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

DAVID T. DAVIES, JR., Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF OHIO EX REL. JAMES L. BOYLES.

(75 Ohio St. 114, 78 N. E. 955.)

Tax—public purpose.

1. The legislative power of this state is delegated to the general assembly. This comprises the taxing power; but the power of the state to take the property of its citizens by a tax is not broader than the purpose for which the state is formed, and so is not wholly within the discretion of the legislature, but, without express prohibition, is subject to the inherent limitation that it may be exercised only for a public purpose.

Same—relief of blind.

2. The act entitled "An Act to Provide Relief for Worthy Blind," passed April 25, 1904 (97 Ohio Laws, p. 392), which provides that all male blind persons over the age of twenty-one years, and all female blind per-

Case Note. — Validity of statute providing for governmental assistance of individual members of certain classes of unfortunate or afflicted persons: — While there appear to be no other decisions in which the validity of statutes of the kind considered in DAVIES v. STATE has been under review, the question of the extent to which public aid may be given other than through public sons over the age of eighteen years, who have been residents of the state for five years and of the county for one year, and have no property or means with which to support themselves, shall be entitled to and receive not more than $25 per capita quarterly from the county treasury, is unconstitutional, for the reason that it requires the expenditure for a private purpose of public funds raised by taxation.

(October 16, 1906.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lucas County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas granting a writ of mandamus to compel payment of an allowance to relator under institutions has arisen in relation to various other statutes, the decisions as to which may properly be taken in connection with the case reported as illustrating the same fundamental principles. It should be noted, however, that these decisions are affected to some extent by various constitutional provisions.

In Patty v. Colgan, 97 Cal. 251, 18 L.R.A. 744, 31 Pac. 1133, a legislative appropriation for the benefit of sufferers from a flood was held to be in violation of the constitutional prohibition of the gift of any public money or thing of value to any individual.

And in Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39, a statute authorizing a city to issue bonds and lend the proceeds on mortgage to the owners of land the buildings upon which had been destroyed by an extensive conflagration was held unconstitutional as authorizing the use of public funds for the promotion of the interests of individuals, although the public welfare might incidentally be advanced thereby.

But in State ex rel. New Richmond v. Davidson, 114 Wis. 563, 58 L.R.A. 739, 88 N. W. 596, 90 N. W. 1067, it was held that the legislature might lawfully appropriate the public moneys to pay a debt incurred by a municipality, which was stricken by a cyclone, for burying its dead, removing débris, and caring for the injured and homeless; the court taking the view that the common interest and well-being of the people of the state were thereby subserved.

In State ex rel. Griffith v. Osawkee Twp. 14 Kan. 418, 19 Am. Rep. 99, a statute authorizing townships to issue bonds for the purpose of procuring funds to provide the destitute citizens of such townships with provisions and with grain for seed and feed as a loan was held invalid as not being for a public purpose; and it was said that the obligation of the state to help the needy is limited to those who are unable to help themselves, and that such legislation was not sustainable upon the theory that the persons assisted would thereby be prevented from becoming a public charge.

In William Deering & Co. v. Peterson, 75 Minn. 118, 77 N. W. 568, an appropriation of 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the statute providing for the relief of blind persons. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James S. Martin and Holland C. Webster, for plaintiff in error:

The purpose of this statute is not public, but purely private.

money from the public treasury for seed-grain loans to farmers whose crops had been destroyed was held unlawful as appropriating public money for a private purpose, since the statute by which the appropriation was made did not confine its benefits to those who were a public charge and those in imminent and immediate danger of becoming such.

But in State v. Nelson County, 1 N. D. 88, 8 L.R.A. 283, 26 Am. St. Rep. 609, 45 N. W. 33, an act authorizing counties to issue bonds to procure seed grain for needy farmers who might be unable to procure the same was held valid as authorizing taxation for a public purpose; the court taking the view that such statute was to be interpreted in the light of the public danger, which was the occasion of its passage, that many citizens, unless succored by some comprehensive measure of relief, would become a public burden; saying: "The case of State ex rel. Griffith v. Osawkee Twp. supra, asserts a doctrine which would defeat the tax in question. This court has great respect for the court which promulgated that decision, and the most sincere admiration for the distinguished jurist, now upon the supreme bench of the nation, who wrote the opinion in that case. Nevertheless we cannot yield our assent to the reasoning of the case, leading to the conclusion that a loan of aid to an impoverished class, not yet in the poorhouse, is necessarily a tax for a private purpose. In our view, it is not certain, or even probable, in the light of subsequent experience in the West, that the court of last resort in the state of Kansas would enunciate the doctrine of that case at the present day. The decision was made fifteen years ago. While the fundamental principles which underlie legislation and taxation have not changed in the interval, it is also true that the development of the Western states has been attended with difficulties and adverse conditions which have made it necessary to broaden the application of fundamental principles to meet the new necessities of those states. Under the stress of adversity peculiar to the condition of the frontier farmer, there has come to be an expansion of the legal meaning of the term 'poor' sufficient to embrace a class of destitute citizens who have not yet become a public charge."

The public purpose, to warrant the exercise of the power of taxation, must be one which appeals to all the people, and is not in any sense partisan.

In State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L.R.A. 280, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653, 45 S. W. 245, a statute appropriating public moneys for the maintenance of free scholarships in a state university for the support of students dependent upon their own exertions for their education, and financially unable to obtain it otherwise, was held to violate a constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from granting public money to any individual.

In Re House, 23 Colo. 87, 33 L.R.A. 832, 46 Pac. 117, an act providing for the treatment of habitual drunkards financially unable to pay therefor, at the expense of the county of which they are residents, was held valid; the court saying: "The object sought to be attained by this act is to provide for a class of its poor who have become helpless and unable to care for themselves, and is clearly within the governmental functions of the state, and a proper exercise of legislative power, unless inhibited by some constitutional limitation. The duty of the state to make provision for the care and maintenance of those who, through misfortune or disease, are unable to take care of themselves, has been too long recognized and established by the legislation of this country to admit of question. The indigent poor and infirm, the insane, orphaned and dependent children, and all destitute and helpless persons within its sovereignty, have ever been recognized as legitimate recipients of its bounty, and their welfare as a proper subject of its solicitude and care." And it was further held that a constitutional provision declaring that "no appropriation shall be made for charitable, industrial, educational, or benevolent purposes, to any person, corporation, or community not under the absolute control of the state, nor to any denominational or sectarian institution or association," was not contravened thereby, since such prohibition refers to state money only, and not to county money.

In Webster v. Police Jury, 51 La. Ann. 1204, 25 So. 988, similar legislation was sustained upon the theory that the treatment and cure of habitual drunkards or inebriates was as much the duty of the parish as the care of sick, disabled, or insane paupers.

So, also, in Baltimore v. Keeley Institute, 81 Md. 106, 27 L.R.A. 646, 31 Atl. 437, a statute authorizing any habitual drunkard to be sent for treatment and cure to an institution within the state maintained for such persons at the expense of the county or city of his residence, if neither he nor his petitioning kin is financially able to incur the expense, was held not to make an unconstitutional use of money raised by taxation.

On the other hand, in Wisconsin Keeley Institute Co. v. Milwaukee County, 95 Wis. 153, 36 L.R.A. 55, 60 Am. St. Rep. 105, 70 N. W. 68, it was held that a county cannot be compelled by statute to pay for the treatment in a private institution of habitual drunkards merely because they are peculiarly unable to procure and pay for such treatment, since such use of the public money is not for a public purpose. This decision turns largely upon the construction given by the court to the act in question, that it is applicable to persons without the ready means or money to pay for treatment, and is not restricted to persons who have become helpless and destitute, and hence the subject of public charity. In commenting upon the Maryland and Colorado decisions above stated, the court said: "The Maryland act was broadly distinguishable from the one at bar, and was held valid. Baltimore v. Keeley Institute, supra. The Colorado act was more like ours, and it was held, in effect, that one 'who is financially unable to pay for the treatment of such disease' belongs to a class of 'poor who have become helpless and unable to care for themselves,' and hence 'within the governmental functions of the state;' and the act was valid. Re House, supra. The case is not made to turn upon the question we have considered, and we cannot regard it as an authority in the case at bar."

And in State ex rel. Garrett v. Frøhlich, 118 Wis. 129, 61 L.R.A. 345, 99 Am. St. Rep. 985, 94 N. W. 50, it was held that the legislature could not appropriate money from the public funds to redeem warrants issued under an invalid law providing for the treatment of inebriates at public expense, which are in the hands of innocent purchasers, where the Constitution provides that taxation shall be uniform, and requires the legislature to provide the tax sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state; since these provisions require taxes to be for a public, and not for a private, purpose.

For note on public purposes for which money may be appropriated or raised by taxation, see 14 L.R.A. 474.

Mr. William G. Ulery also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Whitlock, Milroy, & Mallow for defendant in error.

Summers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1904 the general assembly passed an act entitled "An Act to Provide Relief for Worthy Blind" (97 Ohio Laws, p. 392). The act provides that all male blind persons over the age of twenty-one years, and all female blind persons over the age of eighteen years, who have been residents of the state for five years, and of the county for one year, and have no property or means with which to support themselves, shall be entitled to and receive not more than $25 per capita quarterly from the county treasury on warrant of the county auditor, authorized by the probate judge; and that, under no condition or circumstance shall the beneficiary lose his or her benefits or residence by or through removal to any home or institution for the blind not maintained by said state or county. The probate judge of Lucas county, proceeding under the act, authorized the auditor of that county to issue a warrant on the treasurer for the payment of $25 to the relator. The auditor refused, and thereupon the relator filed a petition in mandamus in the court of common pleas of that county. The court of common pleas overruled a general demurrer to the petition and allowed a peremptory writ, and the circuit court affirmed.

The care of the state for its dependent classes is considered by all enlightened people as a measure of its civilization, and it is not doubted that the legislation under consideration was inspired by beneficent, if not enlightened, motives. This state has provided institutions for the education of the blind; for feeble-minded youth; for honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines; a home for soldiers' and sailors' orphans; for the care and treatment of the insane; an asylum for epileptics and epileptic insane; a boys' industrial school; a girls' industrial home; for the establishment of homes of the friendless; a sanitarium for consumptives; and an institution for the treatment and education of deformed and crippled children. The object of these institutions is sufficiently indicated by their designation, and may be stated to be, generally, to provide places and means where their afflictions may be relieved, or where they may be taught and trained so that they may be self-supporting, or less likely to become a burden on the state, or where their physical wants may be supplied at the public expense. But it does not follow that it would be either wise or constitutional to select out a class having some particular physical infirmity, and then confer a bounty upon individuals of that class. If a bounty may be conferred upon individuals of one class, then it may be upon individuals of another class, and, if upon two, then upon all. And, if upon those who have physical infirmities, then why not upon other classes who for various reasons may be unable to support themselves? And, if these things may be done, why may not all property be distributed by the state?

The principal contention on the part of the auditor is that the law is unconstitutional, because the purpose for which the public funds are appropriated is not public, and because § 1 of article 7, which provides: "Institutions for the benefit of the insane, blind, and deaf and dumb, shall always be fostered and supported by the state; and be subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by the general assembly,"—is a limitation upon the legislative power. And, upon the part of the relator, that the act is within the legislative power, and, in the absence of a specific prohibition in the Constitution, is wholly within the discretion of the general assembly, and that § 1 of article 7 is an express grant of power and sufficiently broad to comprise the act in question. Section 1 of article 2 provides that the legislative power of this state shall be vested in a general assembly. This comprises the power of taxation. But that extends only to the levying of taxes for the purpose of the state. Section 2 of the Bill of Rights declares that all political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit. And § 1 declares that the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property is one of the inalienable rights of all men. And § 19 provides that private property shall ever be held inviolate, but subservient to the public welfare. So that the power of the state to take the property of its citizens by a tax is not broader than the purposes for which the state is formed, and so is not wholly within the discretion of the legislature, but, without express prohibition, is subject to this inherent limitation that it may be exercised only for a public purpose. This view of the law is supported by text writers and by well-considered cases. Story, Const. 699; Cooley, Const. Lim. 207; Black, Const. Law, 342; Judson, Taxn. 405; Gray, Limitations of Taxing Power, 123, and cases there cited. Section 1 of article 7, which provides that institutions for the benefit of the insane, blind, and deaf and dumb, shall always be fostered and supported by the state, is neither a grant nor a limitation of power, but a recognition of the fact that by enlightened people such classes are treated as wards of the state, and is an injunction upon the general assembly to foster and support institutions for their benefit; and it is in obedience to this constitutional mandate that the general assembly has provided for the institutions already enumerated.

The word "institution," as used in the Constitution, had a popular, if not a legal, signification, as exemplified in the legislation above referred to; and, if § 1 of article 7 should be held to be a grant of power as well as a mandate, the act in question would not come within its terms. The controlling question then is, whether the disbursement of the public funds provided by the act in question is for a public purpose. No rule sufficiently definite to be susceptible of certain application has been established. But in the leading case, Citizens' Sav. & L. Asso. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 22 L. ed. 455, where the constitutionality of an act of the legislature of Kansas authorizing a municipality to issue and sell its bonds in aid of a manufacturing corporation was raised, Mr Justice Miller says: "In deciding whether [or not] in the given case, the object for which the taxes are assessed falls upon the one side or the other of this line, they [the courts] must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support and for the proper use of the government, whether state or municipal. Whatever lawfully pertains to this, and is sanctioned by time and the acquiescence of the people, may well be held to belong to the public use and proper for the maintenance of good government, though this may not be the only criterion of rightful taxation." If that rule is applied here, it must be said that the act under consideration is without precedent in this state, and that no provision is made in the act to insure the application of the money to the support of the individual, or to prevent him from becoming a public charge, or in any manner to control its use by him. The act does not direct that the payments shall continue during the lifetime of the beneficiary; nor does it limit the time, nor provide that payments shall cease with the needs of the donee, or provide for any subsequent inquiry. It is an indeterminate, gratuitous annuity, a gift pure and simple; and, being so, the legislature is without authority to make it from the public funds. Other provisions of the act are open to criticism; but, as they go to the wisdom of the legislation, rather than to the power to enact it, they will not be noticed.

It may be said that funds used for the care of the poor are used for a public purpose, and that moneys used under the provisions of this act will subserve a public purpose for the reason that they will enable many blind persons, aided by their own efforts or those of their friends, to support themselves, and thus to escape becoming a public charge. The wisdom of the legislation is not questioned. The power of the legislature to so enact is the question presented here, and that an incidental public benefit is not sufficient to save the legislation has also been decided in the case just referred to. In that case it was claimed that the benefit conferred on the commerce and industry of the town was a sufficient public benefit to warrant the imposition of the tax. Mr. Justice Miller said: "If it be said that a benefit results to the local public of a town by establishing manufactures the same may be said of any other business or pursuit which employs capital or labor. The merchant, the mechanic, the innkeeper, the banker, the builder, the steamboat owner are equally promoters of the public good and equally deserving the aid of the citizens by enforced contributions. No line can be drawn in favor of the manufacturer which would not open . . . the public treasury to the importunities of two thirds of the business men of the city or town."

If the power of the legislature to confer an annuity upon any class of needy citizens is admitted upon the ground that its tendency will be to prevent them from becoming a public charge, then innumerable classes may clamor for similar bounties, and, if not upon equally meritorious ground, still on ground that is valid in point of law; and it is doubted that any line could be drawn short of an equal distribution of property. A few of the many cases more or less illustrative of the application of the rule may be noticed. In Wisconsin Keeley Institute Co. v. Milwaukee County, 95 Wis. 153, 36 L.R.A. 55, 60 Am. St. Rep. 105, 70 N. E. 68, an act requiring any county to pay out of the public moneys of the county to a private party not to exceed $170, for every inebriate found therein and treated upon the order and certificate of the county judge thereof, is declared unconstitutional. See also Putney Bros. Co. v. Milwaukee County, 108 Wis. 554, 84 N. W. 822; State ex rel. Garrett v. Fröhlich, 118 Wis. 129, 61 L.R.A.

345, 99 Am. St. Rep. 985, 94 N. W. 50. In State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L.R.A. 280, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653, 45 S. W. 245, an act was held invalid that provided for the payment of certain sums of money in monthly instalments to certain students while attending the state university, who were dependent on their own efforts for an education, and financially unable to otherwise obtain the same.

The judgments are reversed, and petition dismissed.

I. PUBLIC MATTERS AND RELATIONS.

Interstate commerce. Statutes requiring a carrier receiving baggage for transportation into another state over connecting lines to adjust the loss, inform the shipper where the loss occurred, produce a receipt from the connecting carrier, or prove its inability to trace the loss, are held not to be an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce. 388.

Municipalities. A municipality is held estopped to assert a title to a street which will practically destroy the value of abutting property for residence purposes, and work irremediable injury to the owner, by failing to assert title, and permitting such owner to improve the property at large expense with reference to what he supposes in good faith to be the true boundary line. 243. A city permitting the maintenance of iron doors in a sidewalk, which may be opened without any guard to protect the hole, is held liable for an injury caused thereby, though it had no notice of the negligent use at the time of the accident. 424. The liability of a city for a fall on a sidewalk due to ice less than an inch thick, which the person injured knew was smooth and slippery when he went upon it, is denied in a Kansas case. 933. Municipal authorities are held not to be estopped to require the removal from a street of the rails of a street railway by seeing the rails laid without objection. 1187. For liability for electric shock, see infra, VI.

Municipal water supply. The power of the legislature to forbid the discharge of unpurified sewage into a river from which a public drinking-water supply is taken is sustained, though no injury to public health or comfort is actually shown. 322. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Charitable institutions. The liability of trustees administering a fund solely for the education and maintenance of indigent boys without recompense, for injury to one servant through negligent orders given by another, is denied. 481. That a hospital is conducted as a public charity without expectation of profit is held not to render it immune from liability for negligent injuries to its servants. 496. For devise to, see infra, VII.

Eminent domain. A municipality was held not liable for injury to abutting property by altering the natural surface of a street in bringing it to the first established grade, where the change was not unreasonable or carelessly done. 108. Poles and wires of a long-distance telephone, strung along a public road, are held not to constitute an additional burden entitling the fee owner to compensation, unless actual and substantial injury to his property is shown. 87. The exercise of the power of eminent domain to secure power and operate a street railway is held not to be prevented by the fact that the company had not yet secured its right of way and necessary franchises, if it is proceeding diligently, and has progressed far enough to show that a public use is intended. 198. A pipe line in a rural highway for supplying the public with natural gas for heating and illumination is held not to impose an additional burden on the estate in fee. 506. A property owner is held entitled to show that the passage of a street-opening ordinance which would injure his property rights was obtained by fraud or other unlawful means, or for an unlawful purpose. 639.

Liability of officers. A public official is held liable for loss of public funds from the insolvency of the bank in which they are deposited, notwithstanding his mere inquiry of the general public, or the business men of the community, as to its solvency and the integrity of its officers. 1084.

Public money. A statutory provision for specified payments to blind persons from the county treasury is held void as requiring expenditure of public funds for a private purpose. 1196.

Labor unions. A statute prohibiting employers from exacting agreements from employees not to join a labor union is held to infringe the constitutional rights of liberty. 282.

Regulation of rates. A statutory requirement for the sale of mileage books at less than regular rates is held void as class legislation. 1086.

Depot grounds. Depot grounds are held to be the place where passengers get on and off trains, and where freight is loaded and unloaded, including all grounds reasonably necessary and convenient for such purpose, with necessary tracks, switches, and turnouts. 202.

Desecration of flag. The power of the state legislature to prohibit the desecration of the national flag is upheld in a Nebraska case. 1079.

Taxes. A fraternal beneficiary society conducted for the purpose of providing a fund for payment of a specified sum, on the death of each member, to a designated beneficiary, is held not to be a charitable association whose property is exempt. 380. State bonds are held not to be impliedly exempted from taxation. 663. Personal property of a nonresident, which, for performance of a railway construction contract, is in the state on the day for assessing taxes, is held subject to assessment. 704.

Schools. The authority of a school board to debar members of high-school fraternities organized against its will, from connecting themselves with athletic teams, musical, literary, and military societies, and to deprive them of the customary graduation honors, is sustained, though the parents consented to the organization, and the meetings were held outside the school-house. 352. A prohibition against common-school teachers wearing a distinctively religious garb while engaged in teaching is held reasonable. 402.

Trading stamps. An ordinance forbidding merchants to give out trading stamps in their business is held unconstitutional. 1131.

Voting machines. The use of voting machines at elections is held not to violate a constitutional requirement that all elections shall be by ballot. 621.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Reward. A reward for the arrest of a criminal is held not to be earned by giving information leading to his arrest. 216.

Carriers. The refusal of the conductor of a connecting car to honor an invalid transfer check given by the conductor of the first car on payment of fare is held not to entitle the passenger to remain in the car without paying a second fare, until forcibly expelled. 97. A street car company was held liable for the conductor's refusal to accept a transfer in which a mistake was made by the conductor of the first car, where the passenger gave him a reasonable explanation of such mistake. 103. The reasonableness per se of a requirement that a claim for damages to freight must be presented within ten days is denied as applied to live stock, where the character of the injury cannot be determined within that time. 1141. For mileage-book legislation, see supra, I.; for burden of proving negligence, see infra, VIII.

Insurance. The right of a mutual-benefit society to amend its by-laws so as to increase the assessments on its members is 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

upheld where the existing rate has proved inadequate. 1154. A by-law that mailing of notices of assessment may be conclusively shown by the certificate of an officer who is not required to be personally cognizant of the fact is held unreasonable and void. 238. The mere mailing of a notice properly addressed and stamped is held, in the absence of a statute or contract provision, not to be a compliance with the custom to give notice of the maturity of a premium note, where the letter does not reach its destination. 253. The rule of a benefit society that failure to pay assessments by the last day specified shall suspend the certificate is held waived by the frequent absence of the local secretary on the day for payment, and his custom of accepting payments at any time prior to transmission of assessments to the supreme body. 569. The right of one made beneficiary as a dependent to receive the insurance money is held to cease on her marrying and securing other means of support before the death of the insured. 393. One holding land under a conveyance in fee is held to be the sole and unconditional owner within the meaning of a fire-insurance policy, although he owes part of the purchase price, for which a statutory vendor's lien exists. 627. A single act of the clerk of a local lodge in promising representatives of an insane member to notify them of assessments is held not to prevent the society from claiming a forfeiture for nonpayment of dues, notice of which is mailed to the member. 973. Death from suicide springing from an insane impulse is held to be through external, violent, and accidental means. 223. One running to a base while playing indoor baseball is held not voluntarily to expose himself to unnecessary danger by merely overrunning his base and relying on the wall to stop him when placing his hands and feet against it. 938. For garnishment of indemnity insurer by employee, see infra, VIII.; for measure of recovery for wrongful cancellation of policy, see infra, VIII.

Parol contracts. For parol partnership to deal in land, see infra, III.

Parol mortgage. A parol mortgage to secure a loan for the purchase of a stock of goods, to attach to future additions, is held valid as between the parties. 418.

Overdraft. The right of a bank which pays an overdraft of a local agent of a nonresident principal without ascertaining the agent's authority, to assert the principal's failure to examine the pass book and vouchers, affecting balancing of the account, is denied. 752.

Promissory note. A note without consideration, payable to the children of the maker out of his estate after his death, was held void. 156. A payee's indorsement on a note, acknowledging himself as a part maker with one of the parties, is held insufficient to render him a joint maker. 400.

Checks. Whether a bank receiving and crediting to a depositor a check on another bank may enforce it as owner is held to depend on the intention of the parties as to whether the deposit should be treated as cash. 694. A bank depositor who intrusts the examination of pass books and returned vouchers to an agent who has raised its checks is held chargeable with such knowledge as the agent had in making the examination. 744.

Bonds. The receiver of a bank is estopped to deny the authority of the assistant cashier to bind the bank by statements and representations inducing the issuance of a bond for the fidelity of the president of the bank. 548.

Public policy. A check given to secure the return of stolen property was held valid, so as to entitle an indorser paying the same to recover from the owner, who stopped payment of the check. 175. A contract relieving an employer from liability for injuries due to his negligence is held void as against public policy. 537. The statute of a state where an action for injuries to an employee is brought, making void unreasonable contracts for notice of injury as a condition to maintaining an action, is held not to affect a contract valid in the state where made and in that where the injury occurred, in the absence of anything to disclose an opposite legislative intent. 191. A contract by the president of a corporation for the construction of a building is held not enforceable against the corporation, even as to extra work, where a large bonus was included in the contract price, for division between the president and the contractor. 467.

Ratification. A husband's promise to pay for goods not necessities, ordered by the wife, is held not binding unless she purported to act as his agent in making the purchase, so that his promise is a ratification of her act. 1048. For ratification by married woman after discovery, see infra, IV.

Assignment. A decree for permanent alimony was held not assignable. 179.

Sale. Acceptance of an article after the agreed time of delivery is held not to constitute a waiver of damages for the delay, unless accompanied by circumstances manifesting an intent to waive such damages. 1114. The right of the seller to hold a purchaser refusing to accept the goods responsible for deterioration due to failure to exercise due care pending a resale by him of the goods is denied, unless such failure resulted from the purchaser's conduct. 1184.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

Corporations. Execution by the president, for the benefit of the corporation, of a guaranty which it has power to make, is held sufficient to establish the corporate liability, in the absence of anything to show that he did not act by its authority, although the execution of the instrument is put in issue by verified plea. 376. For 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

corporate liability on contract by president, see supra, II.

Partnership. A parol agreement to purchase a single tract of land in partnership, one of the parties agreeing to pay the other one half of the purchase price on demand, is held void. 945.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

Infants. A foundling hospital which, through mistake of its representatives, placed children in homes of filth and degradation in a distant state, is held not entitled to recover their custody from persons rescuing them therefrom and administering to their needs, who are willing to care for and educate them as their own. 306.

Breach of promise. The refusal of a son of consumptive parents to perform his promise to marry one afflicted with pulmonary consumption is held not to render him liable in damages, although he knew of her disease at the time of making his promise. 582.

Married woman's contract. The power of a woman, after discoveriture, to ratify a note executed during coverture, is denied, where the note was void because not for a debt for payment of which she could contract. 1053. For ratification of wife's purchase, see supra, II.

Married women's rights. The wife's right to devise property held by her husband and herself as joint tenants is held not to be given by the married woman's act. 701.

Divorce. The right to a divorce from one who has been convicted of an offense involving moral turpitude, followed by sentence to the penitentiary for two years or more, is held not to be affected by an executive pardon granted after imposition of the sentence. 272. The courts of the state of the matrimonial domicile are held to have jurisdiction, although defendant is out of the jurisdiction, and is served with publication only. 1127.

V. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY.

Trusts. Executors are held empowered to mortgage the trust estate, under a will authorizing them to use the income for the maintenance of the testator's son, to accomplish which they are empowered to manage the property, sell land, or convey the whole or any part thereof, where, without the mortgage, the income is sufficient only to maintain the estate. 263.

Executors and administrators. An administrator who deposits funds in a bank in good standing, and promptly distributes the interest to the next of kin, is held not liable for losses from the failure of the bank in the absence of negligence on his part. 617.

Artists. The right of an artist to recover pay for a second portrait, painted from a photograph left with him to paint one portrait, and retained by the customer with whom he placed it for inspection, is denied because of the violation of the contract and breach of trust. 362.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; NUISANCES.

Conspiracy. Injury to a retail merchant through a combination to maintain prices, to be rendered effectual by boycotting sellers dealing with persons refusing to agree thereto, is held to give a right of action. 976. A combination to prevent rate cutting, by which associations bind themselves not to sell to aggressive cutters of price, on which list are placed all wholesalers selling to persons on lists furnished them as such aggressive cutters, is held within the Sherman anti-trust act. 984.

Deceit. Suspicion that a statement of facts made to effect the sale of a chattel may be false is held sufficient to sustain an action for deceit if it proves to be false. 646.

False imprisonment. An officer who, after receiving information that a mistake had been made, detains in custody a person whom he arrested in good faith under the honest belief that he was the person intended by a warrant against a person of the same name, is held liable to an action for false imprisonment. 268. Words are held sufficient to constitute an imprisonment if they impose a restraint upon one who is actually restrained. 576. Threatening words or conduct, such as to induce a reasonable apprehension of force, are held to be effectual to deprive one of liberty, if the means of coercion are at hand. 580.

Nuisances. The maintenance of howling and barking dogs and whining puppies, to the great and continuous annoyance and discomfort of an adjoining property owner and his family, interfering with their sleep, rest, and reasonable use and enjoyment of their home, is held to be a nuisance. 349.

Fright. Whether plaintiff's illness was the proximate result of fright caused by the wrongful entrance of defendant's employees into her dwelling, and interference with the property therein, was held to be a question for the jury. 93. One causing nervous excitement by wrongful trespass on one's home, inducing her miscarriage, is held liable for the bodily pain and suffering directly due thereto, although no physical violence is done to her person. 96. Impairment of health, or loss of bodily power, through fright which is the natural and direct result of another's negligent act in blasting, is held sufficient to sustain an action against him. 545.

Navigation. Those in charge of a steamship whose waves endanger the lives of occupants of a small boat near it are held bound to stop normal operations of the ship until the small boat has passed out of the danger zone. 920.

Negligence of water company. Breach of a contract to connect property with a water main and erect a hydrant for protection from fire, without fixing any time to commence delivery of water, is held not to render the company liable for the value of property destroyed by fire from want of water. 913. A private corporation authorized to use the city streets on condition that it will lay its mains and furnish the city and its inhabitants with water at fixed rates is held liable for its wrongful act in cutting off the supply of water from one of its patrons. 917.

Electric shock. An electric light company which negligently turns a current onto a circuit having a grounded wire is held liable for injury to one coming in contact with the grounded current, although the injury would not have occurred if a third person had not made a second ground at another place. 293. A city maintaining an electric-light plant which, for compensation, installs in a business place a light which is imperfectly insulated, is held liable for injuries to an employee of the consumer by coming in contact with an electric current on putting his hand on the globe to warm it. 963.

Liability for servant's torts. A depot agent's malicious refusal to deliver to a licensed drayman goods of merchants which he has contracted to draw is held to render the railway company liable for such damages to the drayman's business as result from the agent's conduct. 926. The act of a conductor in causing the arrest, by a policeman, of a passenger as a pickpocket, is held to render the street car company liable. 162.

Fellow servants. A train despatcher whose duty it is to issue telegraphic orders for movement of trains on a single-track road in the superintendent's name, and see to their transmission, is held not to be a fellow servant of a fireman. 650.

Injury to servants. Employment of a child in a factory in violation of statute is held to be negligence, entitling the child to recover for personal injuries. 335. One digging a trench for a gas main across a public street at night is held to be a fellow servant of the foreman in charge of the gang, so as to make the master liable for the latter's negligence. 367. The operator of a laundry is held to the duty of exercising ordinary care to release an employee and alleviate her suffering after learning that her fingers have been caught between the rollers of an ironing mangle. 940. A freight conductor is held to have no implied authority to engage an assistant to handle freight for which he is to receive passage on the train, so as to entitle him, in case of injury, to hold the carrier liable as an employer. 950. A mine owner, learning of danger of the flooding of his mine from accumulated water in a neighboring mine, is held bound to make such provision for the safety of his employees as would occur to a person of ordinary prudence, or to warn his employees of the danger. 1170. For liability of charitable institutions, see supra, I.

Injury to passenger. A carrier was held negligent in failing to anticipate, and protect intending passengers from injury from, the surging and struggling to get upon a particular train at a particular station, where such occurrences had frequently happened at the same station and train. 729. That a motorman sees one with something in his hand making violent motions towards the car at a place where it is not required to stop for passengers is held not to charge him with notice that his failure to stop will result in throwing a missile at himself, which may injure a passenger. 231. A railway company is held to owe no duty to one who, in violation of law, attempts to board a moving train at a closed vestibule door, until his position of danger is made known to the employees. 603.

Injury by train. A railroad company which permits the frequent use of a private farm crossing by a tenant of the farm for the benefit of which it was constructed is held subject to the liability of one who has extended an invitation which has been acted on. 597.

Injury in highways. For liability of municipality, see supra, I.

Liability of landlord. A landlord is held not liable for injury to the tenant, due to a hidden defect in a gutter, unless he knew, or ought to have known, of the defect. 965.

Surgeons. The right of a surgeon to proceed without consent of the patient or anyone authorized by him is sustained where unexpected conditions develop or are discovered in the course of an operation to which the patient has consented, or where some immediate action is necessary to preserve the patient's life or health. 609. Failure to obtain the father's consent before administering an anesthetic to a boy of seventeen, who, in company with adult relatives, has asked for relief from a small tumor, is held not to render the surgeon liable to the father for the boy's death under its influence. 612.

Last clear chance. One whose contributory negligence continued up to the moment of his injury, although the exercise of reasonable diligence would have warned him of danger and enabled him to escape, was held not to be entitled to recover, although his peril might have been, but was not, discovered in time to prevent the accident. 132. That one was guilty of some negligence in walking on a street-car track does not prevent a recovery for an injury due to the motorman's running a car at high speed with no watchfulness for persons on the track, if she was not negligent in failing to discover the approach of the car. 143. The intoxication of a passenger was held not to relieve the carrier from liability for injury to him by falling down a flight of steps on which he was left by the employees of the carrier on being removed from the train. 148. Negligence of a passenger after alighting, in stepping on a parallel track without looking for an approaching car, was held not to prevent a recovery if those in charge of the car could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered the peril and prevented the injury. 152.

Proximate cause of injury. The defective condition of a track in a mine, resulting in a car getting off the track, is held not to be the proximate cause of an injury to the miner, due to his pinching his fingers between the car and an implement used by him in attempting to get the car back on the track. 907. A street-car conductor's negligent calling of a street before it is reached, inducing a lady passenger to alight at night during a severe storm, is held to be the proximate cause of injuries sustained by falling upon an unfamiliar curbstone which she could not see, while on her way home. 1177. A thirteen-year-old employee's invention of a device to protect his fingers from handling links upon which he is employed to operate a drill which heats them because of defects in the apparatus, the use of which results in entangling his hand in the machinery, is held to be such an intervening cause as to destroy the proximity of the defect in the drill as a cause of the injury. 955.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; WILLS.

Lease. The rights of a sublessee under the sublease are held not to be affected by a decree canceling the lease, made by consent of the lessee's administrator and the representatives of the lessor, in proceedings to which the sublessee is not a party. 221. A subtenant is held as fully estopped as the tenant to question the landlord's title. 930.

Mortgages. An assignee of a mortgage as collateral security is held to obtain a good title as against his assignor by bidding in the property at his own foreclosure sale. 1094.

Bona fide purchasers. The purchaser of an equity of redemption is held not to be a bona fide purchaser as against an attempt to set aside a prior fraudulent sale, because of his assumption of the outstanding mortgage. 1019.

Curtsey. An alien husband is held entitled to take an estate by the curtesy in land of which his wife died seised. 659.

Right of way. A tenant's acknowledgment that a right of way over adjoining property is permissive and revocable is held not to bind him after securing title to the landlord's estate to which the right of way is appurtenant. 614.

Merger of life estate. The acquisition of the life estate by the reversioner is held to merge the fee in him, so as to cut out an intermediate, contingent remainder. 433.

Homestead. A homestead settler, who, after his wife's death, commutes the homestead entry and receives a patent on paying cash for the land at the government price, is held to acquire an absolute title free from any devise in his wife's will. 967.

Record title. Failure to remove from the record an undelivered deed given by one's predecessors in title is held not to estop him from denying the title of a stranger who purchased in reliance on the record. 712.

Mines. A location of a mining claim which complies with the act of Congress, but not with a local statute, as to form and record of notice, is held to become valid on the repeal of the local statute, if the required assessment work has been done. 763. The subsequent discovery of mineral-bearing ore is held to validate the location of a mining claim invalid for want of such discovery, in the absence of intervening rights. 791.

Waters. A mill owner is held entitled, if his interest requires it, to use the water of the stream in his business nights as well as days, if he leaves the natural flow unobstructed and undiminished during the working hours of the day. 289. The respective riparian owners, on a sudden change in the bed of a river, are held entitled to possession and ownership of the soil formerly under its waters, as far as the thread of the stream. 318. The right to place a jetty in a stream so as to deflect the current to the injury of a lower riparian owner by depriving him of the natural flow of the stream and washing away his bank by casting water directly against it, is denied. 344. The right to use power from a dam is held to pass by a grant of property with appurtenances, if such right has been acquired and affixed to a particular mill or parcel of land, but not merely because the grantor had the right to make use of such power. 1139. For legislative power to prevent pollution of water supply, see supra, I.

Market quotations. A board of trade is held not to surrender or dedicate to the public market quotations collected in its exchange by permitting subscribers to paste them upon blackboards in their places of business for their own advantage, and not for that of the public. 889.

Cemeteries. The right of a cemetery company controlled by white persons to prevent a colored person from using his property for burial purposes, or to compel him to sell it, by purchasing surrounding land, was denied. 155.

Rule in Shelley's Case. A provision in a deed, granting to one a life estate, with habendum to him during his natural life, and to the heirs of his body and their assigns, that his wife shall have merely the privilege of living on the premises during his life, and that neither he nor his wife shall have power to convey or encumber the property, is held not to prevent his taking a fee under the rule in Shelley's Case. 1109.

Charitable trusts. The existence of a public free-school system is held not to invalidate a trust for the benefit of boys unable to educate themselves. 471.

Wills. A bequest by a woman of all money which may become due from insurance on her husband's life at the time of its actual collection and receipt by his executors is held to be specific, and admeasured by the collection of the fund by the testatrix and her commingling it with her funds. 592. A devise to the vestry of a parish, to be used for such church purposes as the rector may direct, is held to vest the absolute title in the vestry for corporate purposes. 1119. That an attesting witness able to write his own name holds the end of a pen while it is guided by another in the writing of his name is held not to invalidate the attestation. 1193. For married women's right as to, see supra, IV.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES; PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE.

Premature action. An action to establish a trust against an assignee of the trustee, or to impound the rents and profits, is held not maintainable prior to the time at which the beneficiaries are to be determined. 999.

Action against joint tortfeasor. Payment by a livery-stable keeper of a claim against himself and his bailee for the value of a horse killed by the latter's negligence is held to preclude further proceedings by him against the bailee on the owner's claim, although it was assigned to him at the time of payment. 534.

Impounding rents pending foreclosure. The right to impound rents and profits for reduction of the debt pending foreclosure is allowed, notwithstanding a statutory provision that a mortgage shall not be deemed a conveyance. 1001.

Parties. A bank for whose benefit a note is taken in the president's name, of which it has always had the exclusive ownership and possession, is held entitled to maintain an action thereon as the real party in interest. 1035.

Account stated. A charge for services by an attorney accepted by the client is held to become an account stated, which cannot be reopened except for fraud or mistake. 924.

Specific performance. An antenuptial marriage settlement by which the groom's father agrees to make no discrimination between his children is held enforceable. 734.

Removal of causes. Removal of a suit to a Federal court is held not to prevent plaintiff from instituting a new action on the same cause in the state court after entry of an order of discontinuance. 501.

Execution. Property of a charity is held not liable to sale under execution issued on a judgment rendered for nonfeasance, misfeasance, or malfeasance of its agents or trustees. 485.

Judgment. Indexing under the name of "Frank" a judgment against one whose name is Francis is held to charge a prospective purchaser with notice of the judgment. 415.

Rogues' gallery. A remedy against the exhibition in the rogues' gallery of the portrait of one merely accused of crime is allowed, where it is not necessary as a means of identification or to prevent escape. 274.

Mandamus. The duty of a street commissioner to hear and determine the only questions within his power as to the interference with travel, and the effect upon the pavement, of the tearing up of a street for the purpose of removing the rails of a street-railway system, is held compellable by mandamus. 525.

Injunction. An injunction against repeated acts of trespass on plaintiff's dooryard to erect and maintain a fence was allowed to prevent a multiplicity of inadequate actions at law. 49. An injunction against acts of trespass on land in another state was denied, where the principal fact involved, and upon which the right to exercise the restraint depended, was that of title to the land, even though the necessary parties were before the court. 114. An injunction against the collection of the purchase money, where the title to the land was questioned by suit, is held allowable. 445. An injunction against the use of voting machines at elections was denied. 512. An injunction against a railroad switch in a public street is denied as against abutting owners who have expressly consented thereto for twenty years, and as against their successors in title. 991. An injunction against the enactment of an ordinance against erecting or operating baseball parks within specified limits is allowed, where it appears that injury to property rights will result, and that the ordinance is personal, arbitrary, and discriminatory, and the power to enact it is questionable. 1014. Want of mutuality is held to prevent an injunction against violation of a heating company's contract to furnish heat at a specified yearly amount, where the use of heat rests in the consumer's discretion. 726.

Garnishment. A contract to indemnify an employer for loss paid because of injury to an employee is held not to create any obligation on the insurer's part which the employee can reach by garnishment proceedings. 958.

Witnesses. Statements made in the presence of a grantee since deceased, by his attorney at the time the deed was executed, are held inadmissible in an action to set aside the deed for fraud,—especially where the attorney is also dead. 684.

Burden of proof. The liability of a carrier for injury to a passenger from the jolt of the vehicle is denied, unless the person injured shows that it was caused by the carrier's negligence. 1076.

Privileged communication. Evidence as 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to the contract between an attorney and client for compensation, and the assignment of an interest in the judgment to secure the same, is held not to be privileged. 426.

Evidence. The right of a nonexpert claiming to have received letters from another without ever having seen him write, to testify that he wrote them, is denied, although she claims that he acknowledged having written some of them, where such fact is disputed. 557. Proof of corpus delicti, see infra, IX.

Reversal on appeal. The right of an appellate court to set aside a finding by the jury on the ground that it was scientifically impossible is sustained. 357.

Laches. Laches is held to apply in favor of a trustee under an express trust, who uses the trust property in the purchase and conveyance of land to another in violation of the trust. 370.

Limitation of actions. The running of the statute of limitations against one of several joint tenants is held to bar an action against all, although the remainder are under disability. 407. A limitation of the time for presenting state bonds which have been overdue for eighteen months to six months from the time of notice, which is to be published in a newspaper at the capital city of the state, is held not to be unreasonable as to the length of time. 714.

Damages. Damages for loss of baggage by a carrier were held not to include the trouble and expense of trying to locate it, or in purchasing other wearing apparel to replace that lost, unless the carrier was notified of facts rendering the special damages probable. 188. The measure of damages for wrongful cancellation, for alleged nonpayment of premiums, of an assessment policy on the life of one who is no longer an insurable risk, is held to be the amount of the policy less the cost of carrying it to maturity, with interest. 1163. Recovery for pain and suffering from delay in reaching a hospital because of the employer's failure promptly to furnish free transportation in accordance with its agreement is denied an injured servant who possessed the means of paying for transportation. 997. A parent's right to damages for mental shock and distress from the unlawful arrest and prosecution of minor children on a charge of malicious mischief is denied. 518. Recovery for injured feelings of the husband is allowed for soiling and ruining the casket of his wife, and the mutilation and disfigurement of her corpse by exposure to rain. 1018. Liability for injury due to fright, see supra, VI.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

Venue. The power of the legislature to permit the grand jury of one county to indict for crimes committed in an adjoining county is sustained on the ground that, although the indictment requires a grand jury, venue is not made an essential element of it. 669.

Proof of corpus delicti. The identity of a corpse found partly consumed in a fire was held sufficiently established by circumstantial evidence, for the purpose of proving the corpus delicti in a prosecution for murder. 181.

Cumulative sentence. A sentence of fine for an assault, or imprisonment in default of payment, and a subsequent sentence of imprisonment for a different assault, to begin at the expiration of the former sentence, are held not to be cumulative, with in a statute limiting the term of imprisonment and declaring that cumulative sentences shall be regarded as one. 124.

Pardon. A condition of a pardon, for reimprisonment for the original sentence of imprisonment after the expiration of the time fixed by the court within which his sentence should be executed, is held valid. 719.

Compounding felony. An indictment for compounding a felony by agreeing not to prosecute persons arrested for larceny is held insufficient, unless it charges that a larceny had been committed. 709.

Gaming. Betting on horse racing is held not to be within a statute against betting on any game of hazard or skill. 899.

Sale of liquor. Evidence of a sale of "lager beer" is held insufficient to support a conviction for selling intoxicating liquors. 194.

False pretenses. The coupling of a future 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

promise with a false pretense is held not to relieve the false pretense of its criminal character. 278.

Larceny. The value of gas wrongfully consumed by means of false connections, without having it pass through the meter, during the entire period in which the false connections are used, is held proper for consideration in determining the degree of the crime. 520. The trespass necessary to constitute larceny is held to be absent where the owner, on learning of a design to steal the property from a specified place, places it there with instructions to his servant to deliver it to the one who shall call for it. 756. The mere turning over of baggage to one claiming it, by a transportation company, under the mistaken belief that he is entitled to its possession, is held not to be such a consent to his possession as to prevent his guilt of larceny. 1149.

Robbery. The elements of force and putting in fear are held to be present where one approaches and pretends to arrest an intoxicated person, and afterwards takes away his valuables without resistance on his part. 566.

Assault. Wounding one person by shooting at another with intent to kill is held not to sustain a prosecution for shooting the former with intent to kill. 630.

Homicide. A resolution to kill, following deliberation and premeditation, and a killing in pursuance of such resolution, are held to constitute murder in the first degree, regardless of the rapidity with which the commission of the crime followed its first suggestion. 1056.

Suicide. An attempt to commit suicide is held not to be a crime in the absence of statutory provisions. 286.

ACCOUNTS.

A charge for services by an attorney, which is accepted by the client, becomes an account stated, and cannot be reopened except for fraud or mistake, although the account of collections in which it is embodied is disputed, so that it becomes a matter of litigation. Lane & B. Co. v. Taylor, 7: 924, 97 S. W. 441, — Ark. (Annotated)

ACCOUNT STATED.

ACTION OR SUIT.

Parties to, see Parties.

Right to institute new action in state court after removal to Federal court, see Removal of Causes.

1. An action to compel the destruction of pictures taken by police authorities of one accused, but not convicted, of crime, and intended for the rogues' gallery, is not instituted to punish an infraction of the criminal laws. Schulman v. Whitaker, 7: 274, 42 So. 227, 117 La. 703.

2. In case of a trust for the heirs of a certain person who shall be living at the death of another, no action can be maintained prior to the latter's death, to establish the trust against an assignee of the trustee, or to impound the rents and profits. Allen v. White, 7: 999, 85 Pac. 695, — Colo. (Annotated)

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Title by adverse possession cannot be acquired against a married woman pending coverture. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

2. When one is shown to have taken possession of land as agent of another, his subsequent holding will be regarded as permissive in the absence of proof to the contrary. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

3. The statute of limitations is, during the minority of the trustees, prevented from running upon possession being taken under a deed of a married woman for whose use property was conveyed to a trustee with power to sell by joining her in the deed, if at the time of the conveyance the trustee is dead and the title has descended to his infant heirs. Cameron v. Hicks, 7: 407, 53 S. E. 728, 141 N. C. 21.

4. The statute of limitations does not, for want of adverse actual possession, apply in favor of one claiming coal in a state of nature, in place, and not developed. Newman v. Newman, 7: 370, 55 S. E. 377, — W. Va. —.

5. An intermediate remainder will not be cut out by the acquisition by the ultimate remainder-man of the life estate under adverse possession claimed against the life tenant alone, with the admission that the intermediate remainder is unclaimed and unaffected. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

6. Possession taken under a deed by a married woman of property which was conveyed to a trustee for her life and to preserve remainders, with power to convey by joining the life tenant, sets the statute of limitations in operation against not only the trustee, but the life tenant and the remainder-men. Cameron v. Hicks, 7: 407, 53 S. E. 728, 141 N. C. 21.

APPEAL AND ERROR.Record on appeal.

1. The record may be made to show an exception to the overruling of a motion for new trial by nunc pro tunc entry. Mitchell v. Young, 7: 221, 97 S. W. 454, — Ark. —.

2. The certificate of a trial judge that the bill of exceptions contains all the evidence pertaining or material to the questions raised by a motion for a directed verdict must be accepted as correct, if there is nothing properly in the record to impeach it. Lesch v. Great Northern R. Co. 7: 93, 106 N. W. 955, 97 Minn. 503.

3. That evidence upon a certain question was presented at the trial is sufficiently shown by a bill of exceptions which states that no question was made but that there was evidence for the jury upon all the issues submitted to them, where the instructions show that the issue upon which the evidence is claimed to be wanting was submitted to them. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

4. A bill of exceptions which shows inferentially and by natural implication, from the language used, that it contains all the evidence, is sufficient. Mitchell v. Young, 7: 221, 97 S. W. 454, — Ark. —.

Mode of raising questions in court below.

5. Exception during the trial or on motion for new trial is necessary to preserve error in the instructions to the jury for the consideration of the appellate court. Potts v. State, 7: 194, 97 S. W. 477, — Tex. Crim. App. —.

6. The court will not interfere with verdicts against a master and in favor of an employee upon whose negligence the liability depends, where neither party asks to set aside the verdicts for mistrial, but each seeks to preserve all in his favor and reject the rest. Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 7: 496, 64 Atl. 190, 73 N. H. 556. Dismissal.

7. If the term of imprisonment expires pending an appeal by the jailer from a decision in a habeas corpus proceeding releasing a prisoner from custody, the appeal will be dismissed. Harris v. Lang, 7: 124, 27 App. D. C. 84.

What matters reviewable generally.

8. A question once decided by the court of appeals will not be re-examined when the case again comes before that court upon the same facts and under the same conditions. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso. v. Ferrenbach, 7: 1163, 144 Fed. 342, 75 C. C. A. 304.

Objections as to which party is estopped.

9. One who procures the giving of an instruction in conflict with a correct statement of the law which has been previously given cannot complain of the error of the court in that regard. Indianapolis Traction & T. Co. v. Kidd, 7: 143, 79 N. E. 347, — Ind. —.

Discretionary matters.

Discretion of trial court as to admission of evidence, see also Evidence, 19.

10. The appellate court cannot review the action of the trial court in refusing to permit an accused to withdraw his plea of not guilty and file a special plea to the indictment. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

11. A judgment will not be reversed on the ground that evidence was allowed in rebuttal that should have been offered in chief, unless a manifest abuse of discretion appears. Mendel v. Miller, 7: 1184, 56 S. E. 88, 126 Ga. 834.

Questions not raised below.

12. Want of certainty in a complaint may be remedied by the evidence and verdict, as against an attack for the first time on appeal. Indianapolis Traction & T. Co. v. Kidd, 7: 143, 79 N. E. 347, — Ind. —.

Errors waived or cured below.

13. Participating in the taking of testimony by a referee out of the jurisdiction of the court without a special order authorizing it waives the error. Sharkey v. Candiani, 7: 791, 85 Pac. 219, — Or. —.

14. Failure to request the exclusion of evidence which has become immaterial because not connected with the point in issue will waive the error of its admission, although objection was made to it at the time it was offered, which was overruled upon the promise to connect it with the issue. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

Review of facts.

15. A finding by the jury of a double automatic stroke by a steam hammer will be set aside on appeal where the hammer, weighing 1,250 pounds, was operated by a piston arm working in a cylinder and driven by a pressure of 70 to 90 pounds of steam to the square inch, which was controllable only by a hand lever, and no defect is shown in the mechanism; since there could be no rebound or double stroke to a hammer of that character without the operation of the controlling lever. Chybowski v. Bucyrus Co. 7: 357, 106 N. W. 833, 127 Wis. 332. (Annotated)

Grounds for reversal.

16. The admission of evidence in an action against an electric light company for the death of a person because of grounded current, that there were means by which the grounded portion might have been cut out, is not prejudicial, where the company had, before turning the current into the circuit containing the ground, concluded that the ground was not located there, so that it would not have made use of such appliances had they been part of its equipment. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

17. A conviction in a case tried without a jury will not be reversed on appeal for admission of improper evidence, unless the court can see that the accused was prejudiced by the error. Topolewski v. State, 7: 756, 109 N. W. 1037, — Wis. —.

18. Error in admitting incompetent evidence in an action tried without a jury does not require reversal if there is abundant competent evidence to justify the finding of the court. Pratt v. Davis, 7: 609, 79 N. E. 562, 224 Ill. 300.

19. The exclusion from evidence of the opinion of a witness as to a fact in controversy in a case is immaterial if the jury finds in accordance with the contention of the party offering it. Indianapolis Traction & T. Co. v. Kidd, 7: 143, 79 N. E. 347, — Ind. —.

20. There is no reversible error in refusing to admit in evidence an application for carriage of freight where it is not materially different from the carriage agreement which is admitted. Wabash R. Co. v. Thomas, 7: 1041, 78 N. E. 777, 222 Ill. 337.

21. Instructions submitting issues not authorized by the evidence are, if prejudicial, ground for reversal. Mendel v. Miller, 7: 1184, 56 S. E. 88, 126 Ga. 834.

22. If, after having notice of the terms of a guaranty written over his indorsement, the payee of a note ratifies it, any error in an instruction that it was immaterial if the guaranty was written before or after the signature was placed on the note, if the signature was placed there with the intention of guaranteeing it and the words were written in accordance with that purpose, is harmless. George E. Lloyd & Co. v. Matthews, 7: 376, 79 N. E. 172, 223 Ill. 477.

23. In an action by a passenger to recover damages for having been wrongfully threatened with expulsion from a street car, an instruction that the jury may weigh the wordly circumstances of the parties is reversible error, where there is no evidence as to such circumstances, and the only question to be determined is the amount of the verdict. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. Baker, 7: 103, 54 S. E. 639, 125 Ga. 562.

24. A ruling that defendant in an action for damages for performing an unauthorized surgical operation upon a married woman has the burden of showing leave and license, notwithstanding the declaration avers want of consent by herself "or anyone authorized to act for her," to which defendant pleaded leave and license, which was denied by plaintiff, is harmless, if error, where it is shown that plaintiff herself did not consent, and evidence of the conduct of her husband, the only one claimed to be authorized to consent for her, tends to negative consent on his part. Pratt v. Davis, 7: 609, 79 N. E. 562, 224 Ill. 300.

25. Taking notes of the testimony, by a juror, does not require the setting aside of the verdict; but the matter is within the discretion of the trial court. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

Costs.

26. Each party may be required to pay his own costs on reversal of a decree for want of jurisdiction in the trial court, where defendant did not question the jurisdiction, but proceeded to try the case on its merits. Columbia Nat. Sand Dredging Co. v. Morton, 7: 114, — App. D. C. —.

2. The classification of members of a mutual-benefit society according to age, in a by-law readjusting methods of assessment, is not illegal. Reynolds v. Supreme Council, R. A. 7: 1154, 78 N. E. 129, 192 Mass. 150.

3. A mutual-benefit society has power to amend its by-laws so as to increase the assessments on its members, where the existing rate has proved inadequate, under charter authority to provide for the payment of a certain death benefit, to be secured by assessment, and to provide for the amendment of its by-laws. Reynolds v. Supreme Council, R. A. 7: 1154, 78 N. E. 129, 192 Mass. 150. (Annotated)

4. Raising the rate of assessment on a member of a mutual-benefit society by change of by-laws does not impair his contract, where the by-laws to which he agreed required him to conform to the laws then in force, or which might thereafter be adopted. Reynolds v. Supreme Council, R. A. 7: 1154, 78 N. E. 129, 192 Mass. 150.

Duty of motorman in approaching car discharging passengers at street crossing, see Street Railways, 2, 4.

Question for jury as to duty to provide extra men to prevent crowding at certain hours, see Trial, 22.

1. That the motorman of a street car sees a person with something in his hand near the track at a place where the car is not required to stop for passengers, making violent motions toward the car, does not charge him with notice that his failure to stop the car will result in the throwing of a missile at himself which may strike and injure a passenger, and charge him with the duty of protecting the passenger, so as to render the company liable for injury to the passenger by his neglect so to do. Woas v. St. Louis Transit Co. 7: 231, 96 S. W. 1017, 198 Mo. 664. (Annotated)

2. Neither the failure of a street railway company to give its conductors full and specific instructions, nor the placing of restrictions upon the extent of their authority, nor enjoining them to perform their duties cautiously, prudently, and well, will relieve it from liability for the wrongful arrest of a passenger, made at the instance of a conductor who mistakenly pointed out a respectable person as a pickpocket. Schmidt v. New Orleans R. Co. 7: 162, 40 So. 714, 116 La. 311. (Annotated)

3. A street railway company is liable in damages for a wrongful arrest due to the act of its conductor, who mistakenly pointed out a respectable passenger as a pickpocket to a police officer, under La. Civ. Code, art. 2324, declaring that one who causes another person to do an unlawful act, or assists or encourages the commission of it, is responsible in solido with that person for the damages occasioned by the act. Schmidt v. New Orleans R. Co. 7: 162, 40 So. 714, 116 La. 311. (Annotated)

4. No actionable negligence on the part of a railroad company is shown by the fact that those in charge of a vestibule train, upon receiving notice that an intending passenger was outside of a closed door of the moving train, attempted to rescue him by going the length of the car and opening the door, rather than by operating the emergency brakes. Graham v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 7: 603, 107 N. W. 595, — Iowa, —.

5. A railway company owes no duty to one who, in violation of law, attempts to board a moving train at a closed vestibule door, until his position of danger is made known to employees in charge of the train. Graham v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 7: 603, 107 N. W. 595, — Iowa, —. (Annotated)

6. To hold a carrier liable for injury to a passenger by reason of a jolt of the vehicle, plaintiff must show that it was caused by the carrier's negligence. Foley v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7: 1076, 79 N. E. 765, — Mass. —. (Annotated)

7. Where it appears that there is usually a large crowd at a particular station to take a particular train, and that there has been on many occasions surging and struggling to get upon the cars, the jury may find the carrier negligent in failing to anticipate such occurrences and take precautions to protect intending passengers from injury therefrom. Kuhlen v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 7: 729, 79 N. E. 815, — Mass. —. (Annotated)

8. Train men who attempt to assist an intoxicated passenger from the train are bound to use ordinary care to leave him where he will be reasonably safe in view of his condition. Black v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 7: 148, 79 N. E. 797, — Mass. —.

Negligence of passenger.

9. A passenger is not exercising due care in standing near an open door without supporting himself by his hands while the car is passing over a cross-over switch of which he knows, and which is necessary because of repairs in progress on the track. Foley v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7: 1076, 79 N. E. 765, — Mass. —.

10. A passenger induced by the negligent act of the conductor to leave a street car at a point remote from her destination is under no legal duty to apply for shelter at houses in the vicinity of the place where she alights, rather than to attempt to reach her destination on foot, over a highway which is in a reasonably safe condition for travel by pedestrians. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. McAllister, 7: 1177, 54 S. E. 957, 126 Ga. 447.

11. An intending passenger is not negligent as matter of law, in entering a crowd attempting to board a train, by the fact that she narrowly escaped injury at the same place by doing so on former occasions. Kuhlen v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 7: 729, 79 N. E. 815, — Mass. —.

Ejection of passenger.

12. A street-car passenger who is given an invalid transfer check upon paying his fare and asking for a transfer, to which he is entitled, cannot, upon refusal by the conductor of the connecting car to honor it, refuse to pay his fare, thereby rendering necessary forcible ejection, and hold the carrier liable for the assault; but his remedy is confined to damages for the breach of contract, including reasonable compensation for the indignity put upon him through the fault of the company. Little Rock R. & E. Co. v. Goerner, 7: 97, 95 S. W. 1007, — Ark. —. (Annotated)

Tickets; conditions; fares.

Requiring railroad companies to sell mileage books at certain rate, see Constitutional Law, 5.

13. A condition on a transfer issued by a street railway company that "the holder, by accepting, agrees that, should any controversy arise as to its validity, holder will pay fare and call at company's office for correction," is unreasonable and void. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. Baker, 7: 103, 54 S. E. 639, 125 Ga. 562.

14. A street car conductor is bound at his peril to determine whether a passenger presenting a transfer is entitled to ride upon it, notwithstanding it does not, upon its face, show such right, where the passenger gives a reasonable explanation of the mistake made by the conductor who issued it. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. Baker, 7: 103, 54 S. E. 639, 125 Ga. 562.

15. The voluntary offer of a street railway company to issue a transfer giving the right to ride on other cars of its lines, when accepted, completes a contract the consideration for which is the amount paid to the conductor issuing it; and the right to ride on the car to which the passenger is transferred is in no sense a gratuity. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. Baker, 7: 103, 54 S. E. 639, 125 Ga. 562.

16. A threat by a street car conductor to expel a passenger on account of a mistake in the transfer slip presented by him is a legal wrong giving the passenger a right of action against the company, although there is nothing insulting in the words or manner of the conductor, further than a mere threat to expel might be deemed an insult. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. Baker, 7: 103, 54 S. E. 639, 125 Ga. 562.

CERTIORARI.

1. Facts not appearing in the return to a writ of certiorari, nor in any other manner which would enable the court to take notice of them, are not to be considered in determining the propriety of the writ. United States Standard Voting Mach. Co. v. Hobson, 7: 512, 109 N. W. 458, — Iowa. —.

2. The filing of answers in an injunction suit in which a restraining order has been issued to prevent the carrying out of a contract does not defeat the right of defendants to apply for a writ of certiorari to annul the injunction. United States Standard Voting Mach. Co. v. Hobson, 7: 512, 109 N. W. 458, — Iowa. —.

3. The right to appeal from an order restraining performance of a contract for voting machines does not defeat the right to apply for a writ of certiorari to annul it on the ground that it was in excess of jurisdiction and therefore void, where the election at which the machines were to be used would pass before the appeal could be heard. United States Standard Voting Mach. Co. v. Hobson, 7: 512, 109 N. W. 458, — Iowa. —.

CHARITIES.

Laches to bar proceeding to contest validity of charitable trust, see Limitation of Actions, 2.

1. A charitable trust attaches to property secured for its purposes by a corporation organized to maintain a library for the benefit of the members and of the multitude of people who visit the city, where anyone contributing a certain amount towards the purposes of the enterprise may become a member, and the funds are secured by membership fees and charitable contributions. Fordyce v. Woman's Christian Nat. Library Asso. 7: 485, 96 S. W. 155, — Ark. —.

Definiteness.

2. The existence of a public free-school system does not necessarily render invalid a trust for the benefit of boys unable to educate themselves, on the theory that the trust has no field for operation, since, notwithstanding such system, there may be boys who, by reason of poverty or other circumstances, cannot avail themselves of it. Tincher v. Arnold, 7: 471, 147 Fed. 665, 77 C. C. A. 649. (Annotated)

3. That no provision is made by the donor for the selection of the beneficiaries of a trust for the education of boys not able to educate themselves does not invalidate the trust, since equity will appoint a trustee for that purpose. Tincher v. Arnold, 7: 471, 147 Fed. 665, 77 C. C. A. 649.

4. A charitable trust for the education of poor boys is not rendered invalid by the fact that the class is not restricted in any way by the capacity, color, or condition of the beneficiaries. Tincher v. Arnold, 7: 471, 147 Fed. 665, 77 C. C. A. 649.

Cy pres doctrine.

5. That the donor of a fund to be held in trust for the education of boys unable to educate themselves provides that, after the building is secured, the income of the fund shall be used to pay teachers, does not prevent the use of a part of it for the heating, lighting, and care of the building. Tincher v. Arnold, 7: 471, 147 Fed. 665, 77 C. C. A. 649.

Liability for damages.

Estoppel to maintain action to recover possession of property sold under execution on judgment for negligence of agent, see Estoppel, 6.

6. That a hospital is conducted as a public charity without expectation of profit does not render it immune from liability for negligent injuries to its servants. Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid. Assn. 7: 496, 64 Atl. 190, 73 N. H. 556.

7. That a hospital is founded by property given in trust for that purpose does not exempt it from liability for negligent injury to its employees. Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Assn. 7: 496, 64 Atl. 190, 73 N. H. 556.

8. The rule of respondeat superior does not apply in case of trustees who are administering a fund created for the sole purpose of educating and maintaining indigent boys without recompense, who have exercised reasonable care to select competent servants; and therefore they are not liable for injury to one servant through negligent orders given him by another. Farigan v. Pevear, 7: 481, 78 N. E. 855, — Mass. —. (Annotated)

9. The property of a charity cannot be sold under execution issued on a judgment rendered for the nonfeasance, misfeasance, or malfeasance of its agents or trustees. Fordyce v. Woman's Christian Nat. Library Assn. 7: 485, 96 S. W. 155, — Ark. —.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

1. A parol mortgage to secure a loan for the purchase of a stock of goods, which is to attach not only to the goods already in stock, but to such as might be added thereafter, is valid as between the parties. Mower v. McCarthy, 7: 418, 64 Atl. 578, — Vt. —.

2. A parol mortgage to one loaning money to purchase a stock of goods upon the stock, and additions to it, is valid; and possession taken under it by the mortgagee will relate to the date of the agreement, so as to preclude creditors of the purchaser from sharing in the proceeds of their sale. *Mower v. CONFLICT OF LAWS.

As to contracts; insurance.

1. The statute of a state where the action is brought to recover damages for injuries to an employee, making void unreasonable contracts for notice of the injury to the employer as a condition to maintaining an action in such cases, is not applicable to affect a contract valid in the sister state where made, and in that where the injury occurred, in the absence of anything to disclose a legislative intent to make it applicable to such contracts. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Thompson, 7: 191, 97 S. W. 459, — Tex. — (Annotated)

2. Handing an application and fee to the agent of an insurance company in one state, to be forwarded to the insurer in another state, does not render the former state the place of contract, although the policy is returned to the applicant in that state by mail, where the by-laws of the insurer provide that the association shall not be liable in any manner until the directors have accepted the application and a certificate has been issued, since the contract is complete when the policy is placed in the mail, in the absence of anything requiring personal delivery. Tuttle v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 7: 223, 104 N. W. 1131, — Iowa, —.

Property rights.

3. The question, What title passes by a patent to a homestead settler on public land? must be solved by the law of the United States. Cunningham v. Krutz, 7: 967, 83 Pac. 109, 41 Wash. 190.

1. Injury caused to a retail merchant because of inability to purchase goods on account of a combination among other retail and wholesale merchants for the purpose of maintaining maximum prices for the goods dealt in by them, to be made effectual by refusal to deal with persons who will not agree to maintain prices, and by threats to boycott wholesalers who deal with them, give a right of action. Klingel's Pharmacy v. Sharpe & Dohme, 7: 976, 64 Atl. 1029. — Md. — (Annotated)

2. Persons agreeing to a plan to maintain the prices of proprietary medicines by refusing to sell to aggressive cutters are not, unless they expressly agree thereto, responsible for the acts of a retailers' association which is a party to the agreement, in putting in force coercive measures against aggressive cutters by requesting wholesalers of general druggists' supplies to desist from selling to aggressive cutters, and reporting their replies to the organized retailers; the effective working of which would drive the aggressive cutters out of business. Jayne v. Loder, 7: 984, 149 Fed. 21, — C. C. A. —.

3. That each proprietor and wholesaler of patent medicines is permitted to determine for himself to what retailers he will refuse to sell does not prevent an undertaking on the part of associations of proprietors, wholesalers, and retailers to prevent rate cutting from being within the Sherman anti-trust act, if they bind themselves by an agreement not to sell to aggressive cutters of prices, and the agreement is enforced by the retailers notifying wholesalers who are aggressive cutters, and putting upon the list of aggressive cutters all wholesalers who do not desist from selling to persons on the list so furnished; the result of which is greatly to increase the cost of proprietary medicines to consumers throughout the country. Jayne v. Loder, 7: 984, 149 Fed. 21, — C. C. A. —.

CONSTABLE.

That a constable has not given the bond required by statute to qualify him for serving civil process does not disqualify him for serving a venire for the summoning of a jury in a criminal case. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

Delegation of power.

2. The power delegated to the voting machine commission created by chapter 267, p. 400, Minn. Laws 1905, to determine the efficiency of the voting machine thereby authorized to be used at elections in this state, is neither legislative nor judicial, but administrative, in character. Elwell v. Comstock, 7: 621, 109 N. W. 698, — Minn. —.

Equal protection; abridging privileges.

3. That a state statute forbidding the use of the United States flag for advertising purposes excepts from its operation any act permitted by the statutes of the United States or by the Army and Navy regulations, or any use of the flag for purposes of display or ornament, disconnected from any advertisement, does not render the act objectionable as special or class legislation. Halter v. State, 7: 1079, 105 N. W. 298, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

4. A statute forbidding the use of the flag for advertising purposes does not abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, in contravention of § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Halter v. State, 7: 1079, 105 N. W. 298, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

5. A statutory provision requiring railroad companies to sell mileage books at less than the rates regularly charged for transportation is class legislation, and not for the benefit of the whole people, and is therefore void as depriving the corporation of its property without due process of law, and of the equal protection of the laws. Com. ex rel. Anderson v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 7: 1086, 55 S. E. 572, — Va. —. (Annotated)

Due process; life, liberty and property.

6. A statute forbidding an employer to exact an agreement from an employee not to join a labor union infringes his constitutional rights of liberty. People v. Marcus, 7: 282, 77 N. E. 1073, 185 N. Y. 257. (Annotated)

7. The personal liberty of the citizen, guaranteed by the Federal and state Constitutions, is not infringed by the enactment of a statute by the state, in the exercise of its police power, forbidding the use of the flag of the United States for advertising purposes. Halter v. State, 7: 1079, 105 N. W. 298, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

8. The prohibition of a state statute against the use of the United States flag for advertising purposes does not deprive any person of his property without due process of law, in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Halter v. State, 7: 1079, 105 N. W. 298, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

9. The legislature may, under its police power, forbid the discharge of unpurified sewage into a river from which a public drinking-water supply is taken, without infringing the constitutional rights of the riparian owner, although no injury to the public health or comfort is actually shown. Durham v. Eno Cotton Mills, 7: 321, 54 S. E. 453, 141 N. C. 615. (Annotated)

Police power.

10. A state statute forbidding the desecration of the flag of the United States by using it for advertising purposes tends to foster sentiments of patriotism, and is not vulnerable to the objection that it is not calculated to promote the welfare of society. Halter v. State, 7: 1079, 105 N. W. 298, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

Impairing contract obligations.

11. No impairment of a contract right to use state bonds in payment for state lands is effected by a statute providing for the payment of the bonds in cash, and limiting the time for presentation to six months after publication of notice, after the expiration of which the bonds are not to be recognized as valid for any purpose. *Tip-ton v. 1. An artist who, after filling an order to paint a portrait from photographs of the deceased wife of his customer, proceeds without orders to paint another, cannot compel the customer to pay for it if it is placed in his possession for inspection and retained by him, since the act of painting it constitutes a violation of the contract and breach of trust. Klug v. Sheriffs, 7: 362, 109 N. W. 656, — Wis. —. (Annotated)

Statute of frauds.

2. An oral contract between two persons to purchase a single tract of land together or in partnership, which purchase is finally made by one of them, who pays the whole of the purchase price and takes the title in his own name, the other simply agreeing to pay him half thereof on demand, is within the inhibition of the statute of frauds (Neb. Comp. Stat. 1905, chap. 32, § 3), and is void. Norton v. Brink, 7: 945, 110 N. W. 669, — Neb. —.

Validity.

3. One who, to secure the money with which to procure the return of stolen property, is obliged to indorse the check of the owner, may, if he is compelled to make good the amount upon the owner's stopping payment of the check, recover the sum so paid from the owner, since the payment of money to secure the return of stolen property violates no rule of law and such a transaction is therefore legal and binding. Schirm v. Wieman, 7: 175, 63 Atl. 1056, 103 Md. 541. (Annotated)

4. A contract to pay for the construction of a building does not become enforceable against a corporation because it is executed by its president under its corporate seal, if a large bonus in addition to the amount of the bid is included in the contract price, which is to be divided between such president and the contractor and its representatives, even as to extra work after the price named in the contract has been paid, where, under the statutes of the state, such conduct on the part of the president is a misdemeanor. *Standard Lumber Co. v. COTENANCY.

Running of statute against one of several joint tenants as bar against all, see Limitation of Actions, 4.

1. A joint tenancy in lands held by husband and wife has the same characteristics as to survivorship, under the statutes of the state of Wisconsin, as existed between joint tenants at common law. Bassler v. Rewolinski, 7: 701, 109 N. W. 1032, — Wis. —.

2. A married woman who is a joint tenant of property with her husband cannot, by devising her interest therein, affect the husband's right of survivorship; nor does Wis. Rev. Stat. § 2342, abolishing the disabilities of married women as to the acquisition and enjoyment of property, confer upon her capacity to pass her interest in such property by devise. Bassler v. Rewolinski, 7: 701, 109 N. W. 1032, — Wis. —. (Annotated)

COURTS.

Mandamus to, see Mandamus, 1.

1. The courts may inquire whether an act, the constitutionality of which is assailed, is a valid exercise of the police power and calculated to promote the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society.

Halter v. State, 7: 1079, 105 N. W. 298, — Neb. —.

2. A civil district court has jurisdiction of a complaint to compel police authorities to destroy pictures of the plaintiff intended for the rogue's gallery, and taken after the plaintiff had been accused of a crime for which he has never been tried, since the action relates to a personal right. Schulman v. Whitaker, 7: 274, 42 So. 227, 117 La. 703.

COVENANT.

Merger of rights under, see Merger, 1.

1. The incorporation of a water-lot company with power to purchase, hold, and convey property, with a provision that the death of one or more of the directors or parties in interest shall not prevent or delay a sale of the lots, or any of them, or "an interest therein," does not prevent the insertion, in deeds of some of the lots, of restrictive covenants as to the amount of water or power to be used by the grantees respectively. Muscogee Mfg. Co. v. Eagle & Phenix Mills, 7: 1139, 54 S. E. 1028, 126 Ga. 210.

2. A stipulation in a deed, that the grantee of even-numbered water lots shall build a dam, with a canal or race of a specified character extending through the property, including the odd-numbered lots, and that the lots conveyed, with their improvements, shall be forever liable for the payment of any damage sustained by the owners of the odd-numbered lots by reason of the failure to complete the race or canal and keep it in good repair,—is a covenant running with the land. Muscogee Mfg. Co. v. Eagle & Phenix Mills, 7: 1139, 54 S. E. 1028, 126 Ga. 210.

3. As a general rule, a covenant in a deed of land, restricting the mode of its use, and inserted for the benefit of adjoining land of the grantor, will be extinguished by the subsequent vesting in one person of the title to both tracts of land. Muscogee Mfg. Co. v. Eagle & Phenix Mills, 7: 1139, 54 S. E. 1028, 126 Ga. 210.

Failure of court to instruct upon lesser degree of crime, see Trial, 33.

1. The constitutional guaranty of immunity from criminal prosecution except by indictment does not prevent the legislature from permitting the grand jury of one county to indict for crimes committed in an adjoining county, since, although indictment requires a grand jury, venue is not an essential element of it. State v. Lewis, 7: 669, 55 S. E. 600, 142 N. C. 628. (Annotated)

Sentence and imprisonment.

2. A prisoner under sentence for a longer term than the court had jurisdiction to impose cannot be relieved from custody until the expiration of the time which was within the court's jurisdiction. Harris v. Lang, 7: 124, 27 App. D. C. 84.

3. The imposition of cumulative sentences in a criminal action, the aggregate of which exceeds the jurisdiction of the court to impose, does not render the entire sentence void, but it will be valid for the term which the court has jurisdiction to impose. Harris v. Lang, 7: 124, 27 App. D. C. 84. (Annotated)

4. A sentence of fine, in default of payment of which there shall be imprisonment for a certain time, imposed upon conviction for assault, and one subsequently imposed upon the same defendant of imprisonment for another assault upon a different person, to which he pleaded guilty at the time of his former conviction, which term is to begin at the expiration of the former one, are not cumulative within the meaning of a statute limiting the jurisdiction of the court as to the term for which it may impose imprisonment, and declaring that cumulative sentences shall be regarded as one. Harris v. Lang, 7: 124, 27 App. D. C. 84. (Annotated)

5. Under a statute which provides that "in all cases the court shall award the sentence and fix the punishment or penalty prescribed by law," the power of the court extends to fixing the kind and amount or duration of the punishment, rather than the time when it shall be executed, which is not an essential part of the sentence; and expiration of the time fixed by the order of the court for the execution of a sentence without imprisonment, is in no sense an execution of the sentence. State v. Horne, 7: 719, 42 So. 388, — Fla. —.

Pardon.

Right of jury to determine whether or not condition of pardon has been broken, see Jury, 20.

6. Under a constitutional provision that the pardoning power "may, upon such conditions and with such limitations and restrictions as they may deem proper, . . . grant pardon after conviction, in all cases except treason and impeachment, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons," the pardoning power may, in granting a pardon after conviction, impose any condition, limitation, or restriction that is not illegal, immoral, or impossible of performance, and the acceptance of the pardon binds the person accepting it to all such conditions, limitations, and restrictions contained therein that are legal, moral, and possible of performance. State v. Horne, 7: 719, 42 So. 388, — Fla. —.

7. A conditional pardon may, by its express terms, provide that, upon violation of the conditions, the offender shall be liable to summary arrest and recommitment for the unexpired portion of his original sentence, and such stipulations upon acceptance of the pardon become binding upon the convict, and authorize his rearrest and recommitment in the manner and by or through the officials authorized as stipulated in the pardon. State v. Horne, 7: 719, 42 So. 388, — Fla. —.

8. A provision in a conditional pardon, that, upon breach of the condition on which the pardon is granted, it shall be the duty of the sheriff of any county immediately to arrest the person pardoned and return him to the penitentiary, to serve out the remainder of his term, refers to the length of imprisonment fixed by the sentence, and not to the particular period of time mentioned in the sentence during which it was to be executed; since the latter is not a material or effective part of the sentence. State v. Horne, 7: 719, 42 So. 388, — Fla. —.

9. A conditional pardon by virtue of which a prisoner accepting its terms has been released from imprisonment does not, upon his failure to perform the conditions, or his violation of them, take effect where the contingency specified is a condition precedent, and it becomes void where it is a condition subsequent. State v. Horne, 7: 719, 42 So. 388, — Fla. —.

10. If the condition of a pardon upon which a convict secures his release from imprisonment is violated, the pardon becomes void, and the convict may be arrested as though no pardon had been granted, and compelled to undergo so much of the original sentence as he had not suffered at the time of his release. State v. Horne, 7: 719, 42 So. 388, — Fla. —.

11. A convict who has been released upon a conditional pardon cannot be rearrested and recommitment, upon breach of the condition, upon the mere order of the governor alone, unless such a course is authorized by a statute or by the express terms of the pardon; but he is entitled to a hearing before a court of general criminal jurisdiction, in order that he may show, if he can, that he has performed the conditions of the pardon, or that he has a legal excuse for not having done so, or that he is not the same person who was convicted. State v. Horne, 7: 719, 42 So. 388, — Fla. —.

12. A provision in a pardon requiring re-imprisonment, upon breach of a condition of the pardon, for the remainder of the original sentence of imprisonment, after the expiration of the particular period of time fixed by the court within which the sentence imposed shall be executed, is not immoral or impossible of performance during the life of the convict; nor is it illegal, since the particular period of time within which the sentence is to be suffered by the convict as specified in the sentence is not a part of the legal sentence, except so far as it fixes the quantum of time that he must suffer such penalty; nor does it increase the punishment imposed by the court in the sentence; and it is not forbidden by law. State v. Horne, 7: 719, 42 So. 388, — Fla. —.

Exemplary damages.

1. A street car company is liable not only for actual and compensatory damages, but for punitive damages also, if its conductor wilfully refuses to honor a valid transfer under circumstances of insult and aggravation, followed by an assault upon the passenger. Little Rock R. & E. Co. v. Goerner, 7: 97, 95 S. W. 1007, — Ark. —.

Breach of insurance contract.

Acceptance of article as waiver of, see Sale, 2.

2. The measure of damages for wrongful cancellation, for alleged nonpayment of premiums, of an assessment insurance policy upon the life of one who at the time of cancellation is no longer an insurable risk, is the amount of the policy, less cost of carrying it to maturity had it remained in force, all amounts entering into the calculation to be calculated upon the basis of the legal rate of interest as of the date of cancellation. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso.

v. Ferrenbach, 7: 1163, 144 Fed. 342, 75 C. C. A. 304. (Annotated)

3. The amount of premiums paid, with interest, is not the measure of damages for the wrongful cancellation for alleged non-payment of premiums of a life-insurance policy issued on the assessment plan. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso. v. Ferrenbach, 7: 1163, 144 Fed. 342, 75 C. C. A. 304. (Annotated)

Failure in duty to passenger.

See also supra, 1.

4. If a passenger could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered that she was invited by the conductor to disembark at a point short of her destination, she is entitled to recover damages arising from illness brought about by exposure to the weather after leaving the car. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. McAllister, 7: 1177, 54 S. E. 957, 126 Ga. 447.

5. In an action brought to recover damages for a threat made by a conductor to expel from the street car a passenger who presented a transfer defective because of a mistake made by the conductor issuing it, the measure of damages is not limited to the amount paid to prevent an expulsion, but general damages may be recovered as for an inexcusable trespass, even though no aggravating circumstances were connected with the threat of expulsion. George R. & E. Co. v. Baker, 7: 103, 54 S. E. 639, 125 Ga. 562.

Loss of baggage.

6. Damages for loss of baggage by a carrier cannot include the trouble and expense of trying to locate it, or in purchasing other wearing apparel to replace that lost, in the absence of notice to the carrier at the time of delivering the baggage to him of facts which would render special damages probable. Turner v. Southern R. Co. 7: 188, 54 S. E. 825, — S. C. —. (Annotated)

Personal injuries; death.

7. Proof of pain and suffering following the removal of a woman's uterus is not necessary to render them an element of damages against the one performing the operation, since they are inferred by law. Pratt v. Davis, 7: 609, 79 N. E. 502, 224 Ill. 300.

8. The damages recoverable by a married woman for personal injuries may include expenses for medical attendance which have been actually paid or contracted by her, although the primary duty to make the payment was upon her husband. Indianapolis Traction & T. Co. v. Kidd, 7: 143, 79 N. E. 347, — Ind. —.

9. A man may recover compensation from one causing negligent injuries to his wife, for the loss of society, service, aid, and comfort resulting therefrom, including, if the injury is permanent, compensation for diminished capacity to labor in the future. Kimberly v. Howland, 7: 545, 55 S. E. 778, — N. C. —.

Mental anguish.

10. A parent cannot recover damages for 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

mental shock and distress on account of the unlawful arrest and prosecution of minor children on a charge of malicious mischief, nor for illness resulting from such shock. Sperier v. Ott, 7: 518, 41 So. 323, 116 La. 1087. (Annotated)

11. Damages for mental anguish may be recovered in an action by a husband against a common carrier for soiling and ruining the casket containing the body of his dead wife, and mutilating and disfiguring the corpse, by negligently and wilfully exposing the casket to the rain. Lindh v. Great Northern R. Co. 7: 1018, 109 N. W. 823, — Minn. —.

Aggravation.

12. A consumer whose supply of water has been wrongfully cut off by a water company cannot rely on the fact that a member of his family was ill at the time as an aggravating circumstance, unless it is shown that the agents of the company knew of such illness; nor can he recover anything on the ground that the action of the company imperiled the health and lives of his entire household. Freeman v. Macon Gas Light & W. Co. 7: 917, 56 S. E. 61, 126 Ga. 843.

1. One who grants a thing is deemed, also, to grant that within his ownership, without which the grant itself would be of no effect; but this rule applies only to such things as are incident to the grant and directly necessary to the enjoyment of the thing granted. Muscogee Mfg. Co. v. Eagle & Phenix Mills, 7: 139, 54 S. E. 1028, 126 Ga. 210.

2. If the right to use power from a dam has been acquired and affixed to a particular mill or parcel of real estate, it will pass by a grant of the property, with appurtenances; but, if the power was not an appurtenance of the property at the time of the grant, it will not pass as such, although the grantor had a right to make use of the power at that time. Muscogee Mfg. Co. v.

Eagle & Phenix Mills, 7: 1139, 54 S. E. 1028, 126 Ga. 210.

3. A grant of property will carry with it actual existing appurtenances, but will not create any appurtenances. Muscogee Mfg. Co. v. Eagle & Phenix Mills, 7: 1139, 54 S. E. 1028, 126 Ga. 210.

1. A man cannot change the matrimonial domicile by abandoning his wife and going into another state to reside. State ex rel. Aldrach v. Morse, 7: 1127, 87 Pac. 705, — Utah, —.

2. The courts of the state of the matrimonial domicile have jurisdiction of a suit for divorce, although the defendant is out of the jurisdiction, and service of process is made upon him by publication only. State ex rel. Aldrach v. Morse, 7: 1127, 87 Pac. 705, — Utah, —. (Annotated)

3. The right to a divorce, conferred by Ga. Civ. Code 1895, § 2426, par. 8, upon the conviction of either party for an offense involving moral turpitude, and under which the offending party is sentenced to imprisonment in a penitentiary for a term of two years or more, is not affected by an executive pardon granted after such a sentence has been imposed. Holloway v. Holloway, 7: 272, 55 S. E. 191, — Ga. —. (Annotated)

4. Voluntary manslaughter is an offense involving moral turpitude, within the meaning of Ga. Civ. Code, 1895 § 2426, par. 8, specifying as a ground for divorce the conviction of either party for an offense involving moral turpitude. Holloway v. Holloway, 7: 272, 55 S. E. 191, — Ga. —.

Burden of proof that use of way was permissive, see Evidence, 11, 12.

An agreement by a tenant to pay rent for the use of a right of way over adjoining property which is appurtenant to the estate is not binding on his lessor if made without his knowledge. Schwer v. Martin, 7: 614, 97 S. W. 12, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1221.

EJECTION.

Of passenger, see Carriers, 12.

EJECTMENT.

Permitting a recovery in ejectment against one of the defendants who was not shown to be connected with the main title in the controversy is not erroneous where such title was good against all except plaintiff, by reason of adverse possession. *McCreary v. Voting machines.

Injunction against use of, see Injunction, 9.

Sufficiency of title of statute as to use of, see Statutes, 2.

Delegation of power to voting machine commission, see Constitutional Law, 2.

1. The use of voting machines is not prohibited by a constitutional provision that all elections shall be by ballot. United States Standard Voting Mach. Co. v. Hobson, 7: 512, 109 N. W. 458, — Iowa, —.

2. The approval for use at elections of a voting machine on which the whole ticket can be voted as a unit is not annulled by the passage of a statute striking the circle from the Australian ballot. United States Standard Voting Mach. Co. v. Hobson, 7: 512, 109 N. W. 458, — Iowa, —.

3. The provision of Minn. Const. art. 7, § 6, that all elections, except for town officers, shall be by ballot, was merely intended to secure to the elector the privilege of exercising his right of franchise secretly and effectively, and is not contravened by Minn. Laws 1905, chap. 267, p. 400, providing for the use of voting machines at elections. Elwell v. Comstock, 7: 621, 109 N. W. 698, — Minn. — (Annotated) Ballots; identifying marks.

4. An elector who has placed a mark upon his ballot whereby it may be identified cannot be heard to say that he did not intend the mark for that purpose. Elwell v. Comstock, 7: 621, 109 N. W. 698, — Minn. —

5. Words or sentences such as "nit" or "may the best man win," written upon ballots, were apparently not placed there for the purpose of identifying the ballots, which may properly be counted. Elwell v. Comstock, 7: 621, 109 N. W. 698, — Minn. —

6. A ballot cast at an election, which is so marked by the voter with his name or initials that his identity is thereby disclosed to any other person, is void. Elwell v. Comstock, 7: 621, 109 N. W. 698, — Minn. —

1. An electric light company which negligently turns a current on to a circuit having a grounded wire cannot escape liability for resulting injury to a person coming in contact with the grounded current by the fact that the injury would not have occurred except for the act of a stranger in making a second ground at another place. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

(Annotated)

2. An electric light company cannot escape liability for the death of a person who innocently came in contact with its grounded current upon his own premises, upon the theory that it owed him no duty. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

3. An electric light company is negligent in turning the current upon a circuit upon which it has known that the wire was grounded, without positively knowing that the trouble has been remedied, where the means to ascertain that fact are within its reach and at hand. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

EMINENT DOMAIN.

Who may exercise.

1. Authority to condemn property for the public uses recited in the charter of a corporation will not be denied because a portion of the enterprises in which it is authorized to engage are merely private, where the two are not so combined as to be inseparable. State ex rel. Harland v. Centralia-Chehalis Electric R. & P. Co. 7: 198, 85 Pac. 344, 42 Wash. 632.

2. That a street railway company had not in fact secured its right of way and necessary franchises will not prevent an exercise by it of the power of eminent domain to secure power to operate the road, if it is proceeding diligently with the enterprise, and has proceeded far enough to demonstrate that its immediate purpose is to apply the power sought to a public use. State ex rel. Harland v. Centralia-Chehalis Electric R. & P. Co. 7: 198, 85 Pac. 344, 42 Wash. 632. (Annotated)

What may be taken.

3. An electric railway company is not, in securing property necessary for power purposes, limited to that adjacent to its right of way, under a statute empowering it to appropriate land for right of way and "other corporate purposes" without limitation as to locality. State ex rel. Harland v. Centralia-Chehalis Electric R. & P. Co. 7: 198, 85 Pac. 344, 42 Wash. 632.

For what purpose.

4. A street cannot be created under the power of eminent domain, to be devoted to the purpose of railway switch tracks for the benefit of business concerns in the vicinity. Kansas City v. Hyd, 7: 639, 96 S. W. 201, 196 Mo. 498.

Additional servitude.

5. The poles and wires of a long-distance telephone strung along a public road do not constitute an additional burden which will entitle the fee owner to compensation, unless he shows that there will be an actual and substantial injury to his property. Hobbs v. Long Distance Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 7: 87, 41 So. 1003, — Ala. — (Annotated)

6. A pipe line, laid in a public rural highway under proper authority, and used for supplying the public with natural gas for heating and illuminating purposes, though imposing an additional public service upon the road, is not a use in excess of the right of the public in such road, and does not impose an additional burden upon the estate in fee in the land. Hardman v. Cabot, 7: 506, 55 S. E. 758, — W. Va. — (Annotated)

EQUAL PROTECTION.

See Constitutional Law, 3-5.

EQUITY.

Jurisdiction to grant injunction, see Injunction.

Power of equity pending foreclosure of mortgage to impound rents and profits, see Mortgage, 1.

Specific performance of contract, see Specific Performance.

Equity has jurisdiction of a bill to require the removal from a public highway of street-railway tracks placed there without the consent of the proper authorities. Bangor v. Bay City Traction & E. Co. 7: 1187, 110 N. W. 490, — Mich. —.

ESTOPPEL.

To complain of instruction, see Appeal and Error, 9.

Of municipality.

1. Municipal authorities cannot become estopped to require the removal from a street of the rails of a street railway by standing by and seeing the rails laid without objection. Bangor v. Bay City Traction & E. Co. 7: 1187, 110 N. W. 490, — Mich. —. (Annotated)

2. A municipal corporation which fails to assert its title to a street dedicated to public use, and permits an abutting property owner to improve his property at large expense, with reference to what he supposes in good faith to be the true street boundary line, and maintain the improvements for a period of thirteen years, will be estopped from asserting a title which will practically destroy the value of the abutting property for residence purposes, and work irreparable injury to the owner. Oliver v. Synhorst, 7: 243, 86 Pac. 376, — Or. —. (Annotated)

By record.

3. Failure of successors in title to one whose undelivered deed to real estate has been recorded, to remove it from the record, will not estop them from denying the title of a stranger who purchases the property in reliance on the record. Alabama Coal & C. Co. v. Gulf Coal & C. Co. 7: 712, 40 So. 397, — Ala. —. (Annotated)

By conduct or admissions.

4. The acknowledgment by a tenant that a right of way over adjoining property is permissive and subject to revocation will not bind him after he secures title to the landlord's estate, to which the right of way is appurtenant. Schwer v. Martin, 7: 614, 97 S. W. 12, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1221. (Annotated)

By assent.

5. After the maintenance of a railroad switch in a public street for twenty years under the express consent of the abutting owners, neither those who gave the consent, nor their successors in title, are entitled to injunctive relief against the alleged nuisance. Wolfard v. Fisher, 7: 991, 84 Pac. 350, — Or. —. (Annotated)

By silence or acquiescence.

6. That a charitable corporation has permitted a judgment to go against it for the negligence of its agent and its property to be sold under an execution does not prevent it from maintaining an action to recover possession of the property. Fordyce v. Woman's Christian Nat. Library Asso. 7: 485, 96 S. W. 155, — Ark. —.

By negligence.

7. The beneficiary in a deed of trust of real estate to secure notes is not negligent in surrendering a note without cancellation when it is paid, as the result of which a fraud is committed by securing the sale of the property under it to the detriment of the security of the other notes, so as to subordinate his equities to those of one claiming an interest derived from such sale, but who has not secured the title or paid the purchase money. Wasserman v. Metzger, 7: 1019, 54 S. E. 893, 105 Va. 744.

8. A bank which has paid an overdraft of a local agent upon the bank account of his principal, who resides in another state, without ascertaining the authority of the agent, cannot assert failure of the principal to examine the pass book and returned vouchers after the balancing of the account, as an estoppel upon the principal to deny liability for the overdraft. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Nichols & S. Co. 7: 752, 79 N. E. 38, 223 Ill. 41.

Inconsistency in acts or claims.

9. An averment of consent to an operation, in the declaration in an action which is disposed of without any determination of the rights of the parties, does not estop plaintiff, in a subsequent suit, to show want of consent. Pratt v. Davis, 7: 609, 79 N. E. 562, 224 Ill. 300.

Receiving benefits.

10. The receipt by the beneficiary in a deed of trust to secure notes of a portion of the proceeds of the fraudulent sale of the property will not estop him from contesting the validity of the sale if he acted without full knowledge of the facts, where no prejudice has resulted to anyone from his act. Wasserman v. Metzger, 7: 1019, 54 S. E. 893, 105 Va. 744.

By relation of parties.

11. The title of the lessor cannot be questioned by the lessee before the expiration of the lease, while he is in possession under it, unless based upon some distinct and independent claim to the land. Beck v. Minnesota & W. Grain Co. 7: 930, 107 N. W. 1032, — Iowa, —.

12. One to whom a tenant leases the premises is as fully estopped to question the landlord's title as is the tenant himself. Beck v. Minnesota & W. Grain Co. 7: 930, 107 N. W. 1032, — Iowa, —. (Annotated)

13. Life tenants cannot, by their own acts or admissions, defeat or prejudice the rights of the remainder-man. Anderson v. Messinger, 7: 1094, 146 Fed. 929, 77 C. C. A. 179.

EVIDENCE.Judicial notice.

Error in reception or exclusion of, see Appeal and Error, 17-21; Trial, 4-6.

Admission to corroborate witness, see Witnesses, 2-4.

1. The court will take judicial notice of the laws of nature. Morton v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 7: 344, 87 Pac. 151, — Or. —.

Presumptions and burden of proof.

2. In assailing a prima facie right or title by a bill in equity, the plaintiff must aver and prove facts sufficient to overcome it; otherwise he cannot ordinarily put the defendant to the proof of a perfect, indefeasible title or right. Hardman v. Cabot, 7: 506, 55 S. E. 756, — W. Va. —.

3. If two estates in the same property united in the same person in the same capacity, and it is contended that no merger took place, the person making such contention, if entitled so to do, must allege and prove facts negating the existence of such merger. Muscogee Mfg. Co. v. Eagle & Phenix Mills, 7: 1139, 54 S. E. 1028, 126 Ga. 210.

4. Proof that a machine worked perfectly both before and after an alleged erratic movement which is alleged to have caused a personal injury casts the burden on plaintiff of showing that such movement was caused by a defect in the appliance. Chybowski v. Bucyrus Co. 7: 357, 106 N. W. 833, 127 Wis. 332.

5. The carrier has the burden of showing that a shipper assented to special conditions in the bill of lading, limiting the liability of the carrier for injury occurring beyond its own line and requiring claims to be presented within a specified time. Wabash R. Co. v. Thomas, 7: 1041, 78 N. E. 777, 222 Ill. 337.

6. The burden of showing authority on the part of a conductor of a freight train to employ an assistant is upon one asserting such authority, and the railroad company has not the burden of disproving it. Vassor v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 7: 950, 54 S. E. 849, 142 N. C. 68.

7. The burden of showing lack of knowledge or information on the part of a mine employee killed by the flooding of the mine, of conditions in an adjoining mine which were likely to result in such flooding, does not rest upon one seeking to recover for his death, but the mine owner has the burden of showing such knowledge; and therefore the court cannot direct a verdict for defendant merely because the evidence tending to show absence of knowledge is not conclusive. Williams v. Sleepy Hollow Min. Co. 7: 1170, 86 Pac. 337, — Colo. —.

8. A conveyance by one to his general agent having control and management of all his affairs, and who is his confidential adviser and friend, is presumed in law to be fraudulent; and the grantee has the burden of overcoming the presumption. Smith v. Moore, 7: 684, 55 S. E. 275, 142 N. C. 277.

9. The burden rests upon a passenger induced to leave a street car at a point remote from her destination, to show that her subsequent illness, alleged to have been caused by exposure to the weather, was due to such exposure, rather than to other causes for which the carrier would not be responsible. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. McAllister, 7: 1177, 54 S. E. 957, 126 Ga. 447.

10. The mere fact that a passenger negligently permitted to leave a street car at a point remote from her destination sustained an injury does not raise a presumption of negligence against the carrier; but the burden rests upon the passenger to prove the allegations of fact upon which she relies for a recovery. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. McAllister, 7: 1177, 54 S. E. 957, 126 Ga. 447.

11. One undertaking to close a pass way over his land, which has been enjoyed by a neighbor for nearly fifty years, has the burden of showing that the use was merely permissive, and to explain away the presumption that it was under color of right. Schwer v. Martin, 7: 614, 97 S. W. 12, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1221.

12. The mere facts that one using a pass way over another's land never asked permission, and that the owner of the land never gave it, are not of themselves sufficient to overcome the presumption, arising from long-continued use, that it was claimed as matter of right. Schwer v. Martin, 7: 614, 97 S. W. 12, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1221.

13. In the absence of proof that a note executed by a man and wife was for necessities ordered by the wife, the presumption is that it was for the husband's debt. Gilbert v. Brown, 7: 1053, 97 S. W. 40, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1248.

14. Upon the introduction, by the maker of a promissory note, of evidence tending to show absence of consideration, the burden of showing consideration by a preponderance of the evidence is upon the one seeking to enforce it. Best v. Rocky Mountain Nat. Bank, 7: 1035, 85 Pac. 1124, — Colo. —.

Documentary evidence.

15. A letter seventy years old, found in proper custody, is an ancient document which proves itself. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

16. Upon the question of the genuineness of a letter seventy years old, the public records kept by the alleged writer as the incumbent of the office to which they belonged are admissible in evidence. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

17. The record of a deed is not inadmissible in evidence because the letters U.

Q., following the name of the one taking the probate, did not indicate any officer authorized to take a probate, where it appears that the person designated was clerk of the court, of which fact the court could take judicial notice, and ex officio one of the quorum who by statute had authority to take probates, so that the letters doubtless signified unum quorum. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

18. Under a rule that a standard for comparison of handwriting must be established by direct proof or equivalent evidence, a signature may be established for such purpose by showing that it was attached to a slip handed in by the one whose name it is, and whose signature it is alleged to be, and whose duty it is to fill out and sign such slips, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

19. The trial court has discretion to admit in evidence a photograph of wearing apparel taken from a murdered body, although the apparel is in court at the time of the trial. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

20. A stenographer's transcript of testimony given by witnesses at a former trial who have since died is not admissible in the absence of any evidence that the evidence was correctly transcribed, other than the certificate of the stenographer. Williams v. Sleepy Hollow Min. Co. 7: 1170, 86 Pac. 337, — Colo. —.

Opinions and conclusions.

21. A witness cannot be asked for his opinion upon facts and conditions which must be determined by the jury, and which can be fully placed before them. Indianapolis Traction & T. Co. v. Kidd, 7: 143, 79 N. E. 347, — Ind. —.

22. The question whether or not a particular pin is one shown in a photograph is not one for expert testimony. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

23. One who claims to have received letters from another, but who has never seen him write and is not an expert in handwriting, is not competent to testify that they were written by him, although she claims that he acknowledged that he wrote two of them, where that fact is disputed, so that there is no undisputed writing in evidence to form the basis of comparison. State v. McBride, 7: 557, 85 Pac. 440, 30 Utah, 422. (Annotated)

Evidence wrongfully obtained.

24. If officers armed with a search warrant, upon presenting it at the home of one accused of crime, are invited by his mother to enter and search the premises, so that they do not act under the warrant, evidence obtained during the search is not inadmissible against accused, although the act may have been a trespass as against him. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

Admissions.

25. Statements against interest, by a party to an attempted arbitration to one of the selected arbitrators, are admissible in evidence against him, in an action growing out of the subject-matter of the controversy. Sullivan v. Sullivan, 7: 156, 92 S. W. 966, — Ky. —.

Confidential communications.

26. Evidence as to the contract between attorney and client for compensation, and the assignment of an interest in the judgment to secure the same, is not within the rule excluding evidence of privileged communications. Strickland v. Capital City Mills, 7: 426, 54 S. E. 220, 74 S. C. 16.

(Annotated)

Declarations of deceased person.

27. Evidence of declarations by one in possession of real estate, that he has conveyed the property to another by deed based upon a meritorious consideration, is admissible, in a suit after his death, to set aside a purported deed on the ground of fraud in that the signature was procured under the representation that it was a will. Smith v. Moore, 7: 684, 55 S. E. 275, 142 N. C. 277.

28. In an action by a remainder-man to set aside a deed signed by himself and the life tenant, on the ground that it was procured under the representation that it was a will, declarations by the life tenant, since deceased, are admissible, to the effect that the estate had been conveyed, as tending to show that the alleged representations were not made. Smith v. Moore, 7: 684, 55 S. E. 275, 142 N. C. 277.

Declarations of former owner.

29. Statements of a mortgagor tending to show intent on his part to defraud his creditors, with which the mortgagee is in no wise connected, are not admissible in an action to recover property from the mortgagee after he has taken possession of it under his mortgage. Mower v. McCarthy, 7: 418, 64 Atl. 578, — Vt. —.

30. Evidence of a statement by a mortgagor that the mortgagee had loaned him money and had a right to take possession of the property at any time is admissible in an action on behalf of creditors to recover possession of the property from the mortgagee after he has taken possession of it under his mortgage. Mower v. McCarthy, 7: 418, 64 Atl. 578, — Vt. —.

31. The mere relation of mortgagor and mortgagee does not create such a privity of estate as to render the declarations of one with regard to the property admissible in evidence against the other. Mower v. McCarthy, 7: 418, 64 Atl. 578, — Vt. —.

Relevancy and materiality.

32. In a proceeding to open a street, which, as proposed, would result in a mere cul-de-sac, and therefore be of no benefit to the public, evidence is admissible of a proposal to extend another street at right angles to its termination and thereby secure the necessary thoroughfare and public benefit. Kansas City v. Hyde, 7: 639, 96 S. W. 201, 196 Mo. 498.

33. That a jury in an eminent domain proceeding is impaneled merely to try the question of damages does not preclude the admission of evidence, for the consideration of the court, that the proceeding is instituted for private, and not for public, benefit. Kansas City v. Hyde, 7: 639, 96 S. W. 201, 196 Mo. 498.

34. One whose property is sought by right of eminent domain to widen a street may introduce evidence to prove that the purpose of the widening is to accommodate a railway connection with private property. Kansas City v. Hyde, 7: 639, 96 S. W. 201, 196 Mo. 498.

35. Upon the question of fraud in procuring the signature of a deed under a misrepresentation as to its character, the jury may be permitted to consider the fact that it was kept off the record for a period of ten months. Smith v. Moore, 7: 684, 55 S. E. 275, 142 N. C. 277.

36. Evidence of lack of ladders and bulkheads where they should have been in a mine in which an employee was drowned by an inrush of water cannot be excluded in an action for his death merely because he knew of their absence, unless he had knowledge of the danger arising from the presence of the water in an adjoining mine in connection with the absence of such appliances. Williams v. Sleepy Hollow Min. Co. 7: 1170, 86 Pac. 337, — Colo. —.

37. Evidence of absence of ladders and bulkheads at places where they should have been in a mine is admissible, in an action against the mine owner for the death of an employee drowned by the flooding of a mine through an adjoining one, as tending to show that, if the defendant knew of the danger from the water, he failed to use reasonable precautions for the safety of his employees. Williams v. Sleepy Hollow Min. Co. 7: 1170, 86 Pac. 337, — Colo. —.

38. In an action against an electric light company for injuries caused by a grounded current evidence is not admissible that appliances existed which would enable it to cut out the grounded portion and turn the current into the remainder of the circuit, since it is not bound to adopt any particular appliance, but is required to have the appliances which it does adopt reasonably safe. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

39. For the purpose of connecting one accused of murder with money taken from the possession of the victim, evidence is admissible that, before the crime, accused was short of money, pawning his belongings, and that, after the crime, he had money, as well as his statements as to his lack of money, his losses, and his financial transactions before and after the crime; and the fact that it has not been shown as yet that money had been taken from the possession of the victim is immaterial. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

40. In an action against members of a combination in restraint of trade having for its object the driving out of business of aggressive cutters of prices, evidence is not admissible of other measures adopted by only part of the members of the former combination, which are separate and distinct from it, unless they are shown to have been agreed to by all the defendants. Jayne v. Loder, 7: 984, 149 Fed. 21, — C. C. A. —.

41. In an action by a licensed drayman against a railroad company to recover damages for alleged injury to his business, arising from the malicious acts of the company's agent, evidence as to the conduct of the latter when acting as agent for an express company, in reference to packages which the plaintiff had authority to receive, is irrelevant and inadmissible. Southern R. Co. v. Chambers, 7: 926, 55 S. E. 37, 126 Ga. 404.

42. That one on trial for obtaining money by false pretenses had made similar false representations and pretenses to others is admissible to show his knowledge of the falsity of the representations made to the prosecuting witness, and his guilty intent in making them. State v. Briggs, 7: 278, 86 Pac. 447, — Kan. —.

43. Upon a trial for murder, evidence is admissible of the finding of a ring which belonged to deceased several weeks after the commission of the crime, in a piece of tin foil which was found in a sack of potatoes belonging to accused shortly after the crime was committed, but which was not examined until the time of the finding of the ring. State v. Barnes, 7: 181, 85 Pac. 998, 47 Or. 592.

44. The attempt of one awaiting trial to escape from jail is a circumstance which may be considered on the question of his guilt. State v. Barnes, 7: 181, 85 Pac. 998, 47 Or. 592.

45. That several days elapse between the finding of a corpse and, near the spot, an article known to have belonged to a certain person who is charged to have been murdered, does not render the fact of the finding inadmissible in proof of the corpus delicti, but it weakens its force for that purpose. State v. Barnes, 7: 181, 85 Pac. 998, 47 Or. 592.

46. Evidence of an experiment made by an expert to determine whether or not a stab in the body of a murdered person severed a particular vein is properly excluded. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

47. Evidence that, several months after the injury to one riding on a freight train, the railroad company issued to him a pass describing him as an injured employee is not admissible as tending to show ratification of the conductor's act in permitting him to ride in consideration of services to be rendered in handling freight. Vassar v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 7: 950, 54 S. E. 849, 142 N. C. 68.

Explanation and rebuttal.

48. After a witness for defendant in a criminal case has testified on cross-examination designed to show his interest, that he did not have a certain conversation with the prosecuting witness, evidence of such conversation may be admitted to contradict him, although accused was not present when it occurred. State v. Mulhall, 7: 630, 97 S. W. 583, 199 Mo. 202.

Under general denial.

49. In a suit to enjoin the use of a public road for the purpose of conveying natural gas by means of pipes laid underground in accordance with permission granted by the county court, on the ground that the pipes are not maintained and the gas conveyed for public consumption, the defendant may introduce evidence that the pipes are maintained and the gas conveyed for public use, without any affirmative allegation to that effect, under his denial of the allegation of the bill. Hardman v. Cabot, 7: 506, 55 S. E. 756, — W. Va. —.

Weight and sufficiency.

50. A property owner may be found to have been negligent in making repairs to the gutter of a leased building to stop a leak, if the leak continued after the repairs the same as before. Shute v. Bills, 7: 965, 78 N. E. 96, 191 Mass. 433.

51. The identity of a corpse found partly consumed in a fire may, for the purpose of proving the corpus delicti in a prosecution for murder, be established by circumstantial evidence, such as the size of the remains, and the finding, at and near the spot where the body was found, articles known to have belonged to a person who is alleged to have been killed; the weight and sufficiency of the evidence for that purpose being for the jury to determine. State v. Barnes, 7: 181, 85 Pac. 998, 47 Or. 592. (Annotated)

52. The evidence necessary to establish the corpus delicti in cases of homicide must show that the life of a human being has been taken, which question involves the subordinate inquiry as to the identity of the person charged to have been killed, and that the death was unlawfully caused by the party accused thereof, and by no other person. State v. Barnes, 7: 181, 85 Pac. 998, 47 Or. 592.

53. That one whose skeleton was found in a burning pile of logs was wrongfully killed may be found from the facts that he was a healthy man, and that, from conditions in the vicinity of the fire the body had been dragged to it leaving bloody stains along the way. State v. Barnes, 7: 181, 85 Pac. 998, 47 Or. 592.

54. Possession shortly after his homicidal death of articles known to have belonged to decedent, under circumstances which would justify accused's conviction of larceny, will warrant a conviction of murder,—especially when coupled with contradictory statements by accused as to the whereabouts of the missing person. State v. Barnes, 7: 181, 85 Pac. 998, 47 Or. 592. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Variance.

55. Proof of a contract by ratification of an agent's act is not a departure from the theory of a complaint seeking recovery on a direct contract. Shuman v. Steinel, 7: 1048, 109 N. W. 74, — Wis. —.

EXCHANGES.

A board of trade, which has a right of property in market quotations collected in its exchange, does not surrender or dedicate them to the public by permitting subscribers, to whom they are communicated upon condition that they shall not be made public, to post them upon blackboards in their places of business, where the posting is done for the advantage of the subscribers, and not of the public, and does not make knowledge of the quotations general, or make them accessible to the public as of right, or render them of no further value. McDermott Commission Co. v. Chicago Bd. of Trade, 7: 889, 77 C. C. A. 479, 146 Fed. 961. (Annotated)

EXECUTION.

See Levy and Seizure.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.Liabilities.

Power to mortgage trust estate, see Trusts, 8.

1. An administrator who deposits funds in a bank in good standing in the community, and promptly distributes the interest to the next of kin, is not liable for losses caused by the failure of the bank, no negligence on his part being shown, and the exigencies of administration requiring the fund to be kept on hand. Knapp v. Jessup, 7: 617, 109 N. W. 666, — Mich. —. (Annotated)

2. The retaining in a bank, by an administrator, for three months, of money received by him, instead of distributing it, does not make him liable for its loss through failure of the bank, where he had a right to retain money for the use of the testator's widow, which might be called for at any time. Knapp v. Jessup, 7: 617, 109 N. W. 666, — Mich. —.

Accounting.

Liability for interest, see Interest.

3. An administrator is entitled to credit for an item for the construction and repair, at reasonable expense, of a vault for the remains of the dead, according to the expressed wish of intestate. Knapp v. Jessup, 7: 617, 109 N. W. 666, — Mich. —.

Payment of claims.

4. Next of kin cannot complain of the payment of an item by the administrator without its allowance by the court, where it is less in amount than the balance due the administrator for overpayment in the distribution of the estate. Knapp v. Jessup, 7: 617, 109 N. W. 666, — Mich. —.

Commissions.

5. No fault can be found with the allowance of statutory fees to an administrator, where he collected the funds of the estate, cared for the real estate, looked after the widow, and promptly divided to each heir his share of the estate. Knapp v. Jessup, 7: 617, 109 N. W. 666, — Mich. —.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

See also Malicious Prosecution, 10.

Of passengers, see Carriers, 2, 3.

Question for jury whether imprisonment was voluntary or by force, see Trial, 27.

1. Words are sufficient to constitute an imprisonment, if they impose a restraint upon a person, and he is actually restrained. Martin v. Houck, 7: 576, 54 S. E. 291, 141 N. C. 317. (Annotated)

2. False imprisonment may be effected if one is ordered to do or not to do a certain thing, to move or not to move against his own free will, and force is offered, or there is reasonable ground to apprehend that coercive measures will be used if he does not yield. Martin v. Houck, 7: 576, 54 S. E. 291, 141 N. C. 317.

3. A formal declaration of arrest is not requisite to constitute an imprisonment, if the person imprisoned understands that he is in the power of the one making the arrest, and submits in consequence thereof. Martin v. Houck, 7: 576, 54 S. E. 291, 141 N. C. 317.

4. The essential thing to constitute an imprisonment is constraint of the person, which may be by threats as well as by actual force. Hebrew v. Pulis (N. J. Err. & App.) 7: 580, 64 Atl. 121, — N. J. —

Liability of officer making arrest.

5. An officer who, in good faith and after diligent inquiry, arrests a person bearing the same name as that contained in the warrant, but who is not the person intended thereby, is not liable in an action for false imprisonment founded on the mere fact of arrest; but if he detains such person in custody after information reaches him that the mistake has been made, he will be liable in an action for false imprisonment for such detention. Blocker v. Clark, 7: 268, 54 S. E. 1022, — Ga. —. (Annotated)

6. The good faith which will protect an officer in arresting one bearing the name stated in the warrant, but who is not the person intended, may be negated by such want of ordinary care as is inconsistent with good faith; and it is not necessary to the maintenance of an action for false imprisonment that he should have made the 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

arrest out of spite or a reckless disregard for the rights and liberties of the citizen. Blocker v. Clark, 7: 268, 54 S. E. 1022, — Ga. —.

7. The failure of an officer to exercise reasonable diligence in taking a person arrested before a committing magistrate renders him liable to the person arrested, unless the delay is occasioned by the conduct of the latter. Blocker v. Clark, 7: 268, 54 S. E. 1022, — Ga. —.

FALSE PRETENSES.

Validity of indictment for, see Indictment, 3, 4.

Venue in prosecution for, see Venue.

1. A representation that a person is in a business or situation in which he is not made for the purpose of defrauding another and by which money or property is fraudulently obtained, is a false pretense. State v. Briggs, 7: 278, 86 Pac. 447, — Kan. —.

2. The coupling of a future promise with a false pretense does not relieve the false pretense of its criminal character. State v. Briggs, 7: 278, 86 Pac. 447, — Kan. —. (Annotated)

Relative rights of state and Congress as to protection of, see State.

That a representation of the United States flag forms part of the trademark of a brewing company, and is, as such, a property right, does not justify its use on labels attached to bottles containing beer and used to advertise the company's product, in violation of a statute enacted in the exercise of the police power of the state, and forbidding the use of the flag for advertising purposes. *Halter v. Proximate cause of injury resulting from, see Proximate Cause, 8.

1. Impairment of health, or loss of bodily power, through fright which is the natural and direct result of the negligent act of another, is sufficient to sustain an action against the wrongdoer. Kimberly v. Howland, 7: 545, 55 S. E. 778, — N. C. —.

2. One who causes nervous excitement in a pregnant woman by his wrongful trespass upon her home to such an extent as to cause her miscarriage is liable to her for the bodily pain and suffering endured in direct line of causation from the wrongful act, although no physical violence is done to her person. Engle v. Simmons, 7: 96, 41 So. 1023, — Ala. —.

GAMING.

See Betting.

GARNISHMENT.

Under a contract by which an insurer undertakes to indemnify an employer for loss paid because of injury to an employee, there is no obligation on the part of the insurer which can become the subject of garnishment in proceedings by an employee to enforce a judgment which he has secured against the insured. Allen v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 7: 958, 145 Fed. 881, 78 C. C. A. 265. (Annotated)

2. In respect to the rights of the public in highways, held under valid dedications and acceptances, and the power of the legislature over the same, there is no distinction in West Virginia between the streets of incorporated cities and towns and country roads. Hardman v. Cabot, 7: 506, 55 S. E. 756, — W. Va. —.

3. Permission to lay a pipe line under the surface of a public road for the purpose of conveying natural gas for public use may be granted by the county court to a natural person. Hardman v. Cabot, 7: 506, 55 S. E. 756, — W. Va. —.

4. The right to convey natural gas for public use along a highway by means of pipes laid underground can be exercised only with the consent of the authorities having control of the streets and roads, and under such restrictions as they, in the exercise of their discretion, may see fit to impose. Hardman v. Cabot, 7: 506, 55 S. E. 756, — W. Va. —.

5. That a railroad was constructed in a public street partly for the accommodation of a certain mill owner does not make it private, so as to constitute a public nuisance, if it is open to all persons generally for shipping purposes. Wolfard v. Fisher, 7: 991, 84 Pac. 850, — Or. —.

Grading.

6. A municipal corporation is not liable for injury to abutting property by alteration of the natural surface of a street in bringing it to the first established grade where the change is not unreasonable or carelessly done, even under a constitutional provision that private property shall not be damaged for public use without compensation. *Leiper v. Trusts.

6. A deed by a married woman, executed in the manner prescribed by law for the conveyance of her estates, is of no effect against a trustee to whom the property was conveyed for her use by a deed providing that it might be conveyed by the trustee joining her in the deed. Cameron v. Hicks, 7: 407, 53 S. E. 728, 141 N. C. 21.

7. A provision in a deed conveying property to a trustee for the use of a married woman during life with remainder over, that, in case the life tenant should desire any of the property to be conveyed in fee or otherwise, the trustee should have power to convey joining her in the deed, applies to her life estate as well as to the fee so as to prevent any conveyance by her without joining the trustee. Cameron v. Hicks, 7: 407, 53 S. E. 728, 141 N. C. 21.

8. Where an estate is conveyed to a trustee for the use of a married woman for life and to preserve contingent remainders, the statute, upon the death of her husband, does not execute the use in her so as to permit her to convey the estate. Cameron v. Hicks, 7: 407, 53 S. E. 728, 141 N. C. 21.

9. The death of the trustee to whom is conveyed property for a married woman with power to join her in its conveyance without the execution of the power destroys it so that it cannot be subsequently executed. Cameron v. Hicks, 7: 407, 53 S. E. 728, 141 N. C. 21.

10. A provision in a deed conveying property to a trustee for the use of a married woman, permitting him to convey upon request of the beneficiary, she joining in the deed, prevents her conveyance without the aid of the trustee. Cameron v. Hicks, 7: 407, 53 S. E. 728, 141 N. C. 21.

INDICTMENT, INFORMATION, AND COMPLAINT.

Constitutional guaranty of right to, see Criminal Law, 1.

1. An indictment for compounding a felony by agreeing not to prosecute persons arrested for larceny is insufficient, which does not charge that a larceny had been committed. State v. Hodge, 7: 709, 55 S. E. 626, 142 N. C. 665. (Annotated)

2. An indictment for conspiracy to break a jail for the purpose of lynching a prisoner is not defective for alleging conspiracy with others without naming them, or stating that they are to the jurors unknown, unless the statute requires such facts to be stated. State v. Lewis, 7: 669, 55 S. E. 600, 142 N. C. 626.

3. An information charging that the defendant obtained a draft by false pretenses, on which she collected the money, is not bad for duplicity as charging that the pretenses were made for the purpose of obtaining both draft and money. State v. Briggs, 7: 278, 86 Pac. 447, — Kan. —.

4. An information which charges that the defendant obtained a draft for money as commission for a loan on a farm, on the false and fraudulent pretense that he was an agent engaged in loaning money on farms, and that he had much property, and was financially responsible, and had a large amount of money under his control, is not bad because it fails to state whether the application of the borrower for the loan was oral or written, since it is wholly immaterial whether it was oral or written. State v. Briggs, 7: 278, 86 Pac. 447, — Kan. —.

INDORSEMENT.

Custody.

1. The court will not grant the application of a foundling hospital which, through a mistake of its agents and representatives, has placed children which have come to its care in homes of filth and degradation in a distant state, to recover their custody from persons of some means and education, who, actuated by humanitarian motives, have rescued them from their unfortunate surroundings, administered to their needs, and became attached to them, so that they are willing to care for and educate them as their own, so that it appears that the change will not work for the best interests of the children. New York Foundling Hospital v. Gatti, 7: 306, 79 Pac. 231, — Ariz. —.

Mortgage of real estate.

2. Whether or not executors exceeded their power with reference to the income of a trust estate placed in their hands is immaterial in a proceeding to mortgage the interests of infant remainder-men to take up a valid mortgage placed by them on the estate and to pay overdue taxes. Re Lueft, 7: 263, 109 N. W. 652, — Wis. —.

3. The interests of an infant remainder-man will be promoted by the execution of a mortgage to take up a valid prior one and pay overdue taxes, within the meaning of a statute permitting the mortgaging of estates in which infants are interested to promote their interests in the property. Re Lueft, 7: 263, 109 N. W. 652, — Wis. —.

4. The duty of the life tenant to pay taxes on the estate does not prevent the court from authorizing the mortgage of the estate to pay overdue taxes, and thereby preserve it for infant remainder-men. Re Lueft, 7: 263, 109 N. W. 652, — Wis. —.

INJUNCTION.

Annulling by writ of certiorari, see Certiorari, 2, 3.

Estoppel to claim injunctive relief against maintenance of railroad switch in street, see Estoppel, 5.

Contract rights.

1. Want of mutuality will prevent a court of equity from enjoining violation of a contract by a heating company, after installing a system in a building, to furnish heat at a certain sum per annum, where the use of heat from its plant rests in the discretion of the consumer. Fowler Utilities Co. v. Gray, 7: 726, 79 N. E. 897, — Ind. —.

Nuisance.

Against nuisance, see Nuisances, 1.

2. The jurisdiction of equity to abate a nuisance is not destroyed by the passage of a municipal ordinance purporting to award an easy and expeditious remedy for the inconvenience caused thereby. Herring v. Wilton, 7: 349, 55 S. E. 546, — Va. —.

3. Injunction will not lie against the maintenance of a criminal nuisance merely to subserve the public welfare. State v. Vaughan, 7: 899, 98 S. W. 685, — Ark. —.

Trespass.

4. Equity has no jurisdiction to restrain acts of trespass on lands in another state where the principal fact involved and upon which the right to exercise the restraint depends is that of title to the land, even though the necessary parties are properly before it. Columbia Nat. Sand Dredging Co. v. Morton, 7: 114, — App. D. C. —.

(Annotated)

5. Equity will take jurisdiction of a suit to restrain repeated acts of trespass upon plaintiff's dooryard for the purpose of erecting and maintaining a fence there, under its power to prevent a multiplicity of inadequate actions at law for the trespass. Miller v. Hoeschler, 7: 49, 99 N. W. 228, 121 Wis. 558.

(Annotated)

Cutting trees.

6. An injunction will not be granted at the instance of an abutting owner to restrain a telephone company from cutting trees and shrubs along a public highway in the erection of its poles and wires, since the remedy at law is adequate. Hobbs v. Long Distance Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 7: 87, 41 So. 1003, — Ala. —.

Waters; pollution.

7. Injunction will lie to compel the removal of a jetty placed in a stream in such a manner as to deflect the current to the injury of a lower riparian owner by depriving him of the natural flow of the stream and washing away his bank by casting the water directly against it. Morton v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 7: 344, 87 Pac. 151, — Or. —.

8. An inconsiderable pollution of a river at a point 17 miles above the intake of a city water supply will not be enjoined as a nuisance in the absence of any analysis of the water at the point of intake merely upon opinion evidence that the pollution affects the water at that point. Durham v. Eno Cotton Mills, 7: 321, 54 S. E. 453, 141 N. C. 615.

Political rights.

9. There is no right on the part of voters and taxpayers to injunctive relief against the use of voting machines at elections, and therefore the court has no jurisdiction of suits seeking such relief. United States Standard Voting Mach. Co. v. Hobson, 7: 512, 109 N. W. 458, — Iowa, —.

Legal proceedings.

10. Equity will enjoin the collection of the purchase price of land, when the vendee is in possession under a conveyance with covenants of general warranty, and the title is clearly shown to be defective, or is questioned by suit prosecuted or threatened. Harvey v. Ryan, 7: 445, 53 S. E. 7, 59 W. Va. 134.

(Annotated)

11. Collection of the purchase price of land the title to which has failed may be enjoined, irrespective of the insolvency of the vendor. Harvey v. Ryan, 7: 445, 53 S. E. 7, 59 W. Va. 134.

12. That an action of ejectment was pending against a grantor of land at the time he conveyed it with covenants of general warranty of title will not preclude the grantee from enjoining the collection of the purchase money after the grantor has been defeated in the ejectment suit. Harvey v. Ryan, 7: 445, 53 S. E. 7, 59 W. Va. 134.

13. The enforcement of a bond given for the purchase price of land will be enjoined, where the vendee, who entered into possession under a conveyance with covenants of general warranty, has been evicted in an action of ejectment brought by a stranger. Harvey v. Ryan, 7: 445, 53 S. E. 7, 59 W. Va. 134.

14. Equity is not deprived of jurisdiction to restrain the enforcement of a bond given for the purchase price of land the title to which has failed, by a statute permitting defenses of failure of consideration, fraud in the procurement of a contract, or breach of warranty of title, to be interposed in an action at law on a sealed instrument, when the statute further provides that the party may, at his election, avail himself of his remedy in equity. Harvey v. Ryan, 7: 445, 53 S. E. 7, 59 W. Va. 134.

See also infra, 16.

15. A court of equity may enjoin criminal proceedings under a void law or ordinance, where property rights will be destroyed or greatly impaired. New Orleans Baseball & A. Co. v. New Orleans, 7: 1014, 42 So. 784, 118 La. —.

Enforcement of ordinance.

See also supra, 15.

16. The enforcement of a municipal ordinance excluding the erection or operation of baseball parks within certain limits may be restrained by injunction, where the ordinance is personal, arbitrary, and discriminatory in its character, the power of the city council to enact it as a police regulation is questionable, and it would injuriously affect property rights. New Orleans Baseball & A. Co. v. New Orleans, 7: 1014, 42 So. 784, 118 La. —.

INSURANCE.

Secretary of local branch of fraternal society as agent of grand lodge for collection of assessments, see Benefit Societies, 5.

Conflict of laws as to insurance contract, see Conflict of Laws, 1, 2.

Measure of damages for wrongful cancellation of policy, see Damages, 2, 3.

By-laws.

1. A by-law of an insurance company that the mailing of notices of assessments may be conclusively shown by the certificate of an officer of the corporation who is not required to be personally cognizant of the fact is unreasonable and void. Duffy v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. 7: 238, 55 S. E. 79, 142 N. C. 103. (Annotated)

Acceptance of policy.

2. The enumeration in the application for insurance in a mutual benefit association of certain exceptions from liability does not, by exclusion, prevent the operation of an exception of suicide contained in the insurer's by-laws, so as to render acceptance necessary to make binding a policy containing such exception, where the application makes the by-laws a basis of membership in the association. Tuttle v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 7: 223, 104 N. W. 1131, — Iowa. —.

3. No proposal for absolute indemnity is contained in an application for insurance which does not allude to the method of raising the fund, so as to render necessary an acceptance of the policy, where it provides for the levying of an assessment to meet the obligation. Tuttle v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 7: 223, 104 N. W. 1131, — Iowa, —.

Sole ownership.

4. One holding real estate under a conveyance in fee is sole and unconditional owner, within the meaning of a fire-insurance policy, notwithstanding he owes a portion of the purchase price, for which the statute gives a vendor's lien. Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Pitts, 7: 627, 41 So. 5, — Miss. —. (Annotated)

Vacancy; reoccupation before loss.

5. Reoccupation, before the fire occurs, of an insured building after a vacancy, sufficient to avoid the policy under a condition against vacancy, revives the policy, so as to permit a recovery in case the fire occurs during the occupancy. Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Pitts, 7: 627, 41 So. 5, — Miss. —.

Forfeiture.

6. Failure for more than two years to make an attempt to secure relief from what is alleged to be an irregular forfeiture of a mutual benefit certificate, or to tender dues and assessments thereon, will be regarded as an acquiescence in the forfeiture. Sheridan v. Modern Woodmen of America, 7: 973, 87 Pac. 127, — Wash. —.

7. Under a clause in a note given for an insurance premium, that "for any loss occurring by death after this note is due and remains unpaid then said company shall not be liable," the policy is not forfeited by failure to make prompt payment, but the liability of the insurer is merely suspended during the default, permitting the insured by payment to restore the liability. Kavanaugh v. Security Trust & L. Ins. Co. 7: 253, 96 S. W. 499, — Tenn. —.

8. The mere mailing of a notice properly addressed and stamped is not, in the absence of a statute or contract provision, a compliance with a custom to give notice of the maturing of a note given for an insurance premium, where the letter never reaches its destination, although the custom has been to give notice by mail. Kavanaugh v. Security Trust & L. Ins. Co. 7: 253, 96 S. W. 499, — Tenn. —. (Annotated)

9. Where for eight years an insurance company has permitted an assignee of a policy to pay the annual premium by notes falling due quarterly, and has always notified him when a note was falling due, the policy cannot be forfeited for nonpayment of a note, unless the customary notice reached him. Kavanaugh v. Security Trust & L. Ins. Co. 7: 253, 96 S. W. 499, — Tenn. —.

10. The duty of an insured promptly to pay his premiums is complied with in case, through miscarriage of the mail, a customary notice of the maturity of a premium does not reach him, if, upon subsequently receiving notice, he promptly pays the premium due. Kavanaugh v. Security Trust

11. A single act of the clerk of a local camp of a mutual benefit society in attempting to contract notwithstanding a provision of the laws of the order that no act on his part shall have the effect of creating a liability on the part of the society, or of waiving any right belonging to it; which act consists of promising the representatives of an insane member to notify them of assessments,—will not bind the society so as to prevent its claiming a forfeiture of the certificate for nonpayment of dues, notice of which is regularly mailed to the representatives according to the promise. Sheridan v. Modern Woodmen of America, 7: 973, 87 Pac. 127, — Wash. —.

12. Insanity of a member of a mutual benefit society is no excuse for noncompliance with his contract as to payment of dues. Sheridan v. Modern Woodmen of America, 7: 973, 87 Pac. 127, — Wash. —.

Waiver and estoppel.

13. The principal of waiver and estoppel applies in case of fraternal or lodge insurance. Trotter v. Grand Lodge, I. L. of H. 7: 569, 109 N. W. 1099, — Iowa, —.

14. Where the secretary of the local lodge of a mutual benefit society is frequently away from home on the last day prescribed for payment of assessments on certificates, and for a long time has been in the habit of accepting payments any time prior to the date of transmitting the assessments to the supreme body, a rule of the order that failure to pay assessments on or before the last specified day shall of its own force suspend the certificate will be regarded as waived. Trotter v. Grand Lodge, I. L. of H. 7: 569, 109 N. W. 1099, — Iowa, —.

15. Waiver of the defense of suicide by an insurer is not effected by mailing blanks for proofs of loss with knowledge of the facts, under the express statement that they are for the convenience of the attorneys of the beneficiary, and with the distinct understanding that no rights are waived. Tuttle v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 7: 223, 104 N. W. 1131, — Iowa, —.

Cause of death.

16. Death from suicide which springs from an insane impulse of a disordered or insane mind is through external, violent, and accidental means, within the meaning of an accident insurance policy. Tuttle v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 7: 223, 104 N. W. 1131, — Iowa, —. (Annotated)

Voluntary exposure.

17. One running to a base while playing indoor baseball does not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of an accident-insurance policy, by merely overrunning his base and relying on the wall of the building to stop him when he places his hands and feet against it. Hunt v. United States Acci. Asso. 7: 938, 109 N. W. 1042, — Mich. —.

Who entitled to proceeds.

18. The terms of the charter of a mutual benefit society, and not those of the statute under which it was incorporated, and which might have been adopted, will control in determining who may become beneficiaries. Murphy v. Nowak, 7: 393, 79 N. E. 112, 223 Ill. 301.

19. Proof that a benefit society had adopted a statute limiting the class of its beneficiaries is not necessary in a contest over a fund, if facts showing the applicability of the statute are admitted by the pleadings. Murphy v. Nowak, 7: 393, 79 N. E. 112, 223 Ill. 301.

20. The right of one made beneficiary in a mutual benefit certificate as a dependent of assured to receive the proceeds of the certificate ceases upon her marrying and securing means of support other than the assured prior to his death, where by the laws of the order the fund can be paid only to dependents of deceased members. Murphy v. Nowak, 7: 393, 79 N. E. 112, 223 Ill. 301.

(Annotated)

21. A sufficient designation of beneficiary is effected where assured, in his application, directs the certificate to be issued in favor of his wife, subject to such future disposal as applicant may direct, and upon the back indorses an unsigned direction to make the certificate payable to the wife in trust for a person named, and accepts and recognizes as valid a certificate following such direction. Murphy v. Nowak, 7: 393, 79 N. E. 112, 223 Ill. 301.

22. The beneficiary in a mutual benefit certificate cannot complain of the application to the contract of a rule adopted after the certificate was issued, if the applicant expressly agreed at the time the certificate was issued that rules subsequently adopted should be applicable. Murphy v. Nowak, 7: 393, 79 N. E. 112, 223 Ill. 301.

Indemnity insurance.

Garnishment by employee of employer's liability insurance, see Garnishment.

23. A clause in a policy undertaking to indemnify assured against loss by reason of liability on account of injuries to employees, by which the insurer undertakes to defend proceedings against the assured, or settle the same, unless it elects to pay the provided indemnity to the assured, does not make the contract one guaranteeing payment of an obligation of the insured, rather than one of indemnity, where another clause of the policy provides that no action shall be brought against the insurer unless by the insured himself to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid, the former clause being merely an additional privilege for the protection of the insurer. Allen v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 7: 958, 145 Fed. 881, 76 C. C. A. 265.

INTEREST.

The estate of an administrator is not chargeable with interest on a mortgage which was part of the assets, which came into his possession and was paid, but not discharged, since the presumption is that it was promptly collected and included in the appraisal of assets. Knapp v. Jessup, 7: 617, 109 N. W. 666, — Mich. —.

INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

1. To sustain a conviction for violation of the local-option law the liquid sold must be shown to have been of sufficient alcoholic body to produce intoxication if drunk in reasonable quantities. Potts v. State, 7: 194, 97 S. W. 477, — Tex. Crim. App. —.

2. One cannot be convicted of selling intoxicating liquors on the testimony of a witness that he bought from accused a beverage called "lager beer." Potts v. State, 7: 194, 97 S. W. 477, — Tex. Crim. App. —. (Annotated) Estoppel of tenant or subtenant to question lessor's title, see Estoppel, 11, 12.

Sufficiency of evidence to establish landlord's negligence, see Evidence, 50.

Leases.

1. Possession by the lessor is not essential to the validity of a lease, under statutes permitting the assignment of choses in action and the sale of an interest in land which is in adverse possession of another. Beck v. Minnesota & W. Grain Co. 7: 930, 107 N. W. 1032, — Iowa, —.

Sublease.

2. A tenant need not be in possession in order to sublet. Beck v. Minnesota & W. Grain Co. 7: 930, 107 N. W. 1032, — Iowa, —.

3. A decree canceling a lease, made by consent of the lessee's administrator and representatives of the lessor, in proceedings to which the sublessee is not a party, will not affect his rights under the sublease. Mitchell v. Young, 7: 221, 97 S. W. 454, — Ark. —. (Annotated)

Liability of landlord.

4. The mere fact that a property owner retains control of the roof and gutter of a building leased by him does not render him liable for injury to the tenant through their defective condition, if they remain in as good condition as when let. Shute v. Bills, 7: 965, 78 N. E. 96, 191 Mass. 433.

5. The owner of property is not liable for injury to his tenant due to a hidden defect in a gutter on the property, unless he knew or ought to have known of the defect. Shute v. Bills, 7: 965, 78 N. E. 96, 191 Mass. 433.

Landlord's lien.

6. A statute preserving a landlord's lien for one year after the year's rent falls due operates to bind crops of a sublessee for one year from the time the rent falls due upon the principal lease, and is not controlled by the terms of the contract between the tenant and sublessee. Beck v. Minnesota & W. Grain Co. 7: 930, 107 N. W. 1032, — Iowa, —.

7. One purchasing crops from the sub-lessee of a farm takes them subject to the statutory lien for rent. Beck v. Minnesota & W. Grain Co. 7: 930, 107 N. W. 1032, — Iowa, —.

LARCENY.

1. The trespass necessary to constitute larceny is absent where a property owner, upon being informed of a design to steal his property, places it upon a platform where the intending thief is planning to get it, with instructions to his servant in charge of the platform to deliver it to the one who will call for it, so that when the intended thief arrives he is treated as having a right to the property,—especially where another agent of the owner, sent to arrange for the taking of the property, has agreed to the place proposed by the thief under circumstances which involve a promise of assistance in carrying out the plan. Topolewski v. State, 7: 756, 109 N. W. 1037, — Wis. —. (Annotated)

2. To determine the degree of the crime of one who, by means of false connections, conveys gas around his meter and consumes it upon his property without having it measured, the taking during each day is not to be regarded as a separate offense, but the value of the gas wrongfully consumed during the period during which the false connection is in use at one time will be considered. Woods v. People, 7: 520, 78 N. E. 607, 222 Ill. 293. (Annotated)

3. A gas consumer who, by false connections, carries gas consumed on his premises around the meter so that it is not registered, may be prosecuted for larceny, notwithstanding a statute providing for the punishment of persons tampering or making false connections with gas pipes so that gas might be consumed without being registered by a meter. Woods v. People, 7: 520, 78 N. E. 607, 222 Ill. 293.

4. The selling, and not the cost, price, is to be considered in determining the value of gas stolen, for the purpose of fixing the degree of the crime. Woods v. People, 7: 520, 78 N. E. 607, 222 Ill. 293.

Of money obtained by fraud.

5. One who wrongfully obtains from a transportation company possession of baggage to which he is not entitled, by placing the wrong check on it with intent to appropriate it to his own use, is guilty of larceny. Aldrich v. People, 7: 1149, 79 N. E. 964, 224 Ill. 622.

6. The mere turning over by a transportation company, upon the mistaken supposition that he is entitled to its possession, of baggage to one claiming it, is not such a consent to the latter's possession as will prevent his being liable for larceny in case he has not such right. Aldrich v. People, 7: 1149, 79 N. E. 964, 224 Ill. 622. (Annotated)

7. The rule that, if the owner of goods parts with both the possession and title to another, not expecting their return or disposition in accordance with his directions, the one receiving them is not guilty of larceny, although he procures them by fraud, does not apply where the property is obtained from a transportation company having custody of it merely as bailee, by one wrongfully claiming title to it. Aldrich v. People, 7: 1149, 79 N. E. 964, 224 Ill. 622.

Limitation of time for presentation of state bonds, see Constitutional Law, 11.

1. A statute limiting the time for presentation of state bonds which have been overdue for a period of eighteen months, to six months from the time of notice, and which provides for publication of notice in a newspaper published at the capital city of the state, and for filing of copies with the secretaries of various boards of trade, is not unreasonable, and therefore does not impair the constitutional rights of a bondholder, although, by reason of absence from the country, he actually receives no notice of the statute until after the expiration of the limitation period. Tipton v. Smythe, 7: 714, 94 S. W. 678, 78 Ark. 392. (Annotated)

Laches.

2. Laches will not debar an heir from proceeding to test the validity of a trust created by the ancestor's will for the accumulation of a fund to establish a charity school. Tincher v. Arnold, 7: 471, 147 Fed. 665, 77 C. C. A. 649.

3. The defense of laches, though not applying, as a general rule, to an express trust, does apply to a constructive trust. Newman v. Newman, 7: 370, 55 S. E. 377, — W. Va. —. (Annotated)

When statute runs.

4. The running of the statute of limitations against one of several joint tenants will operate as a bar against all, although the remainder are under disability. Cameron v. Hicks, 7: 407, 53 S. E. 728, 141 N. C. 21. (Annotated)

Ott*, 7: 518, 41 So. 323, 116 La. 1087.

MANDAMUS.

To court.

1. Mandamus lies to compel a trial court to proceed with a cause of which it has jurisdiction. State ex rel. Aldrich v. Morse, 7: 1127, 87 Pac. 705, — Utah, —.

To street superintendent.

2. One who has purchased the rails of a street railway imbedded in the street, knowing that, under the municipal ordinance, he cannot remove them without authority from the street superintendent, cannot compel the issuance of such permit by mandamus, since the officer has a discretionary power to issue it or not according to its effect upon the interests of the public in the street. French v. Jones, 7: 525, 78 N. E. 118, 191 Mass. 522.

3. A street commissioner who has refused to permit the tearing up of a street for the purpose of removing the rails of a street-railway system therefrom, actuated merely by the hope that someone will operate the road, without considering the only questions within his power, as to the interference of the tearing up of the street with public travel and its effect upon the pavement, may be compelled by mandamus to hear and determine such questions. French v. Jones, 7: 525, 78 N. E. 118, 191 Mass. 522. (Annotated)

3. That at the time of seeking service an employee represents herself to be older than she is does not relieve the employer of its ordinary duty to her as its employee. Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 7: 496, 64 Atl. 190, 73 N. H. 556.

4. A proprietor of a laundry, after notice that an employee has caught her fingers between the rollers of an ironing mangle which she is operating, is bound to exercise ordinary care to release her and alleviate her suffering; and the fact that the employee contributes to the injury by her own negligence in assuming the risks of operating the machine does not affect the rule. Raasch v. Elite Laundry Co. 7: 940, 108 N. W. 477, 98 Minn. 357.

(Annotated)

5. Upon failure of a railroad company promptly to furnish an injured employee free transportation to its hospital, to which he is entitled under his contract, he cannot, in case he has in his possession the means of paying for the transportation, hold the company liable for pain and suffering due to delay in reaching the hospital. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Reagan, 7: 997, 96 S. W. 168, — Ark. — (Annotated)

Duty to warn.

6. A hospital, upon assigning an inexperienced nurse to attend a patient sick from a contagious disease, is bound to inform her of the dangerous character of the service. Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 7: 496, 64 Atl. 190, 73 N. H. 556.

Duty as to place.

7. A mine owner, upon learning of the existence of water in a neighboring mine in such quantities as to be dangerous to his employees, is bound to make such investigation as would suggest itself to one using ordinary care and prudence, and, upon learning that there is danger of his mine becoming flooded, to make such provision for the safety of his employees as would occur to a person of ordinary prudence, or inform his employees of the impending danger. Williams v. Sleepy Hollow Min. Co. 7: 1170, 86 Pac. 337, — Colo. —

Unlawful employment of children.

8. The employment of a child in a factory in violation of the provisions of the statute is evidence of negligence in an action by the child to recover for personal injuries inflicted by a machine in the factory. Rolin v. R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. 7: 335, 53 S. E. 891, 141 N. C. 300. (Annotated)

Contributory negligence of servant.

Question for jury as to, see Trial, 20.

9. A railroad employee injured while crossing the track for the purpose of carrying ice to a car, on a clear day, and at a point where he could have seen an approaching locomotive and tender for a quarter of a mile, cannot recover damages, although the employees in charge of the engine ought to have discovered, but did not discover, his peril in time to prevent the accident, where his negligence continued up to the moment he was hurt, and the exercise of reasonable diligence before that time would have warned him of his danger and enabled him to escape. Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co. 7: 132, 87 Pac. 680, — Kan. — (Annotated)

10. A railroad employee injured while attempting to cross a track for the purpose of icing a car, the circumstances not requiring the crossing to be made at a particular time or place, is not within the rule that an employee who is engaged in the discharge of a duty the performance of which requires him to be near or on the track need not keep a strict watch for approaching trains in order to be deemed to be exercising reasonable care for his own protection. Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co. 7: 132, 87 Pac. 680, — Kan. —

11. That a railroad employee, in the performance of his duties, has frequent occasion to cross the track, does not relieve him from the duty of looking in both directions for an approaching train before undertaking to cross; nor is he relieved from such duty by the fact that the rule and practice of the company to run trains along the track only in one direction, except under unusual circumstances, has been changed without notice to him. Dyerson v. Union P. R. Co. 7: 132, 87 Pac. 680, — Kan. —

Fellow servants.

12. One engaged in digging a trench for a gas main across a public street at night, and the foreman in charge of the gang, are fellow servants, so that the master is not liable for injuries to the former through the failure of the latter to inform him that more cars may be expected on the tracks laid in the street, or in failing to keep watch and warn him of the approach of a car which strikes him. Gereg v. Milwaukee Gas Light Co. 7: 367, 107 N. W. 289, 128 Wis. 35.

13. The act of a pit boss in assisting a miner to run cars out of his room to be taken to the pit mouth is that of a fellow servant, and not of a vice principal. Cavanaugh v. Centerville Block Coal Co. 7: 907, 109 N. W. 303, — Iowa, —

14. A train despatcher of a railroad company, whose duty is to issue telegraphic orders for the movement of trains upon a single-track road, in the name of the superintendent, and to see that they are transmitted, is not a fellow servant of a fireman upon one of the locomotives of the company. Riker v. Central R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 7: 650, 64 Atl. 1068, — N. J. — (Annotated)

15. The negligence of the lineman of an electric light company in reporting that a circuit upon which a wire had been grounded, and which he had been sent to clear, was cleared, without having remedied the trouble, is imputable to the company. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

16. A mine owner is not liable for the negligent act of the pit boss in assisting a miner who was to be paid for the amount of coal delivered, in replacing a loaded car on the track, where the mine owner owed the injured person no duty with respect to such service. Cavanaugh v. Centerville Block Coal Co. 7: 907, 109 N. W. 303, — Iowa, —

17. The malicious acts of an agent of a railway company, who persuaded persons receiving freight to refuse to employ a licensed drayman who had theretofore transported their freight for them, will not impose liability upon the railway company, unless such acts were expressly authorized by it, or were within the scope of the agent's employment, or, if beyond the scope of his employment, were approved and ratified by the company after a full knowledge of his conduct. Southern R. Co. v. Chambers, 7: 926, 55 S. E. 37, 126 Ga. 404.

18. A railway company is liable for damages sustained by a licensed drayman who had contracts with merchants to haul their freight from the depot to their places of business, where the agent of the railway company, knowing of the existence of such contracts, wilfully and maliciously refused to deliver to the drayman goods of such merchants, notwithstanding orders, oral and written, that he should do so. Southern R. Co. v. Chambers, 7: 926, 55 S. E. 37, 126 Ga. 404. (Annotated)

19. A railway company is liable to one who goes to its depot to deal with its agent as to matters connected with the business of the company, and who is insulted and humiliated by the language and conduct of the agent; but if the insult results from the agent's conduct at a place other than that to which the public is invited by the establishment of the agency, the company is not liable, unless the agent's misconduct is authorized or ratified by it. Southern R. Co. v. Chambers, 7: 926, 55 S. E. 37, 126 Ga. 404.

MERGER.

Acquisition by ultimate remainder-man of life estate, see Adverse Possession, 5.

Burden of proof as to, see Evidence, 3.

1. A merger of rights running in favor of odd-numbered water lots under a covenant in a deed imposing upon the even-numbered lots the burden of maintaining a dam and race is not prevented, where one person acquires title to all the lots in the tract, by the subsequent incorporation by the legislature of a water-lot company upon which power is conferred to purchase, hold, and convey the property, which the survivors are authorized to sell in case of the death of one or more of the parties in interest. Muscogee Mfg. Co. v. Eagle & Phenix Mills, 7: 1139, 54 S. E. 1028, 126 Ga. 210.

2. The acquisition of the life estate by the reversioner will merge the fee in him and cut out an intermediate contingent remainder, unless an intention that it shall not do so appears. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

(Annotated)

3. Merger will not take place, even at law, upon the uniting of a particular estate and the fee in the same person, if opposed to the intention of the parties affirmatively appearing or to be implied from the fact that merger would be opposed to the interest of the party in whom the different estates or interests become united. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

Claims; location.

1. A location of a mining claim which complies with the act of Congress, but fails to comply with the local statute as to form and record of notice, will, upon the repeal of the local statute, become valid if the required assessment work has been and is continued. Dwinnell v. Dyer, 7: 763, 78 Pac. 247, 145 Cal. 12. (Annotated)

2. The order in which the acts for the location of a mining claim have been done is immaterial where every act necessary to a complete location has been done before an adverse claim has accrued. Dwinnell v. Dyer, 7: 763, 78 Pac. 247, 145 Cal. 12.

(Annotated)

3. A statute making null and void a mining location which does not comply with its requirements as to marking of boundaries, applies only in favor of conflicting claimants, and does not prevent a correct marking before adverse claims attach. Sharkey v. Candiani, 7: 791, 85 Pac. 219, — Or. —.

(Annotated)

4. The subsequent discovery of mineral-bearing ore validates the location of a mining claim invalid for want of such discovery, in the absence of intervening rights. Sharkey v. Candiani, 7: 791, 85 Pac. 219, — Or. —.

(Annotated)

Abandonment.

5. Mining locators who have not perfected their title, who attempt to point out to another unlocated land, and, after he has selected it, place the stakes of the location for him, will, after they have permitted him to improve it at great expense until he has discovered paying ore, be held to have abandoned their claim so far as it conflicts with the later location. Sharkey v. Candiani, 7: 791, 85 Pac. 219, — Or. —.

Conflicting claims.

Binding effect on partner of act of copartner permitting location of conflicting claim, see Partnership, 5.

6. The issuance of a patent to a mining claim is conclusive to establish all facts necessary to its validity as against one claiming adverse rights. Sharkey v. Candiani, 7: 791, 85 Pac. 219, — Or. —.

Power to mortgage trust estate, see Trusts, 8.

1. Notwithstanding the statute provides that a mortgage of real estate shall not be deemed a conveyance whatever its terms, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession without a foreclosure, a court of equity may, pending foreclosure, impound the rents and profits to be applied in reduction of the debt,—especially, where the rents and profits were pledged in the mortgage to the payment of the debt, in consideration of the release by the mortgagee of other security. Moncrieff v. Hare, 7: 1001, 87 Pac. 1082, — Colo. —.

(Annotated)

2. One to whose trustee the equity of redemption of real estate has been conveyed while the title is in trustees for a mortgagee, and who has not paid more than one sixth of the purchase money, cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser entitled to protection against an attempt to set aside a fraudulent sale under a deed of trust in the chain of title; and the fact that he assumed the outstanding mortgage is immaterial, since his undertaking will fall if the consideration fails. Wasserman v. Metzger, 7: 1019, 54 S. E. 893, 105 Va. 744.

(Annotated)

3. The beneficiary in a deed of trust of real estate to secure notes may procure the setting aside of a sale made in violation of the terms of the trust, as against a purchaser at the sale who was a party to the fraud. Wasserman v. Metzger, 7: 1019, 54 S. E. 893, 105 Va. 744.

4. The bidding in of the property, by one who has taken an assignment of a mortgage as collateral security, at his own foreclosure sale, gives him a good title to the property, and transfers the trust in favor of his debtor to the proceeds, although such assignor, because not within the jurisdiction, was not made a party to the proceedings; where, in a contract after the sale, assignor and assignee contracted for a settlement, one element of which was that the foreclosure proceedings should not be disturbed. Anderson v. Messinger, 7: 1094, 146 Fed. 929, 77 C. C. A. 179.

1. A property owner may, upon an attempt by a municipal corporation to apply a street-opening ordinance to the injury of his property rights, show, if possible, that its passage was obtained by fraud or other unlawful means, or for an unlawful purpose. Kansas City v. Hyde, 7: 639, 96 S. W. 201, 196 Mo. 498. (Annotated)

2. An ordinance forbidding merchants to give out trading stamps in their business is not authorized by constitutional and statutory provisions making lotteries and gift enterprises unlawful. Denver v. Frueauff, 7: 1131, 88 Pac. 389, — Colo. — (Annotated)

3. A municipal council cannot, by arbitrarily defining the giving out of trading stamps as a gift enterprise, bring it within the statutory prohibition of such enterprises. Denver v. Frueauff, 7: 1131, 88 Pac. 389, — Colo. —

Liability for damages.

Liability for injury due to fall on slippery sidewalk, see Highways, 7.

4. A municipal corporation maintaining an electric-light plant, which for compensation installs in a business place a light which is imperfectly insulated, is liable to an employee of the consumer for injuries caused by his coming in contact with an electric current when, to warm his hand, he puts it to the globe. Thomas v. Somerset, 7: 963, 97 S. W. 420, — Ky. —

5. A municipal corporation which permits the maintenance of a prominent thoroughfare in constant use by pedestrians of an aperture covered with iron doors of such character that one may be opened without any guard to protect the hole is liable for an injury caused to a pedestrian who fell through an opening left by the raising of one door, although it had no actual knowledge of the negligent use being made of the opening at the time of the accident, and the cover had been raised only a few minutes, so that it was not chargeable with notice. *Hayes v. 1. To entitle one to a trial of the question of another's negligence which resulted in injury, it is not necessary that the effect of the act or omission complained of would in all cases, or even ordinarily, be to produce the consequences which followed; but it is sufficient if it is reasonably to be apprehended that such an injury might thereby occur to another while exercising his legal right in an ordinarily careful manner. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Slaughter, 7: 597, 79 N. E. 186, — Ind. —

On waters.

2. Those in charge of a steamship creating waves which endanger the lives of the occupants of a small boat near it are bound to stop the normal operation of their boat until the small boat has passed out of the zone of danger. Daniels v. Carney, 7: 920, 42 So. 452, — Ala. — (Annotated)

Of infant.

3. A child under twelve years of age is presumed to be incapable of so understanding and appreciating danger from attempting to remove an article from a machine at rest as to make him guilty of contributory negligence and bar his recovery in case the machine is started to his injury. *Rolin v. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS.

Pain and suffering as element of damages for performance of unauthorized operation, see Damages, 7.

1. The consent by a man to an operation upon his insane wife upon taking her to a hospital is exhausted when the operation is performed and she is taken away, so as not to justify another operation if she subsequently returns to the institution. Pratt v. Davis, 7: 609, 79 N. E. 562, 224 Ill. 300.

2. Consent by a man to an operation upon his wife for the removal of her uterus and ovaries is not shown by the fact that, after an operation of a minor nature to which he consented, which did not prove successful, he complied with a direction to bring his wife again to the surgeon for treatment. Pratt v. Davis, 7: 609, 79 N. E. 562, 224 Ill. 300.

3. When a patient consents to an operation, and unexpected conditions develop, or are discovered in the course of the operation; or when a surgeon is called in an emergency, and some immediate action is found necessary for the preservation of the life or health of the patient,—where it is impracticable to obtain the consent of the patient or anyone authorized to speak for him, the surgeon may perform such operation as good surgery demands, without consent. Pratt v. Davis, 7: 609, 79 N. E. 562, 224 Ill. 300.

4. Failure to obtain the father's consent before administering an anæsthetic to a youth seventeen years old, who, in company with adult relatives, has applied to a surgeon to be relieved of a small tumor, will not render the surgeon liable to the father for the death of the boy under its influence. Bakker v. Welsh, 7: 612, 108 N. W. 94, — Mich. —. (Annotated)

PLEADING.Amendment.

1. No departure in a suit to quiet title to real estate is effected by an amendment seeking to estop defendant from questioning plaintiff's title on the ground that a deed in plaintiff's chain of title had never been delivered, for the reason that defendant claiming under the grantor in the undelivered deed had taken no steps to cancel the record of it, although the bill proceeded merely on the statutory grounds for such action. Alabama Coal & C. Co. v. Gulf Coal & C. Co. 7: 712, 40 So. 397, — Ala. —.

Sufficiency of plaintiff's pleadings.

2. The complaint in an action to hold the owner of a steamship liable for injuries caused to the occupants of a small boat by its negligent management must allege that at the time of the accident those in charge of the boat were acting within the scope and line of their authority. Daniels v. Carney, 7: 920, 42 So. 452, — Ala. —.

3. A complaint in an action to hold the owner of a steamship liable for negligence in its operation so as to cause the capsizing of a small boat by the waves generated by it after knowledge of the peril of the small boat must allege not only that the small boat was actually seen by those in charge of the steamboat, it not being sufficient to allege that it was in plain sight of them, but also that the peril was known to them. Daniels v. Carney, 7: 920, 42 So. 452, — Ala. —.

4. The complaint in an action for injuries resulting from the frightening of plaintiff's horse is not rendered demurrable by failure to allege that the horse was one of ordinary gentleness, if the injury is charged to have been caused by the negligent acts of defendant, the particulars of which are stated. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Slaughter, 7: 597, 79 N. E. 186, — Ind. —.

5. Failure to allege that a hand car and articles thereon were calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness does not render the complaint demurrable, in an action to recover damages for leaving such car and articles near a railroad crossing, which resulted in the frightening of plaintiff's horses, and consequent injury, where it is alleged that defendant carelessly and negligently placed the car upon the crossing, and obstructed the free use of it, as a direct result of which the accident was caused. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Slaughter, 7: 597, 79 N. E. 186, — Ind. —.

6. In an action by a consumer of water to recover damages against a water company which had wrongfully cut off his supply, an averment in the petition, that the company has a monopoly of the business, is not irrelevant and impertinent, since it discloses the pertinent fact that the consumer is wholly dependent on the company for his supply. Freeman v. Macon Gas Light & W. Co. 7: 917, 56 S. E. 61, 126 Ga. 843.

7. An averment in a petition in an action brought against a water company by a consumer to recover damages for the company's wrongful act in cutting off his water supply, that the company acted "without legal cause," is an allegation to the effect that the company, without any justification, wrongfully discontinued to serve him, and is not demurrable as a mere conclusion of law. Freeman v. Macon Gas Light & W. Co. 7: 917, 56 S. E. 61, 126 Ga. 843.

2. Placing one in charge of a sales agency of a manufacturing concern with supervision of sales and local agents does not confer the implied power to borrow money for the concern; and it is immaterial that the principal is a corporation. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Nichols & S. Co. 7: 752, 79 N. E. 38, 223 Ill. 41.

PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Of death by electricity.

1. An electric light company which negligently permits its current to be grounded cannot escape liability for the death of one who innocently comes in contact with it at a point where a stranger has made another ground, on the theory that the particular injury could not have been anticipated by any reasonable man. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

Of injury to passenger.

2. The intoxication of a passenger may be found by the jury not to be a direct and proximate cause of his injury, so as to relieve the carrier from liability for injury to him in consequence of his being removed from the train by employees and left upon a flight of steps, down which he falls to his injury because of his inability to care for himself. Black v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 7: 148, 79 N. E. 797, — Mass. —.

3. The negligent conduct of a street-car conductor in calling a street crossing before his car had arrived at the street announced, thereby inducing a lady passenger to alight, at night and during a severe rain storm, at a strange place remote from her destination, is to be regarded as the proximate cause of injuries sustained by reason of her slipping and falling upon a curbstone which she was unable to see, because of the darkness, while endeavoring with due care to make her way homeward along a street with which she was unfamiliar. Georgia R. & E. Co. v. McAllister, 7: 1177, 54 S. E. 957, 126 Ga. 447. (Annotated)

Of injury by street car.

4. Whatever negligence exists on the part of one in walking along a street car track in the direction in which the cars move, without constantly watching for the approach of cars, is not the proximate cause of his being run down by a car running at high speed, with no attention by the motorman to the track in front of his car, where the pedestrian is guilty of no negligence in failing to hear the car because of noise made by a car on a parallel track. Indianapolis Traction & T. Co. v. Kidd, 7: 143, 79 N. E. 347, — Ind. —.

Of injury to servant.

5. The jury may find that the employment, contrary to statute, of a child in a factory, was the proximate cause of his injury by the starting of the machine by another child after he had put his hand into it to remove an article thrown into it by such other child. Rolin v. R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. 7: 335, 53 S. E. 891, 141 N. C. 300.

6. The defective condition of the track upon which cars are run in a mine, by reason of which a car, loaded by a miner who is to be paid by the amount delivered at the pit mouth, gets off the track, is not the proximate cause of an injury due to his pinching his fingers between the car and an implement which has been employed in attempting to get the car back on the track, where he was at liberty to suit his own convenience and employ his own methods in replacing the car. Cavanaugh v. Centerville Block Coal Co. 7: 907, 109 N. W. 303, — Iowa —.

(Annotated)

7. The invention, by a thirteen-year-old boy, of a device to protect his fingers from the discomfort of handling links upon which he is employed to operate a drill, and which become heated and require handling because of defects in the drilling apparatus, which invention is unprecedented in experience, and the use of which results in the entangling of the boy's hand with the machinery to its injury, is such an intervening cause as to destroy the proximity of the defect in the drill, as a cause for the injury, and to relieve the master from liability therefor. Stefanowski v. Chain Belt Co. 7: 955, 109 N. W. 532, — Wis. —.

Of damage by fright.

8. Fright and resulting illness suffered by a woman whose home was ransacked by trespassers in her presence and in the absence of the rest of the family may properly be found by the jury to be the proximate result of the trespasser's wrongful acts. Lesch v. Great Northern R. Co. 7: 93, 106 N. W. 955, 97 Minn. 503.

Duty to fence.

1. The appropriation, survey, and setting apart of land by a railroad company for depot purposes afford strong, if not conclusive, evidence that its boundaries and extent are such as, and no more than, are necessary and proper; and the limits should not be curtailed or extended by the court or jury unless in a very clear case. Wilmot v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 7: 202, 87 Pac. 528, — Or. —.

2. The depot grounds of a railway company within the meaning of the fence laws are the place where passengers get on and off the trains, and where freight is loaded and unloaded, and include all grounds reasonably necessary and convenient for that purpose, together with the necessary tracks, switches, and turnouts thereon or adjacent thereto for handling and making up trains, storage of cars, and the like, and so much of the main track outside the switches as is requisite for the proper handling of trains at the station. Wilmot v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 7: 202, 87 Pac. 528, — Or. —. (Annotated)

Injury at private crossing.

3. A railroad company which constructs a private farm crossing and permits its frequent use by a tenant of the farm for the benefit of which it is constructed, is, in case of a negligent injury to the tenant at the crossing, subject to the liability of one who has extended an invitation which has been acted on, and cannot treat the injured person as a trespasser or bare licensee. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Slaughter, 7: 597, 79 N. E. 186, — Ind. —. (Annotated)

Frightening horse.

4. A railroad company may be liable, for placing an object calculated to frighten horses upon its right of way near a crossing, to one receiving injuries through the frightening of his horse thereon. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Slaughter, 7: 597, 79 N. E. 186, — Ind. —.

As to merger of estate, see Merger, 2, 3.

1. The vesting of a fee in the grantee of real estate is not prevented by the fact that the land was public and Congress authorized its purchase for the purpose of a public library, the patent, however, containing no conditions or limitations upon the character of estate conveyed. Fordyce v. Woman's Christian Nat. Library Asso. 7: 485, 96 S. W. 155, — Ark. —.

Conditional fee; Shelley's Case; estates tail.

2. If a grant of a life estate to one, habendum to him for life and the heirs of his body and their assigns in fee simple, should not be regarded as vesting a fee in the first taker under the rule in Shelley's Case, it conveys a conditional fee which, in states where the statute de donis is not in force, may, after the birth of a child to the life tenant, be conveyed by him in fee simple. Kepler v. Larson, 7: 1109, 108 N. W. 1033, — Iowa —.

3. The statute de donis, being contrary to the spirit of its institutions, has never been in force in Iowa. Kepler v. Larson, 7: 1109, 108 N. W. 1033, — Iowa —.

4. A grant to one of a life estate, habendum to him during his natural life and to the heirs of his body and their assigns in fee simple, conveys to him a fee under the rule in Shelley's Case, notwithstanding the deed also provides that the wife of the life tenant shall have merely the privilege of living on the premises during his life, and neither the life tenant nor his wife shall have any power to convey, or place encumbrances on, the property. Kepler v. Larson, 7: 1109, 108 N. W. 1033, — Iowa —. (Annotated)

Remainders.

5. If a grant to one for his natural life, habendum to him for life and then to the heirs of his body and their assigns in fee, should be construed as vesting in him a life estate with remainder to the heirs of his body, after the birth of a child to him a conveyance by the reversioners would not destroy the remainder and vest a fee in the life tenant. Kepler v. Larson, 7: 1109, 108 N. W. 1033, — Iowa, —.

RECEIVERS.

Duty to continue operation of railroad purchased at receiver's sale, see Street Railways, 2.

1. That a statute providing for receiver's sale of the property of a street railroad company contains provisions contemplating the continued operation of the road by the purchaser does not prevent a purchaser from becoming the absolute owner of the property, and therefore entitled to remove the tracks from the street. French v. Jones, 7: 525, 78 N. E. 118, 191 Mass. 522.

2. No duty to continue the operation of a street railroad purchased at receiver's sale is imposed by a statute providing that the purchaser shall take the property subject to the same duties and liabilities of the original company, where it also provides that, upon failure for sixty days to organize a company to operate the road, the right of the company to do so shall cease. French v. Jones, 7: 525, 78 N. E. 118, 191 Mass. 522.

The removal of a suit from a state to a Federal court does not confer upon the latter such exclusive jurisdiction that, upon its entering an order of discontinuance, plaintiff cannot institute a new action upon the same cause in the state court, laying the damages so low as to prevent a second removal. *Young v. ROBBERY.

The elements of force and putting in fear, within the statutory definition of robbery, are present where accused approached an intoxicated person and pretended to arrest him, and, after compelling him to go a ways with them, searched and took from him his valuables, he making no resistance because he believed his assailants to be officers, and that they would "lick him" if he resisted. State v. Parsons, 7: 566, 87 Pac. 349, — Wash. —.

ROGUES' GALLERY.

SALE.

1. One who repudiates the purchase of a horse because of false representations on the part of the seller, and turns him into a pasture where he is injured so that he has to be killed, cannot defeat recovery on the purchase-money note so far as the animal had a value at the time the contract was repudiated. Fayette Nat. Bank v. Summers, 7: 694, 54 S. E. 862, 105 Va. 689.

2. The mere acceptance of a purchased article after the agreed time of delivery does not constitute a waiver of damages for failure to deliver in time, unless such acceptance is accompanied by other circumstances which manifest an intention on the part of the buyer to waive such damages. Johnson v. North Baltimore Bottle Glass Co. 7: 1114, 88 Pac. 52, — Kan. —.

(Annotated)

3. After the vendee's refusal to accept and pay for goods, delivery of which was not to be made until payment of the purchase price, it is the duty of the vendor to use ordinary care to preserve the goods between the date on which they should have been accepted and the date on which the vendor proposes to exercise the right of resale; and he cannot hold the vendee responsible for deterioration in the value of the goods during such time, unless it appears that his failure to exercise due care resulted from the conduct of the vendee. Mendel v. Miller, 7: 1184, 56 S. E. 88, 126 Ga. 834.

4. If the vendee of goods shipped, to be paid for on delivery, refuses to accept and pay for them, the vendor may, after giving notice to the vendee, sell the property for the latter's benefit; and when the sale is properly made the vendee is conclusively bound by it, and the amount realized under it, and is liable for the difference between the contract price and the price on resale. Mendel v. Miller, 7: 1184, 56 S. E. 88, 126 Ga. 834.

SCHOOLS.

1. A board of school directors has, under a statute authorizing it to adopt rules and regulations for the well-being of the school, authority to debar members of high-school fraternities organized against its will, although with consent of parents of the pupils, and meeting out of school hours, from participating in certain privileges attendant on membership in the school, such as connection with athletic teams, musical, literary, and military societies, and to deprive them of customary graduation honors. Wayland v. Board of School Directors, 7: 352, 86 Pac. 642, — Wash. —. (Annotated)

2. No unlawful interference with existing contracts is effected by the promulgation of a regulation by the department of public instruction forbidding teachers to wear a distinctively religious garb while in the performance of their duties, since all contracts are impliedly subject to the power of the superintendent to make reasonable regulations as to the management of the schools. O'Connor v. Hendrick, 7: 402, 77 N. E. 612, 184 N. Y. 421.

3. A regulation of the department of public instruction prohibiting teachers in common schools from wearing a distinctively religious garb while engaged in the work of teaching is not unreasonable. O'Connor v. Hendrick, 7: 402, 77 N. E. 612, 184 N. Y. 421. (Annotated)

4. That the teacher is not a party to an appeal to the superintendent of public instruction from the hiring by a school trustee of a teacher wearing a distinctively religious garb does not prevent his decision, which is in fact a regulation of the common schools within his jurisdiction, from being binding on her, although as a mere decision it would not be because she is not a party to the proceeding. O'Connor v. Hendrick, 7: 402, 77 N. E. 612, 184 N. Y. 421.

5. The power of a superintendent of public instruction to make regulations for the management of the public schools is implied from a provision in a statute permitting him to remove trustees for disobeying any "decision, order, or regulation." O'Connor v. Hendrick, 7: 402, 77 N. E. 612, 184 N. Y. 421.

SEARCH.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. An antenuptial marriage settlement by which the groom's father undertakes to make no discrimination among his children in his will is enforceable in equity so as to prevent the enforcement of a provision in the will giving the groom only a life estate, while the portions of testator's other children are made absolute. Phalen v. United States Trust Co. 7: 734, 78 N. E. 943, 186 N. Y. 178. (Annotated)

2. Equity may exercise a judicial discretion in refusing specifically to enforce the provisions of a contract made in contemplation of marriage by which the groom is to secure an absolute estate, if, when suit is brought, his habits are such that enforcement would endanger the estate, or defeat the object of the contract. Phalen v. United States Trust Co. 7: 734, 78 N. E. 943, 186 N. Y. 178.

STATE.

The power to prohibit the use of the national flag does not belong exclusively to the Federal Congress, but may be exercised by the several states. Halter v. State, 7: 1079, 105 N. W. 298, — Neb. —.

STATUTES.

Power of court to inquire into constitutionality of, see Courts, 1.

1. A statute for the punishment of lynching is not defective for failure to define the crime otherwise than by name, or to state that it shall be a felony, if a punishment is prescribed for it. State v. Lewis, 7: 669, 55 S. E. 600, 142 N. C. 626.

Entitling; expression of subject.

2. An act entitled "An Act to Authorize the Use of Voting Machines at Elections," which provides for the creation of a commission to determine whether a particular voting machine may be used effectually to express the will of the voters, is not thereby rendered unconstitutional for failure sufficiently to express the subject-matter of the statute in the title, since the provision for the commission is in no proper sense foreign or dissimilar to the principal subject of legislation. Elwell v. Comstock, 7: 621, 109 N. W. 698, — Minn. —.

Construction.

3. A statutory provision forbidding the discharge of sewage into a river from which a public drinking-water supply is taken is not limited by other provisions of the same statute establishing for inspection purposes a watershed extending 15 miles above the point of intake of such supply. Durham v. Eno Cotton Mills, 7: 321, 54 S. E. 453, 141 N. C. 615.

4. In construing the provisions of an act providing for a new system of raising revenue, and changing the former methods of procedure relating to matters of taxation, the courts are not bound by any administrative construction of the former revenue law. Royal Highlanders v. State, 7: 380, 108 N. W. 183, — Neb. —.

Implied repeal.

5. That a statute providing a limitation period for the presentation of overdue state bonds does not in express terms repeal a statute authorizing them to be tendered in payment for state lands, does not leave the rights accorded by such statute in force, where it provides that, after the expiration of the limitation period, the owner shall be debarred from deriving any benefit from them, and that they shall thereafter be void. Tipton v. Smythe, 7: 714, 94 S. W. 678, 78 Ark. 392.

Amendment.

6. An act may be amended without specific reference to it, where it is itself an amendment of a former act into which, by its terms, it is incorporated, and to which reference is made. State Nat. Bank v. Memphis, 7: 663, 94 S. W. 606, 116 Tenn. 641.

Re-enactment.

7. The efficacy of a statute against lynching is not impaired by splitting it up when carrying it into a revision, and placing the different sections under appropriate heads. State v. Lewis, 7: 669, 55 S. E. 600, 142 N. C. 626.

Proximate cause of injury by, see Proximate Cause, 4.

2. The motorman in charge of a car approaching one discharging passengers at a street crossing is bound to keep a sharp lookout for passengers who may attempt to cross the tracks behind the standing car and have his car under such control that he can stop it at a moment's warning upon the appearance of danger. Louisville City R. Co. v. Hudgins, 7: 152, 98 S. W. 275, — Ky.

3. A street car company is liable for injury to a person walking on its track, by the propelling against him of a car running at high speed, with no watchfulness on the part of the motorman for persons on the track, notwithstanding he may be guilty of some negligence in being on the track, if he is not negligent in failing to discover the approach of the car, so that his negligence is merely a remote cause of the accident. Indianapolis Traction & T. Co. v. Kidd, 7: 143, 79 N. E. 347, — Ind. —.

4. That a passenger alighting from a street car and passing back of it to cross the street is negligent in stepping upon the parallel track without looking for an approaching car does not relieve the street car company from liability for injuries inflicted by such car, if those in charge of it, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have discovered the peril and prevented the injury. Louisville City R. Co. v. Hudgins, 7: 152, 98 S. W. 275, — Ky. —.

SUICIDE.

Of insured, see Insurance, 15, 16.

An attempt to commit suicide is not a crime in the absence of statute making it such, or making suicide a crime. May v. Pennell, 7: 286, 64 Atl. 885, 101 Me. 516.

For what purpose.

1. The power to levy taxes, reposed in the general assembly of the state of Ohio, is subject, without express prohibition, to the inherent limitation that it may be exercised only for a public purpose. Davies v. State ex rel. Boyles, 7: 1196, 78 N. E. 955, 75 Ohio St. 114.

2. The provisions of 97 Ohio Laws, p. 392, that all male blind persons over the age of twenty-one years, and all female blind persons over the age of eighteen years who have been residents of the state for five years and of the county for one year, and have no property or means by which to support themselves, shall be entitled to receive not more than $25 per capita quarterly from the county treasury, —are unconstitutional for the reason that they require the expenditure for a private purpose of public funds raised by taxation. Davies v. State ex rel. Boyles, 7: 1196, 78 N. E. 955, 75 Ohio St. 114. (Annotated)

What taxable; exemptions.

3. Personal property of a nonresident, which, for the performance of a railroad-construction contract, is in the state on the day taxes are to be assessed, is subject to assessment under a statute making taxable all real and personal property in the state. Eoff v. Kennefick, 7: 704, 96 S. W. 986, — Ark. — (Annotated)

4. There is no implied exemption of state bonds from taxation. State Nat. Bank v. Memphis, 7: 663, 94 S. W. 606, 116 Tenn. 641. (Annotated)

5. An attempted exemption from taxation of state bonds violates a constitutional provision that all property shall be taxed. State Nat. Bank v. Memphis, 7: 663, 94 S. W. 606, 116 Tenn. 641.

6. That the revenue law providing for the taxation of old line insurance companies upon their gross premiums for the preceding year exempts fraternal beneficiary associations from such taxation does not evince an intention not to tax them at all, but rather to impose upon their property the same tax that is placed upon the property of individuals, corporations, and other domestic associations. Royal Highlanders v. State, 7: 380, 108 N. W. 183, — Neb. —

7. A fraternal beneficiary association conducted for the mutual benefit of its members and for the purpose of providing, by the collection of stated dues and fees from its members, a fund for the payment of a specified amount upon the death of each member, to a beneficiary named by him, is not a charitable association, and its property and funds are not used exclusively for charitable purposes so as to be exempt from taxation by the laws of the state of Nebraska. Royal Highlanders v. State, 7: 380, 108 N. W. 183, — Neb. — (Annotated)

Valuation.

8. In determining the true value of the credits of a fraternal beneficiary association for assessment purposes, the association is entitled, under the rule that the word "credits," as used in the revenue law, means "net credits," to set off the amount of its outstanding beneficiary certificates, matured and unmatured, against securities in its fidelity or mortuary fund, set apart and devoted exclusively to the payment of such certificates. Royal Highlanders v. State, 7: 380, 108 N. W. 183, — Neb. —

Review; correction; equalization.

9. The objection that a member of a board of equalization was incompetent to serve cannot be raised upon a collateral attack upon the assessment. State Nat. Bank v. Memphis, 7: 663, 94 S. W. 606, 116 Tenn. 641.

10. An appeal is not necessary to enable a board of equalization to revise a tax assessment under a statute providing that the board was created for the purpose of revising the assessment when returned by the tax assessor. State Nat. Bank v. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

TRIAL.Conduct and disposal.

1. Upon discovering an error in the admission of evidence, the court need not discharge the jury and award a new trial, but may cure the error by instructing the jury to disregard the testimony. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

2. Counsel cannot be required to disclose whether or not an insurance company is interested in an action to recover damages for personal injuries, notwithstanding the information is wanted for the purpose of determining the qualification of jurors by ascertaining whether or not they are connected with such companies. Chybowski v. Bucyrus Co. 7: 357, 106 N. W. 833, 127 Wis. 332.

Election between counts.

3. A party setting forth two or more counts in his petition will not be required to elect as to which count he will proceed upon, where each sets forth a separate and distinct cause of action. Southern R. Co. v. Chambers, 7: 926, 55 S. E. 37, 126 Ga. 404.

Reception of evidence.

4. Upon a trial for murder, it is not error to admit in evidence the name and address on a card found in the pocket of accused, in connection with a slip of paper found near the dead body, containing a name and address which are alleged to have been written shortly after the crime was committed, and which are similar to that on the card, as tending to connect accused, through an association of ideas, with the writing on the paper. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

5. Since the fact that a carrier is operating under a lease of tracks and station facilities which makes it subject to the rules and regulations of the lessor does not of itself absolve it from liability for failure to exercise supervision over persons coming to the station to take its trains, necessary to prevent injury by crowding into the cars, it is not error to exclude from evidence the lease, in an action against the carrier for injury caused by such a crowd. Kuhlen v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 7: 729, 79 N. E. 815, — Mass. —.

6. A mere offer of evidence that, prior to the throwing of a missile at a street car to the injury of a passenger, other missiles had been thrown at cars for failure to stop them, is too indefinite. Woas v. St. Louis Transit Co. 7: 231, 96 S. W. 1017, 198 Mo. 664.

Statements of counsel.

7. In the absence of anything to show want of good faith on the part of the prosecuting attorney in making statements in his opening speech to the jury, the court is not in error in relying upon them, although he is not able to produce evidence promised. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

8. It is improper for counsel to attempt to get before the jury by argument evidence which could not be produced by direct proof. Little Rock R. & E. Co. v. Goerner, 7: 97, 95 S. W. 1007, — Ark. —.

Sufficiency of evidence to go to jury.

9. One injured while riding on a freight train is not entitled to have his action for damages go to the jury on the theory that the carrier owed him the measure of duty prescribed for either a passenger or an employee, in the absence of any evidence showing the existence of either relation. Vassor v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 7: 950, 54 S. E. 849, 142 N. C. 68.

10. Suggested defects causing an alleged erratic movement of a machine to the injury of an employee are not sufficient to carry the case to the jury if they amount to no more than baseless conjecture. Chybowski v. Bucyrus Co. 7: 357, 106 N. W. 833, 127 Wis. 332.

11. Evidence that one attempted to use dynamite in blasting, though inexperienced, without smothering the blasts, in consequence of which a rock was cast upon a neighboring house, is sufficient to carry to the jury the question of his negligence. Kimberly v. Howland, 7: 545, 55 S. E. 778, — N. C. —.

Questions of law and fact.

12. Whether or not a stipulation in a bill of lading limiting the liability of the carrier to his own line is understood and assented to by the consignor is a question for the jury to determine. Wabash R. Co. v. Thomas, 7: 1041, 78 N. E. 777, 222 Ill. 337.

13. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that a stipulation in a bill of lading that a claim for damages for injury to freight must be presented within ten days after the freight is removed from the car is reasonable, when applied to live stock, the character of the injury to which cannot be determined within ten days. Wabash R. Co. v. Thomas, 7: 1041, 78 N. E. 777, 222 Ill. 337. (Annotated)

14. Whether or not a depositor exercises reasonable care and diligence in examining his pass book and returned vouchers, and in supervising the conduct of his agent if the latter is permitted to make the examination, is a question for the jury, where there is evidence tending to show that he has not done so. First Nat. Bank v. Richmond Electric Co. 7: 744, 56 S. E. 152, — Va. —.

15. The question whether or not the point where animals killed on a railroad track entered thereon was a part of depot grounds is for the jury, where the evidence is conflicting, or different inferences might be drawn from it. Wilmot v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 7: 202, 87 Pac. 528, — Or. —.

16. Whether or not the turning of horses out to graze upon uninclosed land near a depot is such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery in case they wander onto the tracks and are killed is a question for the jury. Wilmot v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 7: 202, 87 Pac. 528, — Or. —.

17. Although the preliminary question as to the authenticity of standards for the comparison of handwriting is for the court, it is not error to submit the final determination of that question to the jury. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

18. A question of negligence cannot be taken from the jury, although the facts are not disputed, if they are such that from them different minds might honestly draw different conclusions. Williams v. Sleepy Hollow Min. Co. 7: 1170, 86 Pac. 337, — Colo. —.

19. It is only in the clearest cases that the court can take from the jury a question of contributory negligence. Williams v. Sleepy Hollow Min. Co. 7: 1170, 86 Pac. 337, — Colo. —.

20. The jury must determine whether or not an employee in a mine, knowing of water in a neighboring mine, knew, or ought to have known, the danger to himself therefrom. Williams v. Sleepy Hollow Min. Co. 7: 1170, 86 Pac. 337, — Colo. —.

21. Whether or not a child is guilty of contributory negligence in any given case is a question for the jury in view of his age, intelligence, knowledge of the surroundings, and capacity to know and appreciate the danger. Rolin v. R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. 7: 335, 53 S. E. 891, 141 N. C. 300.

22. The jury must determine whether or not a carrier is bound to provide extra men at certain hours of the day to prevent injury to intending passengers on its platforms, the crowding of which at such times is unavoidable. Kuhlen v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 7: 729, 79 N. E. 815, — Mass. —.

23. The question whether or not a master has furnished his servant a reasonably safe machine when he has left an uncovered cogwheel at a point to which the servant's duties may call him is for the jury. Strickland v. Capital City Mills, 7: 426, 54 S. E. 220, 74 S. C. 16.

24. The court cannot say, as matter of law, that a reasonable doubt in the mind of the attending physician as to the contagious character of the disease of a patient would justify the omission to inform the nurse assigned to the case that it might be of a contagious character. Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 7: 496, 64 Atl. 190, 73 N. H. 556.

25. Whether or not managers of a hospital exercise ordinary prudence in delegating a nurse to attend a patient whom they know to be suffering from a contagious disease, but of which fact the nurse is ignorant, is a question for the jury, where their conduct may be explainable upon a theory consistent with due care, or upon a theory showing the absence of due care. Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 7: 496, 64 Atl. 190, 73 N. H. 556.

26. Whether the proprietor of a laundry, after notice that an employee had caught her fingers between the rollers of an ironing mangle which she was operating, exercised ordinary care to release her and to alleviate her suffering, is a question for the jury, where he started the machine, which had been stopped, thereby drawing her hand further in and greatly increasing the injury. Raasch v. Elite Laundry Co. 7: 940, 108 N. W. 477, 98 Minn. 357.

27. In an action for false imprisonment, it is a question for the jury whether the submission of the plaintiff to the control of the defendant was voluntary, or was brought about by fear that force would be used, unless it is clear that there was no reasonable apprehension of force. Hebrew v. Pulis (N. J. Err. & App.) 7: 580, 64 Atl. 121, — N. J. —.

Direction of verdict.

28. When the evidence in plaintiff's favor in an action for personal injuries is contrary to all reasonable probabilities, the court should direct a verdict in favor of defendant. Chybowski v. Bucyrus Co. 7: 357, 106 N. W. 833, 127 Wis. 332.

Instructions.

29. The jury should not be instructed as to the rights of a street-car passenger whose transfer was dishonored if he intended to 7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

pay his fare, where the evidence is that he intended to rely on his transfer and refuse further payment. Little Rock R. & E. Co. v. Goerner, 7: 97, 95 S. W. 1007, — Ark. —.

30. An instruction that a street-car passenger is entitled to courteous treatment, and that the carrier is liable if he is not treated with care and courtesy, without more explicitly defining the duty of the carrier towards him, is too uncertain. Little Rock R. & E. Co. v. Goerner, 7: 97, 95 S. W. 1007, — Ark. —.

31. A charge as to the worldly circumstances of the parties is erroneous in the absence of any evidence upon the subject. Southern R. Co. v. Chambers, 7: 926, 55 S. E. 37, 126 Ga. 404.

32. In an action in which the petition contains two counts, to but one of which an instruction on the worldly circumstances of the parties would be appropriate, the instruction of the court should be such as to inform the jury that the question of worldly circumstances is to be considered only in connection with the one count. Southern R. Co. v. Chambers, 7: 926, 55 S. E. 37, 126 Ga. 404.

33. The court's neglect to instruct the jury of its own motion upon the lesser degrees of the crime for which accused is on trial is not error, in the absence of any exception or request for more specific instructions. State v. Parsons, 7: 566, 87 Pac. 349, — Wash. —.

34. An instruction is not erroneous, in an action for negligent killing, as requiring the jury to determine the proximate cause of death, which informs them that, if the diversion of an electric current was the proximate cause of the death, then defendant is liable, where they have been told the facts necessary to create liability, so that a verdict for plaintiff would merely announce that such facts existed from which the law imposes the liability. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 E. 37, 126 Ga. 404.

35. An instruction is not erroneous in assuming, in an action for injury by a grounded electric-light current, that two grounds existed, when it was conceded by both parties that to cause an accident two grounds must have existed, and the accident was established. Harrison v. Kansas City Electric Light Co. 7: 293, 93 S. W. 951, 195 Mo. 606.

Verdict or findings of jury.

36. Judgment cannot be entered in favor of an employer against whom a verdict is rendered for negligence of his servant, who has obtained a verdict in his favor, on the theory that the verdict is general and controlled by the special verdict in favor of the servant, where there is nothing to indicate which verdict is general and which special. Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 7: 496, 64 Atl. 190, 73 N. H. 556.

Remittitur.

37. A verdict for damages founded in part on incompetent evidence cannot be corrected by the court's requiring a remittitur of the amount, made up of the items to which the incompetent evidence related. Jayne v. Loder, 7: 984, 149 Fed. 21, — C. C. A. —.

1. A trust cannot exist where the same person possesses both the legal estate and the beneficial interest. Doan v. Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension, 7: 1119, 64 Atl. 314, 103 Md. 662.

2. A devise to the vestry of a parish, to be used for such church purposes as the rector of said church shall or may direct, creates no trust, but is for the corporate purposes of the vestry, and vests the absolute title in it. Doan v. Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension, 7: 1119, 64 Atl. 314, 103 Md. 662. (Annotated)

Constructive and resulting trusts.

3. Use of trust property in violation of the trust, by a trustee under an express trust, in the purchase of land which is conveyed to another, who has notice of the trust, creates a constructive, and not an express, trust in the latter. Newman v. Newman, 7: 370, 55 S. E. 377, — W. Va. —.

4. A parol agreement between two persons to purchase a single tract of land together or in partnership, which purchase was finally made by one of them, who paid the whole of the purchase price and took the title to himself, the other simply agreeing to pay him half thereof on demand, will not give rise to a resulting trust in favor of the one who contributed nothing to the payment of the purchase money. Norton v. Brink, 7: 945, 110 N. W. 669, — Neb. —.

Termination.

5. The conveyance of his property by the remainderman, in case property is devised in trust to hold it for the life of one person and convey the remainder to another, will, whether he has acquired the legal title or not, vest the remainder in the grantee; so that, upon the falling in of the life estate and termination of the trust, the statute will vest the use in the grantee, and perfect his title to the whole estate. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Smith v. Moore, 7: 684, 55 S. E. 275, 142 N. C. 277.

6. A testamentary trustee who is instructed to turn the property over to testator's son upon his reaching majority has no authority, after that event, to release property of the testator held by absolute title, to a debtor of the estate who claims that the property was held merely as security for the debt. Anderson v. Messinger, 7: 1094, 146 Fed. 929, 77 C. C. A. 179.

7. No equity is created in favor of the assignor of a mortgage, as collateral security for his debt, by his inducing testamentary trustees of the creditor, after their authority has expired, to quitclaim to him the property which the testator had bought in under foreclosure of the mortgage, on the theory that he held the property in trust to secure the debt; although the debtor, in consequence of the agreement for such deed, continues his payments on the original debt, which payments, however, do not much, if any, exceed the amount remaining due after crediting him with the amount of the bid. *Anderson v. Change of bed.

1. The common-law rule that riparian owners on a navigable river which suddenly changes its channel and leaves its former bed retain title to the line of the former thread of the stream is not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, or the Constitution or statutes of Nebraska, and is applicable in the latter state. Kinkead v. Turgeon, 7: 316, 109 N. W. 744, — Neb. —.

2. An owner of lands fronting on a navigable river and holding title to the thread of the stream, subject to the public easement of navigation, is entitled, where the river suddenly changes its course and abandons its former bed, to the possession and ownership of the land to the line of the former thread of the stream, and may maintain ejectment to oust squatters within such limits. Kinkead v. Turgeon, 7: 316, 109 N. W. 744, — Neb. —.

Use of water; diversion; obstruction.

3. The additional daily flow due to the storage of water during a wet season, to be let down during a dry one, is to be treated as part of the natural flow, in determining the right of a lower mill owner in reference to the use of other mill owners further down the stream. Mason v. Whitney, 7: 289, 78 N. E. 881, — Mass. —.

4. The rights of lower mill owners on a stream are not enlarged by suing jointly to restrain the owner of an upper pond from running his wheels throughout the twenty-four hours, thereby depriving them of the benefit of his storage reservoir. Mason v. Whitney, 7: 289, 78 N. E. 881, — Mass. —.

5. It is not unreasonable for a mill owner, if his own interest requires it, to use the water of the stream in his business, nights as well as days, so long as he leaves the natural flow of the water unobstructed and undiminished during the ordinary working hours of the day; and this is true, although those using the water above him send down most of it during the daytime. Mason v. Whitney, 7: 289, 78 N. E. 881, — Mass. —.

6. A riparian proprietor cannot, even to protect his own land, project jetties into the stream if the effect is to deflect the current or shoal the water to the injury of a lower proprietor. Morton v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 7: 344, 87 Pac. 151, — Or. —.
(Annotated)

7. The passage between an island and the main land through which a portion of the river flows is a channel which cannot be obstructed by one riparian owner to the injury of another. Morton v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 7: 344, 87 Pac. 151, — Or. —.

Surface water.

9. The swollen current of a stream during floods, which has not become separated from the main body of the stream, is not surface water which the riparian proprietor may combat as a common enemy, to the injury of adjoining proprietors. *Morton v. Adverse use; artificial condition.

10. The mere fact that for a long period of time it has been the custom of the owners of mills along a stream to run them only during the working hours of the day, by reason of which the lower owners have gratuitously received the benefit of the pond of an upper mill owner which stored the water of the stream during the idle hours and let it all down during the working hours, does not give them a right to insist on his continuance of such practice, so as to prevent his running his wheels throughout the twenty-four hours. Mason v. Whitney, 7: 289, 78 N. E. 881, — Mass. —.

Water supply; remedy for breach of duty.

See also supra, 8.

11. A private corporation exercising a franchise granted by a municipal corporation pursuant to statute, which confers upon it the right to use the streets of the city on condition that it lays therein its main and furnishes the municipality and its inhabitants with a supply of water at fixed tolls, is liable as a public service corporation for its wrongful act in cutting off the supply of water which it is under a duty to furnish to one of its patrons as a member of the public at large. Freeman v. Macon Gas Light & W. Co. 7: 917, 56 S. E. 61, 126 Ga. 843.

12. Breach of a contract to connect property with a water main and erect a hydrant for its protection from fire does not, where no time is fixed when delivery of the water shall commence, render the company liable for the value of the property in case it is destroyed by fire for want of water to extinguish it, since such injury cannot be reasonably supposed to have been in contemplation of the parties as the result of the breach. Hunt Bros. Co. v. San Lorenzo Water Co. 7: 913, 87 Pac. 1093, — Cal. —.

WATERWORKS.

See Waters, 11, 12.

WILLS.

Creation of trust by, see Trusts, 2.

Signature of attesting witness.

1. A proper attestation of a will by a witness is effected, the other requirements being present, if he holds the end of the pen while it is guided by another in the writing of his name; and it is immaterial that such aid is not necessary because the witness can write. Re Pope, 7: 1193, 52 S. E. 235, 139 N. C. 484. (Annotated)

Misnomer of beneficiary.

2. A misnomer of a corporation will not defeat a devise or bequest to it if its identity is otherwise sufficiently certain. Doan v. Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension, 7: 1119, 64 Atl. 314, 103 Md. 662.

Nature of estate or interest created.

3. A life estate with remainder in succession to the lineal descendants of testator's sons, the surviving son, and testator's brothers and sisters, and not a fee in the sons with executory devises, is created by will giving a moiety of testator's estate to each of his two sons, and continuing: "If either of my sons die without lineal descendants, the one surviving shall take his estate above bequeathed, and, if the survivor dies without lineal descendants, then one half both of the decedent's original portion, as well as one half of the portion taken by survivorship, shall go to" one of testator's brothers, and the other half to his surviving brothers and sisters. Anderson v. Messenger, 7: 1094, 146 Fed. 929, 77 C. C. A. 179.

4. A will giving the testator's widow the power of disposing of his estate "when it shall be for the benefit of the family" does not vest in the widow an absolute estate in fee, but confers a life estate, and creates a trust in her as trustee for the benefit of her children. Newman v. Newman, 7: 370, 55 S. E. 377, — W. Va. —.

Reducing or enlarging interest by other provision.

5. A provision in a will devising property to the vestry of a parish, that it shall be used for such church purposes as shall be designated by the rector, is void for repugnance to the fee. Doan v. Vestry of the Parish of the Ascension, 7: 1119, 64 Atl. 314, 103 Md. 662. (Annotated)

6. A life estate in real estate is not enlarged by a power to dispose of the property by will upon reaching twenty-one years of age. Anderson v. Messenger, 7: 1094, 146 Fed. 929, 77 C. C. A. 179.

Contingent remainder.

7. A contingent remainder with a double aspect, and not an executory devise, is created by a devise to one for life and then to the issue of her body then living, their heirs and assigns, but, in case of want of issue, then to another, his heirs and assigns forever. McCreary v. Coggeshall, 7: 433, 53 S. E. 978, 74 S. C. 42.

Ademption.

8. A bequest by a woman of all money which may become due from insurance upon her husband's life at the time it shall be actually collected and received by her executors is specific, and adeemed by the collection of the fund by the testatrix and her commingling it with her other funds. Nusly v. Curtiss, 7: 592, 85 Pac. 846, — Colo. —. (Annotated)

WITNESSES.

Admissibility of evidence to contradict, see Evidence, 48.

To will, see Wills, 1.

Competency.

1. In an action to set aside a deed for fraud, the grantor cannot testify as to statements made in the presence of the grantee by his attorney at the time of the execution of the deed, where the grantee is dead, under the statute forbidding the admission of evidence of transactions with a person since deceased,—especially where the attorney is dead also. Smith v. Moore, 7: 684, 55 S. E. 275, 142 N. C. 277. (Annotated)

Corroboration.

2. The mere making of contradictory statements on cross-examination does not justify the admission of evidence of prior statements to support the witness by corroborating the testimony given on direct examination, although the contradiction consisted of the admission of the making of prior statements in conflict with the testimony given, so that it may be contended that the testimony is a matter of recent contrivance. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

3. The view of the cross-examination of a witness taken by the attorney general in arguing the case to the jury cannot affect a ruling upon the admissibility of evidence to support the witness, under a view of the cross-examination which the court had a right to take at the time. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.

4. The mere fact that a witness admits that he has talked with a person assisting in preparing the defense in a criminal case does not show such bias or moral duress as to make admissible evidence of statements made prior to that time, tending to support his testimony. Com. v. Tucker, 7: 1056, 76 N. E. 127, 189 Mass. 457.
